ing, and they had contracted a habit of disregarding her complaints. She had never been quite the same lively girl after the scene in Robert Fisher's shop. She complained one day of a pain in her head. Her sister smiled, her brother-in-law raised his eyebrows in contempt, and said "Girls were always so full of fancies." She complained no more. Next day the terrible pain was there still, only increasing with ten-fold violence. She went out, hoping the air might alleviate the agony of that poor head. How it throbbed! Now the pain shot up like a stream of fire into her brain; "was she going mad?" She thought she would look in at Robert's shop-window. On her way, she passed the house of another sister; looking in, wildly and strangely enough, she moaned and said she felt very ill. There was another derisive smile, and—"Oh, Clara, you are always complaining; don't give way so." No pity! She turned to go; by this time she was hardly conscious whither, when another stream of fire shot in at her ears, filling her eyes; she fell heavily to the ground. Her sister (who loved her, though she always refused to credit her ailments) saw it was, indeed, no fancy; she was borne, raving, to her own home. They sent for a physician, but he gave no hope; there had been great mental anxiety, he said, and abscess on the brain had formed. Many days and nights she lay on her bed raving; her friends now not only had the affliction of her sufferings to contend with, but the inextinguishable reflection of their own incredulity and hardness to harass them. She fluctuated long between life and death, and then she awoke one day sensible, calm, but dying. She knew her fate; her life had been so pure, she had little fear of death. She called her friends around her, and begged, when she was dead, that Robert Fisher might see her, "For oh!" said the dying girl, "he did love me dearly, indeed he did." Her weeping and repenting relatives promising compliance, she smiled, folded her hands submissively, and so died.

They sent for him. Nay, the hectoring brother-in-law went to Robert himself, and with tears in his hard eyes, brought him to see the corpse, and beside those still features asked his forgiveness. The young man was overwhelmed—stunned with grief. He kissed those poor pale lips—the first, the last kiss of that youthful lover. "Ah," he said, in answer to their self-reproaches, "I would have been such a loving husband to her!" He took a flower—a winter one it was, a white chrysanthemum—off her dead bosom, and before he left they gave him a tress of her soft chestnut hair.

There is little enough in this story of two simple loving hearts. I often pass his shop; I used to pass purposely in the early days of his bereavement. I wished to see how he bore it, for they say the dead are so soon forgotten. At first I used to see him wandering about the shop, as if in a spell-bound dream; and there was a look about his eyelids which told how he spent his hours of leisure—the time when the prying eyes of the world were not upon him. Few knew his heart's simple history; very few would have cared about it if they had; but to me, there was something exquisitely affecting in the smothered anguish of that boy-lover, compelled to attend unremittingly to the cares of the outward world, soothing as best he might the bitterness of youthful affliction, none near to sympathize, counsel, or console. Months have passed now, since they laid her in her early grave. Still I see him the same, saddened, thoughtful, but calm; older looking, for his young affliction has done the work of years, and aged him much. I wonder sometimes how long it will be before the Phoenix of another love will rise from the ashes of his first. I shrink from the question. Is there such a thing as constancy to the dead? Ought there to be? If there is, it dwells in the pale young man, whom I so often see, leaning his head on his thin white hand, as the last customer leaves his well-stored, well-kept shop.

THE WIDOW'S STORY.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

THE little widow had been sitting by herself in the darkest corner of the room all this time; her pale face often turned anxiously toward the door, and her hollow eyes watching restlessly, as if she expected some one to appear. She was very quiet, very grateful for any little kindness, very meek in the midst of her wildness. There was a strained expression in her eyes, and a certain excited air about her altogether, that was very near insanity; it seemed as if she had once been terrified by some sudden shock, to the verge of madness. She began in a low voice—her eyes still glancing to the door—and spoke as if to herself rather than to the rest of us; speaking low but rapidly—somewhat like a somnambule repeating a lesson:

They advised me not to marry him (she began). They told me he was wild—unprincipled—bad; but I did not care for what they said. I loved him and I disbelieved them. I never thought about his goodness—I only knew that he was beautiful and gifted beyond all that I had ever met with in our narrow society. I loved him, with no passing school-girl fancy, but with my whole heart—my whole soul. I had no life, no joy, no hope without him, and heaven would have been no heaven to me if he had not been there. I say all this, simply to show what a madness of devotion mine was.

My dear mother was very kind to me throughout. She had loved my father, I believe, almost to the same extent; so that she could sympathize with me even while discouraging. She told me that I was wrong and foolish, and that I should repent; but I kissed away the painful lines between her eyes, and made her smile when I tried to prove to her that love was better than prudence. So we married: not so much without the consent as against the wish of my family; and even that wish withheld in sorrow and in love. I remember all this now, and see the true proportions of every thing; then, I was blinded by my passions, and understood nothing.

We went away to our pretty, bright home in one of the neighborhoods of London, near a park. We lived there for many months—I in a state of intoxication rather than of earthly happiness, and he was happy, too, then, for I am sure he was innocent, and I know he loved me. Oh, dreams—dreams!

I did not know my husband's profession. He was always busy and often absent; but he never told what he did. There had been no settlements either, when I married. He said he had a conscientious scruple against them; that they were insulting to a man's honor and degrading to any husband. This was one of the reasons why, at home, they did not wish me to marry him. But I was only glad to be able to show him how I trusted him, by meeting his wishes and refusing, on my own account, to accept the legal protection of settlements. It was such a pride to me to sacrifice all to him. Thus I knew nothing of his real life—his pursuits or his fortunes. I never asked him any questions, as much from indifference to every thing but his love as from a wifely blindness of trust. When he came home at night, sometimes very gay, singing opera songs, and calling me his little Medora, as he used when in a good humor, I was gay too, and grateful. And when he came home moody and irritable—which he used to do, often, after we had been married about three months, once even threatening to strike me, with that fearful glare in his eyes I remember so well, and used to see so often afterward—then I was patient and silent, and never attempted even to take his hand or kiss his forehead when he bade me be still and not interrupt him. He was my law, and his approbation the sunshine of my life; so that my very obedience was selfishness; for my only joy was to see him happy, and my only duty to obey him.

My sister came to visit us. My husband had seen very little of her before our marriage; for she had often been from home when he was with us, down at Hurst Farm—that was the name of my dear mother's place—and I had always fancied they had not liked even the little they had seen of each other. Ellen was never loud or importunate in her opposition. I knew that she did not like the marriage, but she did not interfere. I remember quite well the only time she spoke openly to me on the subject how she flung herself at my knees, with a passion very rare in her, beseeching me to pause and reflect, as if I had sold myself to my ruin when I promised to be Harry's wife. How she prayed! Poor Ellen! I can see her now, with her heavy, uncurled hair falling on her neck as she knelt half undressed, her large eyes full of agony and supplication, like a martyred saint praying. Poor Ellen! I thought her prejudiced then; and this unspoken injustice has lain like a heavy crime on my heart ever since; for I know that I judged her wrongfully, and that I was ungrateful for her love.

She came to see us. This was about a year and a half after I married. She was more beautiful than ever, but somewhat sterner, as well as sadder. She was tall, strong in person, and dignified in manner. There was a certain manly character in her beauty, as well as in her mind, that made one respect and fear her too a little. I do not mean that she was masculine, or hard, or coarse: she was a true woman in grace and gentleness; but she was braver than women in general. She had more self-reliance, was more resolute and steadfast, and infinitely less impulsive, and was more active and powerful in body.

My husband was very kind to her. He paid her great attention; and sometimes I half perceived that he liked her almost better than he liked me—he used to look at her so often; but with such a strange expression in his eyes! I never could quite make it out, whether it was love or hate. Certainly, after she came his manner changed toward me. I was not jealous. I did not suspect this change from any small feeling of wounded self-love, or from any envy of my sister; but I saw it—I felt it in my heart—yet without connecting it with Ellen in any way. I knew that he no longer loved me as he used to do, but I did not think he loved her; at least, not with the same kind of love. I used to be surprised at Ellen's conduct to him. She was more than cold; she was passionately rude and unkind; not so much when I was there as when I was away. For I used to hear her voice speaking in those deep indignant tones that are worse to bear than the harshest scream of passion; and sometimes I used to hear hard words—he speaking at the first soft and pleadingly, often to end in a terrible burst of anger and imprecation. I could not understand why they quarreled. There was a mystery between them that I did not know of; and I did not like to ask them, for I was afraid of them both—as much afraid of Ellen as of my husband—and I felt like a reed between them—as if I should have been crushed beneath any storm I might chance to wake up. So, I was silent—suffering alone, and bearing a cheerful face so far as I could.

Ellen wanted me to return home with her. Soon after she came, and soon after I heard the first dispute between them, she urged me to go back to Hurst Farm; at once, and for a long time. Weak as I am by nature, it has always been a marvel to me since, how strong I was where my love for my husband was concerned. It seemed impossible for me to yield to any pressure against him. I believe now that a very angel could not have turned me from him!

At last she said to me in a low voice: "Mary, this is madness!—it is almost sinful! Can you not see—can you not hear?" And then she stopped and would say no more, though I urged her to tell me what she meant. For this terrible mystery began to weigh on me painfully, and, for all that I trembled so much to fathom it, I had begun to feel that any truth would be better than such a life of dread. I seemed to be living among shadows; my very husband and sister not real, for their real lives were hidden from me. But I was too timid to insist on an explanation, and so things went on in their old way.

In one respect only, changing still more painfully, still more markedly, in my husband's conduct to me. He was like another creature altogether to me now, he was so altered. He seldom spoke to me at all, and he never spoke kindly. All that I did annoyed him, all that I said irritated him; and once (the little widow covered her face with her hands and shuddered) he spurned me with his foot and cursed me, one night in our own room, when I knelt weeping before him, supplicating him, for pity's sake, to tell me how I had offended him. But I said to myself that he was tired, annoyed, and that it was irritating to see a loving woman's tears; and so I excused him, as oftentimes before, and went on loving him all the same—God forgive me for my idolatry!

Things had been very bad of late between Ellen and my husband. But the character of their discord was changed. Instead of reproaching, they watched each other incessantly. They put me in mind of fencers—my husband on the defensive.

"Mary," said my sister to me suddenly, coming to the sofa where I was sitting, embroidering my poor baby's cap, "what does your Harry do in life? What is his profession?"

She fixed her eyes on me earnestly.

"I do not know, darling," I answered, vaguely. "He has no profession that I know of."

"But what fortune has he, then? Did he not tell you what his income was, and how obtained, when he married? To us, he said only that he had so much a year—a thousand a year; and he would say no more. But has he not been more explicit with you?"

"No," I answered, considering; for, indeed, I had never thought of this. I had trusted so blindly to him in every thing that it would have seemed to me a profound insult to have even asked of his affairs. "No, he never told me any thing about his fortune, Ellen. He gives me money when I want it, and is always generous. He seems to have plenty; whenever it is asked for he has it by him, and gives me even more than I require."

Still her eyes kept looking at me in that strange manner. "And this is all you know?"

"Yes—all. What more should I wish to know? Is he not the husband, and has he not absolute right over every thing? I have no business to interfere." The words sound harsher now than they did then, for I spoke lovingly.

Ellen touched the little cap I held. "Does not this make you anxious?" she said. "Can you not fear as a mother, even while you love as a wife?"

"Fear, darling! Why? What should I fear, or whom? What is there, Ellen, on your heart?" I then added, passionately. "Tell me at once; for I know that you have some terrible secret concealed from me; and I would rather know any thing—whatever it may be—than live on, longer, in this kind of suspense and anguish! It is too much for me to bear, Ellen."

She took my hands. "Have you strength?" she said, earnestly. "Could you really bear the truth?" Then seeing my distress, for I had fallen into a kind of hysterical fit—I was very delicate then—she shook her head in despair, and, letting my hands fall heavily on my lap, said, in an under tone, "No, no! she is too weak—too childish!" Then she went up-stairs abruptly; and I heard her walking about her own room for nearly an hour after, in long steady steps.

I have often thought that, had she told me then, and taken me to her heart—her strong, brave, noble heart—I could have derived courage from it, and could have borne the dreadful truth I was forced to know afterward. But the strong are so impatient with us! They leave us too soon—their own strength revolts at our weakness; so we are often left, broken in this weakness, for want of a little patience and sympathy.

Harry came in a short time after Ellen had left me. "What has she been saying?" he cried, passionately. His eyes were wild and bloodshot; his beautiful black hair flung all in disorder about his face.

"Dear Harry, she has said nothing about you," I answered, trembling. "She only asked what was your profession, and how much we had a year. That was all."

"Why did she ask this? What business was it of hers?" cried Harry, fiercely. "Tell me," and he shook me roughly, "what did you answer her, little fool?"

"Oh, nothing;" and I began to cry: it was because he frightened me. "I said, what is true, that I knew nothing of your affairs, as indeed what concern is it of mine? I could say nothing more, Harry."

"Better that than too much," he muttered, and then he flung me harshly back on the sofa, saying, "Tears, and folly, and weakness! The same round—always the same! Why did I marry a mere pretty doll—a plaything—no wife!"

And then he seemed to think he had said too much, for he came to me and kissed me, and said that he loved me. But, for the first time in our married life, his kisses did not soothe me, nor did I believe his assurances.

All that night I heard Ellen walk steadily and unceasing through her room. She never slackened her pace, she never stopped, she never hurried; but the same slow measured tread went on; the firm foot, yet light, falling as if to music, her very step the same mixture of manliness and womanhood as her character.

After this burst of passion Harry's tenderness to me became unbounded; as if he wished to make up to me for some wrong. I need not say how soon I forgave him, nor how much I loved him again. All my love came back in one full, boundless tide; and the current of my being set toward him again as before. If he had asked me for my life then, as his mere fancy, to destroy, I would have given it him. I would have lain down and died, if he had wished to see the flowers grow over my grave.

My husband and Ellen grew more estranged as his affection seemed to return to me. His manner to her was defying; hers to him contemptuous. I heard her call him villain once, in the garden below the windows; at which he laughed—his wicked laugh, and said, "Tell her, and see if she will believe you!"

I was sitting in the window, working. It was a cold, damp day in the late autumn, when those chill fogs of November are just beginning; those fogs with the frost in them, that steal into one's very heart. It was a day when a visible blight is in the air, when death is abroad every where, and suffering and crime. I was alone in the drawing-room. Ellen was up-stairs, and my husband, as I believed, in the city. But I have remembered since, that I heard the hall-door softly opened, and a footstep steal quietly by the drawing-room up the stairs. The evening was just beginning to close in—dull, gray, and ghost-like; the dying daylight melting into the long shadows that stalked like wandering ghosts about the fresh-made grave of nature. I sat working still at some of those small garments about which I dreamed such fond dreams, and wove such large hopes of happiness; and as I sat, while the evening fell heavy about me, a mysterious shadow of evil passed over me—a dread presentiment, a consciousness of ill, that made me tremble as if in ague—angry at myself though, for my folly. But it was reality. It was no hysterical sinking of the spirits that I felt; no mere nervousness or cowardice; it was something I had never known before; a knowledge, a presence, a power, a warning word, a spirit's cry, that had swept by me as the fearful evil marched on to its conclusion.

I heard a faint scream up-stairs. It was so faint I could scarcely distinguish it from a sudden rush of wind through an opening door, or the chirp of a mouse behind the wainscot. Presently, I heard the same sound again; and then a dull, muffled noise overhead, as of some one walking heavily, or dragging a heavy weight across the floor. I sat petrified by fear. A nameless agony was upon me that deprived me of all power of action. I thought of Harry, and I thought of Helen, in an inextricable cipher of misery and agony; but I could not have defined a line in my own mind; I could not have explained what it was I feared. I only knew that it was sorrow that was to come, and sin. I listened, but all was still again; once only, I thought I heard a low moan, and once a muttering voice—which I know now to have been my husband's, speaking passionately to himself.

And then his voice swept stormfully through the house, crying wildly, "Mary, Mary! Quick here! Your sister! Ellen!"

I ran up-stairs. It seems to me now that I almost flew. I found Ellen lying on the floor of her own room, just inside the door; her feet toward the door of my husband's study, which was immediately opposite her room. She was fainting; at least I thought so then. We raised her up between us—my husband trembling more than I—and I unfastened her gown, and threw water on her face, and pushed back her hair; but she did not revive. I told Harry to go for a doctor. A horrid thought was stealing over me; but he lingered, as I fancied, unaccountably and cruelly, though I twice asked him to go. Then I thought that perhaps he was too much overcome; so I went to him, and kissed him, and said, "She will soon be better, Harry," cheerfully, to cheer him. But I felt in my heart that she was no more.

At last, after many urgent entreaties, and after the servants had come up, clustering in a frightened way round the bed—but he sent them away again immediately—he put on his hat and went out, soon returning with a strange man, not our own doctor. This man was rude and coarse, and ordered me aside, as I stood bathing my sister's face, and pulled her arm and hand roughly, to see how dead they fell, and stooped down close to her lips—I thought he touched them even—all in a violent and insolent way, that shocked me and bewildered me. My husband stood in the shadow, ghastly pale, but not interfering.

It was too true what the strange man had said so coarsely. She was dead. Yes; the creature that an hour ago had been so full of life, so beautiful, so resolute, and young, was now a stiffening corpse, inanimate and dead, without life and without hope. Oh! that word had set my brain on fire! Dead! here in my house, under my roof—dead so mysteriously, so strangely—why? How? It was a fearful dream—it was no truth that lay there. I was in a nightmare; I was not sane; and thinking how ghastly it all was, I fainted softly on the bed, no one knowing, till some time after, that I had fallen, and was not praying. When I recovered I was in my own room, alone. Crawling feebly to my sister's door, I found that she had been washed and dressed, and was now laid out on her bed. It struck me that all had been done in strange haste; Harry telling me the servants had done it while I fainted. I knew afterward that he had told them it was I, and that I would have no help. The mystery of it all was soon to be unraveled.

One thing I was decided on—to watch by my sister this night. It was in vain that my husband opposed me; in vain that he coaxed me by his caresses, or tried to terrify me with angry threats. Something of my sister's nature seemed to have passed into me; and unless he had positively prevented me by force, no other means would have had any effect. He gave way to me at last—angrily—and the night came on and found me sitting by the bedside watching my dear sister.

How beautiful she looked! Her face, still with the gentle mark of sorrow on it that it had in life, looked so grand! She was so great, so pure; she was like a goddess sleeping; she was not like a mere woman of this earth. She did not seem to be dead; there was life about her yet, for there was still the look of power and of human sympathy that she used to have when alive. The soul was there still, and love, and knowledge.

By degrees a strange feeling of her living presence in the room came over me. Alone in the still midnight, with no sound, no person near me, it seemed as if I had leisure and power to pass into the world beyond the grave. I felt my sister near me; I felt the passing of her life about me, as when one sleeps, but still is conscious that another life is weaving in with ours. It seemed as if her breath fell warm on my face; as if her shadowy arms held me in their clasp; as if her eyes were looking through the darkness at me; as if I held her hands in mine, and her long hair floated round my forehead. And then, to shake off these fancies, and convince myself that she was really dead, I looked again and again at her lying there: a marble corpse, ice-cold, with the lips set and rigid, and the death band beneath her chin. There she was, stiff in her white shroud, the snowy linen pressing so lightly on her; no life within, no warmth about her, and all my fancies were vain dreams. Then I buried my face in my hands, and wept as if my heart was breaking. And when I turned away my eyes from her, the presence came around me again. So long as I watched her, it was not there; I saw the corpse only; but when I shut this out from me, then it seemed as if a barrier had been removed; and that my sister floated near me again.

I had been praying, sitting thus in these alternate feelings of her spiritual presence and her bodily death, when, raising my head and looking toward the farther corner of the room, I saw, standing at some little distance, my sister Ellen. I saw her distinctly, as distinctly as you may see that red fire blaze. Sadly and lovingly her dark eyes looked at me, sadly her gentle lips smiled, and by look and gesture too she showed me that she wished to speak to me. Strange, I was not frightened. It was so natural to see her there, that for the moment I forgot that she was dead.

"Ellen!" I said, "what is it?"

The figure smiled. It came nearer. Oh! do not say it was fancy! I saw it advance; it came glidingly; I remembered afterward that it did not walk—but it came forward—to the light, and stood not ten paces from me. It looked at me still, in the same sad, gentle way, and somehow—I do not know whether with the hand or by the turning of the head—it showed me the throat, where were the distinct marks of two powerful hands. And then it pointed to its heart; and looking, I saw the broad stain of blood above it. And then I heard her voice—I swear I was not mad—I heard it, I say to you distinctly—whisper softly, “Mary!” and then it said, still more audibly, “Murdered!”

And then the figure vanished, and suddenly the whole room was vacant. That one dread word had sounded as if forced out by the pressure of some strong agony—like a man revealing his life's secret when dying. And when it had been spoken, or rather wailed forth, there was a sudden sweep and chilly rush through the air; and the life, the soul, the presence, fled. I was alone again with Death. The mission had been fulfilled; the warning had been given; and then my sister passed away—for her work with earth was done.

Brave and calm as the strongest man that ever fought on a battle-field, I stood up beside my sister's body. I unfastened her last dress, and threw it back from her chest and shoulders; I raised her head, and took off the bandage from round her face; and then I saw deep black bruises on her throat, the marks of hands that had grappled her from behind, and that had strangled her. And then I looked further, and I saw a small wound below the left breast, about which hung two or three clots of blood, that had oozed up, despite all care and knowledge in her manner of murder. I knew then she had first been suffocated, to prevent her screams, and then stabbed where the wound would bleed inwardly, and show no sign to the mere by-stander.

I covered her up carefully again. I laid the pillow smooth and straight, and laid the heavy head gently down. I drew the shroud close above the dreadful mark of murder. And then—still as calm and resolute as I had been ever since the revelation had come to me—I left the room and passed into my husband's study. It was on me to discover all the truth.

His writing-table was locked. Where my strength came from, I know not; but, with a chisel that was lying on the table, I prised the drawer and broke the lock. I opened it. There was a long and slender dagger lying there, red with blood; a handful of woman's hair rudely severed from the head, lay near it. It was my sister's hair!—that wavy, silken, uncurled auburn hair that I had always loved and admired so much! And near to these again were stamps, and dies, and moulds, and plates, and handwritings with fac-similes beneath, and bankers' checks, and a heap of leaden coin, and piles of incomplete bank-notes; and all the evidences of a coiner's and a forger's trade—the suspicion of which had caused those bitter quarrellings between poor Ellen and my husband—the knowledge of which had caused her death.

With these things I saw also a letter addressed to Ellen in my husband's handwriting. It was an unfinished letter, as if it had displeased him, and he had made another copy. It began with these words—no fear that I should forget them; they are burnt into my brain—“I never really loved her, Ellen; she pleased me, only as a doll would please a child; and I married her from pity, not from love. You, Ellen, you alone could fill my heart; you alone are my fit helpmate. Fly with me, Ellen—” Here, the letter was left unfinished; but it gave me enough to explain all the meaning of the first weeks of my sister's stay here, and why she had called him villain, and why he had told her that she might tell me, and that I would not believe.

I saw it all now. I turned my head, to see my husband standing a few paces behind me. Good Heaven! I have often thought, was that man the same man I had loved so long and fondly!

The strength of horror, not of courage, upheld me. I knew he meant to kill me, but that did not alarm me; I only dreaded lest his hand should touch me. It was not death, it was he I shrank from. I believe if he had touched me then, I should have fallen dead at his feet. I stretched out my arms in horror, to thrust him back, uttering a piercing shriek; and while he made an effort to seize me, overreaching himself in the madness of his fury, I rushed by him, shrieking still, and so fled away into the darkness, where I lived, oh! for many, many months.

When I woke again, I found that my poor baby had died, and that my husband had gone, none knew where. But the fear of his return haunted me. I could get no rest day or night for dread of him; and I felt going mad with the one hard thought forever pitilessly pursuing me—that I should fall again into his hands. I put on widows' weeds—for indeed am I too truly widowed!—and then I began wandering about: wandering in poverty and privation, expecting every moment to meet him face to face; wandering about, so that I may escape the more easily when the moment does come.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

THE UNITED STATES.

VARIOUS topics of public interest have engaged the attention of Congress, but upon none of them has any definite action been taken. On the 2d of January the President sent in a message, presenting an elaborate argument against the policy of making appropriations by the General Government for purposes of internal improvement, and vindicating his own refusal to sign the bill passed at the last session of Congress for that purpose. The main point urged is, that if the power is once conceded to the General Government of making such improvements, there can be no limit fixed to its exercise; and appropriations for draining marshes, constructing bridges, and every thing which tends to develop the resources of the country, will be just as legitimate as appropriations for improving the navigation of rivers and harbors. The President recommends the policy of confining the appropriations by the General Government to the works necessary to be constructed in the exercise of its undisputed powers, and of leaving all others to individual enterprise, or to the States, to be provided for out of their own resources, or by a recurrence to the provision of the Constitution, which authorizes the levying of tonnage duties, with the consent of Congress, for the improvement of harbors. On the 3d, a correspondence was sent in to Congress between the Secretary of War and General Wool, who is in command of the United States troops on the Pacific coast, in regard to complaints by the Government that General Wool has neglected the duties of his command for the purpose of aiding in the prosecution of parties who were preparing invasions of Mexico, in violation of our neutrality laws. The General insists that this was made his principal and paramount duty—a position which is very warmly controverted by the Secretary of War. The correspondence, which shows a good deal of feeling on both sides, was closed by a letter from the Secretary, dated the 18th of December.

The Legislatures of several of the States have commenced their annual sessions during the month. The Legislature of New York met at Albany on the 2d. The Message of Governor Clark, which was transmitted on the same day, shows a very large falling off in the revenues of the State Canals, and a deficiency in the general fund out of which the expenditures of the State Government are met. The receipts of the canals during the year were $2,988,665, and the expenditures $1,237,866, leaving $1,750,799 surplus revenue, very nearly the whole of which is required by the Constitution to be appropriated toward the payment of State debts. The falling off in the revenues is attributed to the drought of the season, the business embarrassments of the country, and the competition of railroads. The Governor recommends that the Common Schools of the State be divested of even the slight remnant of the old system which still adheres to them, and that they be made entirely free to all the children of the State; and that the Academies of the State, so far as possible, be made free to pupils from the Common Schools who shall have attended them for a specified time, and shall pass a satisfactory examination in certain specified studies. He also expresses a wish that the Colleges of the State might be brought into harmony with such a plan, so that they may be recognized as members of the general system of State education, and as essential to its completeness and perfection. The amount of money expended for public schools in the State during the year was $2,666,609; the number of school districts in the State is 11,798, and the number of scholars in attendance was 877,201; there were also 87,406 in attendance in academies, and 84,279 in unincorporated private schools. The condition of the various benevolent and penal institutions of the State is fully set forth, and various important reforms are suggested. The Governor recommends the enactment of a law which shall prohibit the sale of all intoxicating liquors, so guarded as to protect personal rights, and give no just cause of complaint to those whose interests may be affected by the legislation desired. He also urges the importance of maintaining and making still more stringent the laws forbidding usury; recommends restrictions upon the issue of railroad bonds; and insists on the necessity of so reforming the traffic in stocks as to divest it of those features which render it little better than gambling. Regret is expressed at the failure of Congress to enact a protective tariff law, and on the veto by the President of the bill for internal improvements. The history of the Missouri Compromise is rehearsed, for the purpose of showing that its repeal at the last session of Congress was unjust and inexpedient, and that good faith and the best interests of the whole country demand its restoration.—The Assembly was organized by the election of Dewitt C. Littlejohn speaker, and R. M. Shearman clerk. The action of the Legislature thus far has not been important.—In Massachusetts the Legislature met on the 3d. The newly-elected Governor, Mr. Gardner, was inaugurated on the 9th: his address on the occasion was devoted mainly to a consideration of the dangers to be apprehended from the foreign population in our midst, and the duties of our Legislature in regard to them. A large portion of the poverty and crime of the country is attributed to them; and the necessity of measures to place the legislative control of the country in the hands of the native citizens is strongly urged. He recommends that every foreign tongue should be discarded; that all documents be printed in the English language only; that all military companies founded on and developing exclusive foreign sympathies be disbanded; that the Bible be retained in common schools; and that the control of the country be retained in the hands of its native citizens. He regards the attainment of these objects as far more important than the accomplishment of any party end whatever. The people of Massachusetts, he says, believe that our rights, privileges, and liberties are endangered by the influx of foreign influences which has increased so rapidly within a few years past. They distrust influences nursed in customs and creeds antagonistic to republicanism; and venal, ignorant, and vicious voters, controlled by those who have other objects in view than those required by the public good. A few select naturalization courts should be established, the proceedings of which should be carefully guarded by stringent regulations; and steps should be taken to withstand the intrigues of those who would pervert the Church to political purposes, either openly or under a secret allegiance to a foreign ecclesiastical Power. The Governor recommends an amendment of the Constitution so as to prohibit the diversion of the educational funds of the State to the establishment or support of sectarian schools; another prohibiting the exercise of the elective franchise within the State to all of alien birth, qualified by naturalization, until they shall have resided twenty-one years within the State; a third, by which no person shall be permitted to vote who can not read the English language; and a fourth, excluding from office all but legal voters according to previous suggestions. He urges also the passage of a law exempting all alien citizens from military duty, and forbidding the payment of the State bounty to any military company which has enrolled among its members persons of foreign birth. Foreign paupers and lunatics shipped here by cruelty and avarice, he says, should be sent back. In addition to these measures of State legislation, the Governor says that various enactments by the federal authority are desired in accordance with the principles of those whom he represents. They wish our army Americanized, our navy nationalized. They wish the restriction as to birth, now applicable to the office of President, extended to members of the Cabinet and of Congress, to Judges of the Supreme Court, and to all our diplomatic representatives abroad. They desire a vital amendment of the naturalization laws, and an uniform requirement of twenty-one years in the United States before the elective franchise is conferred upon aliens; and they wish stringent national laws regarding immigration, the imposition of an uniform and sufficient capitation tax, and the universal deportation of criminals and paupers shipped to our shores. The Governor also speaks very strongly against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and the general encroachments of slavery.—The Legislature of Michigan met at Lansing on the 8d. The Governor's Message states that the surplus in the treasury, on the 30th of November, was $553,004; the indebtedness of the State was $3,818,245; and the receipts of the treasury for the year were $610,609. He recommends the passage of a general railroad law; the prohibition of bank-bills of a denomination under five dollars; the repeal of the prohibitory liquor law, and in its stead the passage of a law prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors in a less quantity than one gallon; the amendment of the Constitution so as to provide for annual legislative sessions of forty days, or biennial, of eighty days; the amendment of the laws relating to mining companies, so that they may increase their capitals to $2,000,000, now limited to $500,000, and the non-passage of the general banking law.—In Missouri, the Legislature met on the 27th of December. The Message of Governor Price states the balance in the treasury at $250,000; recommends the application of the surplus to the payment of the State debt, the extension of the charter and increase of the capital of the State Bank, a special tax for the support of schools, and measures to secure from the General Government a mail and telegraph line between the Mississippi and the Pacific.

From California our intelligence is to the 16th of December. Mining operations seem to have received a fresh stimulus from the discovery of new mines, and especially in consequence of finding some very remarkable specimens of quartz rock containing gold. It is reported that, in Calaveras county, a lump of quartz gold was found weighing 161 pounds, from which a deduction of twenty pounds for rock is said to be a large allowance; its value is estimated at $38,916; it is undoubtedly the largest lump of pure gold ever found in the world.

AUSTRIA.

The only intelligence of interest from Central Europe relates to the conclusion of a treaty between Austria and the Western Powers. The treaty stipulates, 1. That the three Powers would not enter into any arrangement with the Imperial Court of Russia without having first deliberated thereupon in common. 2. The Emperor of Austria engages to defend the frontier of the Principalities, occupied by his troops, against any return of the Russians; and stipulates that this occupation shall not interfere with the free movement of the Anglo-French or Ottoman troops upon those territories against the military forces or the territory of Russia. There shall also be formed at Vienna, between the plenipotentiaries of Austria, France, and Great Britain, a commission to which Turkey shall be invited to send a plenipotentiary, and which shall be charged with examining and regulating every question relating either to the exceptional and provisional state in which the said Principalities are now placed, or to the free passage of the different armies across their territory. 3. In case hostilities should break out between Russia and Austria, the three Powers mutually promise to each other their offensive and defensive alliance in the present war, and agree for that purpose to employ, according to the requirements of the war, military and naval forces, the number, description, and destination whereof shall, if occasion should arise, be determined by subsequent arrangements. 4. In the case contemplated by this article, the three Powers engage not to entertain any overture or proposition on the part of Russia, having for its object the cessation of hostilities, without having come to an understanding thereupon among themselves. 5. In case the re-establishment of peace should not be assured before the 1st of January, 1855, the three Powers agree to deliberate without delay upon effectual means for obtaining the object of their alliance. 6. The three Powers will jointly communicate this treaty to the Court of Prussia, and will receive with satisfaction its accession thereto, in case it shall promise its co-operation for the accomplishment of the common object. 7. The treaty was to be ratified and ratifications exchanged within a fortnight from its date, which was Dec. 2.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Parliament met on the 12th of December, and was opened by the Queen in person. The royal speech stated that the object for which Parliament had been called together was to take such measures as would secure the prosecution of the war with the utmost vigor and effect. Her Majesty said she could not doubt that they shared her own conviction of the necessity of sparing no effort to augment the forces in the Crimea; the exertions they have made and the victories obtained have not been surpassed in the brightest page of their history. The hearty and efficient co-operation of the French can not fail to cement the alliance between the two nations. A treaty of alliance has been concluded with the Emperor of Austria, from which important advantages are anticipated to the common cause; a treaty has also been concluded with the United States, by which subjects of long and difficult discussion have been amicably adjusted. Although the prosecution of the war will naturally engage chief attention, the hope is expressed that other matters of great interest and importance to the general welfare will not be neglected.—In the House of Lords, the reply to the address was moved by the Duke of Leeds and seconded by Lord Ashburton, who urged unanimity and cordial support of their allies, especially of Austria, who risks more in the war than either France or England. The Earl of Derby followed in a long speech, designed to set forth the course which the conservative opposition to the Government intend to pursue. He congratulated the House on the altered tone of the Queen's speech as compared with that of last year, and said that the Ministry had at last been brought to see that no course could be taken but the most direct, the safest and the most honorable, because the boldest. He pronounced an eloquent and elaborate eulogy on the courage and achievements of the army, and proceeded to criticise the errors of the Ministry. His principal charge was that they had shown no foresight—that they had not foreseen the magnitude of the war, and had done nothing on the scale which facts required. He entered into details to justify his censure, and closed by expressing doubts as to the sincerity of Austria in the policy she had adopted. He was answered by the Duke of Newcastle, who followed his objections in detail—vindicating the objects of the war, which he said, were, first to defend Turkey; and secondly, to obtain securities against the recurrence of an attempt on the independence and integrity of Turkey. He confessed the error which had been committed in supposing that Sebastopol was to be easily taken, but vindicated all the measures of the Government for the prosecution of the war, both in the Baltic and in the Crimea—giving copious details, and speaking at great length. Earl Grey, saying that he was one of the few who had opposed the war from the beginning, acknowledged the good it had already done, but could not conceal his dissatisfaction with the way in which it had been carried on; every thing, he said, had been done too late; the resources of science had not been properly adopted. After speeches from several others, the Earl of Aberdeen closed the debate of the day by replying to charges against the Ministry. He insisted that the reduction of Sebastopol, by crippling the power of Russia, would contribute more effectually than any thing else that could be done to secure the independence of Turkey, and denied that in the treaty with Austria England had bound herself in any way to aid in suppressing insurrection in Hungary or Italy.—In the House of Commons, after the address had been moved by Mr. Henry Herbert, Sir John Pakington made a speech in opposition, adhering very closely to the line of remark which the Earl of Derby had adopted in the House of Lords, and expressing the belief that the course of Austria had proved eminently serviceable to Russia. Sir Robert Peel defended the policy of the Government, but urged that something should be done to prevent such speeches as had recently been made by Kossuth and Victor Hugo concerning the war. Mr. Sydney Herbert followed, vindicating the measures of the Government at great length. Mr. Layard next spoke, assailing the conduct of the war, mainly on the ground of its lack of vigor and promptitude, and calling on the Ministry to take a course more in harmony with the vigorous spirit and zeal of the country. Mr. Disraeli, in a speech of two hours, analyzed the whole progress of the war, and condemned the action of the Government, and especially the treaty with Austria. Lord John Russell, after reviewing the opposition speeches that had been made, spoke of the Austrian treaty, acknowledging that she had not agreed to take part in the war, but only that if she should find herself at war with Russia, that fact alone should place her in alliance with the Western Powers, and that before the end of the year she would take into consideration what steps she would be prepared to take with respect to the terms of peace with Russia. He said that this certainly did not bind her to any thing very precise, but his belief and expectation was, that Austria does concur with the Western Powers with respect to the basis necessary for the security of Turkey, and that if Russia does not concede that basis, in the next campaign the forces of Austria will be joined to those of England and France.—In the House of Lords the Duke of Newcastle, after the address had been adopted, moved for leave to hire the services of 15,000 foreign troops, urging as a reason the necessity of increasing the forces engaged in the war, and the difficulty in supplying the requisition from the English population alone. He declined to state whence the troops would come, but said that Parliament must be aware that certain districts in Germany and Switzerland were most likely to furnish them. The Earl of Ellenborough opposed the bill with warmth. Taken in connection with another bill in the House of Commons, authorizing the employment of portions of the British militia to garrison certain ports in the Mediterranean, he said the practical object of the measure was to authorize the substitution in England of fifteen thousand foreign mercenaries for the same number of British militia-men who were to be employed abroad. This was simply to sacrifice a great constitutional principle to cover up the failure of Government, and that, too, without any necessity, for he believed the people of England fully able and willing to yield all the support needed to carry on the war. The moral character of German troops was inferior to that of the English, and he thought it would be extremely dangerous to rely upon them for the suppression of domestic violence, nor did he believe they would prove equal in the field either to the English or French. The Duke of Richmond replied very briefly, and was followed by the Earl of Derby, who thought no encouragement to the Emperor of Russia could be so great as the fact that in the first year of the war the resources of the country were exhausted and the government was obliged to go abroad for troops to carry on the war. He thought it would be extremely hard to send the militia to do garrison duty in the Mediterranean, and declared that the permanent utility of the militia would be completely destroyed by the policy proposed. The Earl of Aberdeen, in reply, said that it was not intended to introduce foreign troops into Great Britain for any permanent purpose, but only for drill and discipline; as soon as they were properly prepared they would be sent abroad. Nor would any of the militia but volunteers be sent to do garrison duty in the Mediterranean. He thought the measure entirely free from the objections which had been urged against it. After remarks from other lords, the Duke of Newcastle replied, denying that there was any intention on the part of government to substitute foreign troops for militia in England, or to maintain them within the country. The Queen already had power to employ foreign soldiers; all that was desired by this bill was to obtain permission to bring them to England for discipline and preparation. The resources of the country were not exhausted; the only difficulty was that time had not yet been afforded to secure their full and proper development. The bill was discussed at considerable length on succeeding days, but was finally passed in the House of Commons by a vote of 173 to 135.—Lord Palmerston, on the 14th, brought forward a bill authorizing the acceptance of voluntary offers that might be made by militia regiments to engage in service abroad. It was not designed, he said, to send them to take part in the war, but only to relieve certain garrisons in the Mediterranean, so that the troops now there might be available for the war.—On the 15th a vote of thanks was moved in both Houses to the British forces in the East for the gallantry and heroism which they have displayed during the recent struggle in the Crimea.

On the 29th of November, at the celebration of the anniversary of the Polish revolution, Ex-Governor Kossuth made a speech in review of the policy of the war, which excited a good deal of attention. He spoke in eloquent terms of the heroism displayed by the British troops in the Crimea, and of the valor and constancy they had evinced in the battles of the Alma, at Balaklava and at Inkermann. But he insisted that the policy of England in the conduct of the war had been wrong in its direction, and inefficient, unsuccessful, and disastrous in its details. The campaign in the Baltic had failed for lack of the co-operation of Sweden: and that was only to be secured by calling Poland to arms. England had endeavored to strike a blow at the commerce of Russia, and had only succeeded in turning it to Prussia. The expedition to the Crimea was a very great mistake, as nothing effectual could be done there toward attaining the object of the war. The failure to attack Russia through Poland, and the suspension of operations on the Danube, had enabled the Czar to send very large reinforcements to the Crimea; and the neglect to take possession of the isthmus of Perekop had left Sebastopol open to his troops. This was the real cause of the obstinate defense of that place, and of the immense losses the Allies had sustained. The main point of Kossuth's speech was to show that England had sacrificed the real interest and object of the war to the alliance with Austria—that she was bartering away the freedom of Poland, Hungary, Italy, and Germany for the precarious and disreputable friendship of the Hapsburgs and the Brandenburgers. He insisted that the theatre of the war should be shifted—that Poland should be summoned to arms, and an attack made upon Russia from that direction.

FRANCE.

The session of the Legislative body was opened on the 26th of December, by the Emperor in person. His speech was firm and decided. "Our arms," he says, "have been victorious in the Baltic and the Black Sea. Two great battles have shed lustre upon our flag. A striking testimony has proved the intimacy of our relations with England. The British Parliament has voted thanks to our generals and soldiers. A great empire, reinvigorated by the chivalrous spirit of its sovereign, has separated itself from the power which for forty years has menaced the independence of Europe. The Emperor of Austria has concluded a treaty, defensive at present, soon, perhaps, offensive, which unites his cause to that of France and England." The alliance, he says, with England is not one of mere passing interest, but is a union for the cause of civilization and the liberty of Europe. In addition to the thanks now offered to England, the Emperor hopes next year to be able to offer a similar acknowledgment to Germany. A high tribute is paid to the zeal and courage of the army, which have contended against so many obstacles. War, he says, entails cruel sacrifices, yet the present contest must be vigorously continued. The French army consists of 581,000 men and 113,000 horses. The navy is manned by 62,000 sailors. This force must be kept up, and a levy of 140,000 men is demanded. Special inducements are to be offered to secure the re-enlistment of those whose term of service has expired, in order to secure as large a number as possible of trained soldiers. The Emperor also demands authority to contract a new loan to meet the expenses of the war. In spite of the pressure of the war, he says that the revenues of the State have not declined; the great works of public utility are continued, and a bountiful harvest has been vouchsafed. New sources of labor have been created to obviate the public distress occasioned by the high price of provisions. The Industrial Exhibition, shortly to be opened, will present the remarkable spectacle of a country carrying on a war at a distance of 600 leagues, and at the same time developing its own internal riches—"a country where the genius of the nation reveals itself in every thing which tends to the glory of France." The speech of the Emperor was received with great applause, and has extorted the warm commendation even of the English liberal press, as rising fully to the level of the occasion, equaling in eloquence, and surpassing in dignity those of the first Napoleon.

THE EASTERN WAR.

Our advices from the Crimea come down to December 20th. Nothing of decided importance has occurred since the battle of Inkermann, November 5th. Both the Russians and the Allies appear to have so thoroughly exhausted themselves as to be incapable of active efforts. The weather has become very severe. Incessant rains have set in, rendering the plateau occupied by the Allies an expanse of mud. It is only by the utmost exertions that the supplies absolutely essential to the English troops are conveyed from Balaklava to the positions before Sebastopol, a distance of five or six miles. A number of transports containing large quantities of supplies have been wrecked by a violent storm in the Black Sea. Their loss has been severely felt. The English troops suffer greatly from fatigue, privation, and exposure. The French, owing to their superior system of ambulance, and the better training of the men in the labors of the camp, have been less unfortunate. The mortality among the Turkish soldiers is very serious. It is supposed that the sufferings of the Russian soldiers in the field must be even greater than those endured by the Allies. They have receded from some of their advanced positions, carrying off all their artillery. The French works have been pushed to within 150 yards of the Russian batteries. From Sebastopol a succession of nocturnal sallies has been made, chiefly directed against the French positions. The Russians are uniformly driven back, with considerable loss, and without effecting much damage. The Russian outworks have been considerably weakened, and they have somewhat contracted their line of defense; but their interior works have been so far strengthened that the fortifications are supposed to be absolutely stronger than at the beginning of the investment. On the 6th of December, two Russian steamers, having six gunboats in tow, came out from the harbor, and commenced firing upon a French steamer lying close inshore. Upon the approach of two English steamers the Russians retired. It thus appears that a passage has been left among the vessels sunk by the Russians at the mouth of the harbor. The opening is wide enough to admit of the passage of but a single vessel, and is commanded by the Russian batteries. The forces of the Allies before Sebastopol are stated to amount to 105,000 men, of whom 48,000 French, 23,000 English, 14,000 Turks, with 20,000 marines, chiefly English. Reinforcements are immediately expected of 24,000 English and French, and 35,000 Turks, which will raise the allied forces to 164,000 men. The troops are anxiously awaiting orders for a general assault.

Editor's Table.

OLD ENGLAND is a subject which may well follow Young America in our monthly editorials; and as we have furnished our readers with quite a liberal supply of the latter article, they will doubtless be grateful enough to indulge us in a few thoughts on the other and less popular topic. It may have less to stimulate our self-esteem, or our national "organ of approbateness;" still it has a deep interest for ourselves, especially in our outward relations to the civilized and Christianized world. Old England, our father-land—or, as we are more in the habit of styling it, our mother-land—is now hard bested in a war more arduous, more critical, more perilous to her rank, if not her very existence among nations, than, perhaps, any former contest in which she was ever engaged.

It is a righteous war on her part. The declared issue, the real issue, is one in which England has the right beyond all question. As far, too, as such a conflict can be ever righteously entered into without a due regard to the best national interests, it is an unselfish war. It is a war involving the highest questions of the world's welfare. It is a war on which would seem to be staked the destinies of Europe. It is a war of civilization against barbarism, of constitutional liberty against despotism. It is a war for supporting the faith of treaties. It is undertaken in defense of a weaker nation unjustly invaded by a powerful neighbor, and with demands utterly destructive of its national independence, and even of its very nationality itself. It is a war demanded, not simply by the English Ministry—who were, in fact, very reluctant to engage in it, and with the best reasons for such reluctance—but by the great English people. It is a war which has enlisted the enthusiasm of all ranks in a nation most Christian, most intelligent, most civilized, most philanthropic, most like ourselves in all the best and higher attributes of humanity. It is a war which has the all but unanimous assent of a people whose substantial and numerous middle class is distinguished, among all others, for a healthy moral sense, or a public conscience most keenly sensible to right, and most alive to all questions of practical philanthropy. It is, last though not least among considerations that may be adduced to our own national feelings, a war waged by a people nearly allied to us in all things that should constitute a national brotherhood. They are of our blood; they are our kindred—our near relations. Four or five degrees of consanguinity bring us into one family. Our near forefathers sleep in English burying-grounds. A generation farther carries us back to the days when they cultivated the same fields, and dwelt beneath the same roofs, and worshiped God in the same temples, with those whose descendants are now expending their wealth, and pouring out their best blood in this most sanguinary and perilous strife. We, too, are Anglo-Saxons. There have been times when we have gloried in the name, and regarded it as our great badge of superiority. But there never was a period when we had more reason to be proud of the distinction it confers. Who would not feel an emotion of exultant pride when he thinks that he is related to the heroes of Alma, or that there flows in his veins a stream of life akin to that which was so heroically poured forth on the sanguinary field of Inkermann?

Every thing calls upon us to take part with England in this conflict—in feeling at least, with all our hearts and souls; and with our hands, too, if the safety of the old mother-land should ever require our departing from the position of national neutrality. And yet how different the fact, how greatly opposed to all this the unnatural spectacle we actually present, if we may judge from our newspapers as at all evidence of the genuine public sentiment. We certainly do not wish to differ with the press—much less to censure the press. We feel that it would be an unequal conflict. But it is impossible to shut the eyes to what we conceive to be an unnatural position of our newspapers, both secular and religious, on this the greatest issue in modern history. The fact can not be denied or disguised, that in this dread strife between Russia and England, the sympathies of the American press are mainly if not wholly with the former. The fact, we say, can not be disguised, although there is sometimes manifested a redeeming sense of shame that would seek to give it a less odious appearance. Every arrival from Europe reveals it, that many, if not the majority of our editors wish well to the cause of the Autocrat, and rejoice in the losses and perils of old England.

It may be that this is all seeming. It may come from a prudential yet false calculation that such is, or would be likely to be, the popular sentiment, and that, therefore, it is for the interest of the press to appear, at least, to forestall it. If such a calculation exists, we believe it to be a very mistaken one. It relies too much on the supposition of that narrow hatred to England which is thought to have grown out of former collisions with the parent land, and which the small souls of either nation have done so much to cherish. We do not believe that there is such a public sentiment—or rather, we do not believe that there was such a public sentiment until the press took steps to create it. In the reciprocal action upon each other of writer and reader—of those who think only through the newspapers, and those who in catering for public sentiment are only giving and getting back, oftentimes, the foolish echo of their own voices—in the action and reaction, we say, of these classes upon each other, there may grow up some such unreal public opinion, in which both parties are mutually deceivers and deceived. This may have also come, at first, from caprice, from the desire of being thought bold and original in one's views of public affairs, or from a conceit in taking the more paradoxical side of a question. But whatever may have been the cause, or the beginning of it, such a sentiment does now widely exist as far as the press is concerned.

The version almost always given to the latest news shows it unmistakably. Credit is given to the Russian rather than the English accounts, although the duplicity and false faith of the former power has been so undeniably proved. The losses of the allies are magnified, or every disposition manifested to set them at the largest sum. There is evident satisfaction in predictions of their ill success. Men sitting in their editorial closets, men who have never seen a field of battle, or learned even the alphabet of military science, do not hesitate to criticise the movements and siege operations of the allied armies. Lord Raglan and General Canrobert are charged with incompetency on the faith of a public haranguer, who although engaged in exciting revolutions, never exhibited any evidence of personal courage, and who repays the hospitality and protection of the generous English nation by every effort he can make, at this critical time, to embarrass the action of its authorities. In short, the whole management and morale of the English and French armies are freely censured, in a manner which shows how freely they would cast still more dishonorable imputations upon them if they only dared to do so in the face of facts that prove a personal heroism unmatched by any thing that ever existed in the grandest days of the ancient chivalry.

Now it may be said that all this comes only from that love of truth and fairness for which the American press is so remarkably distinguished. The British have certainly sustained severe losses, why should we not tell of it? there is a prospect of their failure, why should we not set it before our readers? True—there is no direct answer to this, whatever, in some cases, we might think of its sincerity. Truth by all means; but then there are two modes of telling the truth—in the style and tone of friends, or in that of enemies. The language of our newspapers in giving an account of English losses is not generally that of friends. There is a tone of satisfaction, if not of exultation about it which can not easily be hidden. The feeling has even gone farther than this. Amidst affected condolences for the victims of national or ministerial ambition, has there not been—or is the supposition altogether uncharitable—has there not been, in some quarters, an unmistakable manifestation of a wise and prudent complacency, to say the least, whenever there was an opportunity to tell of the ravages of cholera among these brave men, or to make predictions of their anticipated sufferings amidst the snows and storms of a Crimean winter.

Thank God, we may believe that such exhibitions have been confined to few. Still it is nothing more than what, at other times, and under other circumstances has come out of that morbid appetite for news and excitement which finally may become the very love of evil per se, and which it is sometimes the tendency of an unrestrained press to call forth. Taking it, however, in its best and mildest aspect, this attitude toward England does exist. It is, on the part of many—we hope not of a majority—a position not merely of neutrality, not merely of indifference. It is a feeling of positive dislike, of real and positive hostility.

But there are reasons for it, it may be said. Let us examine them. The war is not a just war—there was no cause for it in any attack of Russia upon Turkey; and if there had been, England had no right to meddle with it. Now the refutation of this consists in the bare presentment of some of the plainest, best known facts. Russia had made demands upon the Turkish empire, by the granting of which it would have become utterly denationalized. They were resisted, just as we would have resisted the demands of any European Power to take a religious and political supervision of all our Roman Catholic population, with the right of appeal to such foreign Power against what they might deem the oppression, or injustice, of our own government. There were circumstances in the known toleration of the Turk, especially as experienced by our own American missionaries, and the known intolerance of Russia, that made such claim to the last degree odious—more odious, too, from its hypocrisy than from its political injustice. On the rejection of this insolent demand, the stronger Power immediately marched its armies into the territories of the weaker. Now, in such circumstances, the latter had a right to expect the assistance of other nations, and they were bound to give it. The attack was a wrong to the whole European community. Aside from the dangerous preponderance of physical power which its success would have given to the invading party, its impunity would have been a moral mischief, a political mischief, of a still graver kind. It would have destroyed all security in the Law of Nations, and all the hopes of peace that can come from the enforcement of its observation.

All honor to the peace societies, and to the good and Christian men who through them are endeavoring to bring up our fallen world to the Gospel standard. Their error is not so much in their grand principle of pacification, as in their mode of applying it, or rather not applying it at all, to extreme cases. Most certainly, let all gentle means be first assayed. So say all sober men. Let no pacific step be omitted that can possibly be tried. Let there be notes, and protocols, and overtures, and patient diplomacy suffering long and trying all expedients. In other words, let negotiation be carried to its utmost length, as it was carried in this case. Every thing before a resort to force. But if these avail not, what then? Surely there must be something else, or there is no peace. Peace is not submission to unjust demands. There is no peace between individuals, when one lies crushed and crouching at the feet of the other. That is not the beautiful thing we call peace, although there be an absence of all active violence. And so is it with nations. Peace is harmony of relation; it is mutual respect of each other's rights. Peace is concord, agreement, pact, compact. Such is the root-meaning of its Latin name, from whence comes our own word. Its Greek etymology contains a no less beautiful and significant idea. Peace is a binding, a bond, a covenant, a mutual understanding by which each party is intelligently bound, whether this be by express contract, or arise impliedly out of mutual relations. Hence they are keepers of the peace who cause such bonds to be observed. They are keepers of the peace who bid the strong stand back and hold their hands off the weak, and who, on refusal, can compel them, and do compel them, to obey such bidding. Even in conflicts among individuals, there may be occasions when a resort to other law would be too slow a remedy, and there is no other way but to knock the bully down. But in respect to nations, the whole question assumes a different and peculiar aspect, taking it out of the methods, though not out of the principle applicable to individual cases. War is not necessarily vindicative, as so many assume, or like the case of the individual righting himself. When properly viewed, justifiable war is a judicial act, though pronounced by one nation because of the want of some higher earthly tribunal. But as no nation ought to go to war unless indubitably in the right, and then only after the exhaustion of patient negotiation, so ought it to seek, and to have, the co-operation of other powers; and thus the objects of the peace associations are realized by their theoretical idea being carried out in actual practice. It is a "congress of nations," but one with authority. It is a "congress of nations" who having exhausted negotiation, or, in other words, legislative and judicial action, are now sitting in executive session for the purpose of carrying out the decree. Such execution of public law is the true moral suasion; for it is teaching the lawless a lesson in political ethics which they will learn in no other way. Thus England, France, and Austria are now a congress of nations for the purpose of bringing to order the barbarian disturber of the public peace. To let him have his way, would not be peace. It would be the farthest possible from the true idea of peace. It would be a vile wrong; it would be gross injustice; it would be a grating discord, a harsh and painful jar upon the world's moral sense; it would be war, and worse than war, in its direct forms.

We might rest the whole argument on this question of political ethics. But there are utilitarian or prudential aspects that are not to be overlooked. Successful impunity would have given a great preponderance of strength to that one nation from whom, above all others, Europe has most to fear. Russia at Constantinople, with the unchecked command of the Black and Caspian seas, with a superiority in the Eastern Mediterranean, with all that once formed the Turkish empire in Europe and Asia, together with Egypt at her feet—pushing on her conquests undisturbed toward India and China—crowding Sweden and Denmark into the narrowest quarters, and finally by her fortresses becoming the undisputed mistress of the Baltic, with Prussia for her crouching slave, and the other German states her overawed tributaries—all these events long threatening, and now about to have their successful commencement in the submission of the Sultan—all this, we say, made more and more imperative the reasons for suppressing what, aside from these momentous prudential issues, ought to be suppressed as a violation of political ethics, and, in this sense, a common wrong to all the nations of the earth. Such is the wrong which comes from every act of national aggression that is suffered to be perpetrated with impunity.

On the broad ground, then, of the law of nations—on every consideration of the world's moral and physical welfare—Turkey was right in resisting the unjust demands of Russia, and England was right in helping her. But there was another item to be taken into account. England had treaties with this wronged and invaded nation. She was bound by solemn compact to guarantee the integrity of her national independence; and when the demand for its fulfillment came, there was but one answer to be made to the requisition. It was the simplest of all questions of right, the obligation of contract, yet concurring with all these other reasons, ethical as well as prudential, in producing a case of as perfect political righteousness as was ever recorded in the annals of history.

With the Czar there was no such necessity. He had only to let Turkey alone, to keep his armies out of her provinces, and to mind his own proper business in creating as good a civilization as he could in the vast barbarian region that Providence had placed under his care. Had he done so, the peace of Europe would have been preserved. The reluctance on the other side to engage in the war is well known. It was made the reproach of the British ministry by the very writers whose hostility has only become the more embittered by the evidences of their present activity.

England, then, was in the right. This ought to have been enough for every editor and every statesman of principle. England was in the right, and on this account alone, all our enthusiasm should have gone with her in the conflict. England was in the right, and this should have been kept solely and steadily in view by us, without looking back to past unhappy differences, or sideways to any contemptible cod-fish disputes, or Greytown bickerings. England was in the right in a war with the great monster despotism of the earth, and we should have been so absorbed in this single question of right, as to allow no differences of opinion on the mere form of constitutional government—seeing that each nation enjoyed the glorious substance—to prevent our going heart and soul with her in the terrific struggle. All our trifling differences with the mother-land may easily be settled hereafter, as they have been before. In the hour of magnanimity which succeeds the hour of triumph, she may calmly take a lesson from us in respect to reform in her own institutions, as well as to the measure of effort she should put forth for the common cause of constitutional freedom in Europe. But whatever may be our differences on any of these questions, we say again, England was in the right, and for all right seeking minds this was enough. It should have commanded our deepest national and individual sympathies in her righteous cause.

But England is hostile to us. We read in our infallible oracles of ominous designs entertained by her against this country. This feeling is mainly cherished by some of the foreign correspondents of our newspapers. Among these gentlemen there are those whom we may truly and unaffectedly admire as models of truthfulness. Confining themselves to patent and accessible facts, the information they convey is of the most reliable, as well as of the most useful kind. Others of these "Men of Letters" seem to be possessed of the mythical ring of Gyges, by means of which they enter invisibly into all the cabinets of Europe, and penetrate their most hidden counsels. They tell us that England is not only continually engaged in thwarting our diplomacy respecting Cuba and Mosquito kings, but is actually intending, at some convenient opportunity, to bombard our towns. To be sure—for all this there is not a particle of proof. The evidence derived from the manifest interest of England to be on good terms with us, as well as from the earnest professions of her leading men, is all the other way. And yet, in the face of interest, and the highest probability, there is yet cherished this morbid feeling of distrust toward a people with whom there is every motive, physical, moral, and political, to be on terms of closest friendship and alliance.

But again, England is selfish in this war. There is no argument that meets us so frequently in the newspapers, or is so often echoed back by the class of readers whose "thinking for themselves" is ever the parrot-like repetition of the very language and ideas of the morning sheet. England is selfish in all this, say this original and independent class of reasoners. The argument is false, but its falsehood is exceeded by its superlative folly. It is a very foolish argument, however common it may be, because in its simplicity it so utterly ignores our own national history. Heroic we doubtless have been, brave we have been, righteous have been our wars, but where is it that they have not been selfish? Do we not lay ourselves open here to a retort from others, especially from those who do not know our own worth as well as we know it ourselves? We are, undoubtedly, the greatest people in the world. The assertion is warranted by our immense territory, our rapidly increasing population, our free government, our growing power, and the universally known enterprise of our citizens. We are the most intelligent people, the most enlightened, the best educated, the most just, the most liberal, the most disinterestedly generous toward all other nations, especially toward feeble sister republics on our own continent. We are the freest people on earth, the most independent in our thinking, the most tolerant of all other men's thinking; we give the widest license to the utterance of all sentiments, on all subjects. The aim of our nationality is the largest freedom of all men of the whole human race. Our Puritan fathers came over here for the very purpose of establishing the democratic principle—the religious and Puritan sternness, together with their theological dogmatism, were only subordinate and collateral traits of character. Our Cavalier forefathers brought with them in embryo the Jeffersonian doctrines, and the resolutions of ninety-eight. From the days of Raleigh and Vane have these seeds been germinating, and we now stand forth the representatives and the champions of the widest liberty to all men in all the world. Our whole history, too, has been the practical carrying out of this national justice and generosity. "Seeing, then, that these things are not to be spoken against," as was well observed by the wise town clerk of Ephesus in his speech to the patriotic shrine-builders of that city—"seeing these things are not to be spoken against," nor written against, we, of course, make them the ground of our political oratory, of our popular lecturing, and our patriotic editorials.

But others do not see so much disinterestedness in our past history. They discover, or pretend to discover, not a little human nature in our public men, or public servants as they style themselves. They may doubt, or pretend to doubt, whether the editors of New York are more honest and more intelligent than those of Liverpool or London. In their national blindness and stubbornness they may raise the questions, whether public opinion on all subjects does not find as free vent in England as in America—whether the moral sense of the substantial population of Great Britain is not as healthy, as keenly sensitive to right, and as influential with national authorities, as any similar love of right is known to be among ourselves—and finally, whether public men in the British Parliament, and the British Cabinet, may not be as pure, as disinterested, as free from party feeling, or factious, or sectional motive, as the public men at Washington or Albany. Thus he might doubt, however plain the matter may be to ourselves. He might raise a question whether our wars have been always and wholly disinterested. He might be very unreasonable in this, or in the spirit and temper with which he made the charge; but in all seriousness, and with the highest reason might he maintain, that if a national conflict were wholly disinterested, it could hardly, in the present state of the world, be either intrinsically righteous or outwardly justifiable.

What do we mean by selfishness as applied to a nation? As used of an individual the term is plain enough; but when predicated of national action the idea becomes more complicated. The analogy of the State to the single man does doubtless hold true to a certain extent, and is to be maintained for many purposes; but in this comparison of the nation to the individual, it should be the individual of the largest relations, and whose single sphere takes in the widest circle of subordinate interests. The nation acts as one man, and yet it may be said, that in this one existence we call the State, there is a plurality of powers and responsibilities, from which it follows that the duties which the State owes to itself are much wider than those the individual owes to himself. Of course, then, there can not be the same rule or measure of selfishness. This division of powers and responsibilities in a State is the greater, and the more numerous, in proportion to the freedom inherent in its constitution—in other words, the sovereignty of pure law which is to the State what reason is to the individual. A despotism may act from a single will, and may thus sometimes seem to act heroically, or chivalrously, while this irresponsible will is cruelly disregarding of the national interests as well as the interests of the world. Thus Nicholas affects to be fighting for religion, and has made his stupid subjects believe it, while to some minds England may exhibit the aspect of prudential calculation. So a wild democracy may act from popular impulse. It, too, may have the appearance of disinterestedness, while in rejecting all calculation it may be only a throwing off of all responsibility; it does not estimate expediencies, but it may only be because the blind feeling is too intensely selfish to be capable of reasoning. In a constitutional State, the public acts being neither those of a single will, nor of a single unchecked popular impulse, must more or less take this appearance of prudential estimate. The State is one corporate existence to all without, but within, in proportion to its freedom, are wide diversities of relations and responsibilities. There is, in such cases a present administration acting not for themselves but for the people, and there is a present age acting for posterity. Thus viewed, the duties and interests of a nation demand a rule of judging, and an estimate of selfishness, quite different from that of the individual. The interests of a nation may be the interests of a large part, and that the highest part, of the human race. They may involve the interests of civilization, of Christianity, of Europe, of the world.

In this way what the political sophist declaims against as selfishness, may be the truest righteousness. Granting, then, that along with other reasons, it may have been in the minds of the British statesmen that the time had come to act in defense of their Eastern empire, what rational right has any one, on that account, to stigmatize the war as selfish? Was it the selfishness of Russell, or Aberdeen, or Palmerston? What were they to gain by it individually? They knew too well, from the past history of English administrations, how much personal and official peril they would incur by the possible reverses of such a war, and hence, perhaps, one reason of their extreme reluctance. No—it was the command of the English people, the noble, generous, English people, that right-loving race to whom we are proud of being akin, that urged them on. It was the voice of this free and intelligent people, declaring that the time had come for the observance of treaties, for the righting of the broken law of nations, and last, yet not less just, nor, therefore, less honorable—for making a careful calculation as to how much the preservation of old England, or of her political rank in Europe and in the East was worth for posterity and the world.

But the British statesmen were not sincere. Why not? What had they to gain by duplicity? Nicholas might play that game; for he had no one to detect him, or who would charge him with it in his own dominions. But a British ministry have upon them the eyes of a jealous parliament, of a still more jealous press, and of a nation pre-eminent for intelligence. Do such considerations secure honest men among our own public servants? Do they make our cabinets honest, our congressmen honest, our editors honest? So we say. Why, then, should not the same causes have the same effect on Russell, Aberdeen, Gladstone, and the editor of the London Times?

The Russian correspondence has been brought up as an evidence to the contrary. We regret that our space does not permit us to go into the close consideration of this, or do more than express the earnest conviction, derived from the most careful study, that seldom have there been state papers more honorable to their authors, than those against which some have uttered so much reproach. We can only give our conclusions here, without our reasons. These letters were certainly courteous, nay, even courtier-like, it may be said; they did not call Nicholas a robber and a barbarian; it would not have been wise to have used any such language of indignant rebuke as Kossuth and Cobden would have had them do; they evidently wrote like men who were not talking to Buncombe, as our phrase is; and yet they were firm, clear, explicit, unhesitating in their opposition to a scheme which they regarded as a public wrong, as well as a national injury. The correspondence speaks for itself to every careful reader; but the great difficulty is, the reading of such papers, as they ought to be read, costs time, and patience, and study. All this is irksome, and, therefore, there are few who will take the pains necessary to a right judgment. To read the slashing newspaper paragraph, and then to fancy it our own thinking, because such has become a daily and habitual process—this is easy—this is perfectly plain and simple, too, and therefore, to many minds, it must be the surest, because the easiest, road to truth.

But why did they not engage in the war sooner? We might content ourselves on this point, with showing the inconsistency, to give it no worse name, of those who censure its reluctant commencement, while its vigorous prosecution, since the invasion of the Crimea, only brings out more distinctly their feeling against England. But the whole subject is too serious a one for such small game. It suggests ideas respecting the nature and issue of the present war in Europe of the most momentous kind, and which would fully answer the question often so flippantly put. Why were they so reluctant to engage in this renewed strife of the nations? Why did they previously exhaust every means and hope of negotiation, even at the risk of their personal popularity? It was because they were far-seeing statesmen, and withal, benevolent and Christian men. It was, too, because with all their sagacity, they could not tell how near it might be to the close of the 19th century before this war should terminate. The bloody commencement is an index of what it may be, but it needed not this to make an honest administration pause reluctant, try all things, yield all things but right and national faith, and national existence, rather than rashly engage in a conflict involving such tremendous issues.

There are also other views of this war that have for us an especial interest. The tolerance of the Turk to the American missionaries had much to do with arousing the zeal of Nicholas for his charge, the Greek Church. His claim of tolerance for his "co-religionists," as some style them, was simply a claim that they should be tolerated in their intolerance to all seceders from their communion. The facts, besides being known through our missionary journals, were clearly brought out in an able speech of Lord Shaftesbury in the British parliament; but we can not dwell upon them. The present state of Europe, both in its conservative and revolutionary aspects as connected with the present war, might furnish a rich subject of editorial discussion. The interest of such a topic varies, of course, with the current of events; but there can hardly be any change in European politics which could diminish its importance.

Editor's Easy Chair.

WE are glad to publish the following letter, because it treats of little annoyances from which most of our readers must have suffered, and which nobody ever finds time to mention. Yet the truth is that the comfort of life depends upon little things, and not upon the great events. A man who was to be hung in the morning would not wish to lie in damp sheets, nor would a merchant who knew that he was to fail next week be any more reconciled, for that reason, to underdone turkey. There is an insolent swagger of mock-heroism which is very fond of saying, when a man complains that he has the toothache, "Well, what's that? suppose you had broken your leg!" It is not easy to discover the wit or wisdom of such a reply, which generally springs from a coarse nature and a want of sympathy. It goes upon the assumption that discomfort and deprivation are the normal state of man. For our own part, we have no idea of liking, nor of professing to like, slack-baked bread, because the cake might have been burnt to a cinder.

There is a remedy which our scornful friend has not thought of.

Discharge the cook.

There is no more obvious nor common mistake than the supposition that because a hero can endure every thing, therefore it is a want of heroism not to put up with every thing.

"Pooh! pooh!" says old Hunx; "suppose your feet are wet! Are you such a baby as to take cold? Can't you stand a little damp? Here, put Miss Nancy to bed!"

If it were worth while to answer such a man, it might be suggested that wet feet were not pleasant—that the Lord made man to go on the earth, and not in the water.

"Pooh! pooh!" old Hunx would say to a fish; "what are you flapping about? Can't you stand a little air and good hard ground? Don't make such a row; only be quiet, and you'll be gutted and fixed all in good time."

Hunx passes for a hero. He ruins his health by thanking God that he can eat whatever is set before him; he has no dainty stomach—not he;

and so he bolts slack bread, and tough meat, and all the garbage of public tables. He can get on without washing every morning—he hopes he doesn't require to be scrubbed like a tavern floor. He talks loud, and swaggers and blusters, and ha-ha's in a melancholy manner, as if noise were wit, and bluster fun, and a general row extreme sociability. "I'm too good for nothing, and nothing's too good for me," says Hunx, with silly vanity.

But let any favorite plan fail, let him lose a few hundred dollars, let him be cornered by any real misfortune, and lo! Hunx collapses. He who was so great in little things is very small in great things. Ten to one, we say, that the man who values his health so much that he will not eat the stuff called dinner at the tavern, will consider that health worth fighting for more valiantly when the coach is stopped by robbers, much more valiantly indeed than he who so little respected the decencies of existence that he actually drank that whitish-green liquid called coffee in the tavern vernacular. Who would fight for a body made up of such materials!

The eloquent appeals and protests of our correspondent have really affected our own equanimity. But we have traveled in other years, and know that no man can really enjoy the prospect of a lovely landscape with a grain of dust in his eye; so are we convinced that the profoundest pleasure of travel is known only to those who would not walk in shoes that pinched, nor smoke cigars when they were made sick by them, nor eat things that were sure to occasion headache and dyspepsia. We cordially advise our young friends to save their heroism for real crises. In any world where Hunx is a hero, heroism is unknown.

Now we will introduce the letter, begging our sweet readers not to hold us responsible for the indignation and denunciation of our correspondent:

"DEAR EASY CHAIR—Business has driven me to the West during the winter months, and I have been laughing bitterly at old Bishop Berkeley the whole way. While 'the course of empire' is taking its way westward, I prefer to remain in the East. When it has arrived, and is settled, then I shall be glad to see if it is any better than the old state of things. If I could only have been boxed up in Boston, and safely delivered on the banks of the Mississippi, I should have been contented; and I don't doubt every body else would have been satisfied. There is nothing to see on the way. In the winter the landscape is extinguished under dingy snow and dull gray fogs. The trees stand dripping wretchedly, and you approach every town through the shabbiest possible suburbs—tumble-down shanties and shops, with a relieving view of back-yards and windows.

"Then along the 'New York Central' you have the stately stations at every city. I like to hear the democratic American, with his legs over as many seats as he can subject to them, with his wide-waving hands and loud-wagging tongue, declaim through his nose at the despotic governments which pretend to be paternal, and in the pauses of his spitting and snatches of negro songs, reviling a state of society of which he has never had any experience. Presently he puts his feet down to step out into a damp and dark wooden shed, full of every kind of inconvenience, swarming with an eager crowd, and no one to tell them where to go; the few officials who are seen either not knowing, or not choosing to do, the very things for which they are made officials; every body and every thing in a wild uproar and confusion—children crying, women rushing and bumping about with bundles and babies, men munching apples and swearing—a momentary Babel, perfectly free and independent, with the largest liberty of going wrong and doing wrong to every individual.

"This is our railroad station. In the terrible despotic countries the details of travel are managed so that you are not in danger of losing your luggage, temper, time, and money whenever the train stops. An official is a personage who holds office for a particular purpose, and he fulfills it. If you are going wrong, he tells you so; and if you ask him whether you are going right, he does not slam the door in your face, or give you an answer as if he were making you a present of a thousand dollars. Doors through which you are not to pass are locked. Doors through which you are not to pass till a certain time, are locked until that time. If you think fit to rage, and assert the inalienable rights of man by breaking your shins against the door, you may enjoy that period satisfactorily. But if you break the door also, then the inalienable rights of other men (of which a pseudo-democracy is so carefully negligent) are involved, and you are put behind doors more securely locked. Of course it is all very tyrannical, but still it is for the greatest good of the greatest number, which, you will remember, is the motto of your favorite journal, 'The Bungtown Banner and Foe to Tyrants.'

"The truth is, that there is no more comparison in the comfort of traveling between the realms of one of the tyrants to which the Bungtown Banner opposes such an unbending front and the free and equal dominions of 'the States,' than there is between the spacious, stately, convenient, and beautiful station-houses in those realms, and the dingy, dismal, wooden shanties which serve to distil rain and gloom upon the enlightened American when he reaches what is called a dépot at home. Where the railway is managed by government, it is managed well for the comfort and pleasure of the passenger. You never find yourself going to Rouen when you meant to go to Lyons. Your neighbor is not permitted to hang his filthy boots over the back of the seat under your nose—nor to peel apples and throw the parings at the stove—nor to roar songs which you do not wish your wife and daughter to hear—nor to spit and spew until you go by water rather than by land. In fact, just as restless boys are made to behave themselves in school, for the sake of the general comfort—which is the purest democratic principle—so men are made to behave themselves in cars and diligences.

"Suppose you are an American citizen, and belong to the biggest and most braggadocio country in the world, does that give you any right to assail my boots with your saliva, my ears with your howling and oaths, and my sense of decency with general disgust? Because you are an American citizen must you cease to be a gentleman? Because you are an American citizen must you fling apple parings against a hot iron stove, and fill a small close car with horrid odors? Because you are an American citizen must you laugh, and whistle, and sing as if you were in a desert? Can't American citizens sit up straight, and talk without slang or swearing? Can't an American citizen eat the peel of his apple, or, if he doesn't like it, throw it out of the window? Must an American citizen, when he has bought a pie that he doesn't find to his taste, throw it under the stove or on the floor, and make very loud and very poor jokes at the expense of the boy who sold it? Above all, can not an American citizen refrain from eating rank cheese in hot cars, dropping the crumbs, to be smashed and slipped over, until, with cheese, and apple-parings, and pea-nuts, and bad pies wasting under the stove, and a copious libation of tobacco juice, such a fetid steam possesses the car, that he is a brave man who reaches the next inviting station without an oath or a headache?

"Why also must American mothers at the West instantly betake themselves to cars upon the birth of a baby? Half of the winter I have been shut up in a nursery on wheels. My dear Easy Chair, you know that I have no objection to babies in the abstract, but I have to babies in the cars. And why, when they kick, and plunge, and scream because they are cross and uncomfortable—which they have a perfect right to be, and which I certainly would be if I were a baby"—why must the simple mamma put her hand to the darling's head and say, apologetically, and loud enough to be heard by the whole car,

"Ah! has Dorcas-Maria a bad headache this morning?"

"My dear madam, babies never have bad headaches in the morning; but they are often and naturally very cross in cars. I wish I had the liberty of crying and kicking when I feel cross in the cars.

"Then there are railroad dinners!—Oh! my dear Easy Chair, I used to think nothing could surpass the horror of 'a feed' upon the Erie Railroad—but I have found deeper depths.

"The cars stop. A sharp voice roars, 'Ten minutes to dinner.' A stampede of passengers ensues. They rush at two long tables, covered with plates of mashed potato, and small bits of hard ham, and impossible-looking beef. Every body immediately plunges into every thing. The hog in man is instantly manifested. Men take their knives from their mouths to put them into butter and salt. Nobody helps his neighbor—but a wild Irishman asks if you will have mutten, turkey, or pork. You select, and it is brought. Shut your eyes, and proceed.

"'Sarce, Sir!' says a filthy wench, dumping down a small plate full of a liquefied black mess—which directly ends your dinner.

"'Beefsteak, Sir!' hisses the wild waiter; for beefsteak has become one of our peculiar institutions, and only with great dexterity and chronic disgust can it be avoided.

"The moment the crowd invested the tables, an unpleasant-looking woman, with a huge pail of some stagnant-looking liquor, began rushing along the line of diners and pouring from the pail into the cup of every guest. It was coffee, ready milked and sugared. Coffee! good heavens! and Father Mathew wants to persuade the world that such stuff is better for the coats of the human stomach than the juice of the grape! I venture to bet any sum that the amount of misery to the human family would be greatly lessened, if every railroad passenger in the State of Ohio drank at dinner a cupful of Longworth's Catawba instead of this nauseous preparation called coffee. They drink more dyspepsia and suffering for the unborn generations in that mixture than they would easily believe.

"But just as I am ready to begin eating, I see that every body is done, and is paying a York shilling at the door to the proprietor.

"'Time's up—all aboard!' shouts the conductor. Another stampede, and the train is under way.

"Now, my friend, is life really so short that the American citizen can not allow time enough to eat his dinner? or is that country so desperately well worth living in where you go too fast to live at all? Why not take half an hour longer for dinner every day, and arrive half an hour later at the end of your journey? You are the greatest of fools to be railing at other countries, where travel is made delightful, not only by the myriad objects of historical and poetic interest, but by the amenities of its arrangements—where you are not compelled to swallow half-masticated morsels of meat that should never be eaten at all, nor choke with draughts of a stuff that nobody but an American citizen would ever think of drinking, because the train may slip off and leave you. There is time, there is order. You shall eat your dinner comfortably, and then you shall mount betimes and travel safely. You will find every convenience, and the little stations along the road (as in Baden) shall each be a picture as you pass.

"When I travel in my own country, dear Easy Chair, I had rather be any thing else than an American citizen. I am perfectly loyal to the principles of my Government—but I can not find the connection between filth of every kind, disgust, distaste, discomfort, and Democracy. If they are indissolubly connected, why, then, as I can individually think in my heart what I please, I prefer the chances of a despotism!

"There is, in truth, no tyranny like that of an ignorant Democracy. The American citizen may swell as much as he pleases, but he is far from being the most agreeable human figure that a traveler encounters. What do I care that you bully me with your doctrine of the rights of man, if you won't leave me my right to be pleased or displeased with what I choose? Here you are, somewhere, angry with this letter of mine to my old friend Easy Chair, because it says that the American citizen upon his travels is a very tobacco-spitting, noisy, dirty individual. You denounce 'the Hapsburg' for imprisoning Silvio Pellico, who aimed to destroy the Hapsburg's power, and, by implication, his life; and you would jeer me for being aristocratic and 'stuck up,' because I prefer fresh air and clean food to the atmosphere of a car and the 'spread' of a railroad dinner. Let a well-dressed man venture among a group of free and independent American citizens in shabby clothes—will he hear suggestions, innuendoes, remarks, or not? Will there be an air of, 'Blast me! suppose your coat is cleaner than mine, do you want to fight?' or not?

"Democracy is very apt to confound rights with requirements. A man may have a right to what he can honestly get; but you have no right to my gettings. In general, if the individual is not to be better cared for in all the details of life by a democracy, what's the use of it? Governments are for the welfare of the governed. But if my welfare is better subserved by a form which does not allow some of my theories than by one which does, I shall let the theories go, and take the comfort. Lamartine said no wiser thing during his short and splendid dictatorship, than asking if the French people meant to wreck the Revolution upon a theory? If the practical operation of Democracy is to be perpetual jealousy of the better foot and whiter hand, let us either hush our fine eloquence about 'man,' or confess that the philosophy of Democracy is Procrustean, and ineffably mean—aiming to make and keep every man of the dimensions of every other.

"As for traveling, dear Easy Chair, I know that that is dependent upon many things. For instance, I do not suppose that we can have comfort, or comparative decency, in traveling upon routes along which pours the great current of emigration. The Western cars must be excessively disagreeable places for a long time to come. But I have no intention of calling them agreeable because they are American; and I sincerely compassionate all whose necessities call them West, at a season when the fields and woods are gray, and when the windows of the cars must be kept closed.

"I am too good a Democrat to allow that dirt is democratic. On the contrary, I insist, that, if we are on the right track, we must come to greater results in life, and in all details, than have ever been achieved. Is art to be dependent upon absolutism? Can there be no pictures where there are no popes nor kings, no statues without grand dukes and emperors? Can we have no temples, no gardens, no public works of general utility and beauty, because we take care of ourselves? We may mistake many times, and not easily find the way; but he is no lover of men, any more than he is a sound politician, who does not see that the hope and charm of a Republic lies in the universal welfare, and in the perfection of details. It is foolish to rail at monarchies until we can do better, as well as think better. If a Republic can not give me clean cars, and sweet air, and a monarchy can, so far the monarchy is better.

"You remember how we all railed at Dickens's 'Notes,' and how we have never forgiven him. He is angry now, as well as we, and in the preface to the popular edition of his works he takes occasion to say that he still holds to the truthfulness of his representations.

"And so do I. I insist that there has never been so good a description of an American table d'hôte, and the proceedings thereat, as in the 'Notes' and in 'Martin Chuzzlewit.' We are the loudest braggars and the thinnest skinned of any people in the world. If we don't wish the world to laugh at us, let us refrain from ridiculous situations. It was idle to say in a rage to Dickens, that there were things just as absurd at home. He knew it better than we did; and it was mainly through his infinitely amusing accounts of it that we knew it at all. And as for the cry of base ingratitude, I really hope that the many hospitable gentlemen who entertained Mr. Dickens did not wish him to put his dinner into his eyes instead of his mouth; and it is never to be forgotten, in this memorable Dickens difference, that he commented upon matters and habits which every traveler can observe—which lie patent to the blindest eyes.

"In any case, an observing American could write a hundred-fold harder book upon our foibles and unnecessary habits than any foreigner has ever done; and for my part, as I know enough to try to keep clean, and to behave like a man and not like a pig, I don't wish any of the weak breath-ren to plead that it is a new country, in extenuation of our little enormities. For the very reason that it is a new country, do let it be a decent country. Begin right, or we shall end wrong.

"Think of traveling a hundred miles straight away from any of our large cities into the country, and a little off the line of railways. What a bed you will have! What stuff to eat, what stuff to drink! What a little vicious iron stove to heat your room red-hot, and leave it in an hour stone-cold! What a pleasant place the bar-room is! What prompt attendance you get! How you are tempted to remain and bring your family in the summer! What a pleasing sense of attention to your wants on the part of the host and hostess! How deeply you feel that here is a man whose business and pride is to keep a public house, and who does it, as every man does what is for his interest and pleasure!

"Now these things are true of all king-ridden countries, and if you are obliged to travel, they are much more important than a good many more important things.

"If you find them slight things, it is because you have never traveled. I grant that it is better to have a poor dinner than to have your leg smashed in a railroad collision. But if that is the American alternative, I shall sail for the calmer latitudes, where we move more slowly, and live longer and more pleasantly.

"I write this, my dear Easy Chair, from what is called, I believe, the Queen City of the West. When I hear that, I find myself repeating 'Cophetua loved a beggar maid,' and you will remember he ultimately made her his queen. The Queen City—and I have been in pensive Florence, sitting upon the yellow Arno, with history for its memory; I have seen elegant Dresden, leaning upon the graceful hills of the Elbe, and holding the Sistine Madonna to its heart; and Naples rising as Venus rose from that summer sea, and polished Paris, and grand and gloomy London, and gay Vienna—and this is the Queen City!

"Frankly, dear Easy Chair, we have many things to be proud of, but our cities are not among the number.

"'Twenty years ago, Sir,' says an animated subject of the Queen City, 'there was scarcely the sign of a town here.'

"So I should think. There is no doubt of it. And twenty times twenty years will pass before a man shall have any kind of emotion as he approaches the city, for any reason that the city itself can furnish.

"The American citizen is the sublimest or the silliest object going. But he is only sublime when his behavior accords in some degree with his opportunities. He is more intelligent than the people of most other countries. But they are all better bred than he.

"I like to hear the American citizen arriving in a public hotel after midnight. Ding-dong, tingling, go all the bells, and his tongue wags in loud talk. He stamps along the corridor to his room. Bang goes the democratic door. It opens again, and slam go the free and independent boots of the American citizen, thundering through the corridor, and bang goes the door again. Of course he has a perfect right. It is his hired room. He pays two dollars or two and a half dollars a day for it, and being his home for the time, where can a man slam his door and whang his boots down, if not in his own house? It is part of the inalienable rights of man to make a noise in a hotel. Of course; and other men have no inalienable rights. Because you have arrived late, and I am to leave early, I have no inalienable right to my quiet sleep. The truth is, that a man who thunders along a hall, and slams boots and door after midnight, is an unmannerly, indecent fellow, who never should be admitted into decent hotels at all. And if it is not democratic to lay your boots out softly, and to steal silently by the doors of sleeping men, then let it be aristocratic, or despotic, or whatever you please, but let us have that, and omit the rights of man until morning. Good manners, thoughtfulness, and consideration of others, are manly and Christian, whatever they are not; and the brawling noise of an American hotel is a constant reproach upon American manners.

"You will think that I have eaten a very bad dinner, or have slept on a very hard bed, to say such things of my beloved mother-country or father-land. But when it is as easy to bake bread twenty minutes as ten, and to close doors softly as with a bang, and to creep along halls instead of stamping, and to throw peels out of the window, and to talk in a low key, and not to yawn so that every body within hearing is made acquainted with the fact that you are fatigued; and to remember that people on the next seat don't care to know about your very uninteresting private affairs; in fact, when it is so easy to remember, and so very obvious, that you are of very little importance to any body else, although you are an American citizen with undoubted privileges and inalienable rights, it seems unnecessary to do precisely the contrary, and give the sting to all the stories of foreign travelers.

"Mr. Dion Bourcicault, we understand, is preparing a book upon America. Do you suppose Mr. Dion Bourcicault travels by all the trains without seeing the fun? Do you suppose Mr. Dion Bourcicault is not going to 'saunce you' with your own apple-peels and cheese-parings? And do you suppose you are not going to fly into a great rage with Mr. Dion Bourcicault when he tells John Bull and the rest of the world what he saw you doing in your cars, and steamers, and hotels? Take down that very ill-favored boot from its conspicuous position upon the back of the seat; spit out of the window; if you don't like your pies say nothing about it; don't try to be funny with the apple-boys, for you always break down; it is not worth while for you to sing, for you have no voice, and you don't know the tune; don't try to bolt your dinner, coffee, pies, turkey, beef-steak (of course), and 'sarce,' in one minute; and in general, if you don't wish to be called disgusting, cease to be so. And when you are called so, instead of sending somebody else somewhere, see whether you have not been disgusting, and you will probably find that you have been.

"So much for the free and independent American citizen, and his traveling morals and manners, my dear Easy Chair. You, sitting comfortably at home, know very little of these things. Perhaps they seem to you exaggerations—I wish they were.

"Perhaps you remember, in the days of your youth, those sweet English inns—quiet, rural, neat—each house a home for the traveler, so that a man understands why English authors so loved and praised the inn. Perhaps you recall the charber-maid, with her white apron, and her cap, and her 'Yez, Zir,' and her 'Coming, Zir:' you have not forgotten the landlord—the host who keeps a house of public entertainment, and who aims to satisfy his guests for the money they pay him, and not to show them by carelessness and superciliousness that he is as good as they are. In fine, I hope you have not forgotten all the points that have made an English inn the synonyme of a place pleasanter than the home of many a traveler. What a pity, then, that when we declared our independence of England we also freed ourselves of so much English cleanliness and comfort. For, strange to say, that old monarchy, which an 'American citizen' of the kind I have mentioned but regards with wholesome contempt, is, in many of the details and delights of life, infinitely superior to the free and enlightened state of things that we enjoy. Is it not as old a truth as holy writ, that a man who can not govern himself can not govern a city?".....

Our correspondent here wanders away into general political disquisition. But, although he is somewhat warm in the expression of his opinions, is there not much in them which is very well worthy consideration? It is easier to bear the great trials than the little annoyances of life. Manners are a part of morals. You, my dear Sir, who are reading this in a car, how is it about your feet and apple-peels?

MOVED by our correspondent's strong statements, half incredulous of the reality of his sufferings, and resolved to see for ourselves if beef-steaks were so tough, and winter traveling in general so utterly dismal; curious, also, to see something of the "American citizen" of whom he makes such merciless mention, we had our Easy Chair set upon railroad wheels, and rushed forth to see Niagara in winter.

The sun was kinder to us than to our friend. It glittered upon the snow-streaked hills, and shone along the far valley reaches; and if the car was a little uncomfortable, and cheese-parings and apple-peel became too painfully evident, we had but to lay our head against the window and fall far back into memories of lands where winter is a fable and a dream.

"Oh, lady, we receive but what we give,
And in our life alone does Nature live," sings Coleridge, looking at the sunset. And so sang we as we glanced at the swift landscape sliding by the windows.

If you have never been to Niagara in winter, you can not fancy the great difference of the summer and the winter travel. The cars are not crowded with those pretty traveling toilets which the July sun loved to see. The women who travel in the cold days have no air of summer wanderers, but they have babies, and an air of seeing their destiny straight to the end. Oh, madame! who took the cars at Lockport—you, with the green silk bonnet and the very audible and furious baby, why did you look in that hard, cold way at every body in the car; why did you talk in that sharp, wiry, loud voice, so that we all shuddered and thrilled with profound pity for that unhappy man, your husband? He was not visible. He doubtless had made excuses to stay behind. He wanted to know how silence seemed. He even wanted to remember the single days before he knew you. We all hoped, for the sake of future family peace, that he was not wishing he had never seen—we meant, heard—you. Ah! madame! why did you allow yourself to harm matrimony in our imaginations, and injure your sex in fancy, and make us so deeply sympathize with our own, because with such a fearfully matter-of-fact way, as if you knew every thing, and defied any increase of knowledge, you said your unimportant nothings so noisily, and—in the very face of a respectable traveling public—fed your baby in the natural way! Self-respect, madame, and respect to others, are mutual. Our indignant friend, whose letter we have quoted, rails at men who slam their doors and boots. But if the misbehavior of men so moves us, what shall we do with you who depreciate your own sex by your conduct? Believe an old Easy Chair, madame, a man reveres his reverence for a woman, and she does him a great injury who assails it. No woman can afford to part with the most sensitive modesty. Who would not tremble before a woman who could so far assert her "rights" as to enter a crowded car, and in the most unconcerned manner and the loudest voice, announce that the buckwheat cakes were cold at breakfast! May such offenders be smothered in cold flapjacks! Be very sure that if you treat your husband like an old shoe, he will, like an old shoe, fall off. Remember that man is made to pursue. You must forever fly, retreat, withdraw. So is the ardor of pursuit continued. And thus the lover shall never be merged in the husband, but still worship you as his inaccessible divinity.

So we slid along, gently moralizing, mourning over the willful wrecks that women make of their influence and charms, until, like a distant sculpture of pure marble, Niagara silently flashed between its shores.

That best of hotels, the Cataract House, was open. Let any man weary of winter travel, of rush, dirt, and beef-steak, betake himself for a day to the Cataract. He shall find rest there, and neatness; and, if he will only shoot the hackmen from the windows, before issuing forth, he will be spared their importunity, which, in this democratic land (as our correspondent would say), is very hard to resist; since, if you persist in declining a carriage, the chance is that you will be insulted by the free and independent American citizen upon the box.

The one street of Niagara is very lonely; one or two empty carriages are drawn slowly up and down. The horses walk expectantly, and the eager drivers long for a prey. The "office" of the Cataract is painfully in order. There is no string of new arrivals to enter their names. There is no row of smoking idlers upon the piazza surveying the eager stream of travel that flows from the summer cars. There is a dull, gray, listless, lost air brooding over the village of Niagara. It is even as a Russian town in the Crimea, all whose inhabitants have been drafted for the war. The last books have not reached the book-stores. We find the last month's magazines. It is a town of the last month, of last year, of last summer.

But as you pause in your walk, or as you lift your head from your paper by the stove in the office, you hear that deep, pensive murmur which is not of last month, nor of last year, but of all time.

It is best to slip quietly out at the back-door, for you so escape the coachmen. In a moment you are upon the bridge over the Rapids. No autumn touches them with fiery glory, nor winter with cold splendor. As in summer, they come leaping and flashing apparently out of the sky, and the smoke of their torrent ascends forever and ever. That first view is still one of the most striking and inspiring, and is sculptured fast in memory. Except that there is snow upon the bridge, and no swarm of passengers, and no green leaves upon the trees, it is the same quivering picture you saw in June—the same that you gazed at in July from under the friendly blue cotton umbrella that defied the sun, at the expense of giving you the aspect of a valitudinarian poet.

The man at the little Indian curiosity-shop still charges the two shillings which secure your admission to Goat Island during your stay. To-day the island is all your own. The newly-fallen snow lies soft and white and untrodden. There is universal silence, with only that immortal roar, and at the westernmost point of the island there is a patch of brown turf, sheltered from the snow by the gracious savin trees. The waters of the river throb gently and die along that shore, whose melancholy turf, amidst the deep surrounding snow, would have suggested to Cowley the summer pressed in the herbarium of the year.

The sun is bright, but the sad shores of Canada fade gloomily in the distance. There is certainly no more uncheerful view than that from Goat Island looking westward. The sense of wilderness is absolute and consuming, and deepens that solemn and almost melancholy impression which Niagara never fails to leave.

The tower by the English fall is cased in ice. The rocks are piled like glaciers. The scene is savage and bare; for there are none of the contrasts of green and twinkling leaves, whose beauty in summer touches and tames the fierce play of the cataract. But, like the sea and the sky, Niagara is always sublime. It is no finer in winter than in the summer. Nor need you suppose that it is grander now because there is not the crowd of summer tourists. We hope Niagara can annul Jenkins and Jones. If those gay young men shooting in patent leathers about Goat Island in the pleasant June rays interfere with your enjoyment of the spectacle, why, then, Niagara is not for you. Put away that foolishness. The cataract sweeps them away like chaff. They go over like leaves, and are lost in the abyss.

Later in the year a bridge of ice often forms in the river by the boiling up of the masses of ice driven by the northeast winds toward the fall. It may even be crossed to the Canada shore.

We did not cross, dear reader, nor suffer our Easy Chair to run the risks of such transportation. We came quietly back again to the hotel—even the most rapt and ecstatic poets do that—and ate the good dinner of the Cataract House. There was no gay crowd, no sweet music, no flutter of muslin and lace, no stately march of waiters. The dinner was served in the little front dining-room, and seven people sat down to it. Do you suppose that our dessert was nuts and raisins? Do you believe that this Easy Chair even tasted the apple which it so abstractedly peeled—(and did not throw the peel at the stove). Ah! do you not suspect that the remembrance of the summer days when first we sat at that Cataract dinner with the fair girls whose daughters sit there now, was sweeter than the pudding-sauce and sadder than the unwonted silence of that hall?

OUR FOREIGN GOSSIP.

A MONTH ago and all the ears of Western Europe waited for the news that Sebastopol was taken. Napoleon (people said) would come to Paris, from his summer hermitage of Saint Cloud when Sebastopol was taken. The tickets would be issued for the first Tuileries ball when Sebastopol was taken. The fashion of the winter's muffs and hats would be out when Sebastopol was taken. All out-staying people in such chateaus of France as keep up their preserves of game, would come to town when Sebastopol was taken. The weather, which had been rainy for a pair of months, would clear when Sebastopol was taken. Long running accounts, overdue in September, would be paid when Sebastopol was taken.

Well, Napoleon has come again to the Tuileries, and the fair-haired Eugenie drives out in her phaeton, and the winter's muffs are half a season old, and sporting people have bagged their last partridges, and sunshine has broken cold and clear overhead, and bills of old standing (some of them) have been paid; but Sebastopol sees yet the Russian banner waving and snapping in the storm-winds of the Crimes.

People have foreborne asking each other, every time of meeting, WHEN the city will be taken, and point all their promises with an—if it is taken. Eugenie, the Empress, talking frankly and fearlessly, as becomes her mixed Scottish and Spanish blood, says the opening ball of the Tuileries will be brilliant if Sebastopol is taken. Holders of stock in the French Crystal Palace (dropping up and down in the market, like the Fahrenheit quicksilver at Balaklava) say the Exhibition will "march" if Sebastopol is taken.

Strangers give themselves the promise of gay winter and rollicking nights in the Chaussée d'Antin if Sebastopol is taken; and holders of securities all, whether moneyed or social, count on a quick advance if Sebastopol is taken.

Was there ever a city which grew into such sudden celebrity? Was there ever a campaign which so nipped all the romance of war? Was there ever such a crop of honor (or wheat) so blighted in the bud?

First, we had long stories of Russian demoralization, and Silistria with its cowardly Cossacks in the background was put on the stage at the Champ de Mars and the office of Mr. Punch. Then came the faint foreshadowings of a great enterprise (leaking out through the Times columns), which was to startle all of Christendom, and annihilate the south of Russia. Indeed it was a great enterprise, and valorously pushed through its first dangers; but the demoralization of which we had heard so much was not, after all, complete; and when Balaklava, with its hecatomb of light cavalry—offered up on the altar of Club-room pride—sent westward its story of fierce battle and butchered men, the papers, in excess of generosity, praised the valor of the Russian barbarians, and admitted, in columns now reeking with bloody story, that the demoralization was not wholly complete.

After that came Inkermann.

The wounds are bleeding now; and fresh black is on the forms of thousands of kneeling ladies—mothers, and sisters, and wives, and daughters—in all the churches of England and of France; and there, before Sebastopol, they are hoisting black flags to get a space between the bombs, where they may safely bury the dead. But few mourners gather at the graves they open upon those bleak hills; and these shivering, ragged officers, struggling with the chills that lie in the hollows of the Tartar hills, and with the griefs for some messmate, who, with his scarlet and broidery on him, dragged in mud and blood, is thrown into the common pit they dig for sergeant and for private.

"If you could have seen it all," writes a guardsman, "standing as I did upon the edge of the great grave, where we had thrown them helter-skelter with their regimental finery on them, and where we caught sight now and then of a familiar face, which had shone with a merry laugh many a day against us at table, you would understand the gloom and disquietude that hangs so heavily on me now. And those romantic girls at home, crazy these many a year for scarlet coats and fashions bright, and thinking it a very grand thing to be a soldier, and grander still (doubtless) to be a soldier's wife, if they had but caught a glance of the scarlet dabbled with blood, and the dead fellows' eyes looking up at the cold pitiless sky from the bottom of the pit, before we tumbled in the gravel and buried them once for aye, they would quit their romantic nonsense, and pray (as I do) that God may bring to an end these wicked days, when battles sweep us down without time to cry for mercy."

Then, when the stones and earth (rough work they make of it there) were hardly rounded over these pits, where the dead lay by forties, the wind rose; not suddenly, nor yet giving any warning notes of the hurricane which was presently to come roaring from the Bosphorus.

Our readers have all followed the story of the poor transport craft—seeming small in comparison with three-deckers, but in reality honest 700 ton ships—thwacked together, huffs, masts, and yards, until their spars went crashing like the boughs of lone trees in a land gale, and the ships themselves, worrying at their light fastenings of a single or a brace of anchors, tore away, and with a few bounds upon the crested seas, dashed hard and full upon the Crimean rocks, and made an end.

The Prince was one of these—as fine a steamer as sails from New York harbor—with all the warm coats which were to give comfort to the shivering soldiers, and bombs and powder besides for a fortnight's work of the batteries; but the bombs and the coats are in the Euxine now.

Punch, with all the rest, is sobered by the common grief which such tidings carry home, and we hear very little now of demoralization; even "Our Bashi Bazouk" (promenading as he does in these days the Paris streets) is grown tender in his caricature, and lends a sigh to the common mourning.

And we upon this side?—albeit no party to the strife—has not an over-earnest echo of British mourning reached scattered ears even here, and kindled griefs that burn like a fire? And does not the dull pulse of Wall Street beat low, in unison with the sacrifice in gold which the French and English offer to the god of war? Can any people be wholly an indifferent spectator, in these days of quick ocean mails and telegraphs, to such fierce human slaughter as that of Inkermann? Do not we feel, and feel keenly, that we belong to a century which has revived again the middle-age fashion of "ordeal by fire?" Peter Nostradea marched on burning coals, in the year 1200, to show that he told the truth; and now Nicholas and Victoria march—their soldiers—over hotter coals than those of the friar, to prove that they claim the right. If we could only put Menschikoff and Napoleon to walk the fire!

Oddly enough, and yet naturally enough, the two great nations who in Western Europe are bolstering up the frail remnant of the Ottoman power, will not understand how outsiders like ourselves can possibly do aught else than praise their endeavor, and join in the few peans they sing. To be sure, there is a tie which joins those nations together naturally, who are in the forefront of civilization; and there is no hearty sympathy in Republican blood with that nationality which is bounded by lances and Cossacks. But when our civilized brothers take strategic moves, which—for selfish ends—involve espousal of half the damnable barbarities which linger under the crescent and the turban, they must at least leave us the right of question, and of looking with grave faces upon such victories as may fill anew the harems of the Sultan, and double the prices for Circassian girls.

That old Greek Church, under whose roof-tree the Russian soldier and serf has learned to pray, and which at least has the merit of kindling a most stubborn faith, and reverently joined hands in death, is not after all so bad that we should wish its cross pulled down and a minaret set up in its stead. Nor do we know if we could wholly join in the prayers they are offering at Rome nowadays—that the great schismatic branch, whose capital is St. Petersburg, may be humbled and brought into the train of those true apostles who hold the keys, and stand on the Janiculan Hill.

Besides this prayer—for the saying of which every man or woman has three hundred days of indulgence, by Papal order—it does not appear that the gathering of Church worthies at Rome has resulted in any thing serious. People are naturally agog as to what may come of it all; and papers upon the other side are discussing if there may be no scheme at the bottom for driving "Our good Allies" the Turks away from their mosques and harems, if need be, into the wilds of Asia. If such be the thought, what power must represent the cross at Constantinople? Hardly Cardinal Wiseman himself would put in a plea for Protestant England; and Napoleon might make a martyr of himself for the profit of the true flock, who tell their beads in the name of Pio Nono.

In short, it is a good time for a gathering of such as trust in the coming sovereignty of Papacy—now that Islamism is trembling in the shock of war, and Romish France and Episcopal England whetting their swords on one stone to cut down the outlying sentries of the great northern heretic.

Another notion has found its way to the lips of talking people: will the bishops and cardinals—having Mr. New York Hughes for exponent—spend a thought or a word upon the matter of Know-nothing-ism, or upon the once ventured proposition for establishing a strong American branch of the great Church hierarchy, with its seat at St. Louis?

Indeed the time is big with great questions of Church as well as of nationality; and who knows what new relations may belong to Cross and Crescent, when this day year shall have summed its account?

In the midst of all this, what an admirable exercise of diplomacy does Austria show, holding three hundred thousand bayonets shivering with a "masterly inactivity" on the Carpathian mountains! How she promises and dodges promises with the hopeful and indignant Allies! How clear she keeps her white coats of all the blood stains which have dyed the Danube and Crimes! How adroitly she keeps to her first-named policy of an armed neutrality! How bravely she bears all the taunts of the Times, and laughs in her sleeve at Mazzini and Kossuth!

Only the other day, the Paris Bourée made a sudden advance which seemed to brighten all the commerce of the capital. Metternich had plotted the rise; the telegraphic announcement had come of the signing of a tripartite treaty. The next day the Bourée fell, for the treaty was after all conditional; the Times said—very sorrowfully conditional. Thus Austria has the merit of giving a tone even to the speculative stocks of the hour, and is reaping an importance she has not known this many a day.

But do people talk abroad of any thing except the war? Giving a flirt to our foreign files, we pounce first upon fashions.

It is strange enough that while business is suffering so grievously, and men at shop-doors are wearing unvisited looks, fashion has leaped into extravagance. Silks, feathers, and jewels are burying the women who are not mourners; and all who have no kindred broken down in the crash of the war, are doing their best to break down their kindred of the shops.

First of all is the heavy moire antique, so full and stiff that one wonders how the wearer will ever sit at all; there are taffetas glacés, wrought over with magnificent bouquets of every imaginable color; there is droguet (we are not accountable for names), bedropped with delicately worked leaves of gold and silk; there are rustling brocades of rose-color, light-green, or gold, wrought to imitate point d'Alençon in superb designs. Even the commoner visiting dresses are of chestnut, violet, or deep-blue shades, and covered with detached bouquets of black or purple velvet. White moire antique is trimmed with bunches of white roses made from ostrich feathers, and hung around with strings of rubies. But we despair of giving so correct an idea of these things as the professional observers; we therefore whip out a paragraph with our scissors, and tessellate it with our other record:

"Dinner dresses are frequently composed of terry velvet. Some are of green terry velvet, trimmed with very deep point d'Angleterre flounces, having a heading of rosettes of narrow gauze ribbon, surrounded by lace the width of the same. The body is à draperie, with a deep lace, falling nearly to the waist, raised on the front by a bouquet of roses, mixed with sprays of diamonds. The short sleeves are covered by two rows of rosettes of ribbon, and lace to match those on the skirt: between each row, and at the bottom of the sleeve, is a narrow frill of point d'Angleterre. A row of very narrow rosettes ornaments the top of the body. A robe of light-green moire antique, with bunches of pink and white roses. The body trimmed with broad braces of white moire, upon which is embroidered a wreath of white and pink roses; a pointed blonde is gathered on each edge, gradually widening over the shoulders so as to cover the short sleeve, which is slightly bouffante. A double frill of blonde reaching to the elbow; the frill is raised at the front of the arm. The braces are fixed behind at the waist by a bunch of ribbons, mixed with blonde. Upon the front of the body the braces cross nearly at the waist, and the ends are left to float about half-way down the skirt. A robe de visite was made of maroon taffetas, with figured flounces, upon the borders of which were here and there large roses of velvet, beautifully shaded—red, yellow, and white. Each flounce was ornamented with a fringe of chenille in trellis work, in which hung rose-buds; nothing can be more elegant than this fringe. The body was made with deep basques, which, with the pagoda sleeves, were trimmed to match the flounces. The front was closed the whole of the length by rose-buds of precious stones. Never has jewelry produced a more charming ornament for the trimming of dresses. A dress moire habillée was of pink gras de Tours; it had five flounces, and at the edge of each three rows of blonde, headed by a galon of pink and white plush; the body without basques; low and short sleeves. We noticed lately two exceedingly pretty dresses, the one was of blue poult-de-soie, ornamented with three wide flounces of point d'Angleterre, supported by one of blue crape; each flounce separated by a fringe of blue feathers, so that the skirt was entirely covered by the six flounces. A berthe of the same make, composed of three narrower trimmings, descending en cœur in the front and at the back of the body, which it entirely covers, as well as the sleeves."

It is hard to believe, and yet it is fair to believe, that the extravagance of present fashions is in no way sustained by the thrift of any business pursuit. In France it is rather attributable to the court influence, which, by these exterior tokens of wealth and gayety, would draw away regard from those serious ills which are the natural result of an expensive and distant war. All the improvements of the capital, it is observed, progress with an unslackened hand. The monster palace of glass, now wholly roofed in, and receiving thus early its interior decorations, is swarming with the blue-bloused workmen, as multitudinous now as in the merry days when "the Empire was Peace." The long range of glass gallery, which has been commanded for reserve space, now flanks the quay from the Place de la Concorde as far as the furthest-most houses toward the barrier. The hanging bridge, which swung between the Avenue d'Antin and the Esplanade of the Invalids, and which was thought too frail for the coming crowds of May, has wholly disappeared, and men are working like maggots around the low-lying piles of stone in the river, which are to serve for piers to a new structure.

To the eastward of the city, beyond the Garden of Plants, another bridge of iron has given place, within two months of time, to the timber construction for a heavy series of arches in stone masonry; and in May, the people and the carts are to cross over as before.

Still another bridge of chains, which tied the Place of the Hotel de Ville to the island of the Cité, has given place to a new and grander one, which is to open a broad street-way from the square before the palace of the city, to the new square they have opened before the old College of France.

The Rue Rivoli is lively, and sunny, and gossiping (if we may say so of a street), far along by the Tower of the Jacqueries, and by the Halles, where in the old days (not ten years gone) were only narrow and tortuous ways, made dim and dirty with leaning and crumbling houses. Even the Halles themselves, the visitor of Louis Philippe time would never know under their present aspect. The fountain of the Innocents (made familiar by Chalon's picture), which had its own private square, hemmed in by lofty and quaint houses, is now all open to day, and occupies a corner only of the grander square, where thousands of blue-coated workers are toiling and measuring their hours by the dial of St. Eustache, which is seen plain and clear upon the western side.

They have caulked the bottom of the pond in the wood of Boulogne, and the water now flows (or rather rests) in a mile of irregular basin—upon whose shores Swiss cottages are rising, and a Scotch transplanter is putting out acres of fir-trees.

They are cutting the Imperial Avenue through the houses that skirt the Avenue de Neuilly; and next summer's visitor will drive in his coupé, straight from the Arc de l'Etoile to the great entrance-gates of the wood.

But, if we may believe the periodic accounts of the Sunday Presse, the people of Lyons and Rouen, whether silk or woolen workers, are receiving few commands for their labor; and the shop-keepers of the capital are soured by the times.

In spite of war and weather, the theatres wear their air of thrift. Upon the farther side of the Seine, Alexandre Dumas is winning something like his old triumph of the Three Mousquetaires, by a new drama, which he calls La Conscience. George Sand, at the theatre of the Gymnase, is drawing crowded houses to listen to her play of Flaminio. Meantime the story of her life—full of French vanity, but full of Madame Dudevant's ease and grace—is threading its way through the murky columns of the Presse.

Madame Rachel (whom well authenticated rumor says we are to hear in the summer to come), has revived the memory of her old triumphs in a new, one act tragedy, entitled Rosemonde. It is the work of that writer who, not many years ago, made her a triumphant rôle in the Roman story of Virginia.

Rosemonde is the daughter of a Gothic king, who, being captured by Alboin, the monarch of the Lombards, is slain, and his skull is wrought by his inhuman captor into a drinking-cup, with which he adorns his fêtes.

He is struck with the beauty of Rosemonde, and royally and brutally he courts her favor. The scene opens with a wild Lombard banquet—as they served banquets in the barba-heroic times when Alboin lived. At the French theatre they study the representation of such a scene, as with us they study a mooted point of dates in the chocolate gatherings of the Historical Society.

Well—you seem to be looking on a savage, middle-age carousal of men, who killed men as men now kill game, and you listen to their wild orgies, with your eye upon goblets and dishes, and tapestried hangings, which carry back your thoughts over eleven centuries (more or less), when King Alboin, in a moment of drunken passion and pride, orders his festive cup—the skull of the dead Goth—to be filled up with wine, and to be borne to Rosemonde, that she may drink a wassail bowl in memory of her father.

The skull is borne to her, and she meets it with an eye of horror, of indignation, of revenge, that only Rachel could throw into expression.

She touches her lips; she controls her emotion; though you see it smothered, and feel it in your heart, burning under her shivering form. She plots with a retainer of the King, promising him the favor that the monarch has sought for vainly, if he will slay him, and avenge her wrong. The savage courtier accepts the conditions—contrives the assassination—accomplishes the deed—leads Rosemonde to the nuptial altar, when the poison she has secretly taken begins to show its effect: and in the presence of the priests, and of the holy tapers, she dies one of her Rachel deaths.

As being short, and easily understood by its pantomime only, the piece will very likely be a popular one upon this side of the water.

We catch up here a pleasant bit of scandal, which is running the rounds of the Paris feuilletons. Some time ago, a pretty actress of the Vaudeville theatre (and we may very possibly have already mentioned the fact) decoyed a weak scion of a noble and wealthy family of France into promise of matrimony. The parents of the boy advised strongly against the sacrifice; but the poor fellow was bewitched; he insisted; and only dignified his rashness by urging his bien aimé, the comedian, to dispose at once of all the trophies of her histrionic life—jewels, dresses, furniture, spoils of a hundred intrigues—and to be rid of them in doing charitable acts toward her poor kinfolks. Actresses are not generally rich of kin; but fortunately it happened that a poor sister of the lady in question was just at this time making ready for a departure to the El Dorado of San Francisco, in the hope that a Pacific sun would brighten chances which waxed dimmer and dimmer in Paris.

The occasion seemed a good one for the charitable disposal of the artiste's inheritance. Accordingly, under the advice and urgency of the marquis-lover, a sale was had; and a pompous hand-bill drew, upon a certain Sunday (the great Paris show-day for auctions), swarms of people to admire the robes, the Japan vases, the parquets, the tapestry, the gold-bound Balzacs, the jewels, which adorned the apartments of the actress.

The sale—like all such—commanded enormous prices, and the sum was sufficient to set up the poor sister as a lady of quality in the new city by the Pacific coast.

But no sooner is the sale complete, than the dame who had thus dispossessed herself of what in her maiden days she had valued most, finds that the marquis-lover has at length yielded to the urgency of his friends, and declines becoming a party to the nuptial arrangement!

Fancy the frenzy of our pleasant Lorette of the Vaudeville!

How the matter ended, or how it may end, the papers do not tell us. We observe only a hint in some incredulous journal that the whole story was a hoax from the beginning, set on foot only for the sake of making a good sale of the worn-out finery of an opera attachée. If so, the contrivance is quite worthy the fertility of our own hero of the Museum at the corner.

Apropos of this matter, it is a noticeable fact, that a larger swarm of purchasers and bidders will throng to the sale of a defaulting or intriguing actress than to any merely respectable sale whatever. Old dowagers, who frown on vice, will puff upstairs to see how vice has been living; and delicate people of tender sensibilities are almost certain to blunder, through ignorance, into these deserted apartments of finery.

Nor must one suppose that such finery is altogether tawdry: French taste is as general as French license; and you will find the chefs d'œuvres of their best artists lending piquancy and an air of cultivation to their haunts of corruption; and all their dishonor is blazoned with their best jewels. The papers of the week tell us, that at one of these sales, of which we have dropped the mention, a satin coverlet, wrought most gorgeously with needle embroidery of some mythologic fable, brought the price of a thousand dollars—notwithstanding it was burnt through here and there by the fire of cigars!

How we wonder at that wonderful French nation! Making grand orations of liberty, and submitting itself, like a whipped school-boy, to the man of most nerve and badness!—threading the march of far-off stars, and fathoming all the secrets of the earth by its philosophic ken, and yet with no self-restraining power to govern its own impulses, and no such love of honesty as will keep the highest or the humblest from cheaterly!

And yet, what kindness of manner, and even of fact, when it works under the stimulant of a battle din!

Only the other day at Inkermann, they tell us, a mounted officer, chasing over the field, espied a wounded sergeant who had done good service in his English ranks; and the officer, at the peril of his own life, snatched up the poor fellow to his saddle-bow—bore him to a place of safety—kissed his hand in token of the good wishes he left with him—and disappeared in the thick of the fight.

In short, the French act best always under excitation: their better natures need warming to be resplendent. When they are cool, they are fearfully selfish.

It is well for them that they have such baits to action as crosses of honor and military medals. They need them. Not that they do not love fighting; but that they love the memory and the tokens of it.

Louis Napoleon has just now (our news dates in mid-December) a few tents of various patterns erected upon a parterre of the Tuileries—where the flowers were in July—that he may judge by comparison what will best serve the comfort of his troops. What a pretty pleading to the popular ear of Paris is this?

What a benevolent Emperor, to turn his flower-garden into illustrative diagrams about the good of his soldiers! And the matter tells—where he wishes it to tell. But until the tents arrive in the Crimea, God keep the poor soldiers warm—for none else can!

THE other day (we seem to date from Paris, and the reader must therefore throw our date back an over-ocean space), a pretty woman appeared in all the splendor of a bridal trousseau at the French Opera; and a story which went the round of the boxes, about her parentage and her wealth, made the lorgnettes double their convergence in the direction of her loge.

It seems that, years ago, an old banker of Holland, whose gold counted by millions, married, in a weak time of his life, a young and a pretty woman. He loved her very truly; and she fancied that she loved him (she certainly did his gold).

She was trained, however, in the strict Holland ways (very much better than French ways), and though she found, as years elapsed, that her husband was old and herself young and beautiful, she maintained her old sense of duty and of trust.

But, in an evil hour, a young marquis of France—exiled from his own country, but carrying the morals and manners of his own country with him—espied the pretty wife of the Dutch banker, and coveted her beauty.

He laid his toils with French art: he became the client of the banker, and placed all his property in his hands; his visits were on the terms of a friend, and, for a long time, nothing doubted.

The wife maintained her true allegiance; but felt that the banker was old and ugly, and the marquis new and attractive.

The state of affairs made itself known at length to the observation of the trustful husband. The marquis was a friend, was rich, was idle, and multiplied day by day, through means of his wealth, the appliances of distraction by which he won upon the regard of the lady.

The banker was beset with the cares of business, and all his capital involved in trade: how could he match the extravagant indulgences which the wealthy marquis lavished upon his friend, the banker's lady?

The Hollander reflected, decided, acted. If the marquis were shorn of his wealth, his power would be gone. The banker plunged wildly into speculations. He regulated all his affairs with other clients, save only the marquis. This French estate became involved like his own; and, with a common crash, both went down together.

People wondered, but were never the wiser. The marquis, impoverished, ceased playing the gallant, and set himself about some lucrative pursuit. The banker, though poor, retained the respect of the world, and won by his very adversity the clinging and renewed fondness of his wife.

Friends came forward soon to his relief: his business was re-established: year after year added to his mercantile successes; year after year took the bloom from the cheek of his wife, and brought them to a nearer level of age.

So, when he would fear gallantries no longer, it happened that he could wear once more the reputation of a man of wealth. Indeed, so great did this become in the end, that he sent for the starveling marquis, and giving him a wise counsel for the future (which, seeing that white hairs had sprinkled the head of the marquis, was hardly needed), repaid him again his lost estate.

There was only one child to claim heirship to the banker's fortune, and that a daughter, the same lady, indeed, of whom the people talked in the loges of the opera as wearing a rich bridal dress.

And her husband was the nephew of the marquis, whom her father, the banker, had made poor and made rich again.

We tell the story as it was told to us.

In English chit-chat a little hum of talk is buzzing again about the ears of poor Perry of the famous 46th. Nor is it altogether so flattering to his vanity as the talk of which we made casual mention two months ago.

It appears, indeed, that poor Perry is weak. He has fallen now, it seems, into worse hands than those of Colonel Garrett and his court martial; he has fallen—alas, for him!—into the hands of sellers of American railway bonds of the Henderson, Galveston, and Houston Branch!

We know nothing of the railway, indeed, which is perhaps in its favor. But poor Perry, it seems, ran over to Paris to get away from English ovation, and to mature his plans.

The Mayor of Windsor, who was almoner of the great Perry Testimonial Fund, amounting in the aggregate to about £2000, heard nothing from him until one pleasant morning an order was presented at the bank where the money was deposited, in favor of a certain Paris banker, for the full sum, and signed by Master Perry.

The Mayor of Windsor being naturally appealed to, as the depositor and trustee of the fund, refused to ratify the draft, and wrote to Mr. Perry for explanation.

Mr. Perry returns a brief apology, and promises speedy account of the whole affair; meantime, however, drawing upon the Mayor personally for a sum of £500, and upon his cousin, another Perry, for a similar amount, being the proceeds from the sale of his royal commission.

The Perry explanation, which comes in a confidential shape, is interesting, as showing to what extent American sharp men are domiciliating themselves in Paris. We can not forbear extracting a portion:

"I have embarked in business, if I may so call it, in Paris, and have placed my money, at least a substitute for it, as I was given that sum (till my check was honored), in a very profitable manner, which has given me 10 per cent., and its safety guaranteed to me by responsible bankers, there being no fear of my losing a fraction. I have certainly been the most lucky man possible. A gentleman here, an American, who is enormously rich, has signed an agreement, which is also signed by the American Embassy, giving me one-half of all he possesses—viz., land to a very large extent, containing mines of gold and copper, besides timber, with which he has taken an agreement to supply the Emperor for the French navy. I now keep my carriage with him, and am going to take a fine hotel, private, in Paris, with him. I would not have given this explanation, only my singular conduct perhaps needed it, to any one, as I intended to take my friends by surprise. I am going with him to his various bankers to leave my name, so my checks here will be as good as his, and payable accordingly. I trust to your keeping this perfectly secret, as I wish no one to know it. I shall be worth by the end of the year probably about £50,000. Remember me kindly to Darvill, who wrote to me, telling me that you were annoyed. Adieu for the present, yours very truly, J. E. PERRY.

"I shall drop upon you one of these days, and give you an explanation of my success, which is very long and important." . . .

We have underscored a portion which seems specially salient. What a candidate would not this promising young Perry have made for a New York mock action (in case he wanted a watch)!

It does not yet appear, so far as we can learn, who the large holder of timber-land, gold mines, and copper, may be. We wish him joy, however, of his "fine hotel, private," with Mr. Perry. We think it would be as well to keep private.

Another joke concerning the matter is a correspondence between the moneyed editor of the Times and a certain personage who has loomed up in Paris as the American agent of the Galveston, Houston, and Henderson Railway. This gentleman, whoever he may be, pleads strongly for the validity of the bonds of the above road, and cites a letter of Mr. Mason (our minister in Paris), guaranteeing the general wholesome character of the State of Texas, and the respectability of Mr. Judge Kent.

The Times man replies in a way which we fear will sadly damage the sale of the Houston bonds. If Mr. Perry, however, can keep up his carriage and private hotel upon them, we think it the highest compliment to their profitable character that an agent (or a Texan) could possibly desire.

Yet one other bit of English gossip, which bears a half-American tint, we can not forbear twisting with our pen out of the mesh of last month's paragraphs, and pointing with such moral as we can make.

We allude to the London Peabody dinner, and the disgust of that "lettered" gentleman, our Secretary of Legation at the court of St. James. We never like to bring within our ink-lines the private quarrels of even distinguished personages; but when privacy is voluntarily abandoned, and printed and gratuitously circulated letters challenge our regard, how, as literary purveyors, can we close our eyes?

And yet we bring it up now from the tomb of the papers only to place on record our regret that such ridiculous scandal should, by remote association even, become connected with our representation at a foreign court. The whole affair has more the guise of a quarrel of collegians or of second-rate clerks, not yet out of their teens, than of one between an accredited representative of the government and of a harmless middle-aged gentleman, who admires fondly the Queen, does patriotic deeds, gives magnificent dinners, and enjoys the mention of them.

It appears to us that a gentleman who does not like his host's order of dinner should be quiet, and—next time—stay away. This is easy, natural, and effective.

It appears to us, furthermore, that such gentlemen as, by long residence and active business sympathies, have grown into the European habit of toadying the representatives of noble, or of royal prerogative, should be careful of asking to their entertainments those sharp, fresh republicans, who obey the first impulses of a riotous nature, and who scorn the etiquette of courts as much as they scorn etiquette every where.

We have hinted at American toadyism (Mr. Buchanan is sponsor for the word), and, to tell truth, there is a lamentable amount to offend the eye and the ear, both in England and on the Continent.

We speak advisedly, and regretfully, when we say that there is not a more place-serving and place-adoring people in Europe than long-established Americans.

We can understand how a man who gives up his country for gains—whether social or pecuniary—should give up his republican ardor as well; but that he should so far forget his native, republican manliness as to join in the European worship of castes—whether royal, imperial, or tamely noble—we can neither understand nor appreciate.

We do not admire the reflected honor they may gain in consequence; nor do we any way envy them a position which is bought by the abandonment of the noblest quality of a republican and a freeman.

We believe in regard for etiquette, though etiquette may have its feudal attachments; we believe in duties to hosts, whether hosts are royal or imperial; but we believe also in a high American manhood, which is lost when it stoops, and doubly lost when it stoops for gain!

Editor's Drawer.

ONE of the most amusing things in the "Biography of Barnum, written by Himself," is the description which he gives of the "Exciting and Terrific Buffalo Hunt," at Hoboken, by which he made some four thousand dollars in one day! The animals exhibited were fifteen forlorn, feeble Buffalo calves; and we shall quote from Washington Irving's "Tour on the Prairies," and from Barnum, to show that there is as much difference in the same breed of animals as there is in the same breed of men. Mr. Irving says:

"Of all animals, a buffalo, when close pressed by the hunter, has an aspect the most diabolical. His two short black horns curve out of a huge frontlet of shaggy hair; his eyes glow like coals; his mouth is open, his tongue parched, and drawn up into a half-crescent; his tail is erect, and tufted, and whisking about in the air: he is a perfect picture of mingled rage and terror."

Now "look on that picture, and then on this;" for the following is the sketch which Barnum gives of his "Grand Buffalo Hunt."

"The band of music engaged for the occasion did its best to amuse the immense crowd until three o'clock. At precisely that hour the buffaloes emerged from a shed in the centre of the inclosure, my man French having previously administered a punching with a sharp stick, hoping to excite them to a trot on their first appearance. He immediately followed them, painted and dressed like a wild Indian, mounted on a fiery steed, with lasso in one hand and a sharp stick in the other; but the poor little calves huddled together, and refused to move! This scene was so wholly unexpected, and so perfectly ludicrous, that the spectators burst into uncontrollable, uproarious laughter. The shouting somewhat startled the buffaloes, and goaded on by French and his assistants, they started off on a slow trot. The uproar and merriment was renewed, and the multitude swinging their hats, and hallooing in wild disorder, the buffaloes broke into a gallop, ran against a panel of the low fence (consisting of two narrow boards), tumbled over, and scrambled away as fast as they could!"

It has occurred to us that there was not a great deal to boast of in this transaction; for, if we remember rightly, not only were the public grossly deceived, but two or three persons lost their lives on the occasion.

A FAITHFUL picture is drawn in the following of "Sleigh-riding and Sleigh-scenes in the City."

"There is scarcely any scene of 'life' that can surpass the bustle and excitement of a great city in 'sleighing-time.' Merry bells, gliding 'cutters,' sleighs, 'pungs,' every thing that has runners, and can be drawn by cattle of any description—bright faces, scores of parties huddled in sweet hay, under warm buffalo-skins—what a delicious assemblage of pleasant matters!"

"Go out on a mild morning in winter, ten miles, say, from the city over a well-trodden road, after a deep snow, which a slight northeast mist, dying away at last in a southern hilly, makes damp and glib! Mark the brown woods—the blue hills, pale, clear, and stately in the distance—the imprisoned river, where the skater wheels on his shining heel; the whitened plains, richly bedight with every hue: it is a sight to remember! “Go,” as the poet says, “Go when the rains

Have glazed the snow, and clothed the trees with ice;
While the slant sun of January pours
Into the bowers a flood of light! Approach!
The encrusted surface shall upbear thy steps,
And the broad arching portals of the grove
Welcome thy entering. Look! the mossy trunks
Are cased in the pure crystal; each light spray,
Nodding and tinkling in the breath of heaven,
Is studded with its trembling water-drops,
That stream with rainbow radiance as they move;
But round the parent stem the long live boughs
Blend in a glittering ring, and arbors hide
The glassy floor—oh! you might deem the spot
The spacious cavern of the virgin-mine
Deep in the womb of earth, where the gems grow
And diamonds put forth radiant rods and buds,
With amethyst and topaz—and the place
Lit up most royally with the pure beam
That dwells within them. Or haply the vast hall
Of fairy palace that outlasts the night,
And fades not in the glory of the sun;
Whose crystal columns send forth slender shafts
And crossing arches; and fantastic aisles
Wind from the sight in brightness, and are lost
Among the crowded pillars. Raise thine eye.
Thou seest no cavern-roof nor palace-vault:
There the blue sky and the white rifted cloud
Look in. Again the wildered fancy dreams
Of spouting fountains, frozen as they rose,
And fixed with all their branching jets in air,
And all their sluices sealed. All, all is light—
Light without shade!”

In the way of calmness, perhaps the following is about as cool as any thing the reader has ever encountered, at least in the “Drawer:”

A young lawyer gets his first note for collection. It is against a country customer; so he sits down and writes him a letter in due form, advising him that “his note has been left for collection, that it has run a long time, and that immediate attention to it will save costs,” etc., etc. In about ten days he received this answer:

“Valley Forks, Nov. 15, 18—

“To F. N. B., Esq.—Dear Sir: I received your polite note of the fifteenth instant this day. It was directed to the post-office at Freetown. The mail comes from your village to Tompkinsville every day by the stage which runs from your place to Owego, leaving your village at six o'clock in the forenoon. From Tompkinsville there is a mail every other day to Freetown, and also to Valley Forks. From thence there is a cross-mail around the hills, through the lower towns in this county, to our place once a week; but the postmasters on that route can't read very well, and sometimes keep a letter over one mail to spell out the direction.

“By directing your letters to this office, where I get my papers, I should get them generally in about three days after you mail them, and about a week or ten days sooner than if directed to Freetown; which delay, in an extended correspondence, might, in some cases, be of considerable importance. I hope, my dear Sir, you will not suffer any inconvenience from it this time; but I thought it best, as you seemed a little ignorant of the geography of this part of the country, to give you this information, that you might in future know how to direct to,

“Dear Sir, yours very respectfully,
“JOHN CALKINS.”

“P. S. As to that note, you say ‘it has run a long time.’ I can only say, as the boy said of the molasses, ‘Let her run!’”

Reading this to a friend at our elbow, he remarked that he had heard or read of two cases of independent, impudent “coolness” that he thought were quite as freezing. He went on to say:

“A sharp-nosed, glib-tongued woman was marketing with her basket on her arm in one of the markets of Cincinnati, when she stopped before a ‘station’ where hominy grits, buckwheat, flour, etc., were sold by the small quantity. Unlike the present time, every thing was down then to the lowest figure.* Going up to the seller, she said:

“‘What do you ask a half-bushel for Indian meal?’

“‘One shilling, ma’am.’

“‘A shilling, eh? Ain’t that rather high?’

“‘High! Sha’n’t I give you a half-bushel? If you think a shilling is a high price for half a bushel of Indian meal, I’ll give you a half-bushel—come, now.’

“‘Is it sifted?’ asked the woman—indicating that even as a gift, she was not going to take it unless it was ‘first-rate.’”

Something akin to this was the other instance of “coolness.”

A merchant in New York, formerly a resident of a flourishing western city of the “Empire State,” after residing in the metropolis for some ten years without once leaving it, took it into his head to visit his old town for a few days. He arrived there the day before the Fourth of July, and during the celebrating of the ensuing day, he encountered very many of his old friends and acquaintances. While he was conversing with one of them, a man with but one arm made his way into the circle where he was standing, and said, “Ain’t you W—— B——, that used to live here some time ago, down there to —’s store?”

“I am—the same,” was the reply.

“Yes; well, I thought so. Don’t you remember me?”

“Can’t say that I do—though your face is familiar to me, too, somehow.”

“Why, it is my arm that does it. I had two when you knew me. This arm” (moving the stump of an arm that was not there), “was blow’d off, last July’s four year, by the busting of a cannon. Don’t you remember old Ben —, that did a good many days’ work down to your store?”

The recognition being now complete, the man went on:

“Can’t you give a poor cripple something on this glorious day? Ef it hadn’t a-been for the Fourth of July, I shouldn’t have lost my arm.”

Mr. B—— took from his waistcoat pocket two

* Apropos of this: Look at the prices in Cincinnati in March, 1821, page 180 of vol. xx. of Niles’s Register, quoted from a Pittsburg paper.

“Flour, one dollar a barrel; good pine boards, twenty cents a hundred feet; sheep and calves, one dollar a head; one bushel and a half of wheat will buy a pound of coffee; a barrel of flour will buy a pound of tea; twelve-and-a-half barrels will buy one yard of superfine broadcloth!”

Compare these prices with present prices: flour at $12 50 a barrel, and tea at from forty to fifty cents!

twenty-five cent pieces, and resumed his conversation with his friends. The man backed out after receiving the money, without a word of thanks, and he saw him no more until, while he was seated at dinner, the one-armed bore came to him at table, and bending over, said in a loud and "confidential" whisper:

"Your brother that lives here give me a dollar this morning; you didn't give me but half a dollar. Couldn't you give a fellar a little more?"

Not wishing—being a New York merchant—to be outdone in liberality by a relative in the "rural districts," he again took from his pocket two quarter-dollar pieces, and handed them to the cripple. Without deigning a reply, the man took the money and walked off.

Just as Mr. B——, on the same evening, was lighting his candle at the bar, being about to retire for the night, the importunate "solicitor" came up to him with—

"I say, B——, do you know that one o' them quarters that you gave me last was an eighteen-penny piece? Haven't you got a good quarter about you?"

"I gave him the 'good quarter,'" said Mr. B——, in mentioning the circumstance to a friend, "and as I went up to bed, and after I had retired to rest, I could not help thinking that my maimed friend 'stood up for his rights' in a way that was 'a caution' to all givers. He repudiated the idea altogether that 'beggars should not be choosers,' that is, if they chose to be!"

We observe the following "Short Dialogue" in a Western newspaper:

A. "Will you have the kindness to take my over-coat in your carriage to town?"

B. "With pleasure; but how will you get it again?"

A. "Oh, very easily: I shall remain in it!"

Not unlike a circumstance in which we were once a party. Having occasion to send to a friend in a sister city a few books, we asked a neighbor who was going to the same place in the morning if he would oblige us by taking them. He kindly acceded, with the proviso, "if he could get them into his trunk."

The parcel was sent—somewhat larger than was anticipated—in a square bundle, and arrived safe at its destination.

Some time afterward, meeting the friend who had obliged us (there were no convenient expresses in those days), we thanked him for his courtesy, and asked him if he found any difficulty in carrying the package?

"Oh, not at all!" he said: "it was too large to go in the trunk, but I managed it very well, notwithstanding. My trunk is not a very big one; so I opened your bundle, and there was abundance of room inside for my trunk!"

THE man who "earns his bread before he eats it;" who, while procuring the means of ample subsistence for himself and family, is at the same time benefiting the community in which he lives, will peruse the following, as all readers should do, with an acknowledgment of the well-expressed truths which it contains:

"The noblest men I know on earth,
Are men whose hands are brown with toil;
Who, backed by no ancestral graves,
Hew down the woods, and till the soil,

And win thereby a prouder name
Than follows kings' or warriors' fame."

"The working men, what'er their task,
Who carve the stone or bear the hoil,
They bear upon their honest brows
The royal stamp and seal of God;
And worthier are their drops of sweat
Than diamonds in a coronet.

"God bless the noble working men,
Who rear the cities of the plain;
Who dig the mines; who build the ships,
And drive the commerce of the main:
God bless them! for their toiling hands
Have wrought the glory of all lands."

"We talk of Adam and Eve as having been, before the fall, in a very happy condition," says the Albany Register; "but one thing they missed—they were never children! Adam never played marbles. He never played 'hookey.' He never drove a tandem of boys with a string. He never skated on a pond, or played 'ball,' or rode down hill on a hand-sled. And Eve—she never made a play-house; she never took tea with another little girl, from the tea-table set out with the tea-things. She never rolled a hoop, or jumped the rope, or pieced a baby-quilt, or dressed a doll. They never played 'blind-man's buff,' or 'Pussy wants a corner,' or 'hurly-burly,' or any of the games with which childhood disports itself.

"How blank their age must have been, wherein no memories of early youth came welling up in their hearts; no visions of childhood floating back from the long past; no mother's voice chanting a lullaby to the ear of Fancy, in the still hours of the night; no father's words of kindness, speaking from the church-yard where he sleeps. Adam and Eve—and they alone, of all the countless millions of men and women that have ever lived—had no childhood!"

KING KAMEHAMEHA, judging from a private letter from the Sandwich Islands, must be a royal monarch. The letter says: "He loaf around the town of Honolulu, peeps into a tavern, and is ready to take a 'nip' with any body that asks him. He isn't worth a red cent, and auctioneers won't take his bid at an auction!"

"The Captain's Bathing-tub" was the title of a most amusing "sailor's yarn" which appeared in "The Saint Nicholas"—a magazine which was too clever to die so soon as it did. It was published monthly, for a short time, at Owego, in this State, but its circulation was too limited for it to be long sustained. But that is "neither here nor there" now, so far as the "Bathing-tub" story is concerned, an incident of which we here condense.

A cabin-boy of one of the ward-room officers, on board a United States' vessel, a good deal given to mischief, one day made his way into the captain's cabin, while they were engaged above in making out a strange sail in the horizon. Here he finds all sorts of luxuries, including various wines, of which he drinks enough to raise his courage not only, but to make him somewhat reckless of consequences.

In this state he finds himself in a room adjoining the cabin, a tin bathing-tub in one corner, luxuriously supplied with rare cosmetics, and "smelling like a barber's shop of the first class." "Now," he says, "I had tried all the other good things that I found in the cabin; I had drank th-captain's wine, and straightened myself out on his sofa, and swung in his hammock; and I thought I wouldn't quit without taking a dip in his bath."

Accordingly he strips, and is just enjoying the first pleasant feel of the water; when he was interrupted by the messenger-boy, who had been sent into the cabin by the captain. Fortunately he was not discovered this time, but it made him cautious:

"... I must contrive some way to get out with my clothes if any body came along again. I wasn't long in finding the way. The ports on the side of the forward cabin were open, and through them I could easily get out into the mizzen-chains, where I could dress myself without being seen. There was a big gun in each port, a "carronade," as they call 'em—short but fat—the biggest kind—you never see such kind of guns, except aboard ships-of-war. I could clamber out alongside one of 'em easy enough, though. I was a little fellow then."

He takes his shoes, clothes, and hat, and sticks them outside of the port where they couldn't be seen; "and then," he says, "I went back to the tub. All this didn't take more than half a minute, for I worked sharp, I can tell you. The only thing I was afraid of was, that the steward would come in and catch me. I didn't care a tinker's copper for the captain. I knew I could get out of the port in less time than would take him to come down the poop-ladder. Big bugs are never in a hurry—it wouldn't look dignified, you know."

Presently, while lying luxuriously in the captain's tub, he hears him coming down the cabin-stairs, when he jumps out of the receptacle and makes for the port:

"I was fairly outside and safe, as I thought, in the chains, before the captain opened the cabin-door. I sat there a minute drying myself, and then was going to begin to dress when I heard the sound of oars coming round the stern of the ship. I knew by the regular dip in the water, and by the noise of the oars in the row-locks, that it was a man-o'-war's boat, and, of course, I supposed it was the first cutter coming alongside, though it seemed to me she had come up mighty quick.

"Here I was in a fix. They would see me from the boat as soon as she pulled round the stern, and I should have had work to tell what I was doing, stark naked, in the chains. I couldn't get my clothes on quick enough to be ready for company—for I couldn't stand up without considerable risk of being seen from the poop, in case some fellow happened to be looking over the larboard side. I concluded pretty soon what to do. I first looked into the cabin. The captain wasn't in sight, so I jammed my clothes into the muzzle of the gun, and then got in after myself, feet foremost. I told you, you know, that guns of the kind they call carronades are short but have tremendous big bores. They are used in close fighting, and, when nothing else comes handy, they load them with a cask of nails, and such sort of things. I shoved myself in feet foremost, because I knew that if I rammed my head in first, with my body on top of it for a wad, it would be rather close quarters for breathing comfortably. I found it rather a snug berth as it was; I couldn't move an inch after I had got in, but I knew I was out of sight at any rate.

"I supposed that after the men had come aboard the boat would be hauled out to the booms, and that then I could get out of the gun. But, instead of that, they had the cutter loaded with something, I didn't know what, that it took pretty near an hour, it seemed to me, to clear her of. They got a sling on the main-yard, and I could hear the orders given to hook on in the boat, and the bo'm's mate in the gangway piping to haul taut and 'hoist-away,' and 'avast hoisting,' and 'come up,' over and over again, until it appeared to me they had got a dozen launch-boats over the side. By this time my back began to ache with lying in the bore of that old gun; it didn't exactly fit my shoulders.

"I began now to hear talking in the cabin. The gun, you know, was all in the cabin except the muzzle of it, that run out of the port. I couldn't hear so well through the iron though, and it was some time before I could make out what the talk was about. I could distinguish the captain's voice, and could hear the words 'lock' and 'wafer' pretty often. At last he and the man he was talking with came close up to the very gun I was in, and then I heard him call the gunner by name in talking to him, and I recognized him by his growl. I heard him rubbing the gun off with his hand, and playing with the lock, and two or three times he snapped it: that made me feel a little nervous, for I didn't know what he might have put in it."

He finds out at last what they are talking about. The gunner has been making some percussion-wafers that he thinks will never miss fire. He said they would set the charge off without any priming, and he wasn't sure that there would be any need even of pricking the cartridge. The captain tells the gunner to try some of these new wafers on the very gun that the fugitive is in!

"I was just going to sing out," he continues, "when the captain asked the gunner if he was sure the gun wasn't loaded.

"Yes, Sir," says he; 'the charges were all drawn when the ship came in, and these guns in the cabin haven't been loaded since.'

"That was not so bad, after all. They were only going to try if the wafers would map—so I concluded to keep quiet. I didn't quite like the idea, though, for I wasn't quite so well contented with the gunner's trial in the gun as I should have been out of it. I wasn't quite as easy in my mind as I had been an hour before, when I was swinging in the captain's cot. I lay still, though, and meant to 'see it out.' I knew there wasn't any shot in the gun, at all events, and I didn't think a blank cartridge would hurt me much, seeing as I had pushed my trowsers and frock in before I got in myself. If I had gone in head foremost, I should have been a good deal more worried about the matter; but, thinks I to myself, 'I'll risk the feet!'

"So there I lay, aching all over, from having my shoulders and hips jammed in between the round sides of my berth, and listening to the talk between the captain and gunner that came in at the touch-hole, and then to the noise in the boat that came through the muzzle. It's not strange that I got every thing mixed up in a heap, in my mind, as to what was going on outside. At last, however, I heard the click of the spring, as the gunner cocked the lock, and the next instant—"

"Well! what then?"

"I was going through the air as if I had been kicked by a forty-horse power! My clothes didn't follow me more than twenty fathoms, but I didn't touch the water till I was a mile and a half from the ship!"

That he was saved is a matter of course, "else wherefore breathes he in a Christian land" to tell his wondrous yarn.

Like Hood's story of the aeronaut who was thrown out of his balloon by a crazy man, when some two miles up in the air, and himself describing the circumstances, and the moon-hoax of Mr. Locke, this "yarn" derives its interest from the naturalness of its minutiae, rather than from the probability of its catastrophe.

THERE has been "any amount" of sport made, of late months, of Shanghai Fowls. They seem to be losing much of their first popularity among us, like many another two-legged foreigner who has paid us a visit of honor, which ended very differently. The Shanghai is born into the world with an inordinate pair of legs, which thereafter continue to grow into regular drum-sticks of the longest dimensions. It is asserted, too, that although good "layers," they are very fond of devouring their own eggs. A Mohawk farmer, who has tried them thoroughly, expresses a by no means favorable opinion of the breed. He says their true name is Shank-high, and that they are rightly named: "They have no body at all, and when the head is cut off the legs come right apart. I don't see how they can set on their eggs—my jack-knife can set as well as they can. They don't sit on the roost the same as other chickens: not a bit of it! When they attempt to sit as other chickens do (they straddle the stick), they fall off backward!"

"They sit when they eat, I know; for I've seen 'em do it; and I've seen 'em try to eat standing—but they couldn't 'fetch it;' for when they peck at a grain of corn, on the ground, they don't more than half reach it but the head bobs right between their legs, making them turn a complete somerset. I'd as soon see a pair of tongs or compasses walking about my yard as these Shank-highs. They crow, too, a long time before day in the morning, when it ain't day; probably because their legs are so long that they can see day-light long before the common chicken!"

A GOOD and pungent satire upon the ridiculous bank-panics which are got up in "hard times," is contained in the following, from an Albany paper:

"There was a severe run made upon the 'Ginger-bread Man' of Troy, on Saturday. Up to two o'clock he had redeemed two crollers and a doughnut. In consequence of the stamina exhibited, consols advanced an inch and a half!"

"THE True Gentleman is of no country, and is the same every where; not only at the social party or assembly, but in the noisy mill, the busy shop, the crowded hall, at home, or in the street: never oppresses the weak, or ridicules the unfortunate: respectful and attentive to his superiors; pleasant and affable to his equals; careful and tender to the feelings of those whom he may consider beneath him."

How many of Thackeray's "snobs" would stand this test of a "gentleman?"

THE "Tall Gentleman," in the ensuing lines, need not have made any "Apology." It was not necessary, at all. It is notorious that "tastes differ," and in nothing is it more remarkable than in the fact that tall women usually choose short husbands, and tall men short wives; fulfilling the old maxim, that "men and women like best their opposites." No; there can be little doubt that the "tall gentleman" was jilted; and he now turns round, and in revenge, affects to be himself the jilter. Like a kindred spirit, who once said to a friend, in speaking of a very beautiful young lady, almost the belle of the village:

"Do you know, Harry, that I came very near marrying that girl?"

"No! is that so?"

"Yes; I kept company with her for some time. Folks said it was a match, sure."

"Well, why didn't you marry her?"

"Well, you see the way of it was this: one night when I was a-seeing of her from conference-meeting, I asked her if she would accept me, and she said she had "rather be excused," and I was so excited, and such a confounded fool besides, that I excused her!"

But we are keeping the reader from the poetry:

Upbraid me not! I never swore

Eternal love to thee;

For thou art only five feet high,

And I am six foot three:

I wonder, dear, how you supposed

That I could look so low;

There's many a one can tie a knot,

Who can not tie a bean!

Besides, you must confess, my love,

The bargain's scarcely fair;

For never could we make a match,

Although we made a pair;

Marriage, I know, makes one of two,

But there's the horrid bore,

My friends declare if you are one,

That I at least am four!

'Tis true, the moralists have said,

That Love has got no eyes;

But why should all my sighs be heaved

For one who has no size?

And on our wedding-day, I'm sure

I'd leave you in the lurch,

For you never saw a steeple, dear,

In the inside of a church!

'Tis usual for a wife to take

Her husband by the arm—

But pray excuse me, if I hint

A sort of fond alarm.

That when I offered you my arm,

That happiness to beg,

Your highest efforts, dear, would be,

To take me by the leg!

I do admit I wear a glass,

Because my sight's not good,

But were I always quizzing you,

It might be counted rude.

And though I use a convex lens,

I still can not but hope

My wife will e'er "look up to me"

Through Herschel's telescope!

Then fare thee well, my gentle one,

I ask no parting kiss;

I must not break my back, to gain

So exquisite a bliss:

Nor will I weep, lest I should hurt

So delicate a flower:

The tears that fall from such a height

Would be a thunder-shower!

Farewell! and pray don't throw yourself

In a basin or a tub;

For that would be a sore disgrace

To all the Six-Foot Club!

But if you ever love again,

Love on a smaller plan,

For why extend to six-feet three

The life that's but a span?

If poor Hood were living, there are many who would attribute these lines to him. As it is, they are from an unheralded English pen, which imitates that great master of word-playing with some success.

WE know not the author of the subjoined passage, which we find in our collection of disjecta membra, but it impresses us as extremely touching, and as having come directly from the heart to the hand that penned it:

"In comparison with the loss of a beloved wife, what are other bereavements? THE WIFE! she who fills so large a space in the domestic heaven—she who is so busied, so unwearied—bitter, bitter is the tear that falls upon her grave! You stand beside her tomb, and think of the past. Fain would the soul linger there. No thorns are remembered above that sweet clay, save those your own hand may have unwillingly or unkindly planted. Her noble, tender heart lies opened to your inmost sight. You think of her as all goodness—all purity—all truth.

"But she is dead. The dear head so often laid upon your bosom, now rests upon a pillow of clay. The hands that ministered so untiringly, are folded white and cold, beneath the gloomy portals. The heart whose every beat measured an eternity of love, lies under your feet. And there is no white arm over your shoulder now—no speaking face to look up in the eye of love—no trembling lips to murmur, 'Oh, it is so sad!' There is so strange a hush in every room! No smile to greet you at night-fall—and the clock strikes and ticks, and ticks and strikes. It was sweet music, when you could count the hours with her—when she could hear it! Now it seems only the hours through which you watched the shadows of death gather upon her dear face. But many a tale it tells of joys past, sorrows shared, and beautiful words and deeds registered above. You feel that the grave can not keep her. You know that she is in a happier world, but still you feel that she is often by your side—an 'angel-presence.'

"Cherish these emotions. They will make you happier. Let her holy presence be as a charm to keep you from evil. In all new and pleasant connections give her a place in your heart. Never forget what she has done for you—that she has loved you. Be tender of her memory."

To how many bereaved hearts will these sentences come, who will look back upon the past with mingled recollections of sorrow and joy—perhaps of penitence. "So live, husband and wife," says an old English worthy, "that when either dies the spirits of both may mingle."

THE following piece of "composition" may be "backed" against any thing ever produced. It was written half a century ago by Sir Boyle Roche, a member of the Irish Parliament, in the "Troublesome Times of 'Ninety-Eight," when a handful of men, from the County of Wexford, struck terror into the hearts of many a gallant son of Mars, as well as the worthy writer himself. The letter was addressed to a friend in London; and it is old enough to be new to nine in ten of the readers of the "Drawer."

"MY DEAR SIR—Having now a little peace and quietness, I sit down to inform you of the dreadful bustle and confusion we are all in from these blood-thirsty rebels, most of whom are (thank God!)

killed and dispersed. We are in a pretty mess; can get nothing to eat, nor any wine to drink, except whisky; and when we sit down to dinner we are obliged to keep both hands armed. While I write this, I hold a sword in each hand, and a pistol in the other.

"I concluded from the beginning that this would be the end of it, and I see I was right; for it is not half over yet. At present are such goings-on, that every thing is at a stand-still. I should have answered your letter a fortnight ago; but I did not receive it until this morning. Indeed, scarcely a mail arrives safe without being robbed. No longer ago than yesterday, the coach with the mails from Dublin was robbed near this town. The bags had been judiciously left behind, for fear of accident; and by good luck there was nobody in it but two outside passengers, who had nothing for the thieves to take. Last Thursday notice was given that a gang of rebels was advancing here under the French standard, but they had no colors, nor any drums except bagpipes.

"Immediately every man in the place, including women and children, ran out to meet them. We soon found our force much too little: we were too near to think of retreating. Death was in every face, but to it we went, and by the time half our little party were killed, we began to be all alive again. Fortunately, the rebels had no guns, except pistols and pikes, and as we had plenty of muskets and ammunition, we put them all to the sword. Not a soul of them escaped, except some that were drowned in an adjacent bog; and in a very short time, nothing was to be heard but silence. Their uniforms were all different colors, but mostly green. After the action, we went to rummage a sort of camp, which they had left behind them. All we found was a few pikes without heads, a parcel of empty bottles full of water, and a bundle of French commissions filled with Irish names. Troops are now stationed all round the country, which exactly squares with my ideas. I have only time to add, that I am in great haste.

"P.S.—If you do not receive this, of course it must have miscarried, therefore I beg you will write to let me know!"

A BEAUTIFUL THOUGHT.

"So should we live that every hour
May die as dies the natural flower,
A self-revolving thing of power.

"That every thought and every deed
May hold within itself the seed
Of future good and future need:

"Esteeming sorrow, whose employ
Is to develop, not destroy,
Far better than a barren joy."

THERE is a good lesson to truant husbands in the following; and we fancy, also, a kind of sly satire upon a certain species of pseudo-sentimental "poetry," so called, which is not perhaps quite so much in vogue at present as it was three or four years ago.

HE CAME TOO LATE!

"He came too late! the toast had dried
Before the fire too long;
The cakes were scorched upon the side,
And every thing was wrong!
She scorned to wait all night for one
Who lingered on his way,
And so she took her tea alone,
And cleared the things away!"

"He came too late! at once he felt
The supper hour was o'er;
Indifference in her calm smile dwelt,
She closed the pantry-door:
The table-cloth had passed away—
No dishes could he see:
She met him, and her words were gay—
She never spoke of tea!

"He came too late! the subtle chords
Of patience were unbound;
Not by offense of spoken words,
But by the sighs that wound.
She knew he would say nothing now
That could the past repay;
She bade him go and milk the cow,
And coldly turned away!

"He came too late! the fragrant steam
Of tea had long since flown;
The flies had fallen in the cream—
The bread was cold as stone.
And when, with word and smile, he tried
His hungry state to prove,
She nerved her heart with woman's pride,
And never deigned to move!"

An anecdote was well told, some years ago, of a polite Southerner, an accomplished and kind-hearted gentleman, which has found a place, and we think deservedly, in our collection:

"On one occasion he had been driving hard, from morning until night, over the rough roads in the neighborhood of Columbia, South Carolina, and alighted at the only comfortable-looking tavern in the place, very hungry and very tired. Sticking his eye-glass to his eye—his constant companion, he being very near-sighted—he demanded a roast fowl, some good wine, and a comfortable room for the night.

"The landlord was 'exceedingly sorry,' but he 'couldn't give him a comfortable room: the only place he could have to sleep in was a double-bedded room, with another gentleman.'

"'Very well, Sir; let us have the best you've got. No man can do more than that, Sir.'

"After discussing his supper, he sought his room, 'turned in,' and went to sleep.

"His slumbers were destined to be of very short duration. Before long he was awakened by a call from the other bed, 'Sir! Sir!'

"'Bless my soul!' cried D—, thrusting his glass up to his eye, and endeavoring to peer through the dark, 'what's the matter, my dear Sir? Is the house on fire, or are there bugs in your bed?'

"'Neither, Sir; but, my dear Sir, you snore so terribly that I can not sleep, Sir. It is terrible, Sir!'

"'Bless me, my dear Sir, I am shocked that I should have been so rude as to snore in a gentleman's presence, and be a stranger to me. I really ask your pardon, Sir, and beg you'll overlook it. It wasn't intentional, I assure you.'

"The apology was accepted; a 'Good-night' was exchanged; and both parties went to sleep again.

"It was not long, however, before a rumbling sound was heard from the polite gentleman's bed, every moment growing louder and louder, until at last it ended in a thunderous diapason. The other lodger, driven almost to madness, started up and exclaimed—

"'Good gracious! this is too much! I can't stand it! I say, Sir! Sir!! Sir!!! wake up, Sir!'

"'Bless my soul! well, what's the matter now?'

cried out the offender, starting up in bed; 'you seem to be very restless, Sir.'

"'Restless! I believe you!' said the disturbed gentleman: 'you've been snoring again, Sir, worse than ever, and I can not get to sleep.'

"'You don't say so! Have I been repeating my rudeness to a stranger? I am really extremely sorry, my dear Sir, but I was really asleep. Good-night—night—night; very sor—sor—ry.'

"And off he drowsed again, and in five minutes began snoring as loudly as ever, until he was again awakened by his room-mate's complaints.

"'Snoring again, have I, Sir?' said the unconscious offender. 'Well, the fact is, I have had a hard day's journey and eaten a hearty supper—and if I snore, Sir, I can't help it. I have apologized twice, and that is sufficient. I am now about to go to sleep again; but allow me to inform you, Sir, that if you wake me up again, snoring or not snoring, Sir, I shall proceed at once to get up and give you the soundest thrashing you ever had in the whole course of your life! Good-night, Sir!'

"His slumbers were undisturbed for the rest of the night."

"It will not do," says Sydney Smith, "to be perpetually calculating risks, and adjusting nice chances. It did all very well before the flood, when a man could consult his friends upon an intended publication for a hundred and fifty years, and then live to see its success for six or seven centuries afterward; but at present, a man waits, and doubts, and hesitates, and consults his brother, and his uncle, and his first cousins, and particular friends, till one day he finds that he is sixty-five years of age—that he has lost so much time in consulting first cousins and particular friends, that he has no time left to follow their advice."

ONE very frequently hears the remark made, that such, and such, and such a man, "can be a gentleman when he pleases." Now when our reader next hears this expression made use of, let him call to mind the following:

"He who 'can be a gentleman when he pleases,' never pleases to be any thing else. Circumstances may, and do, every day in life, throw men of cultivated minds and refined habits into the society of their inferiors; but while, with the tact and readiness that is their especial prerogative, they make themselves welcome among those with whom they have few if any sympathies in common, yet never by any accident do they derogate from that high standard which makes them gentlemen.

"So, on the other hand, the man of vulgar tastes and coarse propensities may simulate, if he be able, the outward habits of society, speaking with practiced intonation, and bowing with well-studied grace; yet he is no more a gentleman in his thought and feeling, than is the tinselled actor who struts the boards the monarch his costume would bespeak him. This being the 'gentleman when he likes,' is but the mere performance of the character. It has all the swell of the stage and the foot-lights about it, and never can for a moment be mistaken by one who knows the world. A cloak too large can not be gracefully worn by a small man."

THE latest instance of "Spiritual Manifestations" that we have seen, is that recorded of an incredulous young man "Down East," whose father had promised, before his death, to hold invisible communion with him:

"The spirit of the gentleman (who, by the way, had been somewhat severe in matters of discipline) was called up, and held some conversation with the boy. But the messages were not at all convincing, and the youth would not believe that his father had any thing to do with them.

"Well," said the medium, "what can your father do to remove your doubts?"

"If he will perform some act which is characteristic of him, and without any direction as to what it shall be, I shall believe in it."

"Very well," said the medium; "we wait some manifestations from the spirit-land."

"This was no sooner said than (as the story goes) a table walked up to the youth, and, without ceremony, kicked him out of the room!

"Hold on! stop him!" cried the terrified young convert; that's the old man!—I believe in the rappings!"

"The hero has never since had a desire to 'stir up the old gentleman!'"

EVERY BODY that knew any thing about Kentucky fifteen years ago, remembers old Colonel Greathouse, a gentleman of the old school, who always had old friends and old wines, and who declared he despised every thing that was new. The old Colonel lived fast, lived well, petted his niggers, raised tobacco, and, of course, gradually wore out his lands. One fine morning in January, the Colonel came to a very strange conclusion, and that was, that the plantation had not paid expenses for many years, and something must be done. After much hard talking and an immense sight of thinking, the Colonel concluded to send his son, "Phil," down the Mississippi, to look out a "new location," the old homestead having "given out." In due course of time, Phil set upon his adventurous journey: he was really "a chip off of the old block," had all of his father's peculiarities, and, though younger in years, had consumed about the same amount of the good things of this sublunary life. Phil, once started, went straight to New Orleans, and took expensive parlors at the St. Charles. His every movement was chronicled by fun and frolic; there was a crowd of good fellows at his heels, go where he would. Every body in the hotel knew him as that "gay young man," and his appearance in the ladies' parlors was hailed with delight. The season drew to a close, and Phil's money was out; and so he started home. Old Colonel Greathouse received "his boy" with all the affection of a fond father; mutual compliments were exchanged; and after the usual questions and answers pertaining to separations were gone through with, Phil found himself in the parlor, with nothing but a round table and a bottle of Madeira between himself and his father, when the following conversation ensued:

"You say, Phil, my boy, that the lands down in Louisiana are very fine, the crops large, and all the people rich and hospitable; s'pose you went about a great deal on the plantations, examined the soil, looked at the expenses of raising the crop, and got your information on the spot?"

"Certainly," said Phil, with gravity; "went about all over, and the land is wonderful; no bottom to the soil—crops grow in it spontaneously—money comes in with a rush—wonderful plantations on that 'Mississippi bottom.'"

"We must move, Phil, and commence the world anew; 'twon't do, my boy, to live here and have every thing eating their heads off," half soliloquized the Colonel; and then brightening up he asked, "you know, Phil, I told you to inquire about the water in that lower country; I am particular about water; how did you like that?"

Phil was puzzled; after a few moments' perplexity he replied, "Why, the fact is, when I got away from home I remembered you mentioned something to me about a matter you were particular about, but I forgot what it was; and, consequently, the few months I was in Louisiana I never tasted any water!"

"You should have done it once, to oblige your father," said the Colonel, sorrowfully; and from that time forward nothing more was heard of the proposed removal to the rich lands "farther South."

SHAKING of hands is the accepted manner of performing "how-de-do," "glad to see you;" but the manner of doing this varies so much, that with some people we have "great shakes," and with others "no shakes at all." Politicians, if they are running for office, have the art of hand-shaking to perfection. Editors have a very impressive shake for a subscriber paying "in advance." In shaking hands ladies are generally passive, for the least pressure from their little fingers means volumes not included in the formal and familiar ceremony. We have been told, by those "posted up" in such matters, that the telling and eloquent shake of the hand, that eclipses all others, comes from a principal in a duel when his second announces to him "that the affair was amicably arranged." It would be impossible to give all the varied expression that characterizes the act of shaking hands; but there are a few that can be designated, which, like primitive colors, form the ground-work of every varying shade.

The pump-handle shake first deserves notice. It is performed in a solemn, mechanical manner. No attempt has ever been successful to give it grace or vivacity. As a general rule, it should not be continued after your friend is in a profuse perspiration from the unwonted exercise. The pendulum shake is of a similar character, but it has a horizontal instead of perpendicular motion. It is executed by boldly sweeping your hand horizontally toward your acquaintance, and, after the junction is effected, rowing with it from one side to the other as long as human nature will bear it. The tourniquet shake is next in importance. It derives its name from the instrument of torture by which surgeons stop the circulation of the blood. The person using this style, if he has a large, powerful hand, can throw his victims into intense agony, and even produce dislocation of the small bones of the fingers, and in delicate persons easily sprain the wrist. The cordial shake is performed with a hearty, boisterous agitation of your friend's hand, accompanied by a moderate degree of pressure, and cheerful exclamations of welcome. This style is indiscriminate and very popular. The grievous touch is the opposite of the cordial grapple. It is principally used by hypochondriacs and sentimental young clergymen, and is always accompanied by a nervous inquiry about somebody's health. The prude major and the prude minor are entirely monopolized by the ladies: the first allows the gentlemen to touch the fingers down to the second joint; the second gives you the whole of the forefinger. The very ladies, however, who use these styles most effectually, will, in a moment afterward, permit the tourniquet squeeze, provided it is done in the waltz or other equally familiar dance. We might extend our list with descriptions of the gripe-royal, and the saw-mill shake, and the shake with malice prepense, which are, after all, but exaggerated forms of the pump-handle, pendulum, and tourniquet varieties, and therefore can be conceived more easily than described.

TOM PLACIDE, as he is every where called by his many friends, relates an amusing incident connected with himself. He states that, awhile since, he was traveling down the Ohio, and being personally unknown to any one, he passed away the time by reading. A most obtrusive person among the passengers seemed to be miserable because he could not learn Placide's business; and, after two or three days' fruitless speculation, he concluded that P. was a "sporting gentleman," and in endeavoring to satisfy himself, the following scene ensued:

T. P., getting angry at the stranger's supposition, his dark eye flashing, and his manner imposing—"I tell you I am no gambler. I am an actor, Sir."

Stranger, growing very familiar and self-complacent—"Ride a horse in a ring, eh? Throw flip-flaps on the tan-bark?"

T. P., very angry indeed—"No, Sir! I am no circus-actor—I am a play-actor." And straightening himself up, and swelling out his portly front, he slapped his hands upon the bottom of his vest, and, in a voice of thunder, demanded, "Do I look, from my size, as if I could throw flip-flaps?"

The stranger viewed the indignant son of Thespis for a moment with a critical eye, and then pronounced, "That he didn't think Placide could throw flip-flaps;" and perfectly unconscious that he had been exceedingly disagreeable, he walked away, to meddle in some one else's private affairs.

Literary Notices.

Napoleon Bonaparte, by JOHN S. C. ABBOTT. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) The Memoir of Napoleon, which has attracted such universal attention as its successive numbers have appeared in the pages of this Magazine, is about to be reproduced, with the original illustrations, in two handsome volumes, including copious additions, and a careful revision by the author. In this important contribution to the biography of one of the most prominent historical characters of modern times, Mr. Abbott has taken an independent point of view, made himself master of the subject by assiduous personal research, and, refusing to yield to the influence of early impressions and foreign traditions, has presented an estimate of the illustrious man to whom he has devoted his studies, which can not fail to soften prejudices, remove misapprehensions, and purify and exalt the fame of Napoleon in the eyes of all impartial and intelligent readers. It is, perhaps, hardly time for the public mind to receive a perfectly just impression of the character of one concerning whom there has been such intense and bitter political controversy. The whole mass of English literature relating to the subject, with only one or two rare exceptions, is infected with the hostile spirit which John Bull feels bound to exercise toward a national enemy. The crude and superficial work of Sir Walter Scott—written after the vigor of that mighty mind had been impaired by misfortune and disease—betrays, through a thin disguise of candor, the inveterateness of foregone personal and political conclusions. Redeemed from absolute tediousness by occasional passages of brilliant description, his narrative exhibits scarcely a trace of the endeavor to ascend to the highest sources of historical evidence, to correct traditional errors, to look at the other side of the picture which had long fastened the attention of British spectators, and to do exact justice to the policy and motives of a man whose name had been a perennial terror, both at the fireside and in the council and the field. The views of Sir Walter Scott, however, with the remains of political prejudice, have been the chief means of forming public opinion on the subject with the generation now on the stage. We have been content with echoing the voices which reached us from the opposite shore of the Atlantic. The question of Napoleon's character was no longer regarded as an open one—not only had the case been given to the jury, but a verdict had been rendered, and the court adjourned. A solitary defender of Napoleon, like Hazlitt, for instance, might lift up his voice against the general concert of opinion, but it was of little use; he could not stem the prevailing tide; and he was set down as a lover of paradox, with shrewd warnings against the seductions of splendid, but erratic genius. The writer of these volumes doubtless shared in the almost universal antipathy with which the character of Napoleon was viewed among the "better classes" in this country. A New-Englander, a clergyman, a conservative, connected with the old Federal party by all his antecedents, he must have imbibed a hatred of Napoleon with his native air. Belonging to a family remarkable for an almost excessive austerity of conscience, and cherishing the traditions of youth with the zeal of religion, Mr. Abbott was perhaps the last man from whom a panegyric on the French Emperor could have been expected. At the commencement of his studies, with a view to this biography, he, probably, little foresaw the result himself. We regard these circumstances as a guarantee of the good faith and earnest conviction which characterize the execution of the work. With all the comments which it has called forth, in the serial form, it is not pretended, as we are aware, that the writer has garbled facts to suit his purpose, or failed to weigh historical probabilities in an even scale. His conclusions, of course, are legitimate themes of discussion, and it is not surprising that they have provoked marked differences of opinion. In regard to the literary merits of these volumes, we think that high commendation can justly be awarded to the writer. His style is often impassioned and glowing, but never passes the limits of natural modesty and good taste. His narrative moves on at a brisk pace—he does not allow it to be impeded by superfluous details—and shows great skill in giving the gist of an incident in a few graphic expressions. It is marked by force and simplicity rather than by ambition of ornament. Frequent scenes of pathos are described, but always with true feeling, and with no attempt to enhance the effect by appeals to mawkish sensibility. Mr. Abbott's battle-pieces are lively and impressive—taking strong hold of the memory—though they do not stun the reader by reproducing the din of combat in a storm of words. With his enthusiastic admiration of the great military conqueror, Mr. Abbott has wisely avoided the temptation of throwing a false glare around military glory. He cherishes a religious sense of the horrors of war. He comprehends the superior position of the arts of peace in the progress of civilization. In doing justice to the achievements of his hero in arms, he does not hesitate to deplore their sad necessity; while his warmest sympathies are with the freedom and intelligence that are to bless the nations, when the bloody footsteps of war shall recede before the advance of pacific improvement. The influence of his work on the younger portion of the community, for whom it is more particularly intended, can not be otherwise than commanding and salutary. It will tend to remove the prejudices of party and ancestry—to inspire a deeper sense of historical justice—and to quicken the appreciation of all that is excellent and noble in the career of Napoleon, without bewildering the mind by a melodramatic display of military fascinations.

The Science and Art of Elocution and Oratory, by WORTHY PUTNAM (published by Miller, Orton, and Mulligan), consists of a theoretic view of the principles of elocution, with a variety of specimens in the different branches of eloquence, selected from the productions of eminent orators. The work has evidently been prepared with carefulness and tact, and is commended to teachers by its variety, appropriateness, and orderly method.

James S. Dickerson has issued a neat educational work, entitled Harry's Vacation; or, Philosophy at Home, by WILLIAM C. RICHARDS, intended to present the more familiar principles of natural science in a form adapted to engage the attention of youthful readers. The plan, although not an entirely novel one, is carried out with no small degree of success. In the dialogues, which are made the vehicle of instruction, the language is simple and attractive, the illustrations are apt, and the topics introduced in the natural order of succession are thus explained to the comprehension of the juvenile student. There are certainly few volumes in which so great an amount of information is conveyed in such a pleasing shape.

The same publisher has brought out the first volume of Romance of Biography, edited by the Rev. FRANCIS L. HAWKS, D.D., containing the Life of Richard the Lion-Hearted. It is designed as the commencement of a series, prepared by different hands, with special reference to the instruction and improvement of the young. The details of the narrative in this volume are fascinating as a novel. The life of the hero was crowded with romantic incidents, and they are here reproduced in their picturesque bearings with admirable effect. Under the able superintendence of the erudite editor, the series can scarcely fail to prove a useful addition to the means of popular education.

Humanity in the City, by the Rev. E. H. CHAPIN. (Published by Dewitt and Davenport.) A series of discourses, devoted to the application of religious truth to the duties and interests of every-day life.

Abstaining from themes of polemic discussion, they plunge into the very heart of city life for materials of warning and illustration. Among the titles of the discourses are, The Lessons of the Street, Man and Machinery, The Allies of the Tempter, The Children of the Poor, and others of a kindred character. These subjects are treated by the author in the spirit of religious philanthropy, and enforced with his characteristic vigor and eloquence of expression.

Fudge Doings: being Tony Fudge's Record of the Same, by IK. MARVEL. (Published by Charles Scribner.) The Fudge family are well-known in the fashionable circles of New York. They reside in one of the stateliest mansions of the Fifth Avenue, sport a magnificent equipage, and are exemplary worshippers of wealth and style. Their nephew, Tony, has most indiscreetly opened to the gaze of the public some of their domestic secrets. He draws aside many a splendid veil—the mischievous rogue—and shows the vulgarity and hollow-heartedness which are concealed beneath upholstery of velvet and gold. As a specimen of caustic, but good-natured satire, this volume is fully equal to any of the previous productions of the author.

Hagar the Martyr, by Mrs. H. MARION STEPHENS (published by Fetridge and Co.), is a story belonging to the school of melodramatic intensity, written in a bold, dashing style, and seeking the materials for popular effect in scenes of strange and high-wrought passion. The best features of the work are its occasional characterizations and descriptions of Southern life; while the improbability of the plot, and its prevailing extravagance of diction are more adapted to charm the lovers of "fast literature," than to gain the approval of discreet readers.

A revised edition of COLTON's Greek Reader, prepared by HENRY M. COLTON, the brother of the previous editors, has been issued by Durrie and Peck, New Haven. The original work was edited by the Rev. JOHN O. COLTON, and published in 1839—this was succeeded by an edition in 1846, by G. H. COLTON—and the edition now offered to the public is furnished with a variety of new references and notes, with other valuable improvements. The excellence of this volume as a preparatory text-book for the Greek student has been fully tested by experience; and we need only say, that the present edition is brought out with the attention to clear and attractive typography, which is half the battle with the beginner in this difficult branch of scholastic education.

A new work by Professor TAYLOR LEWIS, on The Scriptural Cosmology, is announced by G. Y. Van De Bogert. The leading design of the volume is to set forth the Biblical Idea of Creation, philologically ascertained, in distinction from any scientific or inductive theory of the Earth. The learning and acumen of the author, with his well-known earnestness of conviction, can not fail to awaken an interest in the forthcoming work.

Of recent American works none have met with a more cordial appreciation, than Mr. RICHARD GRANT WHITE'S Shakespeare's Scholar. The Literary Gazette speaks of it as follows: "We are, on various accounts, greatly pleased with this Transatlantic contribution to Shakespearian literature. It is another goodly store added by worthy hands to the cairn of the great poet. It is another proof that our brethren across the Atlantic are not totally absorbed in politics, or cotton-growing, or making bread-stuffs. It gives assurance that there will be a succession of men who will take pride in preserving those writings, which are the noblest heir-looms of the common Anglo-Saxon race. We are delighted also to find in Mr. White an enemy of the pedants and bookworms who have too much appropriated the office of Shakspeare's commentators. This feeling he carries to excess, though we can scarcely be angry with the violence of his zeal in such a cause.

Messrs. Griffin of Glasgow announce as forthcoming a collected edition of the works of Lord BROUGHAM, to be issued in parts. By-the-by, it turns out, on the evidence of a manuscript note of the late Lord COCKBURN, of Edinburgh—the biographer of JEFFREY, and the careful collector during his life of every thing relating to the Edinburgh Review and Scottish literature generally—that the famous article in the Edinburgh on BYRON'S "Hours of Idleness," which drew forth the "English bards and Scotch reviewers" and stung Byron into the splendid revenge of his subsequent career, was written not by Jeffrey, but by Brougham. Lord Cockburn's library, containing many curious and valuable memorials, has just been sold; and a collection of tracts, relating to the Edinburgh Review, and Edinburgh politics and literature during the last fifty years, and profusely annotated by Lord Cockburn, has been purchased by the British Museum for 85*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* The collection consists of 350 volumes of pamphlets, of which about 60 refer to the Edinburgh Review alone. These supply, in some cases, the only evidence of the authorship of the essays in that famous periodical.

Some people say Mr. CARLYLE is, and some say he is not getting on with his history of Frederick the Great. He is reported to have declared it his intention to deposit all his future writings, as M.S. sealed, in the Record Office, or some such place, not to be produced for some two thousand years, when the world is enough advanced to receive them with profit. A plan suggested to him in reply, was that he should print off an edition, and have the whole impression put in the Custom-house (with the bonded wine) till the world was fit to appreciate his writings. His friend Mr. TENNYSON is about to break his long silence. We may expect, after such a continued reticence, something truly great. All the young poets who have been so extensively starring in his absence will have to pale their ineffectual fires.

"We have received," says the London Leader, "the sixth volume of M. LOUIS BLANC'S History of the French Revolution, the most brilliant and powerful in style, the most laborious and exact in its accumulation and analysis of original documents, of the many 'Histories' of that colossal epoch. The heroes and the victims of the Revolution have been subjected to transformations so violent and so capricious at the hands of fanatical partisans and unscrupulous literary jobbers, that the very scene of a drama played out before the eyes of our fathers has faded into a mirage, and the leading actors appear like the fantastic shadows of a magic lantern. . . . The chapter in the present volume in which the celebrated Day of Dupes, June 20, 1792, and the invasion of the Tuileries are described, is characterized by force of narrative painting. In this episode M. Louis Blanc corrects the numerous errors and omissions of Lamar-tine and Michelet, having himself consulted with indefatigable diligence the ample resources of the British Museum, so rich in the official reports and flying sheets of the period. 'No doubt,' says M. Louis Blanc, in a long note appended to this chapter, 'M. de Lamartine has involuntarily misled his readers, having been himself misled.' But this only shows with what care historical researches should be conducted. When there is an abundance of contradictory evidence on an event, it is indispensable to take them one by one, to weigh, compare, confront them. A tedious and distasteful task, no doubt! But truth requires it. An historian should be an examining magistrate before being a painter."

A fine statue of white marble, from the chisel of Mr. THURUPP, has just been erected in Westminster Abbey, to perpetuate the memory of the poet WORDSWORTH. It represents the author of the "Excursion" sitting in the open air, in a contemplative mood, as if communing with nature, under whose habitual sway he may be said to have lived. He is resting on a moss and ivy-mantled stone or knoll, with the green sward at his feet enameled in flowers; the legs are crossed; his right hand and arm are wound gracefully round one knee; the left hand, with the forefinger slightly uplifted, is laid upon an open book, which the poet has just been reading; the eyes are bent, in pensive admiration, upon the flowers at his feet; and the spectator may fancy him saying:

"To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears."

The conception is an exceedingly felicitous one; the whole attitude of the figure is singularly easy and graceful, and the sculptor has been equally happy in rendering the head and features of the deceased, with which the public are more or less familiar.

JOHN GIBSON LOCKHART died on the 25th of November, at Abbotsford, in his sixty-fifth year. He was the younger son of the Rev. Dr. Lockhart, of Glasgow, and in that city received his early education. From the University of Glasgow there are exhibitions to Balliol College, Oxford, one of which young Lockhart obtained. He was destined by his father for the law; but though in due time called to the Scotch bar, he had little inclination for legal studies. To the pursuits of literature he was early devoted, and the society into which he was thrown when he first "walked the Parliament house" as a young advocate at Edinburgh, confirmed his purpose of making literature his profession. A visit to Germany, where, among other influencing scenes and incidents, his having seen Goethe is chiefly memorable, completed his alienation from the routine duties of the Scotch bar. In May, 1818, he first met Scott, who was pleased with his conversation, and who shortly after recommended him to the Ballantynes, as likely to afford useful aid in their literary undertakings. They employed him to write the historical part of the "Edinburgh Annual Register," which Scott had previously compiled, but for which other more profitable avocations left him no leisure. Soon after this he received a message from Scott to come to Abbotsford, along with John Wilson, to meet

Lord Melville of the Admiralty, son of the famous Henry Dundas, who had more political power than any Scotchman since the days of Lord Bute, and to whom the young Tories of the north transferred the humble reverence and keen expectation with which they had looked to the father as the dispenser of patronage and places. From the interview with Lord Melville no immediate result ensued in Lockhart's case, but it is well known that political influence had the main share in the election of Wilson to the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh. The appointment turned out far better than had been anticipated; but at the time it was felt to be too strong an exertion of political influence to thrust into the chair of Dugald Stewart a young poet, who had not turned his attention to ethical studies, and whose literary attainments were chiefly known from his light contributions to "Blackwood's Magazine." Lockhart was at this time a most intimate friend of Wilson, and his ablest coadjutor in Blackwood, which, though only started in 1817, had already become a considerable "power" both in literature and politics. In 1820 Lockhart was married to Sophia, the eldest daughter of Walter Scott. All who know the story of Scott at this period of his life will remember with delight what Lockhart has told of his own home at Chiefswood, in which the laird of Abbotsford took so deep an interest. These happy family scenes were soon clouded, and the much-loved boy, the "Hugh Littlejohn," for whom he wrote the "Tales of a Grandfather," died at the early age of eleven. From the mournful thoughts suggested by the desolated hopes of Chiefswood and Abbotsford, we gladly turn to the busier scene in which Lockhart appeared in 1825, as editor of the "Quarterly Review." We may merely mention that before this Lockhart had become more known as an author, having in 1820 published his first novel, "Valerius, a Roman Story," which was followed by "Reginald Dalton," and by several other tales and novels. Early in 1825 appeared his "Life of Burns," in Constable's newly-commenced miscellany of cheap and popular literature. The same year Lockhart removed to London, to succeed Giffard in the management of the "Quarterly." Apart from the influence derived from its political articles, Lockhart took care to maintain the excellence of the "Review" in all departments of literature, and some of the ablest efforts of modern English scholarship are found in the papers on classical subjects in the volumes of the "Quarterly" during Lockhart's editorship. His "Life of Sir Walter Scott" has become a standard book in English literature, and few biographies will ever attain equal popularity.

Amidst the outward affluence and social environments of Lockhart's London life in later years, few but his intimate friends knew the griefs that preyed upon his mind. The whole family history of Scott and Lockhart affords a striking instance of "the vanity of human wishes." Scott's chief ambition was to be a country laird, and the founder of the family of the Scotts of Abbotsford. His inward thought was that his house should continue forever, and the land be called after his own name. Of Scott's four children, the eldest son died childless in India, and the other, unmarried, in Persia. The younger daughter died not long after her father, and Mrs. Lockhart four years later. Lockhart had then a son who is since dead, and his daughter (Mrs. Hope) is married in a connection widely alien from the early associations of Abbotsford. The death of Lockhart has now severed the last tie which linked his family with that of Sir Walter Scott, though his name will live with him in the history of literature.

Of the works of Lockhart which appeared as separate publications, besides the Life of Scott, his literary reputation will receive the highest lustre from the Spanish Ballads. Many similar compositions have since been attempted, but none have excelled in spirit and style these fine specimens of old Spanish minstrelsy.

Professor EDWARD FORBES, F.R.S., late of King's College, London, and the Government School of Mines, and known by his valuable contributions to natural science, and particularly to geology, has just died, in his thirty-ninth year. Dr. Forbes only recently left London to succeed Professor Jamieson in the chair of Natural History in the University of Edinburgh. "This," says the Caledonian Mercury, "was with Forbes the highest object of ambition; and had his life been spared, it would have been dedicated to extending its already great reputation, so that no school probably in the civilized world would have equaled it in greatness. With this view he had formed gigantic and most able plans, which, through his great influence with the Government, would have been liberally supported, and we have no doubt ultimately carried out. But, arrived at the culminating point of his ambition, and at the commencement of his long-matured schemes of usefulness, he has, by a mysterious dispensation of Providence, been removed from us, when we were beginning to appreciate his worth. A chronic disease, contracted when in the East, re-excited and rendered violent by a severe cold caught last autumn on a geological excursion, and which burst out with uncontrollable fury about ten days ago, was the immediate cause of his premature death." "Edward Forbes," says an English paper, "had a great intellect. He was an acute and subtle thinker, and the broad philosophical tone and comprehensive grasp of his many-aided mind enabled him to appreciate and to understand the labors of others in fields of inquiry far different from his own. A naturalist by inclination and by profession; a close observer in the museum and in the field; possessed of a vast acquaintance with the details of those branches of science which he had made his especial study; no less capable of the widest generalizations, as his Ægean researches more especially show—in speculation a Platonist, delighting in Henry More—in literature and in art, blessed with a solidity of judgment and a refinement of taste such as fall to the lot of few—in social life a humorist of the order of Yorick; gifts like these are alone sufficient to raise a man to eminence, and to lead us to lament, as a great calamity, his sudden and early death. But it was not these qualities which distinguished him so highly beyond his fellows. Our affections cling to character and not to intellect; and rare as was the genius of Edward Forbes, his character was rarer still. The potty vanities and heart-burnings which are the besetting sins of men of science and of men of letters, had no hold upon his large and generous nature—he did not even understand them in others. A thorough spirit of charity—a complete toleration for every thing but empiricism and pettiness, seemed to hide from him all but the good and worthy points in his fellow-men."

THE VALENTINE.—DELIGHT.

THE VALENTINE.—VEXATION.

OH!

A VERY COLD MORNING.

Fashions for February.

THE depth of winter is not a season productive of special novelties or innovations in the World of Fashion. The garment which we select for our principal illustration is designed for the Opera or Sortie du bal. It is of merino, ornamented with a border of watered satin ribbon, loops of which, terminating in streamers, are arranged upon the cape and sleeves. A tasseled cord completes the ornament of this neat and simple garment.

The style of coiffure here delineated is designed for full dress. A French twist, terminating in a Grecian plait, carried in a circle around it, forms the back. This lies behind the comb. The twist is continued below by a five-strand cable twist, which also forms a circle around the head, outside and in front of the first plait and comb. The front hair is arranged in French bandeaux, terminating at the ears in an open seven-plait, which is carried in five festoons around the lower portion of the head. Drooping sprays of fuschias and jasmine constitute the floral ornaments.

The slipper, placed upon the stool, is well adapted to the dress delineated above. It is of taffeta, delicately wrought in needle-work, trimmed with swansdown. The overshoes are also bordered either with swansdown or ermine. They are made of various materials—silk, satin, cashmere, velvet, etc. Some are plain, others are ornamented with embroidery. They are confined to the foot by bows of ribbon, or, as in the illustration, by tasseled cords.

We give place to the following hints on the adaptation of colors to complexions, which are well worthy of attention. They are taken from M. CHEVREUL's elaborate treatise on the "Harmony of Colors:"

RED DRAPERY.—Rose-red can now be put in contact with the rosiest complexions without causing them to lose some of their freshness. Dark-red is less objectionable for certain complexions than rose-red, because, being higher than this latter, it tends to impart whiteness to them, in consequence of contrast of tone.

GREEN DRAPERY.—A delicate green is, on the contrary, favorable to all fair complexions which are deficient in rose, and which may have more imparted to them without inconvenience. But it is not as favorable to complexions that are more red than rosy, nor to those that have a tint of orange mixed with brown, because the red they add to this tint will be of brick-red hue. In the latter case a dark green will be less objectionable than a delicate green.

YELLOW DRAPERY.—Yellow imparts violet to a fair skin, and in this view it is less favorable than the delicate green. To those skins which are more yellow than orange it imparts white; but this combination is very dull and heavy for a fair complexion. When the skin is tinted more with orange than yellow, we can make it roseeate by neutralizing the yellow. It produces this effect upon the black-haired type, and it is thus that it suits brunettes.

VIOLET DRAPERIES.—Violet, the complementary of yellow, produces contrary effects: thus it imparts some greenish yellow to fair complexions. It augments the yellow tint of yellow and orange skins. The little blue there may be in a complexion it makes green. Violet, then, is one of the least favorable colors to the skin, at least, when it is not sufficiently deep to whiten it by contrast of tone.

BLUE DRAPERY.—Blue imparts orange, which is susceptible of allying itself favorably to white and the light flesh tints of fair complexions, which have already a more or less determined tint of this color. Blue is, then, suitable to most blondes, and in this case justifies its reputation. It will not suit brunettes, since they have already too much of the orange.

ORANGE DRAPERY.—Orange is too brilliant to be elegant; it makes fair complexions blue, whitens those which have an orange tint, and gives a green hue to those of a yellow tint.

WHITE DRAPERY.—Drapery of a lustreless white, such as a cambric muslin, assorts well with a fresh complexion, of which it relieves the rose color; but it is unsuitable to complexions which have a disagreeable tint, because white always exalts all colors by raising their tone; consequently it is unsuitable to those skins which, without having this disagreeable tint, very nearly approach it. Very light white draperies, such as muslin, plaited or point lace, have an entirely different aspect.

BLACK DRAPERY.—Black Draperies, lowering the tone of the colors with which they are in juxtaposition, whiten the skin; but if the vermilion or rosy parts are to a certain point distant from the drapery, it will follow that, although lowered in tone, they appear, relatively to the white parts of the skin contiguous to this same drapery, redder than if the contiguity to the black did not exist.

CAMP SCENE.

DARIEN EXPLORING EXPEDITION, UNDER COMMAND OF LIEUT. ISAAC C. STRAIN. BY J. T. HEADLEY.

[Having from the first become deeply interested in the Darien Exploring Expedition, and afterward doubly so in the fate of Lieutenant STRAIN, I was very anxious to know its history. Subsequent acquaintance with Lieutenant Strain, ripening into a warm friendship, enabled me to gratify this desire. With that grew the wish to make the facts public. At my request, therefore, Lieutenant Strain gave to me his private report to the Secretary of the Navy, whose permission to use it was cheerfully granted, also the journals kept by both parties, together with the book of sketches made by the draughtsman. Interesting interviews with Lieutenant Maury and civil engineer Mr. Avery, have enabled me to add many details not incorporated either in the report or the journals. For any personal matters relating to Lieutenant Strain I solely am responsible, as well as for any special praise bestowed on him. I know it would be his wish that I should speak of him personally as little as possible; but I have thought it best to look only at the truth and interest of the narrative, and make every other thing subservient to these.]

IT is not necessary here to speak of the importance to the whole civilized world of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien, nor of the different surveys that have been made.

The route of the following Expedition, beginning in Caledonia Bay and ending in Darien Harbor, had not been passed over since 1788, and was a terra incognita. In 1849, an Irish adventurer published a book, which went through several editions, in which he declared that he had "crossed and recrossed it several times and by several tracks," and that only "three or four miles of deep cutting" would be necessary for a ship canal the entire distance. Aroused by this report—which proved to be a mere fiction—Sir Charles Fox and other heavy English capitalists took up the subject, and sent out Mr. Gisborne, a civil engineer, to survey the route. He pretended to do so, and also published a book, mapping down the route, and declaring that it was only "thirty miles between tidal effects," and the "summit level one hundred and fifty feet." An English company was immediately formed with a capital of nearly $75,000,000.

Without following the progress of this scheme in England and on the Continent, it is necessary, in this connection, to state only that Mr. Gisborne's favorable report resulted in enlisting England, France, the United States, and New Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1855, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

VOL. X.—No. 58.—E E

Granada, in exploring together the proposed route for a ship canal across the Isthmus. It will be seen in the succeeding pages that this report was also a fiction; that Mr. Gisborne never crossed the Isthmus at all—never saw across it—never advanced more than a dozen miles inland at the farthest—and, in fact, was afraid to make the attempt, and that, instead of the summit-level being 150 feet, it is at least one thousand feet. As an inevitable result, therefore, the various expeditions, relying as they did entirely on this report, with its accompanying maps, would be led into error, and in the end completely baffled. The English one, starting from the Pacific side December 23d, 1853, proceeded up the Savana, and cutting its way more than 26 miles from the place of debarkation on that river, finally became disheartened, and, with the loss of four men slain by the Indians, returned discomfited to the ships. Strain, from the Atlantic side, started nearly a month later. Three days after his departure, another expedition, composed of French and English together, under the guidance of both Dr. Cullen and Mr. Gisborne, set out from the same point, and endeavored to follow in his track. But, notwithstanding they had the men who said they had crossed and surveyed the Isthmus—the former having walked it “several times and notched the trees”—they were unable even to get out of Caledonia Valley, and after having penetrated not more than six miles in all returned. Gisborne and Cullen could not follow their own maps, not to mention the notched trees. The Granadian expedition started still later. This was a very large party, under the command of Codazzi, the principal engineer of New Granada. How far it penetrated is not known, but straggling over the space of a mile it was completely broken up, and returned, after having lost several men. It is with feelings of national pride I state that the American expedition, under Strain, alone accomplished the passage, though under an accumulation of suffering rarely recorded in the annals of man.

On the morning of the 17th of January, 1854, the Cyane, Captain Hollins, with Lieutenant Strain and his party on board, entered Caledonia Bay, where they were immediately visited by a number of Darien Indians, some of whom spoke broken English and Spanish, which they had acquired in their intercourse with the traders on the coast. They came on board fearlessly, were very intelligent and observant, and, though much below the ordinary stature, were strongly built and athletic.

On the 18th a council was held which lasted about eighteen hours, and finally terminated favorably. For a long time the chiefs resisted Hollins's demand for permission for Strain's party to traverse the Isthmus, and opposed the project of a canal most pertinaciously, insisting that if God had wished one made, he would have given greater facilities (an opinion in which Strain fully coincided before he got across), and that they ought not to be disturbed in the quiet possession of the land which the Almighty had given them. Strain replied that God had created them naked, but they had chosen to clothe themselves, which was as much an infraction of his laws as it possibly could be to construct a canal. To this special pleading they could not reply, and finally, believing that Captain Hollins would send a party through their country with or without their permission, gave their consent, remarking that it appeared to be the will of God that they should cross; and after stipulating only that they should not disturb their women, and respect their property, cemented the treaty by a hearty supper, during which they indulged freely but not immoderately in strong liquors.

Relying on Mr. Gisborne's book, the party took only ten days' provision. Each member of it, with the exception of Mr. Kettlewell, the draughtsman, had either a carbine or a musket, with forty rounds of ball cartridges; while eight of the officers and engineers had, in addition, a five-barreled Colt's revolver, with fifty rounds of ammunition to each pistol. The arms and provisions, in addition to the blankets and minor articles, brought the average weight borne by each individual to about fifty pounds, which was quite as much as they could carry through a pathless wilderness, and in a tropical climate.

The naval officers who were detailed for the expedition were—Passed midshipmen, Charles Latimer and William T. Truxton, and 1st assistant-engineer, J. M. Maury, whom Strain appointed assistant-astronomer and secretary, having obtained sufficient knowledge within the last ten years of his high capacity in each department. Mr. Latimer, however, being taken ill, never started. Mr. Truxton was appointed acting master and executive officer.

Midshipman H. M. Garland, of the Cyane, accompanied the party as a volunteer. The assistant-engineers were Messrs. A. T. Boggs, S. H. Kettlewell, J. Sterret Hollins, and George U. Mayo. Dr. J. C. Bird, of Wilmington, Delaware, was the surgeon. In addition to these were three others, volunteers.

Messrs. Castilla and Polanco, commissioners appointed by the New Granadian government, also determined to accompany the party, which numbered, all told, twenty-seven men. Having safely landed his little band, Strain drew them up, read his instructions to them, and then took up the line of march for a small fishing village at the mouth of the Caledonia river, where good water could be obtained.

As the huts were abandoned by the Indians, they took possession of them for the night, and, having stationed four armed men as sentinels, stretched themselves on the floor. But the heavy booming of the surf, as it fell in regular and tremendous shocks at their feet, made it like sleeping amidst the incessant crash of artillery. The billows, as they broke on the beach, swept on through the houses, over the sand spit, and into the river beyond.

THE COUNCIL.

On the morning of the 20th, the party was early afoot—and while waiting for some provisions and other articles for which they had sent to the Cyane, Strain endeavored to obtain a view of the valley above by opening a path to the summit of a hill on the right bank of the river, near its mouth, and some knowledge of their route by sending a party to cut up the left bank of the river. Here, as he from the top of this hill swept the mountain-range with his glass, the first feeling of doubt and misgiving arose within him, for in an unbroken chain that range stretched onward till it abutted on the sea, showing nowhere the depression indicated on the maps.

This little band of explorers, as they boldly struck inland and began to traverse the intricate forests of the tropics, presented an interesting spectacle. Officers and men were all dressed alike in blue flannel shirts, with a white star in the collar, blue trowsers and belt. The only distinction between them was, the latter wore blue caps without a front-piece, while the former had Panama hats, and pistols in their belts. These caps were stuffed with tow, which afterward served an admirable purpose in kindling fires. A spy-glass strapped to Strain's shoulders distinguished the leader. The order of march was single-file—the leading men carrying a macheta (cutlass) or ax to clear the way. The others followed, each carrying a blanket, haversack, carbine, cartridge-box, and forty rounds of ammunition. It being necessary that the men should be well armed, not much additional weight could be imposed upon them. Strain, an old woodman and explorer, thoughtfully put a linen shirt under his woollen one, anticipating the want of linen with which to dress wounds. That shirt afterward did good service to his wounded, lacerated men.

Taking the bed of the Caledonia river—dragging a single canoe after them until the shallowness of the stream compelled them to abandon it—they pushed vigorously up the Pacific slope, and near sunset reached a large island in the river. Following a path, they found deserted huts similar to those they had left at the mouth of the river, and there determined to encamp. The huts had evidently been deserted in haste, for stools, gourds, and cooking utensils, were strewn over the floors. These, as well as the extinguished brands of a recent fire, were all collected together and placed under charge of a sentry. In the morning they were restored as nearly as possible to their original positions, as Strain was determined to give the Indians no pretext for a display of hostility; although he felt sufficiently strong in numbers and preparation to cope with any tribe they would probably meet on the Isthmus. The rancho was surrounded by a plantation of cocoa, which, with the exception of tortoise-shell, is the only exchangeable product of the Darien Indians. A strict watch was kept during the night, there being two seamen and two officers or engineers, armed to the teeth, at all times on guard, while the remainder of the party had their arms beside them and their cartridge-boxes buckled on. These, silent and motionless, kept anxious watch in the midst of those deserted huts, whose very abandonment seemed portentous of evil. At length the wished-for light appeared, when the shrill and protracted boatswain's call, "Heave round"—the cheering strains used to quicken the sailors as they tread round the capstan to heave the anchor to the cat-head—startled every sleeper to his feet. "Saddle up," then rang through the encampment; and soon every man had his blanket and haversack swung to their places, and, with carbine in hand, stood ready to march. At half-past six they set out; and now wading in the bed of the river, and again following paths along its banks, through plantations of cocoa, plantains, and Indian corn, they pushed on until they came to a point where a small tributary entered from the southward and westward. Here they had a good view of the Valley of the Caledonia; and Strain, taking advantage of it, carefully examined the range of the Cordillera with an excellent spy-glass, and finding only a semicircular chain, from fifteen hundred to two thousand feet in height, abutting upon the sea-coast ranges to the westward and southwestward, determined to follow the easterly, or principal branch of the river, believing that it offered the stronger probability of a gorge through to the other slope.

Soon after passing the tributary already alluded to, they followed a well-beaten path on the left bank of the river, which soon brought them to an Indian village, containing some forty or fifty houses, grouped among trees and surrounded by large plantations of cocoa and plantains, and a small quantity of sugar-cane.

An occasional glance through the interstices of the bamboo walls at the interior of these houses—which were spacious and well-constructed—showed that, though devoid of inhabitants, much of their personal property still remained. The grunting of pigs and the crowing of cocks left behind by their owners, gave the only evidence of life in this deserted village, except the steady tramp of the heavily armed and overloaded party. These familiar sounds added inconceivably to the desolation of the scene, and impressed deeply the whole band. Strain, with his cocked carbine in his hand, strode on in advance, his eye rapidly, almost fiercely, searching every suspicious-looking spot; while the men, each one with his weapon resting in the hollow of his arm, pressed swiftly after. Not till the last hut was passed did they breathe free again. As they emerged from this village, they found a path which wound down a steep bank to the river, near the opposite bank of which lay a canoe containing women's clothing, abandoned evidently in the haste of their flight. As Strain was about to descend by this path, three Indians suddenly appeared. After an interchange of friendly signs, one of them offered to point out to him, as he supposed, the path leading to the Pacific. He accordingly countermarched; but, after accompanying his guide a few hundred yards, came to the conclusion that the latter only wished to lead them from the village; for in the direction he took, toward the west and southwest, Strain, as already mentioned, could see no opening whatever in the Cordillera. He accordingly halted the party, and explained to the Indian, as well as possible, that he would proceed no further in that direction, and was determined to follow up the main branch of the river. The latter made no opposition, but shrugged his shoulders; and turning down a ravine to the river, led up its bed until they had passed the village, then courteously took leave. Subsequent events convinced Strain of the good faith of this Indian, who doubtless would have led him into a path across the Cordillera, which he afterward discovered by mere accident. At ten o'clock the order to halt passed down the line; and the party, still suspicious, breakfasted in the bed of the river. A fire was kindled, some coffee and tea made, which, with pieces of pork stuck on sticks and toasted in the fire, made a comfortable meal. The repast being ended, the party started forward, keeping the bed of the stream till mid-day, when Strain ordered a halt, thoroughly convinced from its course—which inclined strongly toward the Atlantic—its rapid fall—which imparted to it almost the characteristics of a mountain torrent—and the aspect of the mountain ranges which crossed his course, towering some two or three thousand feet above the level of the sea, that this route could afford no facilities for a ship canal, and could not be that alluded to by either Mr. Gisborne or Dr. Cullen. While the main body remained halted here, Messrs. Truxton, Holcomb, and Winthrop were sent up the river to reconnoitre, and upon returning reported unanimously that the route in that direction was impracticable. Having received this report, they rapidly retraced their steps, finding, as they had done in the ascent, several canoes containing women's clothing drawn up on the beach. Their owners were invisible, having doubtless hidden themselves in the forest; but the fact of their having fled up this branch of the river to avoid the party, was additional evidence to Strain that he had taken the wrong direction. Marching rapidly past the village, which seemed to be occupied, he followed the smaller branch toward the southward and westward—the India-rubber, cotton-wood, and other tropical trees, gracefully festooned with parasitic plants, darkening the way, which was enlivened only by the laugh of the men as their companions, now and then, tumbled over a rock into the water. About sunset they encamped on the right bank of the stream. The officers and men were divided into two messes, each having its separate fire and cook. This second day's tramp had been a hard, exciting one, and the men were glad to halt. After tea, the two groups sat around their respective fires, smoking, telling stories, and singing, till the watch was set. An officer and two sentries formed, this night and for a long time afterward, the regular guard from eight in the evening until daylight. The two fires were kept brightly burning all night, shedding their steady light over the motionless party as they slept in pairs, with one blanket beneath and the other above them, under the open sky. They were a splendid set of men, and, as they lay there in order of battle, seemed well fitted for the hardships before them.

Roused up by the boatswain's whistle, the party breakfasted, and again set out, wading about a mile up the river, until they arrived at a "cañon," in which the water was so deep as to place fording out of the question, while the scapped rocks on either side made the ascent to the bank above very difficult. From the outset, as the way became more and more obstructed, Wilson, who had a splendid voice, cheered on the party by making the woods ring with "Jordan is a hard road to travel." While stumbling up the rocky bed of the Caledonia, he had changed his song into "Caledonia is a hard stream to travel," in which there was far more truth than poetry. It was a relief to all, therefore, when Strain ordered a halt, and informed them that it was his intention to leave this river soon, as it was leading toward a very high range of mountains and too far to the southward. Holcomb and Winthrop were for continuing on, and the former having found an accessible point on the bank of the "cañon" to ascend, and displaying some impatience to attempt it, and as some of the party appeared anxious to follow, Strain gave permission, but at the same time recommended them to follow him a short distance below, where a more gentle ascent might be found, and one less likely to tire the heavily-laden party. They did so, and soon came to an easy slope, up which they pushed. They had not proceeded far when they unexpectedly stumbled on a well-beaten track leading over the hills to the southward and westward. This was an unlooked-for stroke of good fortune, and Strain was convinced that he had found by accident the traveled Indian route to the Pacific. He now recalled the scattered party—first by shouting, as they were near, then by the boatswain's whistle, and finally by firing his carbine. The stragglers soon closed in, but upon counting the party to see who might be missing, he found that Holcomb, Winthrop, Hollins and Bird, and Roscoe, a seaman of the Cyane, were absent. He then fired three carbines in quick succession, the previously established signal to close instantly—the signal also of extreme danger. This signal was answered, but still the missing party did not come up. After waiting some time, several successive shots were fired, when Strain, to his astonishment, heard their carbines far up the river, and apparently near the base of the hill. Unwilling still to believe it to be their wish to separate, he waited some time on the slope of the mountain, firing frequently. But finding that their responses gradually became more and more faint and distant, he determined to proceed, hoping that they were only seeking a lower point in a gorge—which he felt sure existed on his left—to cross over and rejoin him. The path he now followed was clear and well defined, and led by a spur over the Cordillera, or principal chain, which rose in three successive peaks as they advanced. The ascent was very steep, being in many places as much as fifty and sixty degrees, up which the men were frequently compelled to pull themselves by trees. As they were without water, and heavily laden, this proved very fatiguing. Arriving at the summit of the first peak, Strain ordered a halt, hoping that the missing party might come up. In the mean time Edward Lombard, a seaman of the Cyane, climbed a tree to reconnoitre the country, but reported nothing but mountains and hills in every direction. Following the Indian trail, at a quarter past one, P.M., the party arrived at a small stream running to the westward. The men, suffering from thirst, stooped down to this, and took long and hearty draughts of water. They then laid aside their arms, blankets, and haversacks, and sat down to wait for the absentees, who were expected every moment. The sun at length stooping behind the tropical forest, and no signs of their arrival, Strain ordered a fire to be made, and went into camp. After eating a scanty supper, he seated himself at a point where the Indian trail entered the gorge, and watched long and anxiously for the arrival of the missing men. The shadows of night gathered over him there, yet he still waited until a late hour, when he stretched himself on his blanket in painful suspense as to their whereabouts.

Early in the morning he sent scouts across the mountain, to see if they had not crossed higher up on the Caledonia, and reached the river valley which he was confident must exist on the other side. At half past nine they all returned, unsuccessful, but reported having found a large stream, which they believed united with that on which they then were, which afterward proved to be the fact.

Deeply solicitous as Strain was about the absent men who had been intrusted to his care, and for whom he was in a great measure responsible, he felt the obligation also not to make any delays that should endanger those still under his command nor the success of the expedition, and at ten o'clock gave the welcome order to move forward. Keeping in view this river to its junction with the Sucubti, they followed the latter in its rough and tortuous course, struggling over huge boulders and masses of stones rolled together by the torrent, and which rendered the way almost impassable. Dangerous rapids also intersected their path, skirted by precipitous banks, along and up which, heavily laden, they scrambled with great difficulty, until at last, fatigued and hungry, they encamped at five o'clock at the mouth of a small stream, having made in all not more than eight or nine miles. All day long, whenever they struck a sandy reach, they found fresh Indian tracks always in advance, but as there appeared to be only two men, and they accompanied by a dog, Strain felt no anxiety, as he knew their strategy never admits of a dog on a war-path. On the morning of the 24th, at nine, A.M., they left their bivouac and proceeded down the bed of the river, occasionally pursuing the banks when it was deep or impassable from falls or boulders. The trail of the two Indians and dog was still very distinct, and it was evident that they had slept in the immediate vicinity of the last night's camp. About eleven o'clock, while wading down the bed of the river, a smoke was seen rising through the trees, and immediately the quick order, "Close up," passed down the line. Soon after, Strain commanded a halt, and advancing alone, mounted the left bank, and found an Indian hut, apparently just abandoned, and on fire; the roof had already fallen in, while the joists and timbers were slowly burning and crackling in the still air. Two other houses on the opposite bank were also in flames. Strain immediately crossed over, and found that, as in the first, all the stools, pots, and other utensils were left a prey to the flames, but their arms and clothing had been taken away. While examining these two houses, Mr. Castilla, the New Granadian commissioner, came up the bank, and seeing a bunch of plantains hanging on a rafter, reached up to take them; but Strain stopped him, declaring that he had promised to respect private property religiously, and was determined to give the Indians no excuse whatever for assailing his party. This destruction of their property looked ominous, and could be construed in no way, except as an evidence of hostility; and Strain now began to anticipate a gathering among them, and an attack at some favorable point in advance. He therefore ordered the men to re-examine their arms carefully, and march in close order. Still leading his little band, he kept on the difficult path, expecting every instant, for hours, a shower of arrows upon his party. He, of course, would be the first victim; and he confessed afterward that he remembered the account given by a comrade in Texas, of the sensation the latter once experienced with two arrows in his body, and the remembrance made him squirm. But compact and silent they kept down the river, generally wading in its bed, and where the water was too deep, selecting the bank which appeared less densely wooded, and always, when practicable, following the trail of the two Indians and their dog. Strain carried twenty or thirty pounds more than any other member of the party; and Castilla, the Granadian commissioner, wishing to relieve him, offered to take the spy-glass, but on being informed that the Indians knew that this was carried by the commander, who would be selected for the first fire, he turned pale, and did not press his offer. Several of the men requested to take part of his load, but he refused, saying, that by carrying more than they, and doing more work, he could better tell how fast to march and when to halt, so as not to overtask them.

At some points the water had attained a great depth, especially where it had caught a rotary motion around some of the smaller boulders, and the traveling not only grew more difficult, but very dangerous. They had lost the Indian trail, and not being able to pass through the forest without the tedious operation of cutting a road with an ax, so thick was the undergrowth, they were forced to climb along the rocky banks of the river, to cross wide clefts in the rocks, and surmount enormous boulders, where a false step or a slip would have led to a broken limb, if not to a broken neck. They made only some ten miles the whole day, and at six in the evening, finding a defensible position, pitched their camp. The men were quite fagged out, and prepared their supper without their usual boisterous merriment. Besides, the consciousness of danger at hand made each one thoughtful. To enliven their spirits they concluded to drink up a bottle of brandy which one of the party carried for medicinal purposes, for the very sensible reason that they feared it would get broken. The evening gun of the Cyane, rising with a booming sound over the Isthmus, also cheered them, for while that was in hearing, they did not feel themselves so entirely cut off from the outer world.

It was not so pleasant, however, when darkness enshrouded the wilderness; but the camp fires blazed brightly, and they were all brave hearts. Still many an anxious glance searched the shadowy forest that hemmed them in, and a score of musket-balls or arrows in their midst would hardly have taken them by surprise. Sentries were posted at some distance up and down the bank, to give timely warning. As silence settled on the camp imitations of the cries of wild beasts were heard in the surrounding forest, made evidently by the Indians who were hovering near, in the hope of alarming them. The next morning the boatswain's "Heave round" rung far and wide through the solitude, and the tired sleepers arose to another day's toil. On examining the ground near the camp they discovered the tracks of seven men, who had closely reconnoitred them in the night. Strain had already begun to doubt whether he was on a branch of the Savana, owing to the course which the river pursued, but as the number of cascades corresponded exactly with those laid down for that river, he was still partially satisfied, and hoped that the maps might, after all, prove to be tolerably correct.

Leaving camp about half past eight, they followed the river by the bed or banks, just as one or the other furnished best footing. Both were difficult; the former being encumbered with granite boulders, and the water often so deep as to reach nearly to the cartridge-boxes, while the latter was almost closed against them by the denseness of the undergrowth. Their constant companions, the two men and the dog, between whom and them there seemed some strange, mysterious link, still preceded them.

Passing several isolated peaks, some five or six hundred feet in height, they at noon, or in three hours and a half, had made about three miles. At length they came to some plantain fields, while the distant barking of a dog announced the proximity of Indian habitations. A halt was now called, and Strain consulted with his officers upon the best course to pursue. A long straight reach of considerable depth apparently closed the bed of the river against them in front, while on the banks the undergrowth grew so thick that it was impossible to proceed, except by the slow process of cutting a road. At length, however, they discovered a path on the left, leading over a steep hill, and which they supposed would intercept the course of the river below. Strain directed Mr. Truxton with a few men to examine it, while he, leaving the main body of the party, many of whom showed symptoms of fatigue, in an open space, where surprise would be almost impossible, continued down the river, to determine whether the reach was passable.

He found it to be, under the circumstances, and considering the evidences of a hostile spirit on the part of the Indians, a dangerous route, as the water was very deep for about a quarter of a mile, the banks on each side perpendicular and about eighteen feet in height; while the ledge at the foot of the right bank, where only they could pursue their way, was not in any part more than two feet wide, and in some places could be passed only with the greatest difficulty, and not without danger of slipping into deep water, where they would sink by the weight of their baggage and accoutrements before assistance could be rendered. An attack in such a place would prove fatal; for the Indians could fire from the bushes while they were on the ledge, where they could neither return the fire nor close with them, nor escape, except by swimming—a resort almost as fatal as to stand and be shot down. At all events, the entire ammunition of the party would be rendered useless. It was a great relief, therefore, when Mr. Truxton came down on the opposite bank and pronounced the path practicable, and trending down the valley of the river after crossing the hill on the left. Cheered by the intelligence, the party entered the river, and slowly, and with great difficulty, stemmed the deep and rapid current. Striking the foot of a steep hill on the opposite bank, they clambered up half a mile to the top, where they found a plantain field, in which the path ended. Wholly at a loss what course to take, they retraced their steps to the river, and while rattling down the hill were arrested by the barking of a dog, which was as abruptly smothered, apparently by a muzzle, and by the distant sound of axes struck rapidly upon some hollow substances. These evidences of the vicinity and watchfulness of the Indians made Strain still more unwilling to risk the ledge along the bank of the river; but as there appeared to be no alternative, he gave the reluctant order to advance, he leading the file. They steadily entered the passage, one by one, and crawling cautiously along the precipice, fortunately passed without an attack. With his gallant little band, Strain had felt himself a match for a horde of Indians; but here he was powerless, and a mountain seemed lifted from his heart when he saw the last man through.

At the end of the reach they came upon a house standing a little back from the river, and surrounded by what appeared to be a species of fortification. Not wishing to expose the whole party to the risk of an ambushade, or to alarm the natives unnecessarily, Strain ordered a halt, and advanced alone to examine it. Like all the other huts they had seen, it had evidently been recently abandoned—the proprietors having left behind much of their furniture, and some provisions scattered upon the floor. Its position was peculiar, and different from any thing they had before seen, having been erected on an artificial mound, scarped and made nearly inaccessible on all sides except through a strong gateway. This mode of construction may have been adopted to guard against inundations; but reference also appeared to have been had to defense against enemies, and the position was certainly one which a few determined men might have held against a large number. Continuing their journey, they soon arrived at a village on the left bank, containing several houses, almost concealed amidst plantain and other fruit trees. They passed this without entering, supposing it to be, like the others, deserted by its inhabitants; the only sign of life being the barking of a dog, which had probably been left when the Indians concealed themselves in the forest. Immediately in front of the village, and on a sloping shingle-beach, they found the remains of seven canoes which had just been destroyed. Their condition satisfactorily explained the sounds of the ax they had heard while in the plantain field on the hill. The destruction of these canoes was complete; for, not satisfied with splitting them up, the Indians had cut them transversely in several places, taking out large chips, rendering it impossible to repair them. This had an ugly look, and was an unmistakable sign of hostile feeling.

The river here was deep and rapid; but Strain leading the way, the whole party crossed in safety, and entered a path which appeared to follow the right bank. Advancing along this, Strain suddenly saw a party of five armed Indians rapidly approaching. Considering all the recent evidences which he had seen of their distrust, not to say hostility, his first impulse was to cock his carbine; but a moment's reflection convinced him it was better not to lose the benefit of their friendship, if it could be obtained, especially as he felt certain that he was not upon the river Savana, as he hoped and at first believed.

He accordingly halted the party, and handing his carbine to one of the men, advanced to meet them, calling out at the same time in Spanish that they were friends. The Indians then came up and shook hands, when he recognized two of their number as having been on board the Cyane soon after her arrival in Caledonia Bay. One spoke a little English, and another, who appeared to be the leader, spoke Spanish intelligibly; while the remainder, belonging to the Sucubti tribe, used only their own dialect. The leader informed Strain that he was on the Chuganagua instead of the Savana, but offered to guide him to the latter stream. In answer to a question respecting the distance, he replied that they could reach it in three days. Strain then inquired if he had been sent by the commander of the Cyane, or by Robinson, a chief referred to in a letter from Captain Hollins, which reached him during the second day's march. He replied, "Neither;" and did not appear to know who was meant by Robinson—probably not recognizing his English name.

Strain felt that he incurred no little risk in trusting himself to these Indians; but being firmly convinced that they were neither on the Savana nor any of its branches, and knowing that the course which the Indians pointed out would at least bring him nearer to it, he determined to accompany them, believing that he could subsist wherever they could, and that, as a last resort, he could return if they deceived or abandoned him. He was especially induced to this determination by the fact that he had offered this same Indian a large sum of money, when he was on board the Cyane, if he would guide him across, and thought it not improbable that he had determined to accept it when once free from the surveillance of his tribe. The order "Forward!" was accordingly given, and they proceeded rapidly, by a well-beaten path, through a cocoa grove and through the forest in a westerly direction. Once in the woods, and finding the path growing less distinct, Strain secretly gave orders to the officers to observe the route carefully, in order that they might return by it, if it was found necessary; and also directed Mr. Truxton, who commanded the rear-guard, to have the trees marked with a macheta as they proceeded.

In silence, and in close order, the little party rapidly followed the Indians, who, leading them over three minor ridges, and one hill nearly six hundred feet high, and through a grove of plantains and of cocoa, arrived a little before dark at a deep and gloomy ravine, through which brawled a rivalet, running apparently in the direction of the river they had left, and as the guide informed them it did.

At this place the Indians left, promising to return in the morning. To this course Strain assented with as good a grace as possible, although very much against his will; for, although he believed them sincere, he felt much more confidence in them while they were within the range of his carbine.

Some of the party asked the Indians to bring some plantains when they returned; which, after consulting with the oldest man among them, the guide promised to do. They then filed away into the woods, and the party pitched their camp. The undergrowth was cleared away, the fires lighted, and the supper of pork and biscuit quickly dispatched. Strain set the watch earlier than usual, as he did not feel perfectly secure in his position, and could not shake off all suspicion of his new friends. He also ordered the fires to be made at some distance from the place which had been selected for sleeping, so as to mislead the Indians if they should attempt to surprise them, and directed the party to lie down in their ranks where the steep bank of the rivulet afforded a certain barrier against an attack in the rear. The two sentries he placed completely in the shade on each wing of the camp, and directed the officers of the guard to keep away from the fire, where the light might guide the aim of any one who should be lurking in the bushes.

Having taken all those precautions which a thorough woodsman alone understands—Strain, keenly alive to the welfare of his party, kept the watch of one of the gentlemen who was somewhat indisposed. After it was over he lay down, but at one o'clock was aroused by a slight noise on the side of the ravine whence he supposed an attack, if any, would be made. Without starting up he turned himself slowly and cautiously over, and saw some one silently climb up the bank close to where he was lying, and look round over the sleeping party. He appeared to be short in stature, as the Indians invariably are on the Isthmus, and by the dim light he could see that his hat closely resembled those which they wear, so, silently drawing his revolver, he thrust it suddenly against his side, saying, in a low tone, "Who's there?" He was answered by Mr. Truxton, just in time to prevent his firing. It was this officer's watch, and having heard a noise in the ravine, he had gone down to investigate it, and was returning by the bank when he thus unexpectedly encountered Strain, and came near losing his life. A moment's delay in answering would have insured his death.

This little circumstance, which was unknown both to the sleepers and sentries, was the only alarm they had during the night. On the morning of January 26th, about half past eight, the guide returned, and announced himself ready to continue the journey. Strain was somewhat surprised to find that, excepting the interpreter and guide, the rest, numbering four, were new Indians.

No plantains were brought as promised; but they continued to give every evidence of friendship, and advised the party to supply themselves with water from the rivulet, as they would have a long and severe march before they reached any more. They therefore filled their bottles and flasks, and, after taking a hearty drink, commenced following a path leading in a westerly direction over a very steep hill about 800 feet in height. Resting but once, and only for a few minutes, to recover their breath, they reached the summit, from which could be seen many ranges and peaks, still higher, to the northward, forming apparently a chain of isolated mountains. Hurrying down the opposite slope, which led them at times along the margin of deep valleys with almost perpendicular sides, they reached, about half past ten, another ravine containing water, where they halted to refresh themselves, not having drank since leaving the camp in the morning. In this rapid march Strain had a fair opportunity of testing the comparative endurance of his men and the Indians; and although the latter, being nearly naked, and with no burdens except their arms, took the steep ascents much better than the former, he found his own men fully equal to them, heavily laden as they were, in descending or on level ground.

Having slaked their thirst at this stream, which Strain concluded to be that called the Asmati on the old Spanish maps, they pushed on, and soon after, passing another branch of the same stream, and some plantations of plantains and cocoa, commenced ascending another steep hill, still pursuing a course little to the northward of west. Near this point, and in the valley, a village known as Asmati is supposed to be situated; but the Indians were always careful to carry them as far as possible from their habitations. The hill which they now ascended was neither so steep or high as the last one, not being more than 450 feet above the level of the valley from which they started. While ascending it, one of the men, Edward Lombard, a seaman of the Cyane, and who carried the boatswain's whistle, was stung on the hand by a scorpion, and for some time suffered severely. Truxton had a little brandy left in a flask, and Strain having heard that stimulants were good for poison, told Lombard to drink it. But the latter being a temperance man declined. Strain then ordered him to swallow it, threatening, if he refused, to pour it down his throat. The poor fellow finally swallowed it, and some moistened tobacco being applied to the wound he soon began to rally, and was at length able to proceed slowly, and by night had recovered entirely, and was as active and energetic as before. He said the effects of the sting were like an electric shock, as instantaneous and as paralyzing. While Lombard was suffering and unable to walk, the whole party halted, and Strain asked the Indians if they knew of any remedy for the sting. They replied they did not; but that there were men in their village who could cure it.

Strain, taking Lombard's musket, gave the order "Forward!" and passing the summit of the hill they commenced the descent, when they were suddenly met by some five or six Indians. A halt was made, and a man, who appeared to be a chief, approached Strain, and made an elaborate speech, accompanied with all the gesticulation and vehemence of an Indian orator. He concluded by directing the guide to interpret it. During the continuance of this speech, of which Strain could distinguish but one word, "Chuli"—"No"—he carefully watched the countenance of the guide, and thought he could detect an expression of annoyance not unmingled with contempt. The latter would not interpret the speech, though requested to do so both by the orator and Strain. At length, being urgently pressed, he abruptly replied, "Vamos"—"Let us go"—and led off. While descending the hill, most of the strange Indians, taking with them some of the party with which they had started in the morning, and replacing them with others, left. From that time the conduct of the Indians changed.

At the foot of the hill they arrived at a ravine leading nearly west, which they followed until sunset, sometimes climbing over boulders, and at others sliding down the face of smooth rocks, where the rivulet formed cascades, and always traveling rapidly and most laboriously. From time to time Strain was obliged to order a halt, to allow those who were most fatigued a little rest. The Indians who had joined that day appeared to enjoy the distress of the men amazingly, and attempted to hurry them on before they were sufficiently rested. Mr. Polanco, one of the New Granada commissioners, laid down, utterly prostrated by fatigue; and Mr. Kettlewell, engineer and draughtsman of the expedition, who was ill the night before, wished the party to leave him to rejoin them afterward at the next camp. Having made only twelve miles, they arrived about sunset at a stream a little smaller than the one they had left two days before, and encamped on an island in front of a plantain grove. The difficulties of the way may be gathered from the fact, that, to make even this short distance, the men were kept all day to the top of their speed and endurance. The whole march was a constant climbing, sliding, floundering over one of the most broken countries imaginable. The ravine which they had traveled was, by common consent, denominated "the Devil's Own." Before the Indians left that evening, the guide, who had appeared somewhat depressed since the interview with the strange Indians, informed Strain that, in the morning, he should start on his return to Caledonia Bay; and that he would visit the ship, and tell the Captain how well they had progressed; meanwhile, he would leave behind some of his friends, to guide them to the Savana, at which they would arrive in a day and a half.

Strain attempted to dissuade him, offering him any pay he might ask to guide him through; but to no purpose. He then told him that he would send a letter by him to Captain Hollins, which he declined taking, and started with the others, leaving Strain with no very pleasant anticipations for the future, there being seven days' hard march between him and the ship, while it was very doubtful whether he could find the path back; for in many places it was so obscure that the Indians themselves could with difficulty follow it. A fatigued party, who looked back with horror to the last few days' march, and with less than one day's provisions, and very doubtful guides, was not a very pleasant object to contemplate. Believing that there was a large Indian population immediately in the neighborhood, Strain ordered an unusually strict watch to be kept. Still he had pitched the camp in so strong a position that he did not believe they would dare to attack him.

The next morning, while preparing breakfast, two strange Indians, with quite a small boy, strolled into camp; and soon after, the old guide, and several others, among whom were the new guides, of forbidding appearance, and who were besides armed with bows and steel-pointed war-arrows—which they never use in hunting—also came in. Some forty more, of different ages and sexes, were seen skulking in a plantain patch on the opposite side of the river, and narrowly watching every movement. Those who were in camp were exceedingly anxious to look into the haversacks of the men and ascertain the amount of provisions they had. These, it is true, were scanty enough, as many of the men had used theirs imprudently, and the New Granadian commissioners, having either consumed or thrown away their rations, had none at any time after crossing the mountains, but lived entirely on those of other members of the party. The officers still having some provisions, which, with greater prudence, they had reserved, Strain directed that they should be divided with the men. All cheerfully consented, with the exception of one, who could not understand why those who had stinted themselves to provide food for the future should now be made to suffer for the reckless improvidence of the others. Strain, who cared little for meat, had eight pounds preserved, all of which he gave up to the men. This left them with nothing on hand but a little bread dust and two or three pounds of coffee. Still, if the Indians fulfilled their promise and took them to the Savana in a day and a half, and they could there obtain boats, they would make a fair journey and escape without great suffering.

Before setting out, Strain took the old guide aside and endeavored to obtain a clew to their intentions and his own prospects. But the frankness and apparent sincerity of his demeanor were gone. He now stated that he would not return to Caledonia Bay until next month, which was only a subterfuge to avoid being pressed to carry a letter. Strain then renewed his offer of large pay, if he would continue to act as guide; and finally asked him his motives in coming thus far. To this he replied, that he had taken an interest in him when they met on board the Cyane, and did not wish him to follow the Chuquanaqua, which was a very long route to the Pacific. He still declared that they would reach the Savana in a day and a half, and the harbor of Darien in two days and a half; but Strain could not induce him to give the name of the river on the banks of which they then were. He then broached the subject of provisions, and asked him if they could not procure some plantains, offering to pay exorbitantly for them. Being told he could not, he requested that he would ask his friends to give them some, reminding him, at the same time, that in compliance with their promise, they had never taken a single article belonging to the natives. To this he assented, but refused either to give or sell. Strain then told him that if they should become short of provisions, and the Indians would neither sell nor give the fruits which were rotting on the trees, in justice to his own party, he should be obliged to violate his promise and help himself. To this threat the guide made no answer. Finally, Strain offered him money for his past services, which he positively refused to accept; and soon after, as the party was about to set out with their new guides, the former turned to take leave of him, and found he had disappeared. This was a bad omen, as the natives on this Isthmus have a strong taste, whether natural or acquired, for shaking hands when their intentions are friendly.

Setting out under these unpleasant auspices, they followed their guides, who led them rapidly by a trail over a hill and through the forest again, to and down the bed of the river. When about a mile below the camp, Strain was anxious to speak with them, but they would not stop, and were careful to keep some one hundred yards in advance—imagining that at that distance they were out of the reach of their fire-arms. They appeared determined to allow no time for rest, which the lagging of some of the party soon showed the need of; for the climbing over rocks, and floundering through reaches of deep water, at the rapid rate they went, tasked to the utmost the heavily-laden party. At length they struck off from the river, taking a path which led into the wood in a westerly direction. From the moment they left the river nothing more was seen of them. Strain's suspicions were immediately aroused, yet he continued to follow the path for about a mile, when it terminated at a plantation and recently abandoned rancho. Here he halted his men, and waited some time to see if the Indians would return. Finding they did not, he hallooed for them. Receiving no answer, he gave the order to countermarch. Disappointed and baffled, the party slowly and with difficulty succeeded in finding their way back to the bed of the river.

The treachery of the Indians now being evident to the whole party, and hence their whereabouts encompassed with doubt, Strain called the first and last council which he held in the expedition. This was composed of all the officers, the two New Granadian commissioners, and the principal engineers of the party. The maps were brought out and spread before them, and Strain explained to them their position, as he understood it. According to the statement of the first guide, in whom they still had some little confidence, they had left the Chuquanaqua, and were within one and a half day's march of the Savana; and as there was but one river of any importance laid down on the maps, the Iglesias, which entered the Savana near its mouth, he naturally concluded he was on that river. Besides, this view made the statements of the Indians and the different maps in his possession corroborate each other. On the one drawn by Mr. Gisborne, ranges of hills were put down between the Chuquanaqua and Iglesias, which corresponded to those which they had just traversed. The great object was, if possible, to reach the Savana; but the question arose, whether the risk might not be too great to justify the attempt. The distance was not supposed to be very great, but there was no trail to direct their course, so that they would probably have to cut a path the whole of the way. The journey, therefore, instead of occupying a day and a half, might take weeks.

Besides, there was no certainty of finding water on the route, as it was near the end of the dry season, and they would thus perhaps become embarrassed in the wilderness, and perish from hunger and thirst. To effect this seemed to be the object the Indians had in view in leading them away from the river; while, even should they reach the Savana, they would meet no canoes, as the savages who had abandoned them would take care to conceal or destroy them all. The only resource then left would be to make their way for more than forty miles through one of the most impenetrable mangrove swamps in the world, where half a mile would be a hard day's journey. In addition to all this, Strain was also aware that, owing to the slight fall in the bed of the Savana, the tide ascended the whole length of these swamps, so that they might perish for want of fresh water while following its marshy banks. In a mangrove swamp, too, they could not expect to find game, or get it if they did. Neither could they dream of finding timber with which to construct a raft. As if to nail all these arguments for not attempting to reach the Savana, two or three of the men and the junior New Granadian commissioner were already foot-sore and worn out with fatigue, and should they break down entirely, or should any body fall sick, it would be impossible to carry them through the dense forest which they would have to traverse. On the other hand, whether the river they were on was or was not the Iglesias, one fact remained certain, that however tortuous might be its course, it would eventually lead to Darien Harbor, the common receptacle for all the streams in that region. As long as they continued on its banks they could not, at any rate, suffer from thirst, at least until reaching tide-water, which did not run so far inland on any of the Darien rivers as on the sluggish Savana. Until meeting tide-water they would encounter no mangroves to impede their march, and if they should, could return a short distance to the forest growth of timber and construct rafts to convey them through.

On the contrary, if this river, notwithstanding the assertions of the Indians, should prove to be the Chuquanaqua, they would meet with settlements before arriving at the mangrove swamps, which presented the most formidable obstacle to reaching the Pacific shore.

The best chance for game was on the river, where some fish might also be obtained, while there was every reason to believe that, as on the stream they had left, they would find plantains and bananas. These last Strain had already determined no longer to respect, considering that the treachery of the Indians and their refusal either to sell or give had entirely relieved him from his former promise. Finally, by keeping on the river, should any of the party fall ill, they could, as a last resource, always construct a raft for their conveyance, even if they failed in finding canoes farther down, which they hoped to do.

This imposing council was held upon a shingle beach, upon which Strain sat soaking his hard, dry boots in the water while making his final speech. The different members were scattered around, some drinking water and others smoking, listening with the gravity of Indian chiefs to this lucid exposition of these not very flattering prospects. After he had finished, he invited every one to express his opinions freely. Unlike most councils, no one was found in this to suggest objections, and Strain took a vote on the two alternatives, when it was unanimously determined that they should continue down the river on which they then were.

No proposition was made to return to the ship, nor was it hinted at by any one.

To those easily discouraged—if there were any—the obstacles already surmounted must have appeared too formidable for them to wish to grapple with them a second time; while, as far as one could judge, the idea of a return occurred to very few members of the party. If it had been otherwise Strain would have pushed on, for, to quote his own language, he said, “I neither considered it expedient or consistent with our national or personal reputation, that so formidable a party, and one of which so much was expected, should be turned back by trifling obstacles.”

Of the seven persons who voted at this council, two perished during the journey, and one afterward, from the effects of starvation and fatigue.

At this point the reader would naturally wish for some clew to unravel the tangled state of things, and know definitely where the party really were, and obtain some explanation of the conduct of the Indians. The river which they had followed for several days after crossing the Cordillera, Strain eventually ascertained to be the Sucubti, a very important stream, utterly ignored in those maps of the moon which Dr. Cullen and Mr. Gisborne—the latter backed by the highest English authority—had published. The Indian guide whom they met on the Sucubti stated that this river was the Chuquanaqua, and that to follow it was a very long route to the Pacific. This, though not literally true, was so in effect, for while it was not the Chuquanaqua, it was a tributary of that river, which certainly did prove to be a most tedious and toilsome route. The river on which they now were was the Chuquanaqua, one of the most tortuous known to geographers—in fact, by looking at the map, one will see that it would be almost impossible to double up a stream so as to get more length in the same space. To all Strain's inquiries respecting the name of this river, he could get no other reply than “Rio Grande”—the great river. He therefore remained in utter ignorance respecting it, although, if he gave any credit whatever to the statements of his first Indian guide, that the Sucubti was the Chuquanaqua, he would naturally conclude that they were upon the next river to the westward of it, which was laid down by Mr. Gisborne as the Iglesias. On the whole, Mr. Strain was afterward convinced that the Caledonia Indians and their Sucubti friends intended to lead them by the most direct route to the Savana, and that they were prevented from doing so by the Indians of the Chuquanaqua or Chuqunas, whom they met on their seventh day's march, and who from the first created suspicion. This opinion, which was originally founded upon the conduct of the respective parties, was farther corroborated by the report of a journey made by a Spanish officer in 1788, from the fort of Agia, near Caledonia Bay, to Puerto Principe, on the Savana. He set out under the guidance of the chief of the Sucubti village, who conducted him safely across, cautiously avoiding the Chuquana Indians, who were hostile to the Spaniards. He was prevented from returning, owing to the hostility of this tribe.

It would appear that in 1788, as in 1854, the Chuquanas were on friendly terms with the Indians of the Caledonia and Sucubti valleys, probably on account of their commercial relations, but that the latter have not sufficient influence to obtain a passage for a white man through the territory of these intractable savages. To these Indians is attributed the massacre of the four men in the British expedition.

It afterward turned out that when they struck the Chuquanaqua river, they were within five miles of the road cut by this British expedition before it turned back. At first sight, by looking at the map, it may appear a most unfortunate circumstance that this road could not have been struck, as they might easily have cut their way to it. Still it is very doubtful if they could have followed the Savana without canoes—owing, as before remarked, to the impenetrable mangrove swamps that stretched so far up with its tides into the interior—and they would have been compelled at last to return to the Chuquanaqua.

It is true that from the termination of Prevost's road to the mouth of the Lara, where the English civil engineers in the service of the Atlantic and Pacific Junction Company had established a station for the purpose of surveying the river, was but six miles; yet, as they were unaware of that circumstance, it could not have influenced their determination. A man with a thousand leagues of wilderness before him may be within one mile of deliverance, yet, with the facts in his possession, to go in that direction would be downright infatuation. The maps on which Strain had implicitly relied proved utterly trustless. The Indians were no better than Gisborne's maps; and thrown wholly upon his own resources, he had, from the meagre facts in his possession, to determine what course to pursue. To have gone in search of a road of whose existence he was ignorant, or to have followed the banks of the Savana toward impassable swamps to find a station he had never heard of, would have been the act of a madman. Under the circumstances he took the wisest course beyond a doubt.

After having determined to continue down the river, Strain felt it important to impress on the men the necessity of great frugality in the use of provisions. He endeavored to prove to the sailors and other members of the party, that the idea that men needed such a liberal supply of food was entirely a popular fallacy; and in order to give his views a more practical bearing, declared that a man could live very comfortably three days without food, and eight with very little suffering. The men rolled their tobacco quids in their mouths, and tried to look their assent to this entirely new doctrine promulgated there on the Isthmus, in the midst of famine, but it was evident Strain could not count much on his converts. The resolution to go on being made, the order to march was given; and now, without a guide, they wound down the crooked banks of the stream.

Soon after leaving the place where the council was held, they passed a river which entered from the eastward, and which corresponded with one put down on Mr. Gisborne's map as an upper branch of the Iglesias.

Subsequent investigations led to the belief that this river was the Asnati (see chart), which Colonel Codazzi in his recent maps has shown to be a branch of the Sucubti, upon information compiled from old Spanish manuscripts, and from conversations held with the Indians. During the afternoon a few plantains were found by the men, and urged upon Strain, who refused, wishing the men to keep them. He and Truxton killed eight birds during the day (though one was an owl and another a woodpecker), which were divided among the party, and none felt the want of the ration, which had given out. This was the first time Strain had fired his carbine at game, and the men, seeing what a dead shot he was, requested him to shoot for the party. While their pieces were echoing through those rarely-trod solitudes, a little incident occurred which caused a thrill of feeling to pass through the band. On looking up they saw a large flock of birds high in the air, and sweeping with great velocity to the west. Down in the forest all was still, but far up heavenward the trade-wind was fiercely blowing, and on the wings of the gale those birds were drifting to the Pacific, now the goal of their own efforts, and the only hope of their salvation. An unknown and toilsome way was before them, while those buoyant forms, borne apparently without effort on, would soon feel the spray of the Pacific. Many an envious glance and envious wish was sent after those birds in their flight. Still the party kept up good spirits, and whiled away the time with jokes and stories. At this camp, and that of the night before, they were first annoyed by sand-flies, and this was the first camp where they met mosquitoes. Fire-flies, too, filled the wood, enlivening the otherwise monotonous gloom. The next morning, January 28th, at half past eight, they continued their journey, and although they had no provisions on hand the party was in fine spirits. The river widened and deepened in parts so much that they were obliged to cut their way across some bends through the undergrowth of the forest. Mr. Truxton shot three birds and caught some fish—among them one cat-fish, six inches long. In the afternoon they had come upon a plantain and banana field, and after eating as many ripe ones as they could obtain, filled their haversacks. Finding that Messrs. Castilla and Polanco, the Granadian commissioners, were very much fatigued, they encamped at about half past three, having made only about five miles. In this camp mosquitoes and sand-flies were met in swarms; and for the first time they heard, what is familiar to every woodsman, the falling of forest trees alone, resembling in the distance the reports of guns.

On the morning of the 29th they left camp at nine o'clock, many of the party with legs and hands much swollen from the bites of mosquitoes and sand-flies, and one of the engineers completely speckled with their bites and badly swollen. About two miles from camp they found some dilapidated huts, which had evidently been deserted for a long time, and fields of plantains and bananas. As the Chuquana Indians apparently do not frequent this portion of the country, these plantations probably owe their origin to the Spaniards, who had a garrison in this vicinity about the middle of the last century.

In the afternoon Corporal O'Kelly and Strain together shot a large iguana on the opposite bank of the river, which sunk. Holmes (landsman) jumped in to bring it ashore, but finding the water deeper than he anticipated, he threw off one of his boots, which sank to the bottom. The recovery of this was of more importance than the iguana, and after feeling around for it in vain, one of the men stripped and dived again and again for it, but unsuccessfully, its dark color rendering it invisible. To this apparently trivial circumstance this poor fellow's death after was partly attributable. This was Sunday. Fatigued with the weight of plantains and bananas, which filled every haversack, and with climbing through gulches and struggling through thickets, they went into camp about four o'clock, having accomplished, with hard work, a distance of only seven miles and a half. Opposite to the camp was a plantain field, with its whole vicinity swarming with mosquitoes of such enormous size, that the officers jocosely christened it "The camp of the mosquitoes elephants." This afternoon Strain took off his boots for the first time since starting. It required the efforts of two men to remove them. His feet were very much lacerated, as were also those of the party. The linen shirt which he had put on under his woolen one was now of great service, and Strain tore it up by piecemeal to bind up the wounds, which otherwise would have been dreadfully aggravated.

On the morning of the 30th, after plucking a supply of plantains and bananas from the plantation opposite, they set out on their journey down the river, which now had become so deep that fording was difficult, and they were obliged to hew their way along the banks, and in some cases saved much distance by cutting directly across the bends. About mid-day, being on the left bank, and finding an opportunity to ford, they crossed, as Strain deemed it decidedly best that they should be upon the west side, and between it and the Savana, where, if by accident they should get away from it, they might strike the latter river. During the day a snake about eighteen inches long was killed, which Mr. Castilla said was the coral snake, and very venomous. Strain doubted this, as he had seen such before in Brazil, and found them harmless.

At about three o'clock they encamped on a mud bank, the Granadian commissioners declaring they could go no farther. The day's journey, it is true, had been fatiguing, yet the principal labor, which was cutting the road through the dense undergrowth, was performed by the officers and their men. Mr. Truxton shot a crane just at evening, which was given to the men, some of whom, owing to carelessness and improvidence, were out of provisions. At this camp they thought they discovered tidal influence, and were greatly elated. Camping so early left a long afternoon, and those less fatigued resorted to various amusements to pass the time. One man, named Wilson, had a superb voice, and he made the woods echo with negro songs—"Ole Virginny" and "Jim Crow;" and often during the day his comic songs would bring peals of laughter from the party, and discordant choruses would burst forth on every side. Another had made a fife out of a reed, which he played on with considerable skill, and made the camp merry with its music. The next morning they breakfasted leisurely, and at half past eight commenced again their journey. Having been so successful the day before in cutting off bends by pursuing a fixed compass course through the woods, they set off S.W. by W., and after crossing a bayou with some difficulty, met a deep and turbid river, about seventy feet in width, running from west to east, which they crossed on a large tree. This river was known on the old Spanish maps as La Paz, and enters the Chuquanaqua nearly opposite the embouchure of the Sucubti, which was thus passed without being seen. A few hundred yards farther on they again fell in with the Chuquanaqua, which had suddenly become deep, rapid, and much more turbid than where they had left it two miles above. Encouraged by the result of this experiment, they again took a departure from the river, and pursued a S.W. by W. course through a swampy country, where, although it was the height of the dry season, they were obliged to make many détours to avoid the standing water and muddy bottom. The country being generally open, they marched rapidly, those behind shouting "Go ahead," as the engineer reported sou'west by west; sou'west. As they tramped along, Strain saw a buzzard sitting on a tree. Turning to Lombard, he asked him if buzzards were good to eat. Lombard being decidedly low in the larder, and withal having a strong appetite for flesh, replied—"Yes, captain, any thing that won't kill will fatten." Strain thereupon fired and dropped the buzzard, and advanced to pick him up. But as he drew near, the dreadful effluvia which this bird sends forth made him turn aside. Lombard approached somewhat closer, but at last was compelled to wheel off also. Each man in his turn, tempted by so fine a bird, pushed for the prize, but each and all gave him a wide berth. In the end they became less fastidious. Avoiding the thick undergrowth instead of cutting through it, and returning to their course when it was passed, they by twelve o'clock had made about four miles and a half. Not meeting the river, the course was changed to S.W., at 3.15 to S.S.W., and from 3.45 to 4.15 to S. by E., when they fell in with a pebbly ravine, containing cool and palatable standing water. As the distance to the river was uncertain, the probability of obtaining water in advance too vague to be risked, and many of the men foot-sore and fatigued, Strain determined to encamp there, although the sun was several hours high. Most of the men had no plantains and bananas, while the officers' messes contained only three or four, so that it now became necessary to examine into the resources which the forest afforded. Some palmetto or cabbage-palm, resembling, but not identical with, that which grows in Florida, was found, and as Strain, on a previous journey into the interior of Brazil, had lived some ten days on a similar vegetable, he had no hesitation in recommending it to the party, and set the example by eating it himself. This is not a fruit, it is simply the soft substance growing upon the top of a tree, and can be cooked like a cabbage. The palmetto of Darien is more bitter and less palatable and nutritious than that of Brazil, but the bitterness was partially removed by frequently changing the water in boiling.

Very little was said in this camp, and there was no mirth or pleasantry; on the contrary, a gloom for the first time seemed to rest on the party. They lay scattered around among the trees, talking in low tones or musing. It was evident they missed the companionship of the river, the only thread that connected them with the Pacific, and the last object at night and the first in the morning on which their eyes rested. Even Strain felt its influence so much, that when the draughtsman, Mr. Kettlewell, came at a late hour of the night to him, stretched on the ground in the smoke from the watch-fire to escape the bites of mosquitoes, and asked what he would have the camp named, he replied the "Noche triste"—the "sad night;" and although many other camps afterward were far sadder than this, and more deserving the title, he nevertheless allowed this name to remain, for it proved the beginning of sorrows. In the morning Strain and Maury took a long walk in the woods to examine them, and held a protracted and serious conversation over their condition and prospects, and discussed the project of making a boat.

Starting about half past eight, they struck off on a southeast course, anxious to reach the river. Hitherto Strain had led the party, every day cutting a path with his cutlase. This was most laborious, and Mr. Truxton now insisted upon taking the macheta, and going ahead in his place. The undergrowth was exceedingly dense, and composed, for the most part, of pinnello—little pine—a plant resembling that which produces the pine-apple, but with longer leaves, serrated with long spines, which produced most painful wounds, especially as the last few days' march had stripped the trowsers from many of the party. After cutting for some time, he suddenly fell backward, and almost swooned away from the effects of heat, pain, exertion, and fatigue. Strain now saw that he was in danger of overtaking the officers, and detailed two men to cut the path, they being relieved every hour. The rest would sit down till ordered to march. It would take hours to cut a few rods.

This was the severest traveling yet, beating, as Strain declared, the jungles of Brazil and the East Indies, which he once considered without a rival. When they encamped, at half past four, near a ravine containing standing water, they had not advanced more than two miles, or at an average only eighty rods an hour. During the march they fell in with palm-trees, bearing a nut which they found edible, agreeable to the taste, and nutritious, though so hard as to be masticated with difficulty. They cut down two trees, and Strain divided the nuts equally. Some palmetto was also found, and toward evening Strain was so fortunate as to kill a mountain hen, which was divided between the two officers' messes, as the men had the last bird which was shot. A deer was also started—the first seen—but they could not get a shot at it.

So thick was the undergrowth that it required some time to clear away a place sufficiently large for a camp. Into this crater, as it were, hewn out of the foliage, the tired wanderers, after a frugal supper, lay down, filled with gloomy anticipations, and, strange as it may seem, mourning most of all for the lost river, which had so suddenly changed its direction and gone off no one knew whither.

Edward Lombard, an old seaman and former shipmate of Strain, whose boatswain's whistle had each morning piped the "heave round," and who had shown great energy and activity throughout, now became quite ill and desponding. A little soup, however, and meat of the mountain hen, which Strain gave him from his own mess, appeared to revive him. During his whole life he had been accustomed, on board ship, to a large supply of animal food, and with it he could have endured as much fatigue as any one in the party; but without it, he was perfectly prostrated. Ever afterward, until his death, the state of his health was an indication of the quantity of animal food in camp. There were no songs to-night—the last strain of music dying away in the "Sorrowful camp." The distressed commander of this handful of brave men now began to feel the pressure of their fate upon him, and on this night he was kept awake by the groans of those who were suffering from sore feet and boils. But fatigue finally overcame all; and at midnight no one was awake, except the sentries and officer of the guard.

Next morning, February 2d, the party appeared in pretty good condition; and Lombard, after eating a banana which Strain had reserved, and which was the last one remaining in the party, declared himself stronger, and ready to start.

Having thus far failed to reach the river on a southeast course, Strain changed it to east; for he found that the great majority of the men thought only of reaching the river banks. "Oh for the river!" exclaimed one; "it is better than Darien harbor." Fearful lest the supplies of water they had hitherto found so abundant might fail, Strain now directed the few vessels which they had remaining to be filled, and given in charge of the officers, he himself carrying an India-rubber canteen containing about half a gallon, which he served out from time to time to the party. As they groped their way through the wilderness, they came upon trees of enormous size, one of which would have measured forty-five feet in girth.

During the afternoon Strain became somewhat anxious in regard to the supply of water, as many hours had elapsed without meeting with water-holes, and their vessels were empty. He therefore deviated from his course still more to the northward to follow down a slope, and finally meeting a dry ravine, where he thought, as a last resort, he could obtain water by digging, followed it until they met water-holes. Here, although but four o'clock, they encamped, and had quite a feast on the turkeys and small birds, reserving a monkey Strain had shot for breakfast. On this and on all subsequent occasions, all game or fruits obtained was divided equally among the party. Poor Lombard was at last unable to chew tobacco, and brought all he had left—about ten ounces—and gave it to Strain, saying, "Here, captain, take what there is left; I can't chew any more." A little coffee remained, and in order to eke it out as far as possible, the berries, after one steeping, were packed up for a second—then for a third, and, finally, for a fourth, when they were eaten for food.

On the next morning, February 3d, they started about half past eight, the whole party, especially Lombard, much revived by the animal food. Feeling confident that the ravine upon which they were would eventually lead to the river, and also afford a certain supply of water, Strain determined to follow it in whatever direction it might lead. As they advanced the forest became open, though the vines, swinging from tree to tree and coiled around every bush, made the march slow and difficult. During the day they discovered and tested a new fruit of the palm, an egg-shaped nut covered with an acid pulp. This pulp was tried, and found to be refreshing; while the kernel resembled that of the carosas, which they had already eaten. This nut gradually became the principal article of diet; and they found that even the acid covering would support life, although it utterly destroyed the teeth, and by degrees the digestive power of the stomach. Strain, foreseeing to what desperate straits they might yet be reduced, endeavored to cheer up the men by this new discovery, assuring them that they were very nourishing food. Not to mention the pulp and rind, the oleaginous nature of the nut itself was highly nutritious; in fact, he said, many tribes of men lived almost entirely on oil. Men and officers listened respectfully to his philosophical disquisition; but it was evident, that, as they looked at their attenuated limbs, and felt the gnawings of hunger, it was pursuing knowledge under difficulties. Suddenly, "A turkey, turkey!" shouted one of the men, and, looking up, a fine large bird was seen sitting on a limb, and stretching out his neck in wonder toward the party. Strain asked if any one could shoot better than he; if so, let him fire. All shouted "Shoot, shoot!" He fired, and brought down the turkey. Soon after he shot another, which, with a third killed by Truxton, quite animated the hungry band. At length, at two o'clock, Strain, still in advance, with his cutlass clearing a way for his tired followers, caught, through the dense foliage, the gleam of the water. He immediately passed the word "river" back through the line, and "The river! the river!" was repeated in still louder accents, till "The river! the river!" went up in one glad shout, and then three cheers were called for by the excited men, and "Hurra! hurra!" rang and echoed through the forest. The German army, when it caught sight of its beloved river, never shouted "The Rhine! the Rhine!" with more ecstasy than did this little party over a stream of whose name even, they were wholly ignorant. They found it deep and turbid, sweeping on at a velocity of nearly three miles an hour. Truxton immediately rigged his hook and line, baiting with the intestines of turkey, and commenced fishing, and soon six fine cat-fish were floundering on the bank. Five of these were given to the men, in addition to their share of the wild turkeys, and seemed, after their late privations, a feast, and filled the whole party with high spirits. Besides, they were once more on the river, and as the tropical moon sailed up over the trees, and turned the dark and turbid water into flowing silver, they felt almost on the borders of civilization. From this time on, a marked and striking difference was seen in the power of endurance between the officers and gentlemen of the party and the common seamen (from the Granadian commissioners, of course, nothing was expected); thus proving, what every man has observed who has been in long and trying expeditions, that intellect and culture will overbalance physical strength. The power of a strong will—the effort demanded by the calm voice of reason and the pride of true manhood—take the place of exhausted muscles and sinews, and assert, even under the pangs of famine and the slow sinking of overtaken nature, the supremacy of mind over matter, of the soul over animal life—no matter how vigorous the latter may otherwise be.

After leaving the ship they all fared alike, and when many of the men were already broken down, physically and morally, the officers and engineers were as active, energetic, and cheerful as at first.

Next morning, at half past seven, they started merrily down the banks of the river. The woods were, at first, open, and the traveling easy; but after making about a mile, they found their progress impeded by a dense jungle, while the river took another easterly bend, thus leading them entirely off their course. Strain halted the party, and after informing them that it was his conviction they were on the Chuquanaqua, one of the most tortuous rivers in the world in proportion to its length, or upon a branch of it which appeared upon none of the maps, and that their journey might be very much protracted, declared that, in his opinion, they ought to avail themselves of the strong current of the river for assistance, or, at least, to convey the sick and foot-sore of the party. A canoe was, unfortunately, nearly out of the question, as about half the cutting part of the only ax had been accidentally broken off in a hard tree. This would prevent them from felling a tree of sufficient size for a boat; while a raft had thus far been put off the question, as they could find no wood sufficiently buoyant to support more than its own weight. The only resource left them, he said, was to cut down a few moderately-sized trees, split and hew them into planks, and construct a boat which might convey the whole party. "It is true," said he, "we have not a single nail, screw, or any oakum or pitch; but I once constructed a boat on a river in Brazil, secured only by wooden wedges and clamps, and I have little doubt we can do it now within twenty-four hours, if you will join me and work with a will." "Hurra! hurra!" was echoed far and wide; and "a boat! a boat!" repeated with acclamations. The order to encamp and kindle a fire was then given. Truxton, Maury, and Garland, and one man, were sent out to hunt game and obtain food; while the remainder, with every hatchet and cutting instrument they could lay hand on, were soon scattered through the woods, which began to ring with the unwonted sounds of incipient civilization. They vigorously cut down trees for planks, and trimmed up clamps, and wedges for splitting the timber, and by evening they had the clamps all done, and two planks, twenty-four feet long, split out and partially hewn. The hunting-party returned before night, bringing only one small monkey, or marmoset, a little palmetto, and some of the acid nuts of the palm. This was a small allowance for twenty-two tired men; and Strain, hearing the cry of hawks near, started off with his carbine, and soon returned with three, which made a meagre addition to the supper. As the men had been hard at work during the day, and were now out of the Indian country, Strain dispensed with the sentries for the night, placing the watch in charge of the officer of the guard; and after this had but one sentry at a time instead of two. The tobacco, their chief comfort, had, at the last camp, given out entirely, and they were driven to all kinds of expedients to supply the deficiency. Some, who were inveterate smokers, gathered decayed dry wood, with which they filled their pipes. The deprivation of tobacco was more severely felt than even that of provisions; and the longings expressed for it greater than for food.

February 5th was Sunday; but, being in no position to make it a day of rest, they were early at work at their boat. In the course of their search after a tree appropriate for planks, they came across some very buoyant wood; and, although it was scarce, Strain immediately determined to build a raft instead of a boat, as the labor was so much less, and so many more men could be employed upon it at the same time. The half-hewn planks were accordingly deserted, and the whole party sent out to seek and cut down these new-found trees. One after another they came dragging them into camp; and, stripping away the bark, peeled off the inner surface for lashings. These strips a part commenced plaiting into ropes, and soon a large quantity of materials was collected on the bank. The officers discovering that animal food went much farther by boiling it into soup, Truxton was selected as cook, to superintend the operations for them, and give to each his portion. Each man carried a cup, and this cup full was the quantity allowed him.

A great misfortune befell them this day, in the loss of their only fish-hook. It was private property, but Strain had appropriated it for the use of the party, and forbidden every one except Mr. Truxton—who was the best fisherman—to use it. He would not even trust himself, so fearful was he of accident. Mr. Castilla had asked for it, and, as he thought that international courtesy would not allow him to refuse, gave it to him. The latter imprudently turned it over to one of the men, who broke it. Had that hook remained to them, no lives need have been lost by starvation, as the river always abounded in fish, their number increasing as they advanced. On such apparently insignificant circumstances do the lives of men depend.

As the man who lost the hook was one of the best in the party, Strain rebuked him only by setting forth what would probably be the consequences both to him and all the party.

By sunset they had collected nearly all the buoyant wood within reach of the camp, and wearied and worn out flung themselves along the bank, and though pierced by thousands of mosquitoes at length fell asleep.

The next morning the boatswain's call from

Lombard, "Heave round!" roused all hands at early daylight, and they again went to work upon the raft. By noon it was finished, but upon testing it, they found, alas! that it would support only seven or eight persons. As they had used all the balsa wood there was in the region, nothing more could be done, and so Strain determined to put those who were ill and foot-sore upon it, and proceed by land with the remainder of the party until they could find more timber of the same description.

At a quarter past four the raft, in charge of Mr. Truxton, was headed from the shore, and swung slowly out into the current. On board were the two New Granadian commissioners, Mr. Boggs, Wilson, one of the seamen of the Cyane, and the draughtsman, Mr. Kettlewell, whom Strain furnished with a compass, to take the bearings of the river, and thus save them on land this trouble; for, still true to the great purpose of the expedition, Strain, amidst all his sufferings, had carefully worked up the route. The remainder of the party, after seeing the raft fairly moving down stream, turned to depart, but discovered that Lombard, who had already given symptoms of mental aberration, was nowhere to be found. Upon inquiry, Strain ascertained that he had been absent from camp several hours, and had left without permission. Scouts were immediately sent out, but they one after another dropped in, reporting no traces of him. Leaving a note directing him to follow down the bank of the river, Strain ordered the march, intending to return for him as soon as he met the raft. But just as they were moving off, to their great joy Lombard emerged from the wood—having been, as he said, down the river to reconnoitre. The main body then took up the line of march, occasionally exchanging signals with the party on the raft; but at length being forced away from the bank by the undergrowth, they heard nothing more of them, and returned to the river late in the afternoon.

Feeling convinced that they were above, Strain called a halt, and sat down to await their arrival. Very soon the report of a gun above was heard, and then a second. This was the signal to communicate, and Strain set off with two men to ascend the river, leaving the main body to rest upon its banks.

After traveling a mile through the forest they came to a bend in the river, where the raft lay moored, those on it believing that Strain and his party were still above. Undeceiving them in this particular, and directing them to move on, he returned; but had scarcely seated himself again when he was startled by another gun, then a second, and a third. This signal was a recall for all parties, and understood to be one also of distress. He immediately took some fresh men, and carrying the ax, hatchet, and macheta, hurried in the direction of the sound.

Forcing his way through the undergrowth and along the bank of the river, he at length came upon Mr. Truxton and the majority of his party seated upon the bank. The latter, as Strain approached, simply made a sign with his thumb over his shoulder, quietly remarking, "There's the raft;" and, true enough, there it lay, jammed against two trees that had fallen across the river from opposite sides, thus forming a complete boom. The bank opposite was high and perpendicular, so that it would be impossible to lift the timbers out and carry them around. Neither could they cut away the huge trees that blocked the stream—it would take, as one of the men said, "a steam snag machine two days to remove it." Strain therefore determined at once to abandon the raft, notwithstanding the labor and time it had cost. Mr. Castilla, the principal New Granadian commissioner, however, still sat on the raft and refused to land, declaring that he was utterly unable to proceed on foot. Strain, knowing better, used every argument to persuade him to come ashore, promising, if necessary, to carry him, but all in vain. At length, becoming provoked at his obstinacy, he told him plainly that he would not, out of mere courtesy to him as a commissioner, sacrifice his own party, and would leave him where he was if he did not come on at once. Seeing that Strain was determined, he crawled ashore, and walked to the place where the main body was halted.

The following extract from the journal of one of the officers vividly portrays the condition of the party: "Proceeded down stream about a quarter of a mile, when finding a place to camp, built a fire and spread our blankets in the mild moonlight. We all feel downhearted to-night, being without any thing to eat, and not having eaten enough each man for the six or eight days to make one good meal; our clothes all in pieces, and nearly all almost shoeless and bootless. Have no idea where we are, nor, of course, when we shall reach the Pacific. The sick almost discouraged, and ready to be left in the woods to take their chances. I would freely give twenty dollars for a pound of meat, but money is of no use here." Thus they lay down, while countless sand-flies and mosquitoes, combined with the pangs of hunger and torture of undressed wounds, made the poor sufferers groan aloud. Their moans were answered only by the screams of the wild cat or cry of the tiger seeking their evening repast of blood. At last fatigue overcame their sufferings, and, save the night sentinel, all at length fell fast asleep. And over them the white moonlight lay, and past them, in quiet beauty, the unconscious river swept onward to the ocean.

Here, on the 7th, Strain again took off his boots, and finding one of his feet extremely lacerated, put on a moccasin in the place of the boot.

Early in the morning Mr. Castilla asked Strain's permission to return, with Mr. Polanco, his colleague, and one man, in order to attempt the reconstruction of the raft on a small scale, capable of carrying three persons, with which, as it would be more manageable, he expected to reach the Granadian settlements on the river below. This request was acceded to very unwillingly, and only with the condition that no one unless a volunteer should be sent. Finally, Benjamin Harrison, one of the best men, offered to go, and they departed, having first received from Strain good arms in the place of their own, which they had allowed to become unserviceable. The party, which numbered twenty-seven when it left Caledonia Bay, was now reduced to nineteen on the land, and with this number Strain continued to follow the river. The thickness of the undergrowth soon drove them inland, and they did not reach it again until evening, when it was time to encamp.

The next morning, February 8th, they were about to leave camp 19th, when a shot was heard near by, to which the party answered with a shout. Immediately after the two Granadians and Harrison emerged from the bushes. Their story was soon told: owing to the exertions of Harrison a small raft had been built, but was soon wrecked among the snags and rapids, and a musket, carbine, and hatchet lost. They all seemed delighted to rejoin the main body, especially Mr. Polanco, who threw his arms around Mr. Truxton and Strain, and declared he never would leave them again, saying to the latter as he embraced him, "I know you don't like me, but I like you, and will stay by you." He evidently had gone with Mr. Castilla against his own inclinations. Harrison was utterly worn out, and, moreover, somewhat feverish, but declaring he was able to proceed, the whole set out to follow the river. The Granadians caught this afternoon an iguana, and stealing off into the wood by themselves, built a fire and ate it. The men, who had hitherto generously divided their last morsel with them, on discovering this, became disgusted, and ever after secretly despised them.

During this day's march they found an article of food which afterward became common in the camp, and was called by Mr. Castilla the "monkey pepper pod." It resembled the cocoon (in its exterior) after the husk has been removed. The interior bore some resemblance to the yellow water-melon, though the seeds were not so regularly disposed, nor in the same direction. It grew in clusters like the jackfruit, or cocoa of tropical climates, and on the most beautiful forest tree of the Isthmus, which sometimes towered to the height of two hundred feet, not a limb or knot breaking the smooth surface of the column-like trunk for a hundred and thirty feet; the fruit, when not quite ripe, as they at first found it, was hard and of a greenish tinge, becoming black by exposure. When ripe it was softer, and assumed a yellow color, yielding a most fragrant odor. In either state it had a pungent and peppery taste. In small quantities it was a very agreeable stimulant to them, who had so long been without condiments to their scanty food. They ate it raw, cooked it with soup, made soup of it, which proved very refreshing and stimulating when setting off on the day's journey without any breakfast. For some time previous to using it they had met with it in the forest, but dared not eat it. At length, however, they found one partially devoured by some animal or bird, and concluding that what one stomach was able to digest another could, they used it without fear. This was the more acceptable, as Strain had stopped their allowance of gunpowder which had been used for pepper and salt in seasoning their miserable food; but the Pacific receding like the mirage of the desert, and the ammunition getting scarce, he feared they might need it more in procuring than for seasoning it.

As they had lost their fish-hook, the officers tasked their ingenuity to make others out of the wire in the tin-pots, though without success, owing to their inability to get a barb on them.

The next morning, February 9th, after having been nearly devoured by mosquitoes, the half-starved party set off, and being forced away from the river by undergrowth and deep ravines, only reached it again about five P.M., having made an estimated distance of nine miles. The forest during this day's march abounded in swamps and heavy undergrowth, which, combined with Harrison's weakness, rendered their progress painfully slow and laborious. Many very large trees were seen in the woods, which generally abounded in fine timber, though very little of it, except caoutchouc and mahogany, was recognized by the party.

The camp to-night (camp 21) was pitched in an open grove, under a magnificent canopy of trees, and on a bank thirty feet high, from which a long reach of the river could be seen as it swept in a deep strong current on. As the declining sun sent long streams of light through the leafy arcades, and flecked the high bank with shadows, and poured its tropical glories full on the flashing stream, the scene arrested every eye by its picturesque beauty, and with one accord the spot was christened "CAMP BEAUTIFUL."

This little band of explorers, as they sat at sunset in their "Camp Beautiful," making soup out of their lean, tough hawks, the dark background of forest casting into still stronger relief their tattered garments and emaciated figures, looked any thing but men on whose fate, for the time being, rested the fate of a ship canal, destined to change the aspect and history of the world.

The next day they continued their march, but were much delayed by Harrison, who, though feverish and unfit to travel, would not permit the party to halt for him, but weak and wretched, kept staggering on. Strain could not see the brave fellow bearing up so nobly, yet painfully, without often stopping to let him rest, and at length at four o'clock encamped on a point abounding in palm-trees, and gave it the name of "Nut Camp." They passed during the day the dry bed of a river of considerable magnitude, coming in on the left side. Its bed and banks were strewn with the trunks of trees, which showed that, though then perfectly dry, it must be a tremendous torrent in the rainy season. Breakfastless and weary the party, now thoroughly crippled with the feeble and sick, renewed in the morning their almost hopeless journey along the banks of the apparently endless river. Harrison was still sick, while the Granadians, as usual, complained much of fatigue, and required great urging to keep up. The Americans, both officers and men, except Harrison, as yet showed no signs of breaking down, although almost all had very sore feet, and their low diet had begun to tell fearfully upon their appearance. Truxton declared he would not wait for the Granadians, who kept constantly crying out "Halt, halt!" He finally came forward and told Strain it was of no use marching in this way—they would never get through. The latter had thought so for some time. He, however, halted, and requested an officer to give the Granadians a cat-fish to revive them, which he did. Constantly on the look-out for something on which they might make a supper, he managed during the day to kill six hawks. No order was observed in the march to-day—the line was long and straggling—and, as it crawled slowly and wearily along the winding shore, presented a most piteous spectacle to the commander. Events were drawing to a crisis—each day told fearfully on the party—a few more like the last would compel them to stop, and leave a portion behind to die by slow starvation. Every morning Strain would scrutinize each man anxiously, to ascertain by the increased emaciation how fast they were sinking. At three P.M. they encamped for the 28d time upon a shelving mud-bank, having made some seven and a half miles by the course of the river. After reaching camp, Strain managed, even with the defective fish-hook, to catch two cat-fish, which were divided among the sick; the hawks being divided equally among the well. When about to start early the next morning, Lombard was suddenly attacked with severe pains, accompanied by dangerous symptoms, which delayed them until nine o'clock. This attack was owing to the diet of palm nuts, which, containing only acid and fibre, the first was absorbed in the stomach, leaving the latter in undigested and matted masses, effectually preventing the action necessary to throw them off. Lombard was the first who suffered severely from this cause, but in the course of the journey no one escaped from the fearful effects of such a diet, which, at the same time that it paralyzed the internal organs, utterly destroyed the enamel of the teeth.

During the day they discovered another species of nuts, the outside covering of which was not unlike the mango fruit. As the tree was large, they did not stop to cut it down, but obtained what they could by shooting into the clusters with their carbines. The complaints of Castilla were constantly heard along the line, while Lombard and Harrison were so ill they could scarcely drag one leg before the other. It was impossible to march, and Strain was obliged to encamp at noon, making only about two miles in all. The serious aspect which affairs were assuming was no longer to be trifled with. There was no concealing the fact that most of the party were failing fast, while the feet of many were sore, and the clothes of all in tatters. Strain had given the last remnant of his trowsers to Kettlewell, and had traveled several days in nothing but his drawers.

Lombard was ill and dispirited, and declared that he would "leave his bones in the woods."

The unfortunate Granadians were much alarmed at the protracted journey, but still would make no exertions to advance; on the contrary, they constantly retarded the party by begging Strain to halt at times when his own officers and men could have made three times the distance. Lombard and Harrison were really ill and suffering, yet they still pushed on, and the last early halt was made at the urgent request of Castilla, who, though doubtless fatigued, was in perfect health.

Now nearly certain that they were upon the Chuquanaqua, which, though almost unknown to geographers, was noted for its tortuous course, Strain was aware that marches of two miles a day would never clear them of the forest until all had suffered terribly from starvation or perished from disease, which their diet would certainly engender. He had no direction in which to look for assistance from without. Captain Hollins, as he was well aware, must be already very anxious, but he was utterly powerless to relieve him, as any party which he might have sent would have consumed their provisions before they could reach him, and instead of being serviceable, would only embarrass him the more, by increasing the number to be provided for in the forest.

From below he had no reason to expect any assistance, as he did not suppose any one in that direction was aware of the Expedition, and besides, if they had, he had already had sufficient experience among the New Granadians to feel assured that—their fear of Indians being placed out of the question—their indolence and selfishness would prevent them from making any effort for which they were not well paid beforehand. Having nothing, therefore, to expect from abroad, finding the party daily becoming weaker, he determined at this camp to send forward and have canoes and provisions brought up to meet them.

Soon after encamping, therefore, he called the men together, and explained to them their situation and the necessity for obtaining canoes and provisions. He then told them that he had resolved to build a small raft, capable of transporting three persons, who were to go forward in search of them. Notwithstanding their previous ill-fortune, he believed that, with a small raft, obstacles might be avoided and surmounted which would stop one large enough to transport the whole party. The proposition seemed to meet the views of the whole party, and the poor fellows went to work energetically to fell a tree which he pointed out to them, and which he had himself commenced cutting down; the wood was tested to see if it would float, and the result being satisfactory, they felled it with no little difficulty, cut it into pieces of appropriate length, and peeled it.

At sunset they had, as they supposed, timber enough for the raft, and were about to convey it to the river bank when it was discovered—by throwing a limb into the water—that, though the wood would float, it was just about the specific gravity of water, and would bear no additional weight.

Thus were all their hopes dashed to the ground, and their labor thrown away. They had, however, found some pussley, as it was called, which they gathered, but hesitated to eat it; when one of the party said that hogs would eat it in the United States, and if it was good for hogs it was good for men. This was conclusive; and large quantities were boiled, of which they all ate ravenously. Violent vomiting ensued—Strain suffering among the rest. They became so thoroughly disgusted with it, that afterward, though nearly half starved, they could never eat it again.

The camp-fire was kindled, and the dispirited, distressed band flung themselves on the earth around it, and sought that refreshment in sleep which could not be obtained by food. That was a long and gloomy night to Strain. He could not sleep, but lay amidst his suffering men, pondering on their sad condition, and revolving various schemes for their deliverance. He had resolved, if the raft had succeeded, to have sent others forward and remained himself behind. This hope was past; and, turn which way he would, it was clear that the last hope of the party rested on some of the strongest cutting their way through and returning with boats. If they were near the Pacific, so much shorter would be the delay of relief—if far, so much more urgent was it that the attempt to reach it should be made before all were too weak to undertake the journey. The time had come for immediate and energetic action, if they would not all perish there in the forest. He had found by experiment that he could endure more, and on less food, than any other member of the party. Besides, the advance might be more dangerous than the retreat. Before them was all uncertainty. Perils greater even than those they had already encountered, might await those who ventured forward. He therefore felt that it was his duty to go; and, if necessary, sacrifice himself for the rest. Still, to leave his command to a doubtful fate, tried him sorely. They had supreme confidence in him, which they might not transfer to another leader; and should an evil fate befall them, which after events should prove he could have avoided, it would be a blow greater than he could bear. Thus revolving his condition, he outwatched the stars; but when the morning dawned his resolution was taken.

Rousing up the men, he called them together and announced his determination to leave the party, and taking three persons, force his way down the river to the nearest settlement, from whence he would send back canoes and provisions. Not willing to order men on this doubtful undertaking, he packed up his blanket, shouldered his haversack and carbine, and called for volunteers. Several at once stepped forward, out of whom he selected Mr. Avery, originally a volunteer in the Expedition, and Golden and Wilson, two of the crew of the Cyana. These men were chosen for no mental qualification, but solely because the state of their physique appeared to promise the greatest endurance of the fatigue which he anticipated.

He then told the men officially that they were placed under the command of Mr. Truxton during his absence; whom he directed to follow under the bank of the river by easy marches—halting whenever it might be necessary—and taking all possible precautions to supply the party with game and other food. In a short conversation with the officers, he expressed his firm conviction that if the nuts, palmettos, and other articles of food which they had met thus far held out, the party might be sustained in camp for six months; but he advised them to change their camp as often as provisions became scarce in the vicinity.

With these parting directions, he, on the 13th of February, took leave of his command, and set out on his journey. As he turned away, he exclaimed "Good-by! good-by!"—"Good-by! God bless you!" came from all, and the forest soon shut him from sight.

This little band of four were well calculated for the terrible trial before them. Strain, the leader, though half naked and a small man, was knit together with iron sinews, and with as brave and resolute a heart as ever beat in a human bosom. Fertile in resources, and with that natural spirit of command which begets confidence and insures obedience, no man could be better fitted for the trying position in which he unexpectedly found himself. Avery was a man of powerful frame, and had already had some experience in tropical travel, having passed some months on the Atrabo, and journeyed elsewhere in New Granada. James Golden, seaman, was a young man who had served with Strain in a cruise on the coast of Africa, and had enlisted in the naval service with especial reference to accompanying him in this expedition. Wilson, a landsman, was also a man of splendid frame, which seemed to have suffered scarcely at all from the privations which he had undergone. Their arms were one Sharp's rifle, belonging to Mr. Avery, two carbines, and two Colt's pistols. They also took plenty of ammunition. Young Golden, not being so strong as the others, had no arms except a pistol—Mr. Avery, Wilson, and Strain carrying the others. Two machetas and a small pocket-compass, and their blankets and empty haversacks, completed their equipment.

The best compass and the double-barreled fowling-piece were left with the main body, one to direct their course and take the bearings of the river, and the other to provide the party with game.

ANCIENT AND MODERN ARTILLERY.

IN few things have men displayed so much ingenuity as in devising and perfecting implements for destroying each other. The necessities of the chase, indeed, demanded projectile weapons; and Nimrod, "the mighty hunter before the Lord," must have had some means of attacking game at a distance greater than he could hurl a stone or cast a spear. When the hunter of beasts became a hunter of men, the same weapons would come into play, and new ones would be brought into requisition. In point of fact, war, rather than the chase, has led to the invention of projectiles.

The sling being the most simple and obvious, was undoubtedly the earliest instrument for casting missiles. It was but increasing the momentum of the stone by augmenting the circumference of the circle around which it was whirled. Slingers constituted the great body of the light-armed troops of antiquity. The weapon was easily constructed, and the missiles adapted to it abounded every where. Every tent which contained a bit of leather was an armory. Every brook course, with its smooth water-worn stones, was a magazine abundantly stored. There was little room for improvement in the construction of the sling. The earliest were, in all essential respects, as perfect as the latest. Those found in the Egyptian tombs do not differ from those used three thousand years later. The only advance made was in the employment of leaden bullets in place of the smooth stones with which the Hebrew youth slew the Philistine giant. It is not a little singular that these bullets were made of an almond-shape, very like the conical balls which modern science has shown to be preferable to the round ones so long employed. Among the Greeks these bullets not unfrequently bore some motto or inscription. Every bullet literally had its billet. A very common one was, "Take this!"—an invitation wholly superfluous to the person who chanced to be hit.

SLINGER.

The range of the sling was great enough to make it a very formidable weapon, though skill in its use could be acquired only by early training and long practice. The inhabitants of the Balearic Islands had a reputation as marksmen akin to that enjoyed by our "Kentucky riflemen." This proficiency was the result of early training, the mothers of the young slingers being accustomed to suspend the food of their sons from the branch of a tree, compelling them to bring it down with the sling, or go hungry. With them it was, "No hit, no dinner."

Next after the sling came the bow. This was still more widely diffused, owing to its greater accuracy. The bows of various nations differed greatly from each other. That of the Scythians was shaped like our letter C, the ancient form of the Greek sigma. Hence the young Greek was told to remember the form of that letter, "because it was like a Scythian bow," just as among us the figure of the letter B is impressed upon the mind of the rustic aspirant for alphabetical knowledge, by calling attention to the fact that it "looks like an ox-yoke." The bow used by the Tartars, the descendants of the Scythians, still retains this shape. As they fight principally upon horseback, they hold the bow vertically, instead of horizontally like other nations. The neck of the horse is thus prevented from interfering with the action of the bow.

The Greek bow was short, not exceeding three or four feet in length. But as it was very stout, considerable force was required to bend it. In using it, the archer dropped upon one knee, bracing himself so as to gain a firmer position. This attitude is shown in the annexed outline of an ancient statue. The bow itself is not represented; but the position of the hands shows that the arrow was drawn to the breast, instead of back to the ear. The Greek bow was originally made of two horns of a species of wild goat, united at the base by a metallic band forming the handle. Of whatever material it was afterward constituted, this form was still retained. The double curvature, with the straight intervening handle, still showed its origin. The Romans copied their bows, as well as many other things, from the Greeks.

The Egyptians were celebrated as archers. Their bows bore a close resemblance, both in form and length, to the famous English long-bow. Specimens now extant, taken from the tombs at Thebes, might pass for the very weapons borne by Robin Hood and the merry archers of Sherwood forest. Their arrows also rivaled in length the cloth-yard shafts of the English archers. Compared with the long Egyptian bow, that of the Greeks was a very clumsy, inefficient weapon. It may seem strange that the Greeks and Romans should never have thought of the obvious expedient of adding to the power of their bow by increasing its length. But there was something in the weapon not adapted to their genius. They trusted to hand-to-hand fighting, rather than to missiles. They had that bull-dog propensity that has made the bayonet the favorite weapon of the English. The archers in their armies belonged almost exclusively to the auxiliary troops, for the bow was an Asiatic rather than a European weapon. The Orientals could never stand before the onset of the serried spears of the Greek phalanx, or the charge of the heavy pilum and short cut-and-thrust sword of the Roman legion.

The nations of antiquity possessed nothing answering to our modern field artillery. But some ordnance was absolutely essential for attacking fortified places. The most obvious instrument for overthrowing walls and bursting in gates was the battering-ram. In its earliest form it was simply a huge beam, borne in the brawny arms of the soldiers, and thrust by direct force against the walls or gate. To add a metallic head to the beam, to suspend it by chains from a support, and to protect those who used it by a movable tower or other defense, were all the essential improvements of which this simple instrument was capable. When of the enormous size of which it was sometimes made, the ram was a very formidable implement, comparing in some respects not unfavorably with our heaviest siege artillery. A French mathematician has calculated that a ram weighing two tons, moved by the force of a thousand men, gave a blow equal to that of a 36-pound shot, fired point-blank. This size was often far exceeded. We read of those which weighed forty or fifty tons, requiring 1500 men to manage them effectively. Nothing less firm than a solid pyramid could long sustain the shock of such an implement fairly brought against it.

The obvious defects of the battering-ram were the exposed situation of those who used it, working, as they necessarily must, directly exposed to the assaults of the besieged; the immense force necessary to manage it; and the difficulty of transporting it from place to place, and establishing it in position. One employed by Vespasian, and by no means the largest of which we have accounts, required for its transportation one hundred and fifty yoke of oxen, or three hundred pairs of horses and mules.

The battering-ram, moreover, was effective only against the defenses of a place, inflicting no direct injury upon the defenders. To effect this latter purpose, the ancients invented a great variety of engines for hurling huge stones and immense darts and javelins, or even beams of considerable size. Though differing widely in construction, these may all be reduced to two classes, as far as their principle of operation is concerned.

The first class is simply a bow of great size, furnished with a winch or other machinery for bending it, and a rest for sustaining the rock or bolt to be hurled. This principle was brought into use in an infinite variety of forms, and specific names were given to each. The bow was placed horizontally or vertically; it had one arm or two, and was made of wood or metal.

One form reminds us of the "infernal machine" by which it was attempted to assassinate Louis Philippe. A number of arrows were arranged side by side upon a support. A stout elastic board, placed perpendicularly, was firmly secured at the lower end, while the upper end was bent back by a winch. When let go, the board sprung back against the arrows, discharging them all at once.

INFERNAL MACHINE.

The other class of engines derived their power from the elasticity of twisted fibres. Such an engine was called a tormentum, from the Latin torqueo, "to twist"—and not, as might appear to the mere English reader, from its tormenting the enemy. A common wood-saw furnishes a perfect illustration of their principle of construction. Let any one draw back the slip of wood by which the cord is twisted, and then let it fly back against his knuckles; he will need no further proof of elastic force of twisted fibres. Increase the number of cords, make the frame of suitable strength and form, and provide an appropriate support for the missile, and we have the ancient tormentum. In some the stone to be thrown was placed in a cavity at the extremity of the lever; the action of throwing then resembled that by which a stone is flung by the arm.

The names catapulta and ballista were applied indifferently to both species of engines; the former denoting those intended for throwing darts, the latter those for hurling stones. The shape given to each depended much upon the purpose for which it was designed; the ballista being usually square, and the catapulta oblong. Hence the boast of the "shoulder-hitter" in the old Latin comedy; "My fist is a ballista, my lower arm a catapulta, and my upper arm a battering-ram."

CATAPULTA.

It will be observed that elasticity is the power made available in both these species of engines. In the one case it is the elasticity of wood or metals; in the other that of twisted fibres. It is the same force, acting under different conditions, that is used in modern artillery. The explosive power of gunpowder arises from the elasticity of the gases suddenly evolved in its rapid combustion. The volume of the gases thus produced is two thousand times that of the powder employed. It is difficult to measure the absolute expansive force of these. Count Rumford filled a cavity in an iron cylinder with twenty-eight grains of gunpowder. In exploding, it tore asunder the iron, which would have resisted a strain of 400,000 pounds applied at no greater mechanical advantage. Here, as in the case of steam, we see that the elasticity of gases exceeds almost infinitely that of any solid bodies.

The application of gunpowder wrought an entire change in the whole system of warlike engines. The explosive power of this compound had been familiar long before it was applied to this purpose. It had been known in the East, and used in the construction of fireworks, from time immemorial. Roger Bacon was acquainted with it as early as 1219. In 1280 the monk Barthold Schwartz appears to have pointed out its applicability to warlike engines. It was not long before the idea was carried into execution. Cannon were certainly used in France as early as 1328. The presence of a number of pieces of cannon at the battle of Cressy, in 1346, proves that they were not an absolutely new invention then, as has been assumed. An army circumstanced as was that of Edward III. is in no condition to try experiments with new weapons upon a battle-field.

The new invention was improved by slow degrees. Yet the range of even the rude guns first fabricated so far exceeded that of the catapulta and ballista, as to call for the most strenuous efforts for their improvement. The main obstacle to this was the low state of the mechanic arts. Milton's description of the artillery of the rebel angels applies exactly to the guns first made. They were mere logs of wood hollowed out. The wooden tube was then strengthened by iron bars and hoops; and at a later period the bore was lined with iron. During the Thirty Years' War, Gustavus Adolphus had a number of guns made much more portable than any that had before been known. To preserve them, they were inclosed in leather cases. This is probably the origin of the absurd story that has passed from author to author, of cannon having been sometimes made of leather.

At length guns were cast in one piece. At first the bore was formed in casting. An iron rod covered with clay was inserted in the mould, which was withdrawn after the casting, leaving a hollow tube. It soon appeared that the bore thus produced was not perfectly accurate; besides that the interior was always honey-combed by the air-bubbles escaping from the molten metal, which weakened the piece. At present all cannon are cast solid, the bore being produced by drilling. In boring, the drill is stationary, the gun being made to revolve by powerful machinery.

It would be superfluous to enumerate the successive changes made in the form of artillery. The main points to be gained were to establish the best ratio between the length of the piece and the size of the bore; and to secure the greatest available strength with the least amount of metal. As the greatest force of the explosion is felt at the place where it first takes place, the breech was made considerably thicker than any other part. The full explosive power of the charge is apparent only when it is closely confined, as in Rumford's experiment. The bottom of the bore, where the powder is placed, was accordingly made smaller than the remainder, which was large enough to admit the ball. This diminished bore constitutes the "chambered breech," which is now applied to small arms as well as cannon.

Attention was also directed to the gun-carriages, in order to construct one which should combine strength, lightness, and facility of movement. In modern field-pieces, the gun rests only upon the hind-wheels, the fore-wheels or "limbers" being detached when the piece is fired. The stout side-pieces, or trails, resting on the ground, give a firm position to the gun. To "unlimber" is to detach the fore-wheels from the carriage, leaving the trails to rest upon the ground. The limber also serves as a vehicle for transporting some of the most necessary munitions and a portion of the gunners. The 9-pounder brass gun is the favorite piece of field artillery in the English service, those of larger calibre being too heavy to be transported with facility over rough ground. The piece itself weighs 13 cwt. Including gun, carriage, limber, 32 rounds of ammunition, and the necessary stores, it weighs 38½ cwt., and can be drawn for a few hundred yards by six horses at a gallop, so as to bring it speedily into position. As now organized in the Eastern war, an English field battery of four 9-pounders and two 24-pounder howitzers has in attendance fourteen other carriages, served by 20 officers, commissioned and non-commissioned, 168 gunners, drivers, etc., and 170 horses.

As now constituted, artillery may be divided into three classes: cannon (a), howitzers (b), and mortars (c), distinguished by their different proportions. In field guns the length is from sixteen to twenty-one times the diameter of the bore. Naval and siege guns are made somewhat longer, in order that the muzzle may project beyond the sides of the ship or the embankments from which they are fired, in order that they may not be injured by the concussion. Mortars are very short, with a large bore; their length is three or four times their calibre. Howitzers are a medium between the other two classes; their length being six or eight times their calibre. Each of these guns is specially adapted to a particular kind of projectile. The calibre of cannon is indicated by the weight of the ball which it carries; that of mortars by the diameter of the bore; either method is used with respect to howitzers. The 5½-inch howitzer carries a stone ball weighing seven pounds; thus a 5½-inch howitzer and a 7-pounder howitzer denote the same piece. The hollow iron ball of the same size weighs twice as much.

For a long time solid round balls, at first of stone, afterward of iron, were the only projectiles discharged by artillery. For battering down walls, the solid ball has the advantage over all others. But when directed against a body of men its efficient range is limited to the direct line of its flight. If the enemy were drawn up in a single line, no ball could kill more than a single man, while the chances would be greatly against its hitting even that one. A number of small shot, directed against a body of men, are more efficient than one large one. To meet this condition grape and cannister shot are employed.

Grape shot are a number of balls slightly fastened together around an iron spindle, in a form somewhat like a cluster of grapes. A cannister shot in shape is precisely like the tin cases used for containing preserved meats. But instead of appetizing delicacies, it is filled with hard iron balls. The design of grape and cannister shot is the same. The rapid flight of the mass through the air bursts the packages, and the balls scatter wide, plowing a broad furrow through the opposing ranks. Now, as a half-pound ball will kill a man as effectually as one of fifty pounds, and as one is just as likely to hit as the other, we may consider the efficiency of grape and cannister shot to exceed that of a solid ball just in proportion to the number of bullets they contain. Hence against troops in the open field, except at a very long range, grape and cannister have superseded solid shot.

Various forms have been tried for shot. There have been, for example, cylindrical, oblong, pine-apple, chain, and bar shot. These last are simply two round balls joined together by a chain or iron rod. But they have gone almost out of use; though in the recent naval attack upon Sebastopol, the Russians did great damage to the rigging of the vessels of the Allies by the use of chain shot. It has been found that when a ball passes through an object with a great momentum, it makes a clean smooth hole of just its own size. If the momentum is less, a large ragged hole is produced. In naval warfare the object is quite as much to damage the enemy's vessel as to kill his men. In order to diminish the momentum of the balls, they have been lightened, either by making them of stone or of iron hollow. The guns for discharging these shot were usually made with a bore larger in proportion to their length than common cannon. Such pieces, as well as the balls shot from them, were called carronades. It was found, however, that the advantage thus gained was more than neutralized by the inferior range of the carronades. Thus during our late war with Great Britain, our inferior fleet on Lake Ontario was saved from destruction by the British vessels being armed chiefly with carronades, while ours bore long guns carrying solid shot. Having the wind of the enemy, our fleet could keep beyond the range of their carronades, peppering them at leisure, and in almost perfect security. "We remained in this mortifying condition for six hours," says the British commander, "without being able to return a shot."

For attacking towns the red-hot shot is probably the most destructive projectile yet invented. To the horrors of bombardment it adds those of conflagration. At first sight it would seem the height of folly to thrust a red-hot mass of iron within an inch or two of a charge of gunpowder. The artilleryman would seem to stand in more peril than any one else. But the hazard is really very slight. The powder is inclosed in a stout flannel cartridge, and two thick hempen waddings, one wet, the other dry, are interposed between the ball and the powder. Still, a red-hot ball is not a very convenient thing to handle, since it must be done by means of tongs, and at great mechanical disadvantage. Hence red-hot shot of more than two-and-thirty pounds have rarely been used. At the recent bombardment of Odessa, however, it is said that red-hot shot were thrown from guns of the largest calibre.

Shells are probably the most terrible arm of modern warfare. A shell of the simplest form is a hollow ball of iron, filled with gunpowder and other combustible matter. A fuse communicates, through a hole in the side, with the enclosed powder. The fuse is ignited by the firing of the gun, its length being so calculated that it may last till the shell has just reached its mark. The shell is burst by the explosion of the powder within, and its fragments scattered in every direction.

Such is the simple bomb-shell—a missile destructive enough, one would think, to satisfy the most blood-thirsty mind. But it must yield the palm to the Shrapnel-shell, which is stuffed with both balls and powder. It thus combines in itself the destructive properties of the solid ball, the cannister shot, and the shell. Its range is nearly as great as that of the first, while it has the diffused action of the two last.

Attempts have been made at various times to cause shells to explode by the concussion of striking their mark; for it is difficult to calculate with perfect accuracy the proper length of the fuse to burn just the right time; and if the explosion takes place a few seconds too soon, the shell is harmless. But none of the attempts have as yet been proved satisfactory, by actual use, though it is said the secret is in possession of both the French and English governments. This, however, is still doubtful. So also is the reported invention of asphyxiated shells, filled with a composition that when burned produces immense volumes of a gas fatal to life.

Cannon and howitzers, as now used, throw both shot and shells. A Paixhan gun is simply a howitzer or cannon of enormous calibre, capable of taking in a large shell. Such was the great gun, called by a ghastly pun on its name, "The Peacemaker," the explosion of which on board the Princeton a few years since, was so disastrous. Mortars are used only for throwing shells. There is this further peculiarity about them. The shell is not aimed directly at the mark, but is shot upward, in order that it may in falling descend upon its object. Thus a shell is thrown clean over the walls of a fortress, and falls into its midst. The mortar, therefore, is fired at an angle of 45 degrees, being the angle which gives the ball the greatest range.

For many years great attention has been paid by military engineers to the rockets invented by Colonel Congreve, and high anticipations were at one time entertained of their efficiency. It was supposed that they would work an entire change in this arm of military service. Though these anticipations have been only partially realized, the rocket is now introduced as a useful auxiliary into siege trains. In external appearance the Congreve rocket differs little from the ordinary signal rocket. It is, however, much larger, and the case is made of iron. As the rocket always goes head-on, it is easy to cause it to explode by the shock of its contact in striking its mark. It is fired from a rest, so arranged as to give direction to its flight. The great defect in the rocket, which has never been fully obviated, is the uncertainty of its aim. Their use is almost wholly confined to siege purposes. For setting fire to towns they have been found very efficacious, as a large amount of incendiary material is easily attached to them.

The application of gunpowder to small arms was much more slow than to artillery. The first steps were simply in the direction of lightening the pieces to facilitate transport. The carriage was then dispensed with, and they were mounted upon a tripod, like a telescope. Next came what were called wall-pieces. They had no stand, but were still too heavy to be discharged from the arm. The muzzle was rested upon the wall, and the piece steadied by being brought to the shoulder. To avoid the "kicking" of so heavily loaded a piece, the muzzle had a projection which was hooked over the wall, so as to receive the shock of the recoil. This was only adapted to the defense of walled towns. It could not be used in the field.

The construction of the harguebuse was a very decided step in advance. This was light enough to be transported on the shoulder, but too heavy to be aimed without a rest. This rest was at first attached to the piece; but was subsequently detached, and carried sometimes by the harguebusier himself, and sometimes by an attendant. It was a stout staff, shod with iron, and having a forked top, in which to rest the gun.

FIRING ROCKETS.

Up to this time the piece was discharged by a slow match. As long as the rest was employed, the gunner had always a hand at liberty to manage the match. But when, in process of time, the piece was so far lightened that it might be fired at arm's length, this mode of discharge caused much embarrassment. This led to the invention of gun-locks. The earlier form was that of a simple dog to hold the slow-match, connected with a trigger, by pulling which the match was brought back into the priming pan. But unless the match was withdrawn at the precise instant, the blast of the explosion was liable to blow off the lighted end of the match, so that the gunner was forced to bestow extraordinary trouble upon keeping his match alight. The flint-lock was then invented. A small iron wheel was connected with a spring like that of a watch. This was wound up with a key, and held securely in position by a catch. A flint was attached to a movable dog, which communicated with a trigger in such a manner that by pulling it the flint was brought against the wheel at the instant the catch was lifted. The spring thus let loose, turned the wheel against the flint, and the sparks thus produced fell into the powder in the priming-pan below. The lock underwent various modifications, until it assumed the form of the common flint-lock, which is now almost wholly superseded by the percussion lock. As a monk was the first to suggest the application of gunpowder to warlike purposes, so it is not a little singular that the percussion lock, the greatest modern improvement upon small arms, was the invention of a clergyman.

CROSS-BOW.

We can not wonder that these imperfect small arms came into use far more slowly than did artillery. The last great siege in which the old catapultæ and ballistæ were much used was that of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453. Gibbon, in his magnificent description of this siege, has not failed to avail himself of the conjunction of ancient and modern artillery. The union of cannon and battering rams, catapultæ and ballistæ, liquid fire and movable towers, distinguished this famous siege. But the long-bow was in the highest repute in England down to the time of Elizabeth; and upon the Continent the cross-bow was long held to be a more formidable weapon than the harquebuse. Even late as the reign of Charles I. strenuous efforts were made to retain the bow as a weapon of war.

It is difficult to overrate the influence upon civilization exerted by the general introduction of the modern musket and pistol. The invention of printing has wrought a change hardly less notable. A few years ago, at an English coronation, when in accordance with old usage the Champion of England, clad in old armor, offers to do battle against the world in defense of the right of the new sovereign, it was gravely announced that the champion had at length succeeded in mounting his horse fully armed, almost without assistance. Yet the knight of old was obliged to train himself to vault into the saddle in just such armor. As such weapons and armor, and the skill to use them, must be confined to the few, arms became necessarily a profession. The knight of the middle ages, clad in steel armor, and mounted upon a steed almost as unassailable as himself, could ride over whole troops of yeomen and burghers, himself almost as safe the while as though he were entrenched in his rock-built castle. The soldier became from his position a tyrant. It was the reign of brute force. Fire-arms changed all this. They restored the natural equality of man. The robber-knight, perched in fancied security in his stronghold upon some steep crag, found that it could be battered about his ears from the plain below. No smith could forge armor that would withstand the small leaden bullet. Any man who could compass the cost of a musket or a pistol even, granting him a quick eye, firm nerves, and a steady heart, was the equal of the trained soldier. Gunpowder is the great leveler. It alone has made democracy a thing physically possible.

The invention of the rifle was another great advance in the construction of the smaller fire-arms, though many years elapsed before it was generally applied to military purposes. The rifle, as every body knows, is distinguished from a smooth-bore by having a number of shallow grooves running down the bore. These grooves, instead of passing straight down, wind around like the threads of a screw, making nearly a complete turn in going the entire length of the barrel. To understand the effect of these grooves upon the action of the piece, we must glance at one or two points in the theory of projectiles.

If a musket-ball were exactly spherical, and of perfectly uniform density throughout, so that the matter should be equally distributed about the centre; and if, furthermore, it were fired from a barrel whose bore was perfectly straight, and accurately circular, of the exact size of the ball, so that it should touch equally in every part of its circumference, the ball would travel laterally in a perfectly straight line, which would be varied vertically only by the attraction of gravitation, which would draw it toward the earth. But no one of these conditions can be fulfilled. No such ball and no such barrel has been made or can be made. Let a musket be accurately pointed at the bull's-eye of a target; then let it be firmly screwed into a vice, and discharged a number of times. No two balls will strike in exactly the same spot. If the target were placed at the distance of a hundred yards, there would probably be a distance of two or three feet between the bullet-holes. The greater the distance of the target, the wider apart would the bullets strike. If the distance were a mile, the balls would strike some hundreds of yards apart. This deflection is owing to imperfections in the balls and the gun—imperfections which it is impossible to remedy in a piece with a smooth bore.

The object of rifling the barrel is to correct this defect. To illustrate the principle of this, we will take a common boy's top. If the matter of the top were equally distributed all around the spindle, the top would—theoretically, at least—stand upright when once fairly balanced upon the peg; for there would be nothing to cause it to fall one way rather than another. But no man ever did make a top at rest stand a minute, and no man ever can do so. Now, let a rapid rotary motion be given to the top, and it maintains its upright position. The same inequality exists as before; but by the rapid motion the heavier side is continually changing its position. The top tends to fall toward its heavier side; but this is simultaneously, as it were, on every side. The inequalities exactly balance each other, and the top does not fall.

Now to apply this principle to the rifle. The grooves wind around like a screw; the bullet fits tightly into them, and can no more be driven straight down into the barrel than a screw can be driven like a nail straight into a plank. It must descend in a spiral course. In emerging from the barrel it must follow a similar track. In a word, it must be screwed into and out of the barrel. The screw motion thus imparted to the ball continues after it leaves the barrel; and we may consider it a top spinning through the air peg foremost. All the tendencies to lateral motion being thus neutralized, it goes straight forward to its mark, influenced only by the attraction of gravitation, which draws it toward the earth. This being a uniform force, can easily be calculated, and proper allowance made for it.

Various expedients have been tried to make the rifle ball fit the bore. It has been made a trifle larger than the bore, down which it is forced by the ramrod and mallet. The American backwoodsman uses a patch of greased cloth around the ball; this requires less force to drive it down, and he dispenses with the mallet. Still, to force the ball spirally down the bore requires time, and rapid firing is of great importance in warfare.

The rifle, therefore, has never, until quite recently, been a favorite weapon in European warfare. It was introduced into the French armies during the Revolution; but was speedily abandoned. Perhaps the character of the soldiers of the republic had quite as much to do with this as the defects in the weapon. The ardent youths who flew to arms at the tidings of the invasion of their country by the combined forces of the Continent, had little of the cool calculating spirit which enables the Kentucky hunter to pick off the enemy man by man. The fierce charge, the fiery hand-to-hand conflict, the shock of masses, were more in accordance with their instincts.

After the occupation of Algiers, the French troops were brought in contact with a new foe. It was useless to charge against an enemy who would not stand the shock. The fleet steeds of the Arab warriors easily bore them beyond the reach of the French, while in retreating their long carbines told fearfully upon the pursuers. To cope successfully with these, a weapon was wanted which should combine the long effective range of the rifle with the facility in loading of the musket. Two general modes of constructing such a weapon suggested themselves: a rifle capable of quick loading at the muzzle, and one loading at the breech. Almost simultaneously kindred experiments were undertaken in Prussia, while the peculiar character of our own border warfare led to like efforts here. The result has been the production of three forms of rifles. The revolver in America, the Zundnadelgewehr in Prussia, and the Minié rifle in France. For close skirmishing like that which our borderers carry on with the savage, where a half dozen shots in a minute may be worth a thousand in an hour, nothing can equal Colt's revolver.

The Prussian Zundnadelgewehr, or "needle-firing gun," is a rifle loaded at the breech. The cartridge contains the ball and the powder, between which is placed a detonating material. It is discharged by forcing a thin steel needle through the powder, against the detonating material, which causes it to explode, the ignition thus taking place at the forward end of the cartridge, which possesses several advantages not necessary to be detailed. In rapidity of loading and discharge, the Prussian gun stands unrivaled; but its construction is so delicate that much doubt exists as to its efficiency in the rough usage of an actual campaign. If report speaks truly, after a few discharges it leaks fire to such an extent, through the joinings, that the soldiers can not discharge it from the shoulder. It is apprehended that, like the famous regiment of tall grenadiers of the first Russian monarch, it is quite too fine to use.

In France attention was turned to perfecting the muzzle-loading rifle. The first considerable step was taken by M. Delavigne, who made the barrel of his rifle with a chambered breech. That is, the bottom of the barrel, where the powder was placed, was smaller than the bore above. The ball was of a size to pass freely down until stopped by the shoulders of the chamber, upon which it rested. Two or three smart taps with a heavy ramrod flattened out the ball, so that it filled the bore, and was pressed into the grooves. As a round ball would not merely flatten laterally, but become distorted by the blows, he used a conical one, with several grooves around it. It was found that not only was the force required to spread the ball lessened, and the friction diminished by thus reducing the rubbing surface, but the grooved ball traveled more truly, the atmosphere apparently acting upon the grooves as upon the feather of the arrow.

Colonel Thouvenin improved upon Delavigne's chambered breech by screwing a tige or steel pin into the breech of the ordinary rifle barrel. The ball passing down the barrel, rested upon the tige, around which the powder lay, exposing a larger surface, and thus igniting more rapidly. This rifle is the carabine à tige of the chasseurs de Vincennes.

Colonel Minié directed his attention to improving the ball. His ball is a leaden cone, shaped very nearly like a sugar loaf, of a size to pass readily down the bore of the rifle. In the bottom of the ball is a conical excavation, in which is placed an iron thimble of the same shape, only somewhat larger, so that it passes only part way up the excavation. This thimble acts like a wedge, and a blow upon it will drive it further into the cavity in the bullet, spreading the soft lead equally on every side. The first shock of the explosion, when the powder is ignited, of course strikes the iron wedge, driving it up into the lead, which expands and fills the barrel and its rifled grooves. The force of the powder performs the work of the blows of the ramrod in other rifles. The operation of loading consists merely in dropping the bullet down upon the powder. This combination of ball and gun constitutes the fatal Minié rifle.

Marvelous stories are told of the range and accuracy of this new weapon. A good marksman is sure of his man at a distance of more than one-third of a mile; at a distance twice as great the men and horses attached to a piece of artillery might be easily picked off one by one; at a mile and more the balls would tell fearfully upon a body of troops. At the battle of Inkermann, we are told that the Minié balls passed sheer through four men, killing the fifth. The most effective distance for grape and canister shot is but three or four hundred yards—just half as far as the Minié rifle carries with perfect accuracy. A few riflemen, therefore, lying securely under cover might easily disable a battery. A hundred of these weapons well directed against Bragg's artillery might have changed the fate of the battle of Buena Vista. A troop of cavalry advancing to the charge would be for a mile under the direct fire of a body of riflemen. Bomarsund and Sebastopol the French riflemen deliberately picked off the gunners at the embrasures of the Russian fortress. The Minié rifle must effect great changes in the art of war, by depriving the artillery of the pre-eminence it has so long held of being the most efficient arm of service. It behooves our own government to look to it that we are not found without having at command this new weapon.

The present war in the East has given rise to almost innumerable suggestions and experiments for the purpose of improving every description of fire-arms. Among these is the "Lancaster gun," which is an apparently successful attempt to apply the principle of the rifle to cannon of the largest size. The chief peculiarity of this cannon is, that the bore, instead of having grooves like the rifle, is smooth. As a substitute for grooves, the bore, instead of being circular, has a form slightly elliptical, the major axis exceeding the minor about half an inch, in a piece of eight inches calibre. The longer axis, instead of running straight down the piece, makes a half-turn in its whole length. The annexed cut represents a section of the bore at the breech of the gun, the longer diameter lying horizontally. At the muzzle the longer diameter, as in the cut opposite, stands perpendicularly. The ball being of such a shape as to fit the bore, it of course makes a half-turn in passing from the breech to the muzzle, and thus acquires the rotary motion of the rifle bullet. The ball for the Lancaster gun is conical, like that used with the Minié rifle. Suppose an ordinary sugar loaf to be slightly compressed at the sides, and we have a perfect representation of this ball. The conical ball possesses two advantages over the spherical one. It receives less resistance from the atmosphere, and it admits of a heavier ball being fired from a cannon of a given calibre. It is the combination of the twisted spherical bore and the conical ball that constitutes the Lancaster gun. This gun has been put to the test at Sebastopol, where it is asserted that it has thrown a ball of 95 pounds weight more than four miles.

THE SNAKE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THE RATTLESNAKE AND ITS CONGENERS.

OF all animated life, the serpent at first sight, is the most repulsive; and yet, with the species, there is such a combination of the beautiful, the terrible, and the mysterious, that the beholder, in spite of himself, is attracted by their appearance. The association of the animal with the fall of our first parents, no doubt, to the Christian mind, gives it a vague and undefined interest; but with all heathen nations, and from the remotest times, the serpent has occupied the most prominent place, not only as a deity, but as the fittest physical representative of spiritual qualities. Upon the earliest monuments of Egypt, Syria, Greece, India, China, and even on those of the conventionally newer nations of America—in fact, every where on the globe—it has ever been made typical of wisdom—power—duration—the good and evil principles, and of eternity. "It has entered into the mythology of every nation, consecrated almost every temple, symbolized almost every deity; was imagined in the heavens, stamped upon the earth, and ruled in the realms of everlasting sorrow." Moses lifted up a brazen serpent in the wilderness, and those afflicted who looked upon it lived, and thus it was made to shadow forth the mightiest event wrought for the redemption of mankind; yet why it has been thus universally used, seems impossible of solution. The ancients attempted various explanations, but all founded upon fabled qualities, for they evidently knew little of the natural history of the animal, and instead of describing the living, breathing thing, merely repeated and exaggerated those strange attributes ascribed to their deified representations.

The most striking hieroglyphs in which the serpent occurs are those of Egypt, and usually appear over the entrances of their great temples; these are composed of a pair of extended wings, a globe, and two serpents: the globe signified the simple essence, the wings the penetration of universal power, the serpents the life-giving principle. This expressive compound emblem has been found by Mr. Layard among the supposed ruins of Nineveh; it also occurs on Syrian and Persian temples. Aztec ruins in Mexico are still to be seen, composed of large stones, in which some particular layer is projected from the plain wall, and ingeniously sculptured so as to represent a huge snake encircling the edifice. Stone works of vast extent, in the forms of serpents, penetrated or surrounded the Druidical temples of the early Britons. Our own fertile valleys of the West are filled with tumular monuments, a mile in length, erected by the early inhabitants of this continent, representing pythons in every form, and displaying a perfect sympathy of intention with similar creations in the Eastern world.

Of the connection of the serpent with the temptation of Eve, we have heard a strange story related by an American traveler in Egypt, who was noted among his companions for his willingness to intrude upon out-of-the-way and admitted-to-be dangerous places. An Arab guide, perceiving this peculiarity, offered, for a consideration, to conduct him into the interior of one of the large pyramids, and show him a room, upon the walls of which was a picture no Frank had ever seen. The bargain was at once consummated, and the parties entered the structure, and after sliding down an inclined plane of some hundred feet, they came upon a large room, out of which led a narrow and half choked-up communication with an adjoining apartment. This apartment reached, the Arab lit his torches, and exposed to the astonished gaze of the traveler a painting, fresh as if the work of yesterday, representing a serpent with human arms and legs, handing an apple to an Egyptian woman; both figures relieved by the conventional trees peculiar to such early art. If this story be true—and we have no reason to doubt its authenticity—we have a pictorial representation of the Fall of Man, possibly more ancient than even the Mosaic account.

A large portion of the rings, necklaces, and bracelets found in ancient tombs are formed of single or combined serpents, beautifully variegated by different colors in gold, precious stones, and enamels; and the commonest form of household gods of the Mexicans and Peruvians was the same, and probably it was a favorite example of their finer jewelry. This emblem is also dug out of our western mounds, sculptured in fine basalt, and betraying a vast amount of labor and excellent art. As the light of Christian civilization dawned upon mankind, the mythological character of this form of life seems to have become more and more disregarded, until now it is only alluded to in such a connection as is indicative of the deplorable ignorance of early times—yet there is a taint left in our natures for the old superstition; for we still maintain, with the ancients, a predilection for ornaments of the serpent form; and we daily meet in the rich salons of Europe, and of our own country, fingers as delicate as Pharaoh's daughter's glistening with snaky rings, and arms more beautiful than Cleopatra's that are encircled by the golden asp.

Our object is not, however, to deal with the vague and often sublime fancies of the ancients regarding the serpent, but to treat of its history in the spirit of the age—when speculation gives way to truth, and the fables of times past are forgotten in the interesting facts brought forth by the naturalist and other close observer of the Creator's works. A general division of serpents may be made in the distinction which lies between those which kill by muscular pressure and those which destroy their prey by poison. The latter class are comparatively few in number, and may be considered exceptions to the general rule; for all boas, pythons, and most snakes, depend for their subsistence upon the power they possess of crushing their prey in enveloping folds. The assertion that most serpents in temperate climates are harmless, can not readily be assented to; for the Englishman, who has not a really dangerous specimen on his native island, shrinks from their presence with all the fear that he betrays when he meets with the really death-dealing cobras of the jungles of India; and it is remarkable, that Europeans residing in that country, soon become indifferent to the vicinity of the most destructive wild beasts of prey, but can never conquer their dread of snakes. The same thing may be said of the enlightened mind every where, for it recoils from the presence of serpent life.

RATTLESNAKE AND WILD CAT.

This terror is one of the most defined instincts of human nature, for it exists without having been founded upon any direful experience, and can not be overcome by reason; yet most serpents are beautiful, and in their adornment, combine with unequalled grace all the brilliant colors of the most precious mosaics. We knew an excellent artist who had a taste for natural history, and being favorably situated for gratifying a long-indulged wish, he determined to place upon canvas the gorgeous beauties of the rattlesnake. It so happened that while he was busied with the last touches upon a portrait of a lovely girl—was adding the rich carnations to the lips, the azure to her eyes, and the sunny auburn to a profusion of glowing locks, he received the announcement that a just killed rattlesnake was at his disposal. A few moments only elapsed before his sitters were changed. In place of all that was beautiful—in place of intelligence—in place of woman in her loveliest estate, there was reared the form, according to our instinctive ideas, of the most repulsive of created things. By a happy conception the serpent was arranged in a most natural attitude of defiance; its mouth was open, its fangs displayed, and the enthusiastic painter began his work. Soon by the aid of chalk the spiral and expressive form was produced upon the canvas; next was seized the pallet, the colors all beaming in flesh tints, the pencils still glowing with the imitating hues of Hebe; but all in their purity found a place upon the the serpent's form. The delicate pink, the softened carmine, the Tyrian blue, the deep auburn, were not only necessary, but just as they appeared in their clearness and purity, so did they most approach the original, and aid in starting forth a picture of horrid fascination. With the hand of genius the labor of an hour made the task complete—the effect was magically produced—a vivid, glowing lesson had been taught, that the things we love and worship in nature, or shrink from with terror, are but combinations of the same charming effects of form and color; and that in our own minds, and not in the outward things, is the beauty or hideousness that attracts or repels.

Serpents, says a distinguished naturalist, have been improperly regarded as animals degraded from a higher type; but their whole organization, and especially their bony structure, demonstrate that their parts are as exquisitely adjusted to their habits and sphere of life, as is the organization of any animal conventionally superior to them. Nothing can be more wonderful than to see the work of feet and fins performed by a modification of the vertebral column. As serpents move chiefly on the surface of the earth, their danger is greatest from pressure and blows from above; all the joints are fashioned, therefore, to resist yielding, and sustain pressure in a vertical direction; there is no natural undulation of the body upward and downward—it is only permitted from side to side. The serpent, simple as it is in form, can, by the wonderful wisdom displayed in its creation, outswim the fish, outleap the jerboa, and suddenly loosing the close coils of its couching spiral, it can spring into the air and seize the bird upon the wing; for all these creatures have been known to fall its prey. The serpent, without arms or talons, can outwrestle the athlete, and crush the tiger in the embrace of its ponderous overlapping folds; and instead of being obliged to lick up its food as it glides along, it uplifts its crushed prey to its mouth, grasped in the death-coil as in a hand.

There are properly no sea snakes, although we hear much of sea serpents. Most snakes swim well in water, but they must have their head out to breathe, else they will drown about as soon as the lower orders of most land animals. Eels are not snakes, and most people are conscious of the fact; yet few can tell the distinguishing traits of difference between them and the reptile ashore: the eel has a flat tail, erect as an oar, the snake has a round one. Yet the sea, it would seem, is not altogether free from serpentine life that will vie for poison with the rattlesnake itself. In Haydon's extraordinary autobiography, there is a singular incident related, illustrative of our position. Her Majesty's brig Algerine, was at anchor in Madras Roads, when one of the marines hooked and brought on board what was evidently taken for an eel. A young officer of the brig, Haydon's step-son, took the animal in his hand, which irritated it, and it seized hold of the young man's fore-finger, and held the skin doubled up between its teeth until forced to let go its hold. This occurred at half past seven in the morning. The bitten man held the occurrence lightly, and went down to breakfast, but soon after felt some uneasiness in his throat, which quickly began to swell, and the patient, although attended by two physicians, died in just three hours after receiving the wound. Soon after death the neck was discolored, the body spotted, and it was found necessary to hasten the burial. The snake (so called), was six feet six inches in length, general color yellow, ornamented with forty-three black rings equidistant, its circumference eighteen inches in the largest part, its tail projecting vertically, flat or compressed, which shows that it was a native of the sea. It had three rows of teeth, but no fangs could be discovered.

We are accustomed to say that the serpent swallows its food; this is true in a general sense, but not so, if we understand the act as applied to animals of a higher organization. A boa attempting to bury a buffalo in its capacious maw, or a little garter snake disposed to do the same favor for a juvenile frog, does not let the precious but very different sized morsels tremble for a moment on their palates, and then disappear; on the contrary, after the meal is prepared, the bulk may be many times larger in diameter than the apparent size of the jaws and throat that are to receive them. But no difficulty is in the way; the jaws of the serpent not only separate, if necessary, from each other—being held together only by cartilaginous ligament—but they also have the power of protruding or retracting them, one independently of the other. By this arrangement, one side of the jaws is extended forward, and the two rows of teeth of the upper, and the single row of the lower fixed into the prey; then the opposite side of the jaws is pushed on in the same manner, and so on alternately, until the mass disappears.

I took a good deal of trouble (says a recent traveler in Ceylon) to inquire the size of the boa-python of that country; but though I heard of several that, within the memory or tradition of men had been killed, measuring thirty feet, I never heard that size exceeded; but this by no means proves that their growth is limited to that length, or that they may not exist in large numbers. Game of all kinds is so plentiful in Ceylon that the boa need never be forced into the neighborhood of man to procure food. In India I know, from eye-witnesses, of their being killed forty-five feet long, and six feet in circumference; and the one killed in the Sunderbund some years ago, was credibly reported to be sixty feet; moreover, in proof that this need not be an exaggeration, we may remember, that the snake that stopped the army of Attilius Regulus in the river Bagroda, was one hundred and twenty feet in length, and that its skeleton was preserved in Rome until within some three or four centuries.

Boas, however, of most promising proportions, occasionally visit the scenes of civilization. A perfectly authenticated story is told of an officer residing in British Guiana, who amused himself in fishing and hunting in a neighboring river. One sultry day, tired with unsuccessful sport, he threw his lines, and drew his canoe to the river's edge, for the purposes of refreshing himself in the water. Having done so, he stretched himself, half dressed, on the benches of his canoe, with his gun at his head loaded with shot, and in this position he fell asleep. Presently he was roused from his slumber by a curious sensation, as if some animal were licking his foot. In a state of half stupor, natural to waking from a sound sleep, he cast his eyes downward, and, to his horror, perceived the neck and head of a monstrous serpent, covering his foot with saliva, preparatory to commencing the process of swallowing him whole. The officer had faced death in many forms—on the ocean—in the battle-field, but never had he conceived of it in such terrible guise. For a moment, and but a moment, the officer was fascinated, and then withdrawing his foot, he instinctively seized his gun lying beside him.

The reptile, apparently disturbed, for it had evidently mistaken the officer for a dead carcass, drew its head below the canoe. It rose again, moving backward and forward, as if in search of the object it had lost. The officer, with the muzzle of his gun within a yard or two of the serpent, fired, lodging the contents in its head. The terrible boa, with a hiss, raised its heretofore unseen body in the air, and seemed determined to throw itself upon the officer and embrace him in its powerful coils. A fortunate stroke of the paddle sent the canoe into the stream and to a place of safety. Having procured assistance, the officer returned to the place of attack; and having killed the reptile, found it upward of forty feet in length and of proportionate thickness.

Another officer in the British service, stationed with his regiment in the neighborhood of Kalladgee, in India—a region in which monkeys abound in numberless quantities—professes to have been a witness to the following extraordinary scene:

He was one day, accompanied by a native as a companion, climbing one of the slanting ascents of a neighboring cliff, when he became aware that an unusual commotion existed among the monkeys, which had become so familiar with the officer's appearance, that they seldom honored him with a snarl or any other expression of dislike. Creeping round the projection of a rock, behind which the monkeys seemed to have congregated, the officer became a witness of a strange tragedy in simian life. In the voluminous folds of an enormous boa was being slowly enwrapped a beautiful brown monkey, whose last cries and struggles denoted that all succor was too late. The surrounding monkeys, in wild alarm, were running hither and thither, moping, moaning, and chattering, but not one advanced near the spot where their poor companion was momentarily disappearing in the dread folds of its destroyer. The officer, whose curiosity was highly excited, sat down, and determined to watch the serpent prepare its food for deglutition. The bones of the poor victim were broken like pipe stems by the pressure to which they were subjected; and gradually the reptile began to untwist its folds, affording a magnificent view of its glittering scales, which shone like variegated metallic substances. The officer shuddered as he beheld the serpent's head—its prominent eyes luminous with fiery light. Perfectly heedless of the noise made by the monkeys, it unwound its coils till the victim, now an unrecognizable mass, lay before it lubricated and fit to be received into the destroyer's stomach. When the reptile had fairly commenced its repast, and before the flaccid body began to fill and swell, the officer, with the assistance of his companion, the native, determined upon capturing the soon to be sated giant. Accompanied by the stout lascar, bearing a strong cudgel and sharp knife, the officer felt there would be little difficulty in securing the prize when once filled to repletion. But upon nearing the scene of strife a new subject of admiration presented itself. The constrictor lay thoroughly gorged, beneath a projecting mass of the cliff, and resembled more a log of wood than a thing of life. On the summit of this projecting rock a troop of monkeys had assembled, and three or four of the largest and strongest were occupied in displacing an immense fragment of the massive stone, already loosened by time and the elements, from the parent ledge. By enormous exertions—made in a silence that was rare with the volatile creatures—they at last succeeded in pushing the rock until it trembled just over the boa's head; when, uttering a fierce yell, in which every separate voice mingled in exultation, by a vigorous movement they shoved it over the precipice. The heavy mass had been judiciously poised, for it struck the serpent on the head, mashing it to a jelly, and as the reptile threw its fearful tail about in its last struggles, the officer and native instinctively joined in the cries of exultation of the monkeys, as they rejoiced over their well-accomplished vengeance.

Snake-charming is a trade in Eastern countries, and the secrets connected with carrying it on are carefully handed down from father to son, although its professors insist that they inherit from nature their singular power. The practice is known to be very ancient. The earliest notice of the mystery is in the Psalms, where we find an allusion to the "voice of the charmers." There is a practical benefit derived by the people of the East, from the occupation of these men, in their bringing from concealed hiding-places poisonous serpents that infest private houses and gardens, which the charmer does with great effect. It has been the care of many intelligent Europeans to satisfy themselves that the natives were honest and used no deception. A missionary of India states, that some incredulous persons, after the most minute and careful precaution against artifice of any kind, sent a charmer into the garden. The man began playing with his pipe, and for some minutes proceeded from one part of the garden to another; he finally stopped near a wall much injured by time, and declared that a serpent was within the ruins. He then played quicker, and his notes were louder; when almost immediately a large cobra put forth its hooded head, and the man fearlessly ran to the spot, seized it by the throat, and drew it forth; he then showed the fangs, beat them out, and placed it among the rest of his serpents confined in his basket.

Layard, while encamped in the vicinity of his "favorite ruins," states, that a snake-charmer, with his son, a boy of seven years old, one afternoon came to his tents, and exhibited his tricks in the midst of a circle of astonished beholders. The exhibitor first pulled from a bag a number of snakes knotted together, which the by-standers declared to be a venomous kind. The child took the reptiles fearlessly from his father, and placing them in his bosom, allowed them to twine around his naked neck and arms. The Bedouins present gazed in mute wonder at the proceedings; but when the Sheikh, feigning rage against one of the snakes which had drawn blood from his son, seized it, and biting off its head with his teeth threw the writhing body among them, they could no longer restrain their horror and indignation, but uttered loud curses upon the infidel snake-charmer and upon his kindred to the remotest generation.

An affecting story is told of an European family residing in Saint Domingo, in which an only child was sacrificed by a snake, through the arts of a petted slave. The negro was a favorite with his master's household, but in spite of this became involved in one of those deep conspiracies that characterized the early history of the West Indian Islands. In the dead hour of night, the slaves from the adjoining plantations met in the forest to concoct their insurrectionary plans, and expose and punish any of their members who had shown any reluctance to carry out their designs for the destruction of the whites. The slave we have alluded to was suspected by his confederates of undue affection for his young mistress, and it was whispered that, in a general rising, he would make an effort to save the innocent child from massacre. This supposed humanity on the part of the slave was pronounced treason in its worst form; and the suspected conspirator, on pain of death to himself, was ordered, before the next meeting, to destroy his young mistress, as a proof that he was not a traitor in heart. The negro—the confidential servant of his master and the inmate of the household—accomplished his purpose without attracting to himself the least suspicion. Hunting up the nest of a pair of deadly snakes, every where to be found in tropical climates, with those arts peculiar to all semi-savage minds, he enticed them into the garden and familiarized them with the vicinity of the house. His plans being perfected, he announced to his master and mistress that he had reason to believe that there was a deadly reptile lodged in the vicinity. A large reward was offered for its destruction, and in two or three days the negro brought the female to the house, laid it upon the front steps, and received the congratulations of the family for his faithful devotion. The moment he was unobserved, he dragged the dead carcass of the snake into the house, thrust it through the lattice-work that divided the sleeping chambers from the parlors, and then, opening the door of the sleeping room, trailed the venomous body across the empty couch of his young mistress, and concluded by depositing it in a coil under the sheets and in the very centre of the bed. All this being done, he next enveloped the body of the snake in some broad leaves, hid it about his person, and unobserved escaped into the open air.

At midnight, when every door was opened, and every lattice turned up to admit the refreshing breeze denied during the day—when all were wrapped in profound slumber, the surviving snake was searching for its lost mate. Gradually it approached the dwelling, for it was on the trail, climbed up the door-steps, glanced inquiringly about, as fresh evidences of final success seemed to dawn upon it, and then it stealthily entered the parlor; straight across the floor it moved, penetrated the lattice, and mounted the couch. The trail was now warm, and led the snake under the clothes; the innocent occupant of the couch brushed the intruder aside, and in another instant the deadly fangs of the frustrated and angry serpent were buried deeply in her bosom. The victim sighed heavily, for the deep sleep of a tropical climate was upon her, and she slumbered on, to waken no more in this troubled life, and to present to her fond parents in the coming morn, instead of a sweet, doting, intelligent child, an offensive mass—the most terrible form of death.

The Southern negroes will never kill a snake, giving as a reason, that it will cause them "bad luck." This idea is evidently traditional with them, brought by their ancestors from Africa. Many of them also appear to have the power, if cultivated, of charming snakes; for, if so disposed, they will handle any snake they come across with impunity. A physician of Louisiana, who had a desire to study the habits of the rattlesnake, kept a number in a cage, and, for fear of accident, had it placed in the distant corner of a large room in which he slept. It was the doctor's custom, on his return home at night, to take a glance at the reptiles, to assure himself that they had been properly cared for through the day, and also to see if the door of the cage was securely fastened. One night, having come home very late and much fatigued, he neglected his usual precautions, and at once retired. The weather was exceedingly hot, and, notwithstanding his exhaustion, several hours glided away without his obtaining any sleep. Suddenly he heard a light sliding noise along the floor, and cautiously looked out to learn the cause. The moonlight was shining full into the room, and to his horror he discovered the largest of his snakes roaming free about the room. What was to be done? A loaded gun was at the farthest end of the room—but was this the only serpent out of the cage? Were all the rest at liberty? The whole household being asleep, the doctor concluded it was better to wait until morning, taking the precaution to tuck his mosquito bar with extra care around his bed, and thus imprisoned, he impatiently watched the issue. The snake continued his travels, finally approached the bed, and all became silent.

At daylight the doctor heard the steps of his body-servant, who was coming, according to custom, to perform his morning duty. The doctor cried out to him not to open the door, but to go for an old African negro, named Isaac, who was known to approach all snakes without fear. The negro came, and entered upon his task confidently, and after a moment or two found the cause of the alarm quietly sleeping under the bed. The other snakes were in the cage, although the door was open. The doctor insisted upon the negro's shooting the snake, but he flatly refused, and declared himself able to seize the animal without the least fear of being bitten by him. Advancing toward the bed, he commenced whistling and pronouncing soothing words, in the same manner as the snake-charmers of India; after some minutes he ventured to pass his hands over the back of the snake, all the time using soothing sounds: finally, he lifted up the snake's head, and induced it to repose upon his bended arm and body—the snake suffering all this without betraying the least fright or emotion.

The doctor, agitated for the safety of his servant, and wishing the matter to end, desired the negro to put the snake in the cage. This Isaac said was impossible for him to do; and upon the negro approaching the prison-house, the snake, as if conscious of his purpose, immediately erected its head in anger, and sprang its rattle. Whereupon Isaac walked in another direction, began his incantations, and the reptile was soon calm. He then asked for a sheet, and by degrees accustomed the snake to its sight, and then passed one edge of it between his arm and the animal's body, continuing his wheedling and walking about all the time. As soon as he was certain that he could envelop the reptile in the sheet, he rapidly threw it around him, and the snake was mastered. By a series of skillful movements he got the snake back into his old quarters, without having received the slightest injury, and thus the adventure terminated; the negro, however, declaring that he could never again charm that snake, because he had used his power to deceive it.

The gentleman who relates the above incident is authority for another, that came very near a tragical termination. A hunter of his acquaintance used to amuse himself, whenever he met with a fine specimen of a rattlesnake, with endeavoring to catch it alive. This he was enabled, after much experience, to do by means of a long stick, cleft at the end, with which he was accustomed to seize the reptiles by the back of the head. One day, as he was posted some distance from his friends, watching for deer, he perceived a large rattlesnake, which he seized in his favorite manner, and then, after placing his fingers firmly behind the reptile's head, he amused himself by opening its mouth, in order to examine its teeth and fangs. In the mean time the snake, quite unnoticed by the imprudent hunter, who was entirely absorbed in his examination of the creature's head, had twisted its body in numerous folds around his arm. Little by little he was conscious of a slight pressure, accompanied by an alarming numbness in the member. The hunter immediately attempted to disengage his arm. At the same time he felt conscious that his power to do so was every instant lessening, and he had the additional horror to feel that his fingers were becoming powerless to retain their hold. At last the head of the animal began to draw near the palm of his hand, and the hunter gave himself up for lost, when fortunately one of his companions at an adjoining "stand" heard the cries of distress, and most opportunely arrived, armed, as is common in the Southern forests, with a bottle of ammonia. The cork was hastily pulled, and the contents poured into the reptile's mouth. Instantly the frightful scene was changed; the animal in agony unrolled, and fell harmless to the ground, and with a successful blow its head was separated from its body.

Although it is disputed by most naturalists that snakes have the power of fascination, yet to us it seems as if nothing relating to their natural history is more fully substantiated. People living in crowded cities, who receive from abroad "specimens" preserved in alcohol and bottled, or write dissertations from examinations of the "stuffed skin," must feel assured, from what they see before them, that the power of fascination is a fable; and as doubting is a safe form of unbelief, it is freely expressed. The rattlesnake, nevertheless, as certainly has an eye of command as had Napoleon; and the power of the reptile's gaze is not only acknowledged by the humbler class of animals, but man, with all his superior powers, has felt the thrill of helplessness pass through his soul, as he beheld that mysterious eye glaring full upon him. Approach a rattlesnake, and with the first convenient thing dash out its brains, but dare not to make a close examination of the death-dealing object before you; if its spiral motions once find a response in the music tune-markings of your own mind—if you look into those strange orbs, that seem to be the openings into another world—if that forked tongue plays in your presence, until you find it is as vivid as the lightning's flash, and the meanwhile the hum of those rattles begins to confuse your absorbed senses—you will be conscious of some terrible danger; that you stand upon some dread precipice; that your blood is starting back from your heart; and you can only break through the charm with an effort, that requires the whole of your resolution.

A well authenticated story is told of a Mr. Rowe, of Philadelphia, who was riding out one morning to visit a friend, when his horse refused to go forward, being terrified at a large rattlesnake that lay across the road. Mr. Rowe believed in the power of snakes to charm, and alighting from his horse attempted to lead the animal around the object of terror. The snake meanwhile coiled itself up, sounded its rattle, and stared its enemy full in the face, and with such fire in its eyes that Mr. Rowe felt the cold sweat break out upon him, and he was conscious that he neither had the power to retreat or advance. However, his reason remained, and getting the better of his alarm, he suddenly approached the reptile, and with one stroke of his cudgel knocked out its brains.

The food of the rattlesnake, it is to be observed, is in a great measure composed of small animals or birds superior to it in fleetness, and it has no power to seize its prey except when it is coiled up, and consequently incapable of giving chase. In addition, the reptile, when attempting to seize its prey, emits a strong odor, which no doubt has a stupefying effect upon the victim. Now, as the rattlesnake never steals upon any object, and is perfectly incapable of seizing its food, except when it is coiled up and stationary, how would it ever obtain subsistence, if nature had not given it the power to attract its prey within its deadly reach? On one occasion we were hunting over an old cotton-field, when we perceived a large rattlesnake coiled up under a tree, upon the limb of which, perhaps six feet above, was a small hawk. The reptile was in a high state of excitement; its head waved to and fro, and otherwise indicated the phenomenon of charming. Without hesitation we discharged the contents of our gun, and literally cut the creature to flinders; at the same instant the hawk fell heavily to the ground, and so helpless, that we thought a scattering shot had struck it. In a moment, however, the hawk commenced fluttering and rolling on the grass, as if suffering from intoxication; gradually it recovered the use of its wings, and screaming with terror, passed beyond our sight.

But this power of fascination is not confined to the rattlesnake; it is peculiar to the species. How far the popular stories we meet with in the newspapers are critically correct, it is difficult to decide; but they are all founded in truth, and are characteristic of the mysterious influence under consideration. An English paper recently published the following incident:

"A little boy, who was known to be frequently absent from school, was noticed in the neighborhood of Privet, by a shepherd, to be very busily engaged in the wood. The shepherd approached nearer, and was surprised to see the boy feeding two adders! The child having crumbled his bread in his satchel, spread it out in his cap, and the adders came and ate the food, picking up the crumbs with great dexterity. After feeding the snakes, the little fellow lay down upon the ground and played with his strange favorites, all three seeming to enjoy the sport. But if the little urchin rejoiced in their company the shepherd did not, for with much difficulty he killed the reptiles, to the great distress of their little playmate, who wept bitterly at their destruction."

The most extraordinary story of snake fascination was recently related by a St. Louis paper* of a black snake seven feet six inches long, and a young girl thirteen years of age, which resulted in a fearful tragedy. The father of the child lived in Franklin County, Missouri. The fact was first noticed, that the young girl from perfect health, began to decline, and finally wasted away to a mere skeleton. On the arrival of the spring she could not be prevailed upon to eat in the house, but insisted upon taking her bread and meat to the banks of a neighboring creek. The neighbors having heard of the child's extraordinary conduct, and also of her wasted appearance, suggested to her father to watch her movements, which was done on a succeeding Friday. The child had been sitting on the bank of the creek nearly all the forenoon until near dinner time, when she got up, went to the house, asked for a piece of bread and butter, and again returned to her place of watching. The father stealthily followed the child, and to his horror saw a huge black snake slowly raise its head into the child's lap, and receive the bread and butter from her hand; and when she would attempt to take a bite of the bread, the snake would become very angry, when the child, trembling like a leaf, would promptly return the food to the monster. The father was completely paralyzed, not being able to move hand or foot; the blood fairly clogged in his veins, and he groaned in agony. This caused the snake to become alarmed, and it glided away into the creek and disappeared. Upon being questioned, the child refused, or appeared incapable of giving any answers. It was finally determined that the child should go again the next day, and that the snake should thus be allured ashore and killed. The next morning the child took the bread to the creek as usual, and the moment the monster made its appearance, the father, who was on the watch, fired and shot it through the head. The child swooned, the snake writhed about and died; the child recovered, and swooned and recovered, and swooned, and finally died, seeming in the greatest agony. Upon the facts the editor says: "This horrible, and at the same time melancholy occurrence, is the first we have heard of for a long time, and in fact the first we ever knew of where we could positively vouch for its truthful correctness. We know that there are persons who doubt the reality of such fascination, but if they entertain any doubts on this subject hereafter, the relations of this unfortunate little girl can be found ready and willing to corroborate our statement."

With the rattlesnake the excitement of charming is positively necessary to prepare the animal to take its food. Nature seems to have provided this strange peculiarity to call the salivary glands into action, and soften the muscles of the throat so as to give them the elasticity necessary for swallowing. A gentleman who had a large rattlesnake confined in a cage, after it had fasted for some months, gave it a half-grown rat. To his surprise the snake took no notice of the intruder, and in a few hours they were living on peaceable terms. The rat ate its food with relish, and paid no attention to its disagreeable neighbor. After some two or three weeks the gentleman had his attention attracted to the cage by warlike sounds, and looking in, to his surprise he discovered the snake coiled up in the attitude of defiance, its head waving to and fro, its eyes glistening with anger, and its rattle making a continued hum. The rat, meanwhile, as if conscious of its doom, exhibited every symptom of terror, and yet constantly approached its enemy. The reptile having finally prepared itself for the fatal blow, darted with lightning rapidity upon the poor quadruped, and soon engulfed it in its capacious throat. This example is satisfactory, that the snake, as we have already suggested, is obliged to go through the excitement attendant upon what is termed charming, to be able to take its food; for it could at any time, for weeks previous, and without ceremony, have snapped up the rat as it lay all the day long sleeping upon the floor of the cage.

A Southern gentleman, who took a great deal of interest in the habits of rattlesnakes, mentions that a negro once brought him one and offered it for sale. To show the size and beauty of the creature, he took it out of the small wooden box in which it was confined, and fearlessly let the serpent loose upon the ground. The reptile began to glide in a sinuous, undulating, but gentle course along the veranda. Seeing it approach the limits of the adjoining premises, the negro was ordered to bring the reptile back. Obeying the injunction, the man immediately recaptured the snake, which he effected by applying his fingers to the back of its head. The gentleman, upon examining the snake attentively, discovered two long and terrible fangs projecting from the upper jaw, which he had understood the negro to say had been extracted. The negro, upon being told of the danger he ran in seizing the snake with his naked hand, replied, "that there was never any danger when the snake was not coiled up and prepared for a spring."

Audubon, to prove that serpents can not fascinate, relates that he had a rattlesnake and a thrush confined in a large cage—so large, indeed, that the bird easily escaped out of the reach of the monster. For a long while the snake made vain attempts to catch its prey, and finally only succeeded by lying down close to the cup of water, and there waiting for the bird. The thrush showed great uneasiness, and would dash at the water and then retreat; it finally, as the great ornithologist thinks, fell a prey to its enemy while endeavoring to quench its thirst. Our conclusion is, that the snake never possessed intelligence enough to go through the complicated argument that the thrush must come to the cup of water or perish with thirst; on the contrary, the snake being near the water was an accident, and the bird, instead of dashing down to drink, was really in the toils of the charmer, and vainly struggling to make its escape.

Rattlesnakes have their antipathies, and those known, are very strongly marked. In Texas, particularly between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, the largest rattlesnakes in the world exist, and at certain seasons of the year it is quite dangerous to "camp out" without due precaution. The inhabitants have many devices to protect themselves, but the most simple is encircling the place of bivouac with the long horse-hair halter. The snakes will never cross this magic circle. In more northern latitudes, it has been found that the rattlesnake will not live where the white ash grows in abundance. It has even been the practice among hunters who traverse the forests in summer, to stuff their boots, moccasins, and pockets with white ash leaves, for the purpose of securing themselves against the snakes; and it is said that no person was ever bitten who resorted to this specific.

Judge Woodruff, formerly a resident of Ohio, relates that he was with a small party on the Mahoning river for the purpose of deer hunting. The party took their station on an elevated spot, fifteen or twenty yards from the water's edge. Here the men watched for their wished-for game; and while they were waiting, they saw a large rattlesnake, which had crawled out from among the rocks beneath them, and was slowly making his way across a narrow, smooth sand-bank toward the river. Upon hearing the voices of the men, the snake halted, and lay stretched out with his head near the water.

"It was now determined to try ash leaves. Accordingly search was made, and a small white ash sapling, eight or ten feet long, was procured; and, with a view to make the experiment more satisfactory, another sapling of maple was cut. In order to prevent the snake's retreat to his den, the Judge approached him in his rear, and when he had advanced within eight feet of him, the snake coiled up his body, elevated his head several inches, brandishing his tongue, and thus signified his readiness for battle. The Judge then presented his white ash wand, placing the leaves upon the body of the snake. The reptile instantly dropped his head upon the ground, unfolded his coil, rolled over upon his back, twitched and twisted his whole body in every form but that of a coil, and gave signs of being in great agony. The white ash was then laid by, upon which the snake immediately placed himself in a coil, and assumed the attitude of defense as before. The sugar-maple stick was next used; the snake darted forward in a twinkling, thrust his head 'with all the malice of the under fiends,' and the next moment coiled and lanced again, darting his whole length with the swiftness of an arrow. After repeating this several times, says the Judge, I changed his fare, and presented him the white ash. He immediately doused his peak, stretched himself on his back, and writhed his body in the same manner as at the first application.

"It was then proposed to try what effect might be produced upon his temper and courage by a little flogging with the white ash. This was administered, but, instead of arousing him to resentment, proved only to increase his troubles. As the flogging grew more severe, the snake frequently stack his head into the sand as far as he could thrust it, and seemed desirous to bore into the earth and rid himself of his unwelcome visitors. Being now convinced that the experiment was a satisfactory one, and fairly conducted on both sides, we deemed it ungenerous to take his life after he had contributed so much to gratify our curiosity; and so we took our leave of the rattlesnake with feelings as friendly at least as those with which we commenced our acquaintance with him, and left him to return at leisure to his den."

The rattlesnake excites a great deal of alarm in the deer, and it is seldom that the buck will let it escape without giving battle. Their manner of attack is very curious and effective. The buck trots around the rattlesnake for some time, seemingly disposed to confuse the reptile, and then suddenly starting off will make a tremendous sweep, and coming near the snake will gather its four sharp hoofs into a point, and then springing eight or ten feet in the air, will land directly upon the coils of the snake, and then separating its feet with wonderful quickness and force, if the assault has been successful, the snake is cut into shreds.

Combats between the rattle and black snakes are certain if they meet, and the black snake is, with rare exceptions, the conqueror. Upon seeing each other, these animals instantly assume their respective attitudes of defiance, and display the great difference in their organization. The rattlesnake coils itself up, ready for attack or defense; the black snake, being a constrictor, moves about from side to side, and is in constant activity—mutually exciting each others passions. The rattlesnake finally settles down into a glowing exhibition of animosity, its head thrown back, its fangs exposed, its rattles in constant agitation. The black snake, seemingly conscious that the moment of strife has come, now commences circling round its enemy, absolutely moving so swiftly that it seems but a gleam of dull light; the rattlesnake attempts to follow the movement, but soon becomes confused, and drops its head in despair: then it is that the black snake darts upon the back of the neck of its deadly foe, seizes it between its teeth, and springing upward, envelops the rattlesnake in its folds. The struggle, though not long, is painful: the combatants roll over in the dust, get entangled in the bushes; but every moment the black snake is tightening its hold, until the rattlesnake gasps for breath, becomes helpless, and dies. For a while the black snake still retains its grasp; you can perceive its muscles working with constant energy; but finally, it cautiously uncoils itself, and quietly betakes to the water, where recovering its energy, it dashes about a moment as if in exultation, and disappears from the scene.

Of all enemies with which the rattlesnake has to contend, except man, the hog is the most destructive. An old sow with a litter of pigs to provide food for, will hunt for the reptile with a perseverance and sagacity truly astonishing, tracking them by their scent to their hiding-places, and never letting them escape. In the West in early times, and now throughout the country, if rattlesnakes become troublesome in any locality, a drove of hogs are turned into their haunts, and the snakes soon disappear. The hog, when it sees a rattlesnake, instantly erects its bristles and back, and commences rattling its tusks. The snake accepts the challenge, and prepares for defense. The old porker seems to understand what parts of its body are invulnerable to poison, so it gets down upon its knees, and in this awkward position deliberately crawls, by a sideling motion, up to the enemy. The snake darts forward, and the hog dextrously catches the fangs in the fat that swells out the jaws—the blow is repeated, and the hog having been smitten on one cheek deliberately turns the other. This the animal continues to do until the snake has not only exhausted for the time being, its poison, but also its strength. The hog then deliberately rises from its knees, and now, regardless of consequences, seizes the serpent near the head, and putting its fore-foot upon its squirming body, strips the reptile through its teeth, and thus tears it to pieces. If the hog, as is sometimes the case, happens to be very lean, and the poison fangs thereby strike the circulation, it will die from the wound, but this conjunction rarely takes place.

In the fall the rattlesnake seeks a secure place in which to hide during the cold months of the year, and they have been found in large numbers entwined together, in a torpid state, and while in this condition they are comparatively harmless. In warm climates the rattlesnake trusts to the heat of the atmosphere for the development of its young in the egg, although it would seem that, in extreme northern climates, the production of the egg is followed by the instant appearance of the young breaking from the membranous shell.

The poison of the rattlesnake, and the remarkable machinery with which it is injected into the wound, have always been subjects of philosophical interest. It is only recently, that a gentleman prepared by education, and dictated by the true spirit, has given his attention to this subject, and he has unfolded to the world many interesting facts, and added to the cause of humanity.* From the gentleman referred to we learn, that during a sojourn of two or three months in the interior of Arkansas, which appears to be the paradise of these reptiles, he discovered four distinct varieties of the rattlesnake, the species including the largest serpents of North America.

Upon dissection, the Doctor found that the poisoning apparatus of all serpents was similar. It consists of a strong frame-work of bone, with its appropriate muscles in the upper part of the head, resembling and being in fact a pair of jaws, but externally to the jaws proper, and much stronger. To these are attached one or more movable fangs on each side, just at the verge of the mouth, and capable of being erected at pleasure.

The fangs are very hard, sharp, and crooked, like the claws of a cat, and hooked backward, with a hollow from the base to near the point. At the base of these fangs is found a small sack, containing two or three drops of venom, which resembles clear honey. The sack is so connected with the cavity of the fang during its erection, that a slight upward pressure forces the venom into the fang, and from which it makes its exit with considerable force. The rattlesnake does not bite, but throws its fangs forward with tremendous force, literally hitching them as hooks into the destined victim, and in the rude assault the poison is driven into the wound with the rapidity of lightning, and unerring as is always the shaft of death. Unless the fangs are erected for battle, they lie concealed in the upper part of the mouth, sunk between the internal and external jaws, something like a pen-knife blade shut in its handle. These fangs are frequently broken off and replaced by new ones, the rudiments of which always appear on careful examination.

The incidents that follow are so interesting, that we give them in Dr. Gilman's own language:

"During the process of robbing several species of serpents, I inoculated several small but vigorous and perfectly healthy vegetables with the point of a lancet, well charged with venom. The next day they were withered and dead, looking as though they had been seathed with lightning. In attempting to preserve a few drops of venom, for future experiments, in a small vial with two or three parts of alcohol, it was found in a short time to have lost its venomous properties. But after mixing the venom with aqua ammonia, or spirits of turpentine, or oil of peppermint, or of cinnamon, or of cloves, or with nitric or sulphuric acid, it still seemed to act with undiminished energy. It is best preserved, however, for future use, by trituration with refined sugar or sugar-of-milk.

"A very fine, large cotton-mouth snake, being captured, by tying a shoe-string around him, he became excessively ferocious, striking at even the crack of a small riding-whip. Finding himself a prisoner, without hope of escape, he turned his deadly weapons on his own body, striking repeatedly his well-charged fangs deeply into his flesh. Notwithstanding this, he was put in a small basket, and carried forward. In one hour after he was found dead, and no amount of irritation could excite the least indication of life. Four hours after, while removing the skin for preservation, the blood oozed slowly from the vessels in a dissolved state. No violence was done to his snakeship except what he did to himself.

"A large rattlesnake, beheaded instantly with a hoe, would, an hour after, strike any thing that pinched its tail. Of several persons who were testing their firmness of nerve by trying to hold the hand steady while the serpent struck at it, not one could be found whose hand would not recoil in spite of his resolution; and one man—a great bully, by-the-by—was struck on the naked throat with considerable force by the headless trunk of the serpent, and staggered back, fainted, and fell from terror. Mr. Stewart, of Mississippi, tells me he once witnessed a singular scene. An old hunter shot a rattlesnake's head off, and after reloading his gun and standing some time, he stooped to pull off the rattle, and the bloody but headless trunk of the snake struck him in the temple, and he fainted and fell down with terror.

"Seven venomous serpents, belonging to five different species, were made to fraternize and dwell amicably in one den. A beautiful pair of long-bodied speckled snakes, known as king-snakes, found to be fangless, and consequently without venom, were duly installed as members of the family. Some uneasiness was perceivable among the older members, but no attempt was made to destroy the intruders, though they might have been killed instantly. The next morning four of the venomous serpents were found to have been destroyed by the king-snakes, and one was still within their coil, and the two remaining ones would make no effort at self-defense. A large rattlesnake seemed stupid and indifferent to his fate. He could not be made to threaten or give warning even with his rattles. The smallest king-snake was afterward inoculated with the poison of one of the serpents he had destroyed, and died immediately after—thus evincing that they must have exercised some power besides physical force to overcome their fellow-creatures."

The vitality of the snake is a matter of observation with all acquainted with its habits. The negroes of the plantations say that one never dies—no matter how much "killed"—until after sundown. Some flat-boatmen on one occasion captured a large black snake in the Tallahatchie river, and put it in a cage for the sake of amusing themselves with its struggles to escape. Accidentally finding a mole, about the size of a mouse, they put "the groundling" into the snake's cage. The reptile at once gulped it down, but the mole, making no difference between the sides of its prison-house and the solid earth, much to the astonishment of the flat-boatmen, ate its way out of the snake's side; whereupon it was swallowed again, and again gnawed its way into daylight. The snake, getting a dinner under difficulties, once more titillated its throat with the oft-repeated morsel, but with no more success of keeping it on its stomach than the Irishman had with the emetic. The fourth time, the snake vainly attempted to engulf its dinner, but was too much exhausted, and gave it up as an impossible job. The mole, so well calculated to make its way through the world, was put on shore as a reward for its bravery; and, if it ever thinks at all, must be very much amused at its adventures with the flat-boatmen on the roaring river of the sunny land of Florida.

Extraordinary stories are told of the time that the poison of the rattlesnake—so subtle that it destroys vegetable as well as animal life—will remain active upon the fang. A naturalist preserved the skin of the snake, with the mouth open and the fangs exposed. After a time—many months—it ceased to be valued, and was carelessly left uncared-for in the house. One dark evening a member of the family stepped upon something, and felt a slight puncture at the bottom of the foot. In the course of a few hours alarming symptoms were visible, and the patient was pronounced to have been bitten by a rattlesnake. Upon examination, the effigy was found on the floor, crushed as if by some heavy weight, with one of the fangs broken off. A still more curious anecdote, which seems authentic, is related of a farmer, who came home from the woods, and, without being aware of the cause, became fatally sick: after a few hours he died, every one pronouncing the case one of active poison. Very many years afterward a son of the deceased, now grown up, appropriated to himself his father's boots. At night, upon going to bed, he was taken very sick, and after a few hours died; when it was remembered that the symptoms were the same as those of the father. Upon examination of the boots, a rattlesnake fang was found driven into the leather just above the heel, and broken off so as not to be observable on the outside, and yet pointing down in the interior, in such a manner that, in drawing off the boot, the fang would inflict a slight wound.

At the commencement of our Revolution the rattlesnake held quite a conspicuous place in the imaginative minds of many of our patriotic fathers, as a fit emblem for our national flag; and hence the reptile assumed, for the time being, an historical interest. One of the pleasantest essays ever written by old Ben Franklin was in support of this proposition. In Congress, on the 9th of February, 1776, Colonel Gadsden presented "an elegant standard, such as was used by the commander-in-chief of the American navy, being a yellow field with a lively representation of a rattlesnake in the middle in the attitude of going to strike, and the words underneath—

"DON'T TREAD ON ME."

Of this flag, Paul Jones, in his journal, says: "As first lieutenant of the Alfred, on board of that ship, before Philadelphia, Mr. Jones, with his own hands, hoisted the flag of America, the first time it was displayed, as the commander-in-chief embarked on board of the Alfred."

By the kind order of an overruling Providence, in spite of our prejudice against snakes and serpents, the number of persons actually injured by them is exceedingly small; for it is rare, indeed, that a poisonous reptile will make an unprovoked attack upon a human being. In Ceylon—which is described as the heaven of snakes, and is the home of the cobra capello, where they are so plentiful as to be frequently found concealed in the houses, and snugly stowed away in the beds—they are looked upon as comparatively harmless, and, as with our own rattlesnake, it requires the industry of the naturalist and the historian, to find authentic records of the species doing injury to man. But, as parts of the creation, they are full of interest, and upon careful study, will be found equally with the more attractive exhibitions of nature, to show forth the wonders of the Almighty's handiwork.

PERSONAL MEMOIRS OF THE BOURBONS IN SPAIN.

THE year 1700 was drawing to a close. Carlos the Second, the last Austrian king of Spain, was on his death-bed. Neither his mind nor his body had ever been strong; and hypochondria had now shattered the one, and disease enfeebled the other. He had endured, during the past few weeks, what would have shaken the frame of the most robust noble at his court.

Dying childless, competitors for his succession had assailed him on all sides, urging him to decide between them by a will. Death relieved him of the Electoral Prince of Bavaria, whose claims were the best; and the contest thenceforth lay between Philip of Anjou, grandson of Louis XIV. and Carlos's eldest sister, and the Archduke Charles, son of another sister of Carlos, who had married the Emperor Leopold. In law, the titles of both were bad. At their marriages both the sisters of Carlos had solemnly renounced, on behalf of their husbands and their issue, all claim to the Spanish succession. But such renunciations have seldom possessed much weight among kings, when any thing was to be gained by their repudiation; neither Louis XIV. nor the Emperor troubled their heads about so small a matter. The latter secured the services of several of the Spanish Ministers, and placed great reliance on the Queen and the confessor, who were strongly attached to the Austrian line. The interests of the French pretender were advocated by Cardinal Portocarrero, Archbishop of Toledo, the most wily priest of the age. The former applied themselves to fortifying Carlos's natural predilection for the Austrian side; the latter wrought upon another chord in the royal breast. Profligate as Carlos had been, he was, like many other Spanish profligates, a thorough bigot. At this crisis especially, the fear of death had led him to redouble his devotions. Portocarrero assured him that the salvation of his soul depended on his leaving his crown to Philip. This was a statement not easily proved to a man of sane mind. To the Cardinal's surprise, Carlos had sense enough left to perceive its fallacy, and the cunning priest saw that the success of his scheme required that the King's imbecility should be rendered more complete.

Reminding Carlos of an old superstition, he advised him to consult the spirits of his ancestors. The idea pleased his morbid fancy; and at midnight, with a torch in his hand, the monarch descended into a vault in the Escorial called the Pantheon, where the bodies of the kings and queens of Spain lie. No ray of light penetrates that gloomy chamber. Massive bronze chests inclose the corpses. All around harmonizes with the dread presence of death; and we may be sure that Portocarrero allowed no element of terror to pass unnoticed on this occasion. Some of the tombs were opened, and the ghastly remains paraded before the trembling king. At length that of his first wife, whom he is said to have loved, was unsealed, and her features—such had been the skill of the embalmer—still wore an air of freshness and unearthly bloom, though she had been eighteen years in the grave. The sight was more terrible to Carlos than that of the livid corpse falling to pieces by decay and gnawed by worms. He fell back into the attendant's arms, crying, "I shall soon be with her," and was carried from the vault. The effect of the scene was so cruel, that he could endure the Escorial no longer, and fled to Aranjuez.

Still his fondness for the Austrian line endured, and the Cardinal saw that his mind needed further shocks. Having disposed of his most dangerous rival, the confessor, by a riot which he contrived to excite at Madrid, he calmly informed the King that his disease required a higher remedy than medicine; that he was in the condition of the unfortunates mentioned in the gospels as being possessed of devils, and that the only hope left was in the awful rite of exorcism. Those who are familiar with the superstitions of the period, will readily conceive the terror with which this announcement was received by Carlos. Next to excommunication, exorcism was the most terrible sentence of the Papal church. The royal chapel was hung with black, and every preparation made for an awful ceremony. The King was seated in the middle of the aisle, in a penitent's dress, while priests chanted lugubrious psalms, and attendant friars constantly sprinkled holy water over his person. After the litany, Portocarrero and other ecclesiastics made their appearance, and at once addressing themselves to the spirit, adjured it, with many opprobrious epithets, to abandon the body of Carlos, and seek another home. Doses of sulphur and asafetida were meanwhile administered to the patient, those drugs being generally supposed to be peculiarly efficacious in expelling demons. Finally, the torture was concluded by the rite itself. Portocarrero pronounced it in a terrible voice, invoking all the terrors of heaven and hell upon the spirit which obstinately persisted in retaining possession of the body of the King, and neglecting no formality which could enhance the agony of the unfortunate hypochondriac.

The work of destruction was now so far complete that Portocarrero could venture on bolder tactics. He begged the King to refer the question of his successor to the Pope, as the infallible judge of right and wrong; knowing perfectly well that Innocent XII., who was at daggers-drawn with the house of Austria, would decide in Philip's favor. The appeal was made, and the result justified the policy of the Cardinal. Carlos was admonished that if he desired to escape eternal damnation he must appoint the grandson of Louis XIV. his successor. Portocarrero lost no opportunity of impressing the alternative on the King's mind; night and morning—having usurped the confessor's place—he and his creatures prayed at the dying man's bedside that he might repent ere he died, and save his soul by executing a will in favor of Philip.

At length, having exhausted ecclesiastical terrors, and driven his victim to the verge of madness, the tormentor extorted a promise that the Pope should be obeyed. The words were hardly uttered before two men appeared in the room; the one Arias, a political friend of the Cardinal's, the other Ubilla, secretary of the Despacho, who had been created a notary for the purpose, and had brought the will in his pocket, all ready for signature. Carlos writhed, but Portocarrero was already in prayer and thanksgiving; and, partly by force, partly by entreaty, the will was signed, Carlos exclaiming in his agony, "God alone is the disposer of kingdoms." The next day he promised his wife to make a will in favor of the Archduke Charles; but the hand of death was too rapid, and before any steps could be taken his life was ended.

A different scene was enacted at Versailles a few days afterward. Messengers were at once dispatched to Louis, to inform him of the success of his schemes, and inviting his grandson to take possession of his kingdom. No subject had been more constantly in the French king's thoughts for months than this Spanish succession. For it he had braved a war with all Europe. For it he had lavished untold sums of money. Yet when the news came, this excellent man was so astonished and shocked that he would not receive the Spanish envoy. Adroit courtiers had to coax him to listen to his story. Persuaded at last to hear the proposal, he allowed it to be laid before his council, and asked their opinion with a deprecatory air. They were well schooled in Louis's manner of dealing. Though it was perhaps the fiftieth time within a year that they had met to consult on that very business—though the dispatches from Harcourt, the ambassador at Madrid, had related to nothing else for months—though bales of correspondence with Portocarrero and other agents were lying in their archives—all affected to share the King's surprise. The Chancellor looked anxiously at the legal bearings of the plan. Another counselor curiously examined its political merits. Torci weighed both sides of the argument, and thought, on the whole, that, however unexpected the proposal was, Louis ought to accept the Spanish throne for his grandson. The Dauphin gave way to a beautiful burst of enthusiasm, and said his ambition had no higher aim than to be father and son of a king. These reasons seem to have overcome the scruples of the virtuous monarch; for summoning young Philip to his presence shortly afterward, he addressed him in the magniloquent style peculiar to the period and the man. "Sir," said le grand roi, "you are called to the throne of Spain. The nobles demand you, the people desire you, and I give my consent." A day or two afterward Philip left for Spain.

Philip, Duke of Anjou, was seventeen years old at the time. Being only the second son of the Dauphin, no one had ever imagined that he was destined to wear a crown, and his education had been sadly neglected. A slight deformity of person, joined to a taciturn habit and gloomy frame of mind, had kept him aloof from the gayeties of the French court, and he was as inexperienced and timid a youth as could be found in the whole nobility of France. His preceptor, Beauvilliers, paid him the compliment of stating that he had never given him any trouble. Docility was, in fact, his leading virtue; indolence his ruling vice. Provided he was permitted to enjoy a long night's sleep, had mass said to him regularly, and was freed from business cares, he was supremely happy. Such was the founder of the Bourbon dynasty in Spain; such the monarch who was expected to raise the Peninsula from the ruin into which it had fallen.

Those who are familiar with the present condition of the Spanish monarchy, may perhaps realize its state at the beginning of the eighteenth century. The power which aimed at universal monarchy under Charles V. had fallen into absolute decrepitude in a hundred and fifty years. It had lost successively Germany, Portugal, the Low Countries, Artois, Flanders, and Franche-Comté. Three fourths of its inhabitants had emigrated or disappeared. Its finances had fallen so low that the King was often forced to borrow a few pistoles to pay his household expenses. Its army had vanished. Foreign merchants, with foreign ships, manned by foreign sailors, monopolized its trade. Miles and miles of fertile land lay waste. The whole country was the prey of the monks and the Inquisition. In the language of an eloquent historian, "Death's hand was visible every where; in the nation, whose liberties had been ruined; in the government, deprived of army, navy, and funds; in property, lying idle for want of labor, and locked up by the church tenures; in the people, a prey to sluggishness and poverty; in the reigning dynasty, a ghastly spectacle of impotence. So marked a decline had never been witnessed in any former royal family. Charles V. had been a soldier and a king; Philip II. had been nothing more than a king; Philip III. and Philip IV. had not even been kings; Charles II. was not even a man." This was the legacy Louis had coveted, and his grandson left Versailles to claim.

To a boy, however, who had never known any higher delight than a triumph at the tennis-court, it was promising enough. Philip was well received at Burgos and Madrid, and began to think royalty a very fair occupation. Bull-fights were given in his honor, and he was allowed to have recherche suppers, and to get up as late in the day as he pleased. The council grumbled at first when Philip kept them waiting three or four hours, in order to enjoy a comfortable rest after a jolly evening; and Louis XIV., his grandfather, wrote sharp letters on the dangers of indolence. But Cardinal Portocarrero and Arias, who were anxious to reap the reward of their labors, consoled Philip, and graciously relieved him of the burdens of kingship. While he was enjoying midnight suppers, they were portioning out the kingdom among their friends, and assisting the tax-gatherers to rob the state. Poor Philip found the council a bore. He cared so little about state business that he frequently omitted to open his letters, and invariably forgot the topics discussed by his cabinet as soon as it rose. A horse, a gun, and a few jovial friends, were more suitable to his age and congenial to his humor than political problems or state concerns. He could not, however, shake off all the obligations of his rank; his marriage was essential to the welfare of Spain, and when his grandfather notified him that he had chosen him a wife, Philip dutifully replied that he was resigned and content. The lady selected was a little girl of thirteen, of gentle manners and mild disposition; her family, the house of Savoy, were sure to interpose no obstacle to the French king's authority over his grandson. Still, lest little Maria Louisa should begin to rule her boy husband, and thus interfere with the views of Louis, it was thought prudent to provide her with what is called in Spain a camerara major, and what we shall accurately render by the plain Saxon word nurse. This nurse is one of the most renowned personages in Spanish history.

Some thirty odd years before, the wife of the Duke of Noirmontiers, a French nobleman of high standing, had given birth to a daughter, Anne Marie, who, in due time, grew up a handsome young woman, and was married to a dashing noble of the court, the Prince of Chalais. Shortly after the marriage, the latter was concerned in a fatal duel; and being exiled in consequence, died at an early age, leaving his widow in very straitened circumstances. She fled to Rome, where her fascinating manners and personal charms secured her many admirers; among others, Cardinal Portocarrero, Cardinal Bourbon, and the Abbé d'Estrees. These excellent prelates charitably undertook to defray the expenses of Madame de Chalais' household until they could find her a husband. The search was not long. Flavio d'Orsini, Duke of Bracciano, and a Grande of Spain, wanted a wife, and the clerical magnates made such tempting offers, that he consented to overlook the detriment scandal had wrought in the fair fame of the handsome Frenchwoman, and to give her his name. His death soon afterward again set free the charming adventuress. Her ambition was now gratified. Possessed of consummate art, great powers of fascination, extensive knowledge of human nature, and intense lust for power, the Princess Orsini had required but two things to secure the realization of her hopes—wealth and rank—and both were now hers. She ruled despotically the dissolute court of Rome: the leader of fashion, the protectress of art, the idol alike of votaries of pleasure and masters of diplomacy. But her mind craved a larger sphere of action. The sceptre of society at Rome did not satisfy her grasp. With her quick eye, when the marriage of Philip was proposed, she saw that Spain afforded the sphere she sought. At once severing the ties which bound her to the papal court, she offered her services to Louis XIV., promising that she would faithfully serve him, and keep watch over the royal couple. So eligible an offer was not to be neglected; the Princess Orsini received a gracious letter of thanks from the great monarch; and Philip was presented with a baby wife and an experienced nurse at the same time.

He seems to have been equally grateful for both presents. As sometimes happens, a strong affection sprang up between himself and his wife; and the Princess Orsini, accustomed to deal with the ablest diplomatists of the time, found no difficulty in asserting her sway over the children she had undertaken to govern. She purchased her authority, however, at a cost which to us will seem considerable. She claimed as a right the most menial functions of the royal household; officiating not only as lady-in-waiting to the Queen, but as valet de chambre to the King. With what pride she discharged the duties of the former station may be seen from her letters, in which she angrily claims a vast superiority over the Piedmontese servants who presumed to vie with her in washing the Queen's feet. There is even a sort of triumph in the complacent manner in which she relates her attendance at his majesty's bedside in the morning, with his slippers and shirt in her hands. It is only just to the princess to add that she aimed at something higher than perfection in these menial occupations. Saint Simon notes that "she invariably hurried forward to her ends without regard to the means;" and she had no sooner usurped the place of mistress in the royal household than she gave proof of her ambition. Philip was beginning to suffer enemi in his palace; and had already thought of visiting his Italian dominions by way of a distraction. The princess encouraged the idea; urging him to set out without delay, and to appoint the Queen regent in his absence. The war to which his accession to the throne gave rise was already lowering in the horizon; Philip made it the pretext of a journey to Naples.

His arrival in that city was marked by a signal disappointment for the superstitious king. The blood of Saint Januarius, which, according to the papal authorities, invariably liquefies at the command of the priests at certain seasons of the year, was brought out with the usual forms in his presence; but, to the horror of the congregation, it remained as solid as a stone. Worse than this, the moment Philip left the church, the blood of the saint liquefied as usual. This was a sad omen: a severe blow to Philip, and a great discouragement to the faithful. To his credit be it said, however, that he overcame the despondency it caused; and war breaking out shortly afterward, he behaved with signal bravery at the battle of Luzzara and the siege of Borgoforte. This was the beginning of the famous war of the succession; a war occasioned by the jealousy of the Emperor of Austria, who wanted the Spanish crown for the Archduke Charles, and the apprehensions of England, alarmed at the establishment of the house of Bourbon on the throne of Spain. The majority of the Spanish people supported Philip, and his grandfather remained, of course, his firm ally; but the opinions of the former were not consulted, and the latter was hardly able to cope with England and the German Empire united. It was hard enough, one would imagine, for a poor lad like Philip to be set to govern a ruined kingdom like Spain, where he had not money to pay his servants, or guards to prevent beggars insulting him in the streets; but England and Austria resolved that he should not have even this scant share of the world's goods without a struggle. So troops were sent into Spain and Italy; and the war, whose annals Lord Mahon has so ably written, was commenced in earnest.

Maria Louisa—left as regent of the kingdom—was charged, in the first place and above all things, to get money. The royal coffers were entirely empty. But Spain contained three provinces—Valencia, Catalonia, and Aragon—whose liberties the Austrian line of kings had not disturbed, and which, though sternly opposed to despotism in the monarch and frequently factious and turbulent, had usually come to the aid of the throne in similar emergencies. Before leaving, Philip had applied to the Cortes of Catalonia for a grant, and had obtained a trifle, with a promise of more whenever he consented to confirm their ancient privileges. Maria Louisa now made a like request of the Cortes of Aragon. The same demands met her, and as she declined to accede to them, she was obliged to content herself with one hundred thousand dollars, which she transmitted to Philip. We may be sure that his resentment at this small supply was simultaneous with his resolve to abolish the liberties of the free states in Spain.

He returned home soon afterward, and found Orsini governing the kingdom. So little affection was there in her language, that she boldly asked his approval of "her administration." She was, in fact, the despotic mistress of the court and the kingdom. She had eclipsed Portocarrero, her former friend, Arias, and the French ambassador; encouraged Philip in his habits of indolence and effeminacy; and actually shown signs of rebellion against Louis XIV. Such audacity was not tolerated by the imperious ruler of France, who promptly ordered the princess to withdraw from the court. He was obeyed; but Philip and his wife were literally heart-broken at the catastrophe. Orsini had become essential to their existence. The queen fell ill, Philip kept his bed, and refused to attend to business till she returned. Louis, fearful of the failure of his ambitious schemes, reluctantly permitted his Minister Torci to write to the princess, authorizing her to return to Madrid; but the haughty woman replied that the king himself had dismissed her, and if her restoration was desirable he must restore her himself. Her boldness was successful: Louis, the terror of the greatest court in Europe, wrote her a letter with his own hand, flattering her, and entreating her to resume her post. She graciously condescended to accede to his request; and, having dismissed Portocarrero and Arias to show her authority, again seized the reins of government to the delight of Philip and his wife. Her conduct was the scandal of the Spanish court, which then made some pretensions to morality. A young man named D'Aubigné officiated as her secretary, and at times passed for her husband; though the princess, happening to open a dispatch from the French ambassador, in which she was mentioned as married to D'Aubigné, impudently scribbled on the margin "pour mariée, non." Other occasions of scandal induced Louis to make a second attempt to undermine her. With his usual duplicity, he directed his ambassador to assure her of his implicit reliance in her fidelity, and at the same time commanded his grandson to send her to Paris. She left Madrid accordingly; but before she reached Versailles, Philip, with all the energy of which his feeble nature was susceptible, had notified Louis that if he had to choose between his grandfather and the princess, he would not hesitate in deciding in favor of the latter. His infatuation overcame the antipathy of the French king. When the princess arrived at Versailles, she was received with honors seldom granted to a subject. Louis himself, who had sent for her to pronounce her disgrace, was fascinated with her; his attentions gave Madame de Maintenon a fit of jealousy, and the favorite hastened Orsini's return to Madrid. So overwhelmed with joy were Philip and his wife at the restoration of their idol, that they traveled two leagues to meet her; and, to the disgust of the punctilious Spaniards, violated regal etiquette in a most glaring manner by inviting her to enter the city in their own carriage. After this, of course, she resumed her supreme authority.

Meanwhile, the war continued, and the imperial armies were generally successful. Philip received the news of defeat after defeat. Half his kingdom was in the possession of his rival. Shaking off his native sluggishness for a while, he led his own armies at Saragossa and was utterly routed. A precipitate flight saved him. He hastened to Madrid, and assembling his friends, escaped to Valladolid. The history of his misfortunes affords a touching illustration of the noble fidelity of the Spanish people. Though he had no other claim on their affection but the title of king—though he could not point to a single act of his to command their gratitude—thousands sacrificed every thing to support him in adversity. Crowds miles in length followed him to Valladolid. When the Archduke Charles entered the capital he found Madrid a desert. Nothing could shake the loyalty of the people of Castile. Whole regiments were cut to pieces without murmuring; and, for the first time in his reign, money was freely offered him for the defense of his throne. It is due to Philip—whose life contains few acts justly worthy of praise—to say that his fortitude rose under his trials. When his grandfather urged him to compromise with the enemy, he protested that he would not surrender one foot of Spanish soil; and was doubtless sincere in his declaration to the people, that he would rather die under the ruins of the monarchy than yield it to a stranger. In truth, he was less responsible for the dreadful miseries inflicted on Spain by the war of the succession than the sovereigns of England and Austria; the blood then shed, the homes desolated, the misery engendered, were their acts, not his. Not that Philip, even under the pressure of circumstances which have called forth brilliant talent in men even less esteemed than he was, ever rose to respectable administrative ability. When his chances were at the worst, and when they were at their apogee, he was uniformly the same—an uxorious husband and the willing slave of the Princess Orsini. If others lighten his load of responsibility for the sufferings of the first years of his reign, none but himself must answer for his shameful and constant neglect of the duties of his station. The year before the peace of Utrecht, when the Allies had overrun Spain, and Philip's chances were not worth a year's purchase, the Duke of Noailles writes of the Spanish court: "The King and Queen are always the same; petty and private reasons overpower the consideration of the general good. Court intrigues preponderate; and no confidence is given but to five or six wretches without experience or talents."

In the year 1711, Philip's cause was desperate. His rival actually reigned at Madrid. But, at the very moment when his flight to Paris might have been expected, the Emperor Joseph died, the Archduke Charles inherited his crown, and the whole aspect of affairs was changed. The Allies then sought peace; and, through the agency of the Princess Orsini, it was concluded. By that peace Philip lost many valuable territories, among others Gibraltar and Minorca, which England secured, as Lord Bolingbroke confesses, by the favor of the all-powerful princess, and for which he strongly recommends her to the gratitude of his government. The whole of the Italian possessions and the Netherlands were severed from Spain. Philip further bound himself and his successors—the stipulation possesses a curious interest to-day—never to sell or alienate any one of his European or American dominions to France or any other power without the consent of all the parties to the treaty of Utrecht. But greater misfortunes than the loss of provinces or prestige awaited him. His wife—his gentle, much-loved Marie—sickened and died, and Philip was inconsolable. Touched by his misfortunes, the Princess Orsini hired the convent next to his palace, and had the party-wall between demolished, so as to obtain free access to him at all hours unperceived. There can be but little doubt that this virtuous woman acted thus from the dictates of a warm heart; though the Spaniards thought differently, and inquired of each other whether the princess aimed at playing the Maintenon in Spain, or whether she really meant to be queen in name as she was in fact. Her vivacity and fascinating elegance—which age could not impair—afforded grounds for such conjectures. If she did entertain views of that nature, they were soon abandoned; for, a few months after the Queen's death we find her advising Philip to marry again.

The story of his second marriage is strikingly dramatic. The princess wanted to find him a wife whom she could rule as she had ruled his first queen. There was at the Spanish court at that time an Italian Abbé from Placentia, who shared in no small degree the confidence of the princess. A singular man this Abbé; "a monstrous large head, swarthy complexion, short neck, broad shoulders, and low stature;" the son of a gardener, and well acquainted himself with hoe, rake, and spade; had dug carrots and garlic for a time, then taken to digging graves; from sexton's assistant had risen to the dignity of priesthood; from priest had risen to be valet-secretary to great men; had served many masters, devout with some, ribald with others, subservient to all, and pleasing all—until at last, having been presented to Louis XIV. by Vendôme—whose favor he had gained by his profane wit and licentious jests—he was appointed by the French king to watch Orsini at the court of Madrid. This was the man, by name Giulio Alberoni, with whom the princess took counsel about the choice of a wife for Philip. Surely knave never fell more completely into a trap. Alberoni warmly sympathized with the princess, affected to share her apprehensions, and recommended Isabel Farnese, a countrywoman of his own, for whose docility of character and angelic gentleness he vouched. Satisfied by his assurances, Orsini dispatched her relation, Chalais, to demand the hand of the princess for the king. Her emissary had hardly sailed for Italy when accounts reached her which gave the lie to Alberoni's statements respecting the character of the princess. She sent off a second messenger with express orders to countermand the proposals of marriage. Alberoni also sent a messenger, in all haste, to the Farnese family, urging them to accept the offers of Chalais without delay. The last envoy reached Parma first. Orsini's second messenger arrived twenty-four hours before the time fixed for the marriage-ceremony: in ample time to defeat the alliance, had he been able to deliver his message. But Farnese was on the alert. The messenger was detained one day at the gates of the city on some frivolous pretext. When he entered the marriage-ceremony was over, and his orders were useless.

The princess bore up against the disappointment with her usual fortitude. When Isabel landed in Spain, she advanced to meet her as far as Xadraga. But the tide of misfortune had fairly set in against her. Before she met the Queen, the latter received a letter from Philip, stating that Orsini had used every means to persuade him to marry her, that she would be sure to breed discord between them, and that the new queen should at once get rid of her. He cautioned Isabel against being an hour in her society; "for," said the letter, "if you talk to her but an hour, she will fascinate you." Quite unconscious of this cruel blow from a quarter where she felt so secure, the princess met the Queen smilingly, and led her to her apartment. They had hardly entered when Isabel—the model of gentleness so vaunted by Alberoni—took offense at Orsini's dress, and attacked her savagely. Bewildered and shocked, the princess attempted to excuse herself; but the Queen, in a paroxysm of fury, called the attendants to turn out "that mad woman," and, seizing her by the shoulders herself, actually pushed her outside the door.

This was the last of Philip's nurse, who fills a place in Spanish history second to no statesman or courtier. Thrust into a carriage, without time to change her dress, she was hurried off under an escort of fifty dragoons, and forced to travel for twenty-three days in bitterly cold weather, without change of linen or a bed, and frequently without sufficient food. She fled first to France, where no one would receive her; thence to Holland; was refused permission to return to Rome by Pope Clement, but obtained from his successor the grace of being allowed to attach herself to the household of the Pretender Stuart, where she died, solacing herself on her death-bed with the reflection that she was still in the service of a lawful king. No remorse ever seems to have penetrated Philip's mind in consequence of his desertion of his early friend. Royal ingratitude is perhaps wisely ordained by Providence to guard against man's proneness to sycoophancy and king-worship.

The most detestable act committed by Philip during the ascendancy of this woman, was doubtless the destruction of the liberties of Valencia, Aragon, and Catalonia, in revenge for their refusal to supply him with funds. His grandfather had reminded him, on his departure for Spain, that the Spanish monarchy had always been absolute; Philip made it so. At the very time the unfortunate Spanish people were pouring out their life-blood in his defense, in the year 1707, a royal decree abolished the fueros of Aragon and Valencia, and thus bereft those provinces of the freedom they had enjoyed under the whole Austrian line. After the close of the war, a similar decree was fulminated against Catalonia. The Catalan spirit rose, and the monarch was informed that they would never submit to be deprived of their liberty. In a single-handed contest with the crown, Catalonia might have maintained her rights; but the monarchs of those days were always ready to lend each a helping hand when subjects became unruly. France and England kindly lent Philip an army—his own was scattered—to crush the Catalans. In a few weeks the whole province was laid waste by the foreigners, and city after city fell. The Catalans—whose spirit never flagged—retired to Barcelona, fortified it, and prepared for a desperate defense. It was assaulted over and over again; but with such valor did the townsmen fight, priests and women eagerly mingling in the fray in defense of their cherished fueros, that the issue was long doubtful. At length, numbers and discipline triumphed; Barcelona was taken, and for hours every living soul was put to the sword by the victors. Repeated offers of peace had been made by Philip, on the sole condition that the fueros should be abandoned; but when the city was smoking in ruins, the brave Catalans still persisted in refusing to surrender this guarantee of freedom. They were now utterly annihilated. So desperate had been their defense, that it was seriously proposed and considered by Philip whether the town should not be razed to the ground, as a lesson to the rest of Spain: had the kingdom possessed another seaport on the coast as available for commercial and military purposes as Barcelona, this horrible idea might have been carried into effect. As it was, the King graciously contented himself with reducing the Catalans to the condition of vassals of the crown.

Queen Isabel had no sooner reached Madrid than a fresh struggle for supremacy began between herself and the minister Alberoni. Isabel's gentleness was the gentleness of the cat: she was hasty, vindictive, impetuous, and full of caprice. Her inexperience compelled her to submit to the sway of the minister for a few years; during which Alberoni labored zealously to improve the agricultural condition of the kingdom, to establish manufactures, to place the army and navy on a proper footing, and, above all, to extend and consolidate the power of the Church. His power was so unbounded that he did not scruple, on the occasion of a dispute with the Duke of Escalona, the high chamberlain, to seize the grey-headed noble by the shoulders in the king's bedroom, and thrust him out of the chamber. But these bursts of temper, and his rigid superintendence of the royal finances—which he guarded so vigilantly that Isabel declared he did not allow her enough for the necessities of life—led to his ruin. The measure he had meted out to Orsini was meted out to him. The Queen's assa feta, or bedchamber-woman, Laura Pescatori, resolved on his disgrace, urged on, it is said, by the British and French ambassadors, to whom Alberoni had made himself particularly obnoxious. She gained the Queen, who was only too ready to see her rival in the king's favor disgraced; and one day, without any notice, Alberoni received orders to leave Madrid in a week, and the kingdom in three. He obeyed; on his way to the sea-side was attacked by robbers, stripped of every thing, and forced to travel on foot, in disguise, from Barcelona to Gerona. Persecution as virulent as that he had invoked against Orsini followed him in his exile. The Pope refused to receive him, and he fled to the Apennines. Some years afterward he was allowed to remove to Placentia, where he lived in great poverty, till Pope Benedict invited him to the office of vice-legate of Romagna, which he held till he died, at the age of eighty-eight.

Isabel was now supreme. The King was so devoted to her that he could not bear to be absent an hour from her side. Her energy was well adapted to master his sloth. She made war and declared peace; appointed ministers, and collected the revenues; always dealing with Spain as if it were her private property. Saint Simon gives the following singular picture of the habits of the royal pair:

"At nine o'clock in the morning the assa fets, or first woman of the bedchamber, drew aside the curtains of the royal bed, followed by a French valet, who carried a restorative cordial composed of broth, milk, wine, yolks of eggs, cinnamon, sugar, and cloves. While the King was drinking this cordial, the assa fets brought the Queen some tapestry or other work, and having placed upon the bed some of the papers which lay upon the chairs, retired with the valet. Their majesties then said their morning prayers. The prime minister, when there was one, or the secretary of state then made his appearance, and transacted the necessary business; while the Queen's employment did not prevent her from giving her opinion. The minister retiring, the assa fets brought the King his dressing-gown and slippers, and his majesty passed into his dressing-room, where he was assisted by three French valets and two Spanish noblemen of his household. Being quickly dressed, he passed a quarter of an hour alone with his confessor, and then repaired to the Queen's toilet.

"On the King's retiring to his dressing-room, the Queen rose from bed, attended by the assa fets only; and these were almost the only few minutes in the four-and-twenty hours which she could call her own, and converse on confidential business unknown to the King. Hence the consequence and power of the assa fets—who was always a person in the highest confidence—and the importance of these precious moments, when the Queen could receive or return any letter or message. But as this time seldom exceeded a little more than a quarter of an hour, without giving umbrage to the King, it is easy to imagine with what apprehensions letters or messages were received or returned, and how precipitately political conferences were closed. The Queen then returned to her toilet, which was attended by the King, accompanied by two or three principal officers of his household, the infants, and their governors. At the conclusion of the toilet their majesties repaired to the drawing-room to receive foreign ministers and grandees who requested a private interview. When any one was introduced, the Queen affected to retire to the end of the room; but people who were presented, well knowing that the King told her all that passed, and that she would be offended if any secret were kept from her, always entreated her majesty to approach, or spoke loud enough to be heard by her, if she persisted in keeping aloof. Philip never gave an opinion on business of importance without having first consulted the Queen in private, or asked her counsel publicly at the time of the audience.

"After the audience, King and Queen heard mass. They sat down to dinner at twelve, no one, save those who had been present at the toilet, being admitted. The King had his particular dishes, the Queen hers. The latter, who was inclined to gormandize, ate largely and of many dishes. The King was a sparing eater, and seldom varied his fare: soup, fowls, boiled pigeons, and a roast loin of veal, without fruit, salad, cheese, or pastry, comprised his usual meal. Though bigoted, he never kept saigre; but his fondness for eggs in every style was marked. Both king and queen drank Champagne. After dinner they said their prayers again, and saw the minister, if he had any particular business to transact. The royal couple then drove out in a carriage to shoot; and this, though the only diversion of the King's life, was no less dull and melancholy than his other occupations. A number of peasants drove the game into a particular spot, where the King and Queen, ensconced in an avenue, shot promiscuously at stags, wild boars, hares, and foxes as they passed before them. On returning from shooting, they partook of a cold collation: the King, biscuits or bread with wine and water; the Queen, pastry, fruits, and cheese. Then they received their children for about a quarter of an hour, and afterward transacted business with the minister or secretary of state.

"The Queen confessed once a week. She used to retire with the confessor into a cabinet adjoining, and if the King thought the confession too long, he would open the door and call her. They then said their prayers once more, or read some book of devotion till supper, which was exactly like dinner. After supper they conversed or prayed tête-à-tête till bedtime."

While Philip shot hares, Isabel's mind dwelt on higher game. Louis XIV. was dead. His successor, young Louis XV., was attacked by a disease which threatened his life. In the event of his death, Philip might aspire to the French throne. True, he had renounced it by solemn oath; but what of that? Isabel resolved she should be Queen of France. Foreseeing the opposition which would arise if Philip attempted to wear both crowns, she boldly resolved to make him abdicate the Spanish sceptre. In January, 1724, he announced, to an astonished people, that it was his intention to resign the throne in order to lead a private life with the Queen—to the end that, freed from all other cares, he might serve God, meditate on a future life, and devote himself to the important work of his salvation. He appointed his son Luis his successor, and retired to the palace of San Ildefonso, on which he had spent six millions of dollars, and which he preferred to the Escorial. The people of Castile expressed no sorrow at the loss of a monarch who had done nothing to gain their good-will, and the last few years of whose reign had been equally divided between the chase and his bed. But for the peace of the kingdom they desired that their Cortes should meet to ratify the abdication of Philip. Isabel was shrewd enough to see the danger of a step which would forever bar her from ascending the Spanish throne afresh; and she positively refused to convoke the Cortes. She prudently kept the Spanish throne in reserve, in case she failed in her attempts on that of France. Her confidence in the success of her schemes was, however, unbounded. Ample preparations for a journey to Paris were made at San Ildefonso. The Queen's jewels and clothes were packed up. Couriers were kept on the road, and daily messengers left with dispatches for the Duke of Bourbon, who was in Philip's interest. In fancy she was already Queen of France.

Meanwhile young Luis ascended the Spanish throne; his coronation being commemorated by an auto-da-fé, at which five heretics were burnt before him. Two events of note are recorded in his short reign. The first was his robbing his own orchards at night in order to worry the royal gardeners. The second was his imprisonment of his wife, Louise Isabelle d'Orleans, daughter of the regent, who had been forced upon him by Alberoni. Her gallantries were so notorious and so shameful, that Luis was compelled to have her arrested on her return from a gay soirée. She affected penitence, and a reconciliation took place. Luis had, in truth, resolved to divorce her; but while the necessary papers were being prepared he died of small-pox.

To the astonishment of every one, Philip, his father, unceremoniously seized the sceptre at his death. The truth was, Louis XV. had recovered, and Isabel thought the Spanish throne better than none. Having failed to become Queen of France herself, she tried to marry her daughter the Infanta to Louis XV.; but this scheme failed likewise, and she furiously exclaimed—this pattern of gentleness—"The Bourbons are a race of devils, except," she added to the king, who was beside her, "your majesty." It was hardly worth while to make the exception. Philip lay day after day like a log in his bed. For eight months he never shaved. The Queen ruled the state, received foreign ambassadors, made war, and even thought of heading her armies. So completely was she mistress of the kingdom, that at her confinements the whole business of state was at a stand still. The poor king, a victim to hypochondria, again thought of abdicating; and his hints to that effect so frightened Isabel, that she locked him up in his own room. The wretched monarch contrived in her absence to write a decree of abdication, and bribed a valet to carry it to the Council of Castile; but the Queen intercepted the message and destroyed it. After this her watch over the King became more rigid. He was absolutely forbidden to go to Madrid; and lest he should by any possibility communicate with the Council of Castile, he was removed to Seville, and allowed to spend whole days and nights in bed. There, while the Queen was scheming to secure for him the succession of the Emperor Charles VI., Philip was suddenly struck with apoplexy, and died before a physician or a priest could reach him.

Such was the founder of the Bourbon dynasty in Spain. It would be difficult in the history of dynasties to find one which sprang from a more worthless source.

Philip had five sons and two daughters. Of the former, Luis died before him; Ferdinand and Charles succeeded him in turn; Philip became Duke of Parma, tried to emulate the extravagance and vices of his father-in-law, Louis XV., and after playing the part of a royal beggar for some years, died of a fall from his horse; and Luis Antonio lived and died in entire obscurity.

Ferdinand ascended the throne at the age of thirty-six. He was a little ugly man, who had never cared for any thing but hunting and music. He did not think fit to alter his habits on becoming King of Spain. It is said that he spoke the truth, which was very commendable in a man in his position; and he was highly extolled for having forborne to put his mother-in-law to death, or at least exile her without a dollar when he ascended the throne. The truth was, that Ferdinand was an intensified embodiment of his father's indolence, and never had any opportunity of committing absolute crimes. All he wanted was a wife, a gun, and an opera singer. The first he found in Portugal, in the person of Barbara, daughter of John V., a very fat young lady, who piqued herself on her angelic meekness and docility. A polite Frenchman who visited her court, declared that her face "pained him to behold," so excessively plain and harsh were her features. It would have been well for Spain had her personal defects been her worst faults; but with these she combined insatiable avarice, low cunning, and true Portuguese treachery. The last of Ferdinand's requirements he imported from England. Carlo Broschi, a famous opera singer, had gained fame and wealth by his profession; and under the assumed name of Farinelli, gladly accepted Ferdinand's offer to come and charm his hereditary hypochondria with sweet strains. It is related that when Farinelli first arrived at Madrid, the Queen secretly introduced him into the room next to Ferdinand's bedchamber, where he sang and played, and that the new pleasure so excited the sluggish monarch, that he rose from his bed and actually shaved himself. This Farinelli became in course of time an important personage of state, and inherited the mantle of the Princess Orsini. Shortly after his arrival he was appointed intendant of the King's pleasures; which, as the King lived for nothing but pleasure, gave him almost absolute control over the court. Petronius Arbiter was not nearly so powerful. He ruled the King with music, the Queen with sycophancy. When trouble broke out between the courts of Versailles and Madrid, Farinelli the singer was appointed to conduct the negotiations on behalf of the latter. To realize the strangeness of such an appointment, we must try to fancy Mr. Forrest intrusted with the settlement of the Fishery Question, or Mario accredited by the British government to Washington. However, Farinelli did his duty; and to his undying honor we must add that he never robbed his master or Spain. His partners in the government of the kingdom were not so scrupulous. Though Carvajal was rigidly honest and austere to a fault, Ensenada, who during the greater portion of Ferdinand's reign shared the weight of the government with Farinelli, set a sublime example of corruption and boundless extravagance. He wore on his person jewels worth nearly half a million of dollars. At his disgrace the inventory which was taken of his effects contained, among other things, a list of porcelain to the amount of two millions of dollars, forty watches, 1170 pairs of silk stockings, 180 pairs of breeches, 150 pairs of drawers, and 48 rich suits. He had been Farinelli's friend when the latter arrived in Spain, and in the hour of adversity the honest singer did not forget him. To his influence Ensenada owed his exemption from the fate of Orsini and Alberoni.

The memoirs of Ferdinand are not the history of Spain. That must be sought in the biography of Ensenada, Carvajal, and Farinelli. The King was a nullity in his kingdom. As hypochondriac as his father, he had got it into his head that he was to die of asthma, in abject poverty, and had actually persuaded the queen that such was his destiny. All his care was to ward off the dreaded disease, with which he was never really threatened; all hers to heap up money, which she obtained by selling every office under the crown to the highest bidder. In affairs of state neither meddled much; and it is perhaps to this peculiarity that the monarch owes the title of Ferdinand the Sage. He did certainly once or twice take some share in the business of the Council when his spendthrift brother, Philip, entreated him to pay his debts, and his intriguing brother, Carlos, tried to gain a footing in the government. But a remittance to the one, and a reprimand to the other, exhausted Ferdinand's energy. He cried bitterly when Carvajal died, and was hardly less affected at Ensenada's disgrace; trembling lest the cares of government should fall on his feeble shoulders. The death of his wife completely prostrated him. He shut himself up at Villaviciosa, and deprived himself of food and rest. The British ambassador wrote to his government: "The King has kept his bed for seven days; he was blooded twice within a few hours, and has been physicked; but his aversion to see any one but the two physicians increases daily." All public business was stopped, for the ministers could not even obtain the formality of a signature from the King. The premier, M. Wall, confessed that Ferdinand's mind was deranged. He refused to be shaved, and insisted on going about without any other covering but his shirt, which had not been changed for weeks. His hypochondria returning with violence, he persuaded himself that he would die if he lay down, and spent the last days of his life sitting upright in a chair. At length death terminated his sufferings, within a year after the decease of his wife.

During the whole of his reign he had been a mere cipher. With singular maladroitness the historians, who have delighted to style him Ferdinand the Sage, have commended his frugality and economical style of living; pointing triumphantly to the fourteen millions of dollars he left in the Spanish treasury. Allusion has already been made to one mode in which the bulk of this money was gained; another remains to be told. Philip had died deeply in debt, his reckless expenditures for hunting and the construction of San Ildefonso having absorbed twice the means at his disposal. Contrary to the invariable practice of the Spanish monarchy, Ferdinand refused to pay his father's debts, and hoarded up the money raised for the purpose, while his unfortunate creditors starved. He has also obtained the credit of dealing the first blow at the papal despotism in Spain. To this he has no claim. The honor of the deed belongs to men whose names are now forgotten—Macanaz and Orri, under Philip, and the stern Carvajal and Wall in his own reign. They it was who stripped the Pope of nine tenths of his benefices, and paved the way for the stupendous reform Aranda was destined to accomplish. The best we can say of Ferdinand is, that he was a harmless imbecile.

Carlos the Third, his successor, was his half brother, being the son of the imperious Isabel Farnese. He had been King of Naples some years before the death of Ferdinand; and was thus the most experienced Bourbon king Spain had had. His reign stands out in bold contrast to those of his predecessors and his successors, from the simple reason that he showed, on great emergencies, a will of his own. He owed much if not all of his fame to his tact in avoiding worthless favorites, and his good fortune in commanding the services of able men as ministers. Spain has reason to be proud of such statesmen as the Conde d'Aranda and Florida Blanca.

At his accession the state required him to provide successors to the Spanish and Neapolitan thrones. His eldest son, Philip, was an idiot. Carlos summoned a jury of physicians and learned men to examine him; they reported that they were unable to find in the unhappy prince the use of reason or any trace of reflection. Philip was accordingly disinherited. His second brother, Carlos, was named Prince of Asturias; and the third, Ferdinand, obtained the crown of Naples.

The first act of his reign was the exile of poor old Farinelli, whose voice had gone, and who was probably very glad to leave the desolate court of Spain, no richer than he was when he first went there. The direction of affairs he intrusted to Squillace and Grimaldi, both able men, the former a Neapolitan. This done, the king began to indulge his passion for hunting, which with him amounted to a monomania. He had hardly seated himself on the throne when the British ambassador reports that though his abilities are good, he sacrifices every thing to hunting, and will not abandon his favorite pursuit for the gravest state affairs. He kept thousands of men employed in beating up game for him, and his expenses for this amusement involved him in constant pecuniary difficulties. His dinner hour was fixed at ten in the morning, so as to leave him a clear afternoon for the chase.

While he hunted, Squillace set about reforming the kingdom, and more especially the condition of the priests and the church. By a bold stroke of authority he succeeded in banishing the Grand Inquisitor, and this act was the beginning of the war between state and church, which is the most interesting feature of Carlos's reign. To understand it, it must be remembered that when Philip V. ascended the Spanish throne, one fifth of the real estate in the kingdom belonged to the church, and was held in main-morte, so that it could not be alienated. During Philip's reign, upward of three thousand persons were either burnt, imprisoned for life, or sent to the galleys by the Inquisition. These frightful atrocities were diminished under Ferdinand; and when the attention of Carlos was drawn to the Inquisition, that body urged, as a complete answer to the charges of cruelty brought against them, that they had only burnt four persons and imprisoned fifty in several years. Still, the kingdom contained no less than ninety thousand priests or monks, and twenty thousand nuns; in all, upward of one thirtieth of the whole population were ecclesiastics of some sort, an unproductive burden to the state. The first blow was struck, as was said, by the exile of the Grand Inquisitor. It was soon avenged. Spain being at war with England, the British fleets took Havana; and the royal confessor took care to remind the King that the fall of that city had taken place on the anniversary of the exile of the holy officer. Carlos, a thorough bigot at heart, was struck with the coincidence, and the inquisitor was recalled. But so meagre a triumph did not satisfy the papal church. The priests resolved to ruin Squillace. He had issued an edict against long cloaks and slouched hats, which frequently served as a disguise for brigands and assassins. He had moreover, to raise money to supply the King's wants, granted monopolies to certain parties for supplying Madrid with bread and oil. These measures created much discontent among the people. The proscription of slouched hats was regarded as unequivocal tyranny; and the rise in the price of bread caused great suffering. Of these elements of popular discontent the Jesuits adroitly availed themselves. Of a sudden, in March, 1766, a riot broke out at Madrid. The populace thronged the streets, breaking windows, insulting the officers of state, and attacking the Walloon guards. Rushing in a body to Squillace's residence, they called for the minister's head, and declared they would be satisfied with nothing short of this sacrifice. With great difficulty Carlos, the Queen, and Squillace made their escape to Aranjuez, whence the King sent messengers to treat with the mob. They demanded the exile of Squillace and the revocation of the edict prohibiting slouched hats. Both demands were instantly granted, and quiet was once more established. Strange to say, Squillace was no sooner dismissed than the populace set to work to repair the damage done during the riot with as much energy as they had displayed in carrying it out. Every one whose windows had been broken, or whose property had been otherwise injured, was paid in full. Where the money came from he was not told. There were men in Madrid, however, who knew enough of mobs to be well aware that it did not come out of the pockets of the bravos who broke Squillace's windows. People pointed significantly to the gloomy Jesuit colleges; and then it was remembered how many dark priests had been seen fitting like evil spirits through the mob on the occasion of the riot. Scores of thinkers doubtless recalled to memory the injuries Squillace had wrought to the church, the vindictiveness of the Order of Jesus, and the singular concentration of purpose evinced by the populace in directing the whole force of the popular torrent against him. In brief, there were but two classes which could have excited and defrayed the expenses of the "slouched hat riot," as it was called; these were the nobles and the church. It was clearly not the work of the nobles.

Among others who were diligently noting facts of this nature, was an old soldier, and a youthful statesman, the Count of Aranda, whose military experience led him at once to discover the real authors of the disturbance. Squillace's exile drew Aranda nearer to the King; with every precaution of secrecy he communicated his suspicions, and to his great delight found them fully shared by the monarch. They agreed that the turbulent Jesuits must be punished. But how could a blow be struck without their knowledge? The royal confessor was in their interest; they had spies every where; it was hardly safe to whisper what was to be kept a secret from the all-seeing, all-hearing fraternity. Aranda consulted with the King with locked doors; not a soul was intrusted with the least inkling of the scheme. Least the spies should perceive that the royal ink-stand had been used, Aranda brought his own in his pocket, together with paper and pens. Portugal had just been compelled to exile the Jesuits, in consequence of their factions conduct in Paraguay; with this example before them, the King and his minister framed their decrees. No living soul in Madrid had the least suspicion of the plot.

At midnight, strong bands of soldiers simultaneously surrounded the six Jesuit colleges; the bells were secured, and sentinels posted at every door and outlet. The Jesuits were then roused from their beds and summoned to the refectory, where an officer awaited them with the decree of exile in his hand. After it was read, each man was directed to pack up his linen, snuff, and money; and the whole fraternity was dispatched in carriages, under the escort of dragoons, to the sea-side. With such secrecy and unanimity had the coup d'état been carried out, that no one in Madrid suspected what had happened until late next day, when the exiles were far on their journey. We are led to form a high opinion of the efficiency of the government and its thorough organization, from the fact that precisely the same measures were taken at the same time all over Spain; and within a few weeks, throughout Spanish America and the Philippine Isles. By the end of six months the Spanish dominions did not contain a single avowed Jesuit.

When we recollect the mischief they had done to Spain in various ways; their factionness; their cruelty; their unbending hostility to municipal reform; and the burden they constituted in a state which required the active support of every citizen; their expulsion will seem an act of sound policy. In fact Spain would have been spared half her subsequent troubles had their fate been shared by three fourths of the remaining priests, who, like locusts, ate up the fat of the land. But this much said in justice to Aranda and Carlos, it is impossible to deny the exiles a tribute of admiration for their fortitude under their trials. Not a complaint broke from the lips of a single prisoner, either at the time of their arrest and separation from a much-loved home, or during the hardships and privations of the journey. Shipped in transports for Civita Vecchia, their arrival at that port took the governor by surprise, and he refused to allow them to land until the pleasure of the Pope should be known. Clement, foreseeing the coming storm, declined to allow his dominions to be made a refuge for all the ecclesiastical outcasts in Europe, and they put to sea again, under a scorching sun and scantily supplied with provisions. For three months they were tossed hither and thither in the Mediterranean, suffering indescribable misery, and dying in large numbers from want of the necessities of life. At length, the inhabited earth refusing them a resting-place, they were unladen like bales of goods, and thrust ashore on the barren coast of Corsica. There, fresh privations awaited them; and the aged and infirm rapidly sank under their miseries. Many months elapsed before Carlos, softened by their sufferings, decreed an allowance of about twenty-five cents a day to each exile, and procured for them admittance to Italy. The Pope made a faint struggle on their behalf, and even threatened the Duke of Parma, who had followed Carlos's example, with excommunication. But the King of Spain and Aranda were resolute; and the papal authority had fallen so low that Clement's successor was glad to purchase peace with his powerful neighbors in Naples, Spain, and Parma, by abolishing the order of the Jesuits. The survivors then considered harmless, were permitted to return to Spain.

The overthrow of the Jesuits was, however, by no means the overthrow of the Church. It was the means of wresting the schools out of the hands of the clergy; but the Inquisition still retained the censorship of all publications, while the ecclesiastical courts still took cognizance of numerous criminal offenses, and enjoyed the right of confiscating, to their own use, the property of the individuals they condemned. The lives of the ecclesiastics of both sexes were still a common subject of scandal. Against these abuses Aranda battled bravely; but it seemed as though the King's energy as a reformer had been exhausted by the expulsion of the Jesuits, for his bigotry grew daily more and more intense, and the confessor invariably succeeded in defeating Aranda's designs. After a short while the Inquisition again grew so bold as to attract once more the attention of Europe. Señor Olavide, a popular reformer, undertook to reclaim and colonize the Sierra Morena, which from time immemorial had been a den of banditti; and among other good citizens whom he contrived to attract to the spot, he was fortunate enough to obtain several Protestant families. A lawgiver for his little colony, he wisely decreed that these Protestants should not be compelled to attend mass; for which, and other cognate offenses, he was shortly afterward seized and thrust into one of the dungeons of the Inquisition. The majority of the members of that dread tribunal insisted on having him burnt. To this, however, Carlos would not consent; the Grand Inquisitor himself owed to an unbecoming tenderness toward the prisoner, and confessed that a good long imprisonment, with a recantation and a reprimand, would satisfy his conscience. This opinion prevailed. We have the closing scene of the drama from the narrative of a foreigner who was present.

"A great number of persons of all ranks, civil, military, and ecclesiastical were invited, I should rather say summoned, to attend at the holy office at eight o'clock in the morning, on the 24th of last month. They were all totally ignorant of the reason of their being called on. After waiting some time in an apartment destined for their reception, they were admitted to the tribunal—a long, darkish room, with the windows near the ceiling, and furnished with a crucifix, under a black canopy, a table with two chairs for the inquisitors, a stool for the prisoner, two chairs for his guards, and benches for the spectators. The familiars of the Inquisition, Abrantes, Mora, and others, grandees of Spain, attended as servants without hats or swords.

"Olavide soon appeared, attended by brothers in black, his looks quite cast down, his hands closed together, and holding a green taper. His dress was an olive-colored coat and waistcoat, with canvas breeches, and thread stockings, and his hair was combed back into a bag. He was seated on the stool prepared for him. The secretaries then read, during three hours, the accustomed accusations and proceedings against him. They consisted of above a hundred articles, such as his possession of free books, loose pictures, letters from Voltaire, his having neglected some external duties of religion, uttering hasty expressions, his inattention to images, together with every particular of his life, birth, and education. It concluded by declaring him guilty of heresy. At that moment he fainted away, but was brought to the recovery of his senses that he might hear his sentence. It was no less than the deprivation of all his offices, present and future, the confiscation of his property, banishment to thirty leagues from Madrid, from all places of royal residence, from Seville, his new colony, and Lima, the place of his birth; prohibition from riding on horseback, or wearing gold, silver, or silk; and eight years confinement and monastic discipline in a convent. The sentence being read, he was led to the table where, on his knees, he recanted his errors, and acknowledged his implicit belief in the articles of the Roman Catholic faith. Four priests in surplices, and with wands in their hands, then came in. They repeatedly laid their wands across his shoulders, while a miserere was sung. He then withdrew, the inquisitors bowed, and the strangers silently departed with terror in their hearts, but discretion on their lips." Olavide escaped to France, lived long enough to recant his heresy, and wrote a book in favor of the Church.

It was some years after this that the last auto-da-fé took place in Spain. The victim was a poor old woman, who was accused of being a witch. More than a century before a judge in Massachusetts had begged pardon of his fellow-citizens assembled in church, for having had the folly and the wickedness to sentence just another such old woman to death for witchcraft. From the decline of Aranda's power to the conquest by Napoleon, no open attempts were made to overturn the priesthood of Spain; the revolutionary tide alone warned them, that if they valued their own safety they must not provoke the people too far.

Baffled by the ecclesiastics, Aranda turned his vigorous mind to political reforms, and strongly urged the King to re-establish the fue-ros of Catalonia, Aragon, and Valencia, unlawfully abolished by Philip V. But the monarch was too much of a Bourbon to yield one iota of his prerogative; and the noble-hearted statesman, disgusted by his failures, begged leave to retire to the embassy at Paris. Under his successors, Grimaldi and the celebrated Florida Blanca, Spain speedily found itself involved in quarrels and wars all over the world. War with England had become a chronic disease; and Carlos, who nourished a strong antipathy against the holders of Minorca and Gibraltar, took more interest in his quarrels with the British ministers than in any public business. The United States at this time declared their Independence; and greatly to the discomfiture of Florida Blanca, who urged the danger of their example to the Spanish colonies on the same continent, Carlos feigned to espouse their cause against Great Britain. The truth was, Franklin had adroitly denied England's right to retain Gibraltar, and the remark found its way to Carlos's heart. What measure of sincerity his friendly assurances to our envoys contained, may be inferred from his declaration on his death-bed, that nothing gave him greater satisfaction than the remembrance that he had never held direct intercourse, or concluded any treaty, with the "rebellious States" of North America.

The war with England, including the capture of Minorca, and the famous though unsuccessful siege of Gibraltar, the armed neutrality which was first conceived at Carlos's council, and the important innovations in international law which grew thereout, as well as the commencement of the troubles in South America, which led to the independence of the Spanish colonies, occupy much space in histories of Spain under Carlos, and form the leading points in biographies of Florida Blanca and other statesmen. Carlos himself had little to do with them. Threatened with the same hypochondria that had embittered the life of his predecessor, he sought distraction in renewed ardor at the chase. A close observer of his habits states that he never saw his temper ruffled except during two days in Passion Week, when he was detained from hunting. Swinburne says: "His dress seldom varies from a large hat, gray coat, buff waistcoat, black breeches, and worsted stockings: he wears a small dagger at his belt, and his pockets are always stuffed with knives, gloves, and shooting tackle. On gala days a fine suit is hung upon his shoulders, but as he has an eye to his afternoon sport, and is a great economist of time, the black breeches are worn to all costs. I believe there are but three days in the year that he spends without going out shooting, and these are marked with the blackest mark in the calendar. No storm, heat, or cold can keep him at home, and when he hears of a wolf, distance is counted for nothing; he would drive over half the kingdom rather than miss an opportunity of firing on that favorite game. Besides a number of persons belonging to the hunting establishment, several times a year all the idle fellows of Madrid are hired to beat the country and drive the wild boars, deer, and hares into a ring, where they pass before the royal family." He kept a journal in which he regularly entered the results of his chase; and shortly before his death, he was enabled to boast that he had killed 589 foxes and 5823 wolves, besides smaller game, and thus had not been useless to his country. His favorite passion was fatal to him at last. He caught cold while hunting, at the age of seventy-three, and died after a short illness.

In comparison with the uxorious Philip, the imbecile Ferdinand VI., the profligate Carlos IV., the infamous Ferdinand VII., or the present occupant of the Spanish throne, Carlos III., with all his faults, seems a good man, and a praiseworthy monarch. He never bartered away his kingdom to favorites, or set an example of dishonesty, cruelty, or vice. A strictly moral man himself, he was severely censorious of the morals of the court. Firm to obstinacy, he seldom allowed himself to be used as a tool by intriguing courtiers. As kings went, he showed a very respectable interest in his subjects, and did not always throw impediments in the way of the schemes by which Aranda, Squillace, Grimaldi, and Florida Blanca attempted to improve their industrial and social condition. Had his resolution been proof against the insidious appeals of his confessor, the great ecclesiastical reforms of which Spain stood in such need, would have been achieved in his time, and the present fallen condition of Christianity in that kingdom might have been averted; as it was, his expulsion of the Jesuits, and the bold front with which the Spanish Cabinet opposed Pope Clement, reflect credit on his memory, and show that, up to a certain point, he was not wanting in moral courage. His great defect was his absorbing love for a pastime which usurped the energy and the hours that should have been devoted to the service of the state. It would be hardly fair to reproach him—a Bourbon—with his unwillingness to restore to his provinces the liberties the founder of his dynasty had stolen from them.

By his wife, Amelia of Saxony, he had thirteen children, eight of whom died before him. Of the survivors two were daughters; one son, Philip, the eldest, was an idiot; Ferdinand, his third son, succeeded to the crown of Naples; and Carlos, the second, Prince of Asturias, ascended the Spanish throne as Carlos IV.

The twenty years which this sovereign spent on that throne were the most startling and eventful that Europe had known since Charlemagne. The French revolution, which first sowed democratic seeds on European soil—the resistless and universal reaction against ecclesiastical tyranny—the overthrow of kingdoms, and the elevation of men of the people to the sovereign rank—the convulsions which led a monarch to the scaffold, upset the whole political existence of Europe, and culminated in an era of war unprecedented in history—were all contemporaneous with the reign of Carlos IV. He ascended the throne a few months before the Bastille was attacked; his fall was the first step Napoleon took toward his ruin. To us, separated by a long lapse of time from the mighty events of those days, it would seem that not even a blacksmith or a hod-carrier living at that period could have helped acting his part in the drama, and linking his name, in some memorable way, with the deeds done around him. Yet Carlos IV., the successor of Charles V., and the inheritor of a monarchy once the greatest in the world, lived and reigned throughout the whole epoch without once raising his name to the historical level, until his vices and his fall gave him prominence. He would have been utterly insignificant had he not been conspicuously depraved. All the defects of the Bourbon kings of Spain were combined in his character, and enriched by the addition of vices to which the worst of them had been strangers. He was as weakly subservient to his wife as Philip; as imbecile and indolent as Ferdinand; as deeply absorbed in the search of pleasure as his father; and he was, what they were not, grossly addicted to sensualism; blindly attached to the superstitions of his church; and treacherous, base, and false to a degree which almost surpasses belief. To rise early, eat, pray, and hunt till noon; to dine, shoot till dark, sup, pray, and talk idly of state affairs with his wife's lover, or of other themes with the ministers to his own debauchery—such was the routine of his life; a routine, as he assured Napoleon in 1808, which had never varied since he ascended the throne.

He never pretended to perform the work of a king. When he ascended the throne he found the able Florida Blanca at the head of affairs. He made some feeble attempts to restore the Church to its old position, at the very time when the works of Voltaire and Rousseau were shaking the foundation of all religion, and tried hard to have the Holy Virgin appointed tutelary saint of Spain. He was so far successful in this design as to compel the Estates to take an oath of their belief in her immaculate conception; but the cathedral of San Jago de Compostella stood out boldly for the prior claims of their patron saint, who, as they naively assured the King, had often appeared at the head of the Spanish armies, mounted on a white charger; and Carlos ultimately recognized the propriety of allowing such claims as these to rest undisturbed. After this failure, he betook himself to his table and his chase with renewed zeal. The supreme power fell into the hands of two other persons.

These persons were Maria Louisa, the queen, and one Manuel Godoy. On the shoulders of the latter had fallen the mantle of the Princess Orsini—with this difference, that the latter had some respectable title to the rank she held, while the former had risen by means which, with all the faults of the Bourbons, had been unknown before Carlos IV. Manuel Godoy was the son of a poor noble of Badajoz. Poverty had obliged him to enlist in the life guards of the royal family. At the age of twenty-four he mounted guard at the palace. He was a fine-looking young fellow, and played the lute to perfection. This accomplishment attracted the attention of the queen, who was already tired of her husband, and Godoy became the recipient of favors which must have astonished none more than himself. Not to dwell upon trifles, he soon usurped the rightful place of the monarch, and four years after the accession of Carlos he contrived to supersede Florida Blanca, and to assume the direction of affairs in the kingdom. Being ignorant, unprincipled, and reckless, his first act was to plunge Spain into hostilities with the republic of France, and when disaster rewarded his folly, he hastened to conclude, first, the treaty of Basle, by which Spain surrendered part of her American dominions, and next the peace of San Ildefonso, by which, to conciliate France, he embroiled Spain with England. Fresh losses were the penalty of this new blunder; and the peace of Amiens again diminished the Spanish empire. It was clear that, whichever side of the contest Spain espoused, she was sure to be the loser; so Godoy, raised in consequence of his last service to the title of Prince of Peace, resolved to try a middle course, and to observe a strict neutrality between the belligerents. England consented without demur; but Napoleon, who was anxious for the assistance of Spain, demanded a tribute of something like $12,000,000 a year, as the price of renouncing so useful an ally. Godoy, taught by the loss of St. Domingo and Trinidad, consented. But Great Britain very naturally interpreted this tribute as an act of hostility, and retaliated by the battle of Trafalgar, in which the Spanish fleet was annihilated. Shortly afterward the American colonies revolted; and Napoleon, pursuing his own schemes, thought fit to dispossess the Bourbons of the throne of Naples. Such were the first fruits of Godoy's administration.

He had, in fact, thought of nothing but his own pleasure; and the King, of course, was too busy hunting, eating, and flirting with ballet-dancers, even to know what his wife's favorite was doing. Maria Louisa and Godoy consoled themselves for the loss of colonies, revenue, and fleet, in the delights of unlawful love. After the peace of Amiens, the favorite had feigned to withdraw from public business; but he obtained the appointment of generalissimo of the Spanish armies, though he was profoundly ignorant of the fundamental principles of the military art, and could not even direct a review; and was afterward honored with the rank of admiral, though it is doubtful whether he ever trod the deck of a man-of-war. He even assumed the title of "Highness," never granted to a subject. His whole business was the sale of offices, which, as Toreno confesses, he carried on to such an extent, that any one who chose to pay could obtain not only the first civil offices of state, but even the highest ecclesiastical preferment. He sold bishoprics as readily as posts of alcalde. With the money thus obtained, he and the Queen led a life of infamous scandal. Not a tinge of romance gilded their amours. Godoy was legally married to Maria Theresa de Bourbon, the King's cousin; and the unalterable affection which he inspired in the breast of Donna Josepha Tado, who bore him a large family of children, was a matter of public notoriety. We must suppose that the horrible depravity of the Spanish court had dulled all sense of feeling as well as decorum; for the philosophy with which the Queen treated the profligacy of her favorite was not more conspicuous than the lover-like regard entertained for him by the King. The account given by the Spanish writers of the condition of the court of Carlos IV. would not bear republication to-day.

All this, however, was drawing to a close. Untaught by experience, and seriously inconvenienced by the tribute exacted by Napoleon, the Prince of Peace resolved to break with France once more; and, while assuring Bonaparte of his firm friendship, actually issued to the Spaniards a violent appeal against the French. For so wretched a creature to attempt to intrigue against the great master of diplomacy was only another instance of his folly. Napoleon speedily arranged the partition of Spain with Alexander at Tilsit; and, the better to accomplish his schemes, required the Prince, who dared not openly declare himself, to send the flower of his army to Italy and the north of Europe. He then, under the transparent pretense of watching Portugal, poured a French army into Spain.

Meanwhile other cares engrossed the Prince of Peace. As often happens in monarchical countries, a violent animosity had sprung up between the heir-apparent, Ferdinand, and his father, the King. As Carlos was obviously nothing but a tool in Godoy's hands, the intrigues of the Prince of Asturias were mainly directed against him, and it soon became evident that one or the other must be ruined. Ferdinand—a weak, spiritless, vicious youth, totally destitute of filial affection—had written to Napoleon, begging the favor of being allowed to marry a princess of his family, and hinting that the price of so great an honor would be his complete subserviency to the will of the great conqueror. The letter fell into the hands of Godoy, who persuaded Carlos and Louisa to make it the basis of an accusation of high treason against their son. He was charged with no less a crime than a design to murder his father and mother, arrested, and held for trial. If no proof of the fact was adduced, the character of Ferdinand affords no presumption that such an infamy would have been too shocking for him to perpetrate. But the public indignation at what appeared to be a dark plot against the life of the heir to the throne, compelled Godoy to abandon his design. Ferdinand was liberated. Carlos wrote an abject letter to Napoleon, stating his side of the case; but the Emperor refused to interfere. His troops already held the principal fortresses in the north of Spain; his own scheme was too ripe; and the utter worthlessness of both father and son was too apparent to allow him to think of espousing the cause of either. Murat arrived at Burgos in March, 1807, and though he only assumed the title of lieutenant of the Emperor, it was palpable that his authority rendered the office of king a sinecure.

At this conjuncture the national spirit of the Spaniards was aroused. A riot broke out in Madrid, and the populace directed its fury against the favorite, whose vices and follies had, in their opinion, produced all their misfortunes.

His palace was attacked and searched. The King and Queen, who had made preparations for a flight to Mexico, were forcibly detained and forbidden to leave the kingdom. Godoy himself, at the first news of the outbreak, had fled to his garret, and covered himself with a pile of mats. Every room in his palace was ransacked by the infuriate mob, and more than once, it is said, the pikes and swords of the populace passed within a few inches of his body. Still he escaped detection for thirty-six hours. At the expiration of that time, he could no longer endure the tortures of thirst, and crawled down the stairs to procure a glass of water. On his way he was recognized and denounced. A shout of exultation burst from the mob as they seized him and hurried him they knew not whither. In the madness of their fury they threw stones, sticks, and filth at him, and wounded each other without injuring him. Torenó recounts his escape with amazement. While they were thus contending wildly for the honor of being his executioner, a few Walloon guards charged the crowd and rescued him. Two stout horsemen seized him, one by each arm, and dragged him off, more dead than alive, to the nearest jail, into which he was thrust bleeding, senseless, and covered with mire. A rescue was only prevented by the personal intervention of Ferdinand, who was implored by his mother to save "the father of her children."

Ferdinand was not the man to render a service of this kind gratuitously. The scene had been too much for the weak nerves of Carlos; and when his abdication in favor of his son was proposed, the miserable monarch eagerly embraced the suggestion. In March, 1808, one year after Murat's entrance into Burgos, Carlos announced that his infirmities obliged him to abdicate the throne; and declared that, "freely and spontaneously" he renounced the sceptre, and placed it in the hands of his "well-beloved son, Ferdinand, Prince of Asturias." The abdication was received with just such transports of delight as might have been expected from the well-known life of Carlos; and the multitude, knowing nothing of Ferdinand's disposition, hailed him as the saviour of Spain. Two hundred thousand people accompanied him on his entrance into Madrid, and threw themselves at his feet with every exclamation of joy and enthusiasm.

His first care was to obtain a recognition from Napoleon, and for this purpose envoys were sent to the Emperor with most servile professions of esteem. At the very same time, Carlos, who had repented of his descent from the throne, on receiving a kind message from the Emperor, sent word that his abdication had been extorted from him by force, and implored Napoleon to restore him. The French monarch complied with neither request, but invited Carlos and his son to meet him at Bayonne. The former, with the Queen, set out at once: the latter was at first reluctant to put himself in Napoleon's power; but the fear of his father's intrigues, and his own hopes, finally overcame his scruples, and he left Madrid with the infants for Bayonne. Carlos arrived first, and Napoleon bluntly told him he wanted a fresh abdication in his favor—promising the royal dotard a comfortable residence and plenty of money in exchange. To these conditions Carlos and Maria Louisa at once agreed, and even engaged to do their best to bully their son into abdicating his throne. When Ferdinand arrived, he was assailed not only by the French Emperor and his officers, but by his own father and mother—whose violence of language to their son seems to have amazed the by-standers: Maria Louisa is even said to have suggested his execution to Napoleon. Ferdinand resisted at first; but his weakness was not proof against the mock threats of the French generals, and he, too, ended by signing a renunciation in favor of Napoleon. Carlos and his wife, with the Prince of Peace, were sent to Compiègne. Ferdinand and the infants were granted Talleyrand's seat at Valençay, with handsome pensions.

Spain—always loyal to her kings—was frantic at the capture of Ferdinand. A desperate struggle began in every province and city, and formed the first scene of the Peninsular war. "Vencer o morir por la patria y por Fernando septimo," was the cry throughout the country. While the Spaniards were dying by the hundred in his defense, Ferdinand, his uncle, and brothers, were leading a life of ease and sloth at Valençay. They had few diversions—the uncle, Don Antonio, having strictly forbidden his nephews from entering the library, which was filled with the revolutionary publications of the eighteenth century; but Madame Talleyrand occasionally gave them a tea-party: they worked assiduously with a turning lathe, and they sometimes drove through the neighborhood to admire the scenery. Thus was spent the time of the Bourbon heir to the Spanish throne, while his country was bathed in blood. Indifference was not enough for Ferdinand; on each victory he wrote to congratulate Napoleon, and, on grand occasions, set Talleyrand's woods on fire to testify to his joy. Some years after he had been sent to Valençay, a hair-brained baron, named Kolly, contracted with the British Government to deliver him from the hands of the French. The project was insane, as the only Spanish attendant Ferdinand had was a fellow who was acting as a spy for the French Government; and one of Kolly's confederates, named Richard, soon betrayed him. He was arrested; but, to try Ferdinand's temper, Fouché sent the traitor Richard to Valençay with a feigned scheme for his escape. As the French Government had expected, Ferdinand no sooner heard Richard's tale than he at once disclosed the whole to the Governor of Valençay, and had him sent back to Paris. He desired nothing better, he said, than to remain where he was.

Five years he spent cheerfully in his prison, during which Spain was the seat of one of the most terrible wars the world has ever known. At the expiration of this period, the failure of Napoleon's expedition against Russia necessitated the recall of his troops from Spain; and he offered to reinstate Ferdinand on his throne. So wedded was the latter to his life of ease, that he evinced considerable reluctance in accepting Napoleon's proposal. His scruples were, however, overcome, and in March, 1814, Ferdinand left Valençay for Spain. The utmost enthusiasm prevailed at the news of his return. For the people of Spain, his restoration was an exchange of a French for a native master; and they warmly seconded the Cortes in welcoming him home, and offering him their support and encouragement. The intense hatred with which the French were regarded in the Peninsula, may be inferred from the following Catechism, which was taught to the village children by the priests:

- Q. Tell me, my child, who art thou?
 A. A Spaniard, by the grace of God.
 Q. Who is the enemy of our happiness?
 A. The Emperor of the French.
 Q. How many natures has he?
 A. Two; the human and the diabolical.
 Q. How many emperors are there?
 A. One, in three deceitful persons.
 Q. What are their names?
 A. Napoleon, Murat, and Manuel Godoy.
 Q. Which of the three is the most wicked?
 A. They are all three equally wicked.
 Q. From whence did Napoleon come?
 A. From sin.
 Q. Murat?
 A. From Napoleon.
 Q. And Godoy?
 A. From the infamy of the two.
 Q. What is the spirit of the first?
 A. Pride and despotism.
 Q. Of the second?
 A. Rapine and cruelty.
 Q. Of the third?
 A. Avarice, treason, and ignorance.
 Q. What are the French?
 A. Ancient Christians become heretics.
 Q. Is there any sin in putting a Frenchman to death?
 A. No, my father; we gain heaven by putting one of those dogs of heretics to death.

Like Louis XVIII., Ferdinand no sooner felt himself at liberty than he scorned all restraint. The Cortes requested him to return to Spain by one route; he took another. They stipulated that he should exile the Bonapartists—he had promised Napoleon to retain them; and, as it turned out, he acted just as suited his own purpose. He crossed the frontier in disguise, arrived at Valencia, and at once issued two decrees, disavowing the action of the Cortes, ignoring the Spanish constitution of 1812, and clearly foreshadowing a restoration of monarchy on the old Bourbon principle. Thence he repaired to Madrid, where he was received by the priests and their creatures with shouts of "Viva Ferdinand and the Inquisition!" The cry was soon justified. Ferdinand's first act was to take measures to restore the Church property and re-establish monasteries. He then dissolved the Cortes, suppressed the newspapers, and imprisoned the leaders of the democratic party in Spain, who had been so faithful to his cause during five years of exile. The concentrated tyranny of his soul began to burst forth. Friends and enemies felt his anger alike. The Bonapartists, or Josephinists as they were called, were driven from the kingdom in spite of his pledge; Cevallos, his faithful adherent and apologist, who had defended him when the prisoner of Valençay had not a friend, had to fly for his life; and the republicans were every where thrown into dungeons. Executions followed with such rapidity as to appall any nation which had not endured a six years' war. Ferdinand evidently aimed at restoring the despotism of his fathers. Weakened by the desperate contest it had waged on his behalf, and stunned by the shock of disappointment, Spain endured these atrocities in silence for six long years. Banditti scoured the country, and levied undisputed toll on villages and travelers. Priests once more fattened on the land, and good citizens starved. The King himself embroidered offerings to the Virgin, and divided his time between his confessor and his lieutenant of police. Amidst such scenes it is hardly worth while to notice such trifles as royal marriages. Ferdinand's first wife, Maria Antoinetta Theresa of Naples, an amiable and virtuous princess, had had the misfortune to acquire popularity under Carlos's reign; and, accordingly, was invited to take chocolate with her mother-in-law the Queen, and died a few hours afterward. After his coronation, Ferdinand married successively a Portuguese and a Savoy princess, both of whom died before him.

It was not to be expected that the Spanish nation would forever submit to such unbridled despotism as that of Ferdinand. In 1820, the whole country was in a ferment: Riego and Quiroga aroused a rebellion among the soldiery, and declared they would never lay down their arms till Ferdinand had accepted the constitution of 1812. As cowardly as tyrants usually are, Ferdinand gave way at the first show of force; and in March of the same year his adhesion to the famous charter of Spanish freedom was given in the principal towns. A new era seemed to dawn on Spain. Brief enough, however. Austria, Russia, and France were horrified at the victory gained by the Spanish democrats. In the hour of trouble, the Czar had recognized the government of the Cortes, and approved the Constitution of 1812; but now, Napoleon was at St. Helena, and he could afford to speak the truth. At Troppau, the Holy Alliance declared their abstract "right to interfere in the affairs of foreign nations in every case where constitutions were established not consistent with the monarchical principle, which recognizes no institution as legitimate that does not flow spontaneously from the monarch." It is rather to be regretted that, in their enthusiasm for monarchy, the allied sovereigns overlooked the case of a transatlantic Power whose institutions were slightly inconsistent with the monarchical principle, and did not "flow from any particular monarch." Had they thought of enforcing their right of interference in the affairs of the United States, Spain might possibly have preserved her freedom. Unfortunately the flagrant case of this country did not present itself to their notice; and it was resolved to make an example of Spain. One hundred thousand men were raised in France, and the greater part sent over the frontier, under the Duke d'Angouleme, to assist Ferdinand. For three years—ever since his acceptance of the Constitution—he had been occupied in conspiring against the Cortes; he now broke loose from all restraint, and declared his intention of ruling despotically. Ruined as Spain was, it was hopeless to think of a contest against the French. The republicans reluctantly accepted Ferdinand's offer of an unconditional amnesty, and abandoned their cherished hopes.

Treachery was the ruling trait of the King. No sooner had Angouleme invested Madrid, and Ferdinand felt himself surrounded by French bayonets, than he had all the democrats he could find arrested. The gallant Riego was executed at once. Quiroga escaped by a miracle. Scores of high-souled patriots were imprisoned, tortured, or executed. The dungeons overflowed with political captives. Ferdinand was once more a happy man. Strengthened by a French garrison, and fortified by the knowledge that every prominent man in Spain was either in prison or in exile, Ferdinand flattered himself that he had fairly broken the Spanish spirit, and once more resigned himself into the hands of the priests. His third wife dying, he married his relation, Maria Cristina of Naples, and became in his old age as uxorious as his ancestors. He would leave the council-chamber two or three times during the sitting to visit her, and spent the greater portion of the day in her room. The habits of the couple were primitive; they rose at six, dined alone at two, and went to bed at nine. The only amusement they took was a drive to the Zoological Garden at Madrid, where the bears and monkeys were taught to salute the King. In his latter years, Ferdinand's mind lost its powers; even his cruelty vanished, leaving his folly alone to attest his identity. At length, in 1833, Spain was delivered by his death by apoplexy.

All right-minded men justly applauded Lord Brougham when he declared in the British Parliament, before Ferdinand's death, that he was "more the object of the contempt, and disgust, and abhorrence of civilized Europe than any individual living." A countryman of our own has sketched his character in still more vivid colors. "It is hard to say," observes Mr. Wallis, "whether folly or iniquity was the prominent characteristic of that very wicked and foolish man. His only occupations in life were power, vengeance, and the gratification of his appetites. His policy had two departments—force and fraud. His only address was falsehood, and when it was not necessary to him as an instrument, he sported with it as an accomplishment or reveled in it as a luxury. He hated constitutions, because they trammelled him. He hated reform, even when it did no harm, because the constitutionalists were reformers and had befriended him, and he hated them. Having no idea of government except as the exercise of his own will, he found the ancient institutions and traditions of the kingdom as objectionable as the new lights, and he loved them all the less because he had understood none of them. Religion—though he professed it sturdily, went through its forms ostentatiously, and clung to it like a bad coward when death terrified him—he practically valued only as a lever of government. Education and literature he discouraged, because he knew nothing about them, and had an indefinite idea that they were not to be trusted. Men of learning and talent he drove as far away from him as possible, being 'as much afraid of them,' to use a phrase of Lord Chesterfield's, 'as a woman is of a gun which she thinks may go off of itself and do her a mischief.' He had, in fine, no sympathy with the feelings of his people, because he had no heart; and none with their intellectual yearnings, because he had no head. The only good thing he ever did was to die, and he did that as slowly and as unsatisfactorily as possible, having never learned in all his vicissitudes to submit with grace to necessity, and being opposed on principle to gratifying his subjects as long as he could in any way avoid it."

His old father, Carlos, had died four years before him. The climate of Compiègne not suiting him, he had removed to Marseilles, and from thence to Rome, where he spent the last twenty years of his life in unbridled excesses, with the Queen and Godoy. On his accession, Ferdinand had evinced his filial affection by stopping his father's pension; and the virtuous trio were for a time reduced to great straits. Europe, however, would not permit him to let the old man starve, and Ferdinand was compelled to make him an allowance. This ceased at his death; and Godoy, like so many other favorites, was driven in poverty to Naples.

At the demise of Ferdinand, a fierce contest for his succession took place. By the old law of Spain, females as well as males could inherit the throne; but this law had been altered by Philip V., who desired to assimilate the Spanish monarchy to that of France. Ferdinand, cajoled by his wife, Maria Cristina, had, previous to his death, repealed Philip's enactment, and, by placing the law on its old footing, secured the throne to his infant daughter, Isabella, thus excluding his brother, Carlos. The latter would not allow himself to be set aside; and prepared to assert his claims to the throne by arms. Maria Cristina, acting as regent, proclaimed her daughter queen; Carlos was proclaimed in like manner by his adherents. This was the beginning of the famous Carlist war.

Don Carlos openly proclaimed his belief in the Bourbon doctrine of divine right, and promised, in case he was successful, to re-establish the Inquisition with all its old privileges. Ten years before, this profession of faith would have insured him at least the support of the Holy Alliance; but the French revolution of 1830 had scattered that junta of despots, and Austria and Russia had their hands full at home. In 1838, fossil principles like his only earned for him public contempt, while they gained for Cristina a host of partisans. The old nobility and the priests adhered to Carlos; the mass of the people, preferring a child who might turn out well to a man whose wickedness was incurable, rallied round the regent and Isabella. A body of British volunteer troops, under General De Lacy Evans, one of the heroes of Inkermann, also marched under her banners. The war began to rage with such fury that the world stood aghast. Carlos announced that he would give no quarter; the Cristinist generals replied with a similar threat. At the commencement of hostilities in Navarre, Lorenzo, the Cristinist general, inveigled Santos Ladron, the Carlist leader, into a conference, and had him and thirty-two of his companions shot in a ditch. Searsfield was ordered by Cristina to shoot every rebel prisoner, and faithfully obeyed the infamous command. The same indiscriminate massacre was enjoined upon the Cristinist soldiers in a proclamation from Pamplona, issued in 1844. Nor were the Carlists at all behind their enemies in butchery. Cristinist prisoners were every where massacred in cold blood. Zumalacarreui, the Carlists' bravest general, was not surpassed by the most savage of the regent's officers. After the battle of Vittoria, he had some eighty to a hundred prisoners in his hands. Two out of the number having escaped, the officer in charge sent to his superior for orders. "Let the prisoners be bound hand and foot," was Zumalacarreui's answer. He was told that no cords could be had for the purpose. "Then let them be put to death." The Carlist officer, nowise astonished, ordered a corporal's guard to fix bayonets and charge in among the prisoners. The poor wretches shrieked for mercy, and clasped the knees of their murderers in frantic agony; but not one escaped. On a previous occasion he had taken prisoner a young count named Via Manuel, whose amiable character and talents induced Zumalacarreui to admit him to his society and his table, until he could be exchanged. A message to that effect had been sent to the Cristinist general, who had several Carlist prisoners in his hands. The reply was brought while Via Manuel was at table with his captor. It was laconic. Nothing but these words: "The rebels have been shot already." Zumalacarreui handed it without a word to Via Manuel, who was shot next morning. It is hard to say on which side the atrocities were the most frequent or the blackest. The Cristinos succeeded in making prisoners two daughters of Zavala, a Carlist chief, and invariably placed them in the front of their army which marched against their father. For some time this manœuvre succeeded. Zavala dared not fire on his daughters, and was obliged to retreat whenever the Cristinists advanced. But at length a sense of duty overcame his paternal affection, and on the approach of the Cristinists near Guernica, the old Carlist directed his soldiers to fire. The moment their pieces were discharged, he ordered an advance with the bayonet; and by a miraculous interposition of Providence, had the delight to rescue both his daughters unhurt in the midst of the dead and the dying. The massacre of Barcelona, at which the brave O'Donnell perished, with twenty-one others, and where the brutality of the Cristinists in mangling the dead bodies spread a feeling of horror throughout Europe, is notorious. Yet it falls into the shade in comparison with the other atrocities of the war. At Villa Franca the Cristinists, among whom were many women and children, fled for refuge into the church. The Carlists set it on fire, and bayoneted those who attempted to escape from the stifling smoke. On the other hand, Mina, the Cristinist general, shot every fifth inhabitant of a populous village, because they had failed to give him information with respect to the movements of the enemy. In short, the traveler in Spain during the Carlist war waded knee-deep in blood. It is impossible to make any distinction between the combatants. Ferdinand's widow and his brother were equally regardless of the welfare of Spain and the dictates of humanity. It seems to have been the destiny of the Spanish Bourbons to mark their track with blood.

The war ended as disgracefully as it had begun. Espartero, the Cristinist general, met Maroto, the Carlist general, at Vergara, in 1839, and offered him a round sum of money to lay down his arms. The offer was accepted. The next year Cabrera was defeated, and fled: and this destroyed the last hope of the Carlists. Thenceforth Isabella's throne was undisputed. It was not without thorns, however. Four years before, it had occurred to some factious Spaniards that it was hardly fair for the Regent Cristina to ask them to spend their blood in her service, while her rule ground them to the earth. These, and other highly impertinent pretensions for a subject to urge, were set forth, not without boisterous clamor and threats, at La Granja; and as Cristina could not help herself, she yielded, and the Constitution of 1837, an improved edition of that of 1812, was forthwith promulgated. This was not all. Like the mother of her late husband, Cristina had not allowed her position to stand in the way of her passions: a handsome fellow named Muñoz, son of a tobaccoist, had fascinated her, and she had openly presented him to Spain as her husband long before he had any legal right to the title. Besides this violation of her duty to her deceased husband, she had plundered the royal coffers with unsparing hand: while the kingdom was on the verge of bankruptcy, Muñoz and his children rolled in wealth. All this was sure to lead to a crisis. In 1840, after the Carlist war had ended, the victorious general, Espartero, called Cristina to such an account that she was obliged to fly the kingdom and take refuge in France. Espartero himself succeeded her as regent.

According to the law of Spain, he should have held the office four years; according to the will of Ferdinand, which fixed Isabella's majority at eighteen, for eight. But cabinet or rather bed-chamber intrigues in Spain invariably prevail over law and constitution; three years after Espartero became regent, Narvaez persuaded the Cortes to proclaim Isabella's majority, and the Duke of Victory, the saviour of her throne, was forced to fly precipitately to England. On 15th November, 1843, Isabella, then a child of thirteen, was declared of age by the Cortes of Spain. To teach her some smattering of her duties, Don Salustiano de Olozaga was appointed her tutor, with a seat in the cabinet. Unfortunately the queen-mother, Cristina, had been allowed to return to Spain, and hated Olozaga with a deadly feminine hatred. She heaped insult after insult on his head. The Queen invited him to dinner; Cristina's emissaries, who were in waiting at the palace, told him, when he came, that no dinner was prepared for him. Olozaga immediately answered, with admirable tact, that "he had not come to eat, but to pay his respects to the Queen," and forced his way into her presence. But Cristina had resolved on his disgrace. On the 1st of December all the dignitaries of Spain were summoned into the royal presence. There little Isabella recounted to them, with the utmost circumstantiality, how Olozaga had compelled her by violence to sign a decree for the dissolution of the Cortes a few days before. The declaration was attested by the Queen with the usual solemnity, and a cry of horror arose throughout Madrid at so gross an outrage. Fortunately for Olozaga, he possessed equal nerve and coolness. He met the charge with a bold front; and to the confusion of Cristina, who had expected that he would not have the audacity to oppose his word to that of the child-queen, he not only denied the fact, but proved its utter falsity in the Cortes. Thus, at the very commencement of her reign, poor little Isabella was convicted of uttering, under circumstances of peculiar solemnity, a deliberate falsehood, with the view of ruining one of the few honest men who surrounded her. Nothing saved her from public execration but her youth, and the general belief that her fault was chargeable on the queen-mother alone.

The latter now began to rule Spain once more. To avoid scandal, Muñoz and she resolved to follow the example of their neighbors, and to become man and wife, the former having received the title of Duke of Rianzares. To extract from suffering Spain fortunes for him and his children became Cristina's sole concern. With this view she engaged in the slave-trade, and speculated largely in railways and mines; always contriving to make money, while every one else was a loser. Wealth, however, did not cure the vices of her youth. In 1851, her intrigues, political and otherwise, became so fruitful a theme of scandal, that even Narvaez was compelled to resign his office and retire into private life. The want of his strong arm was soon felt; a few months ago his successor was driven from office by an insurgent mob, and Cristina herself was retained at Madrid in a sort of legal custody.

Isabella gladly resigned the cares of royalty into the hands of her mother and Narvaez. Her only serious occupation during the first years of her reign was to dance and to make a collection of sweetmeats which should surpass the first confectioners' shops in the world. In this she is said to have succeeded, her pastry-cook museum being pronounced perfect on all hands. Her love for truth has already been exemplified. Her gratitude and affectionate disposition are not less striking. Previous to the expulsion of her mother, the Marquesa de Santa Cruz had been her governess, and constantly received marks of intense love from the young queen. When she was exiled in 1840, Isabella received with the same affection her new aya, the widow of General Mina, and never even inquired about the marquesa's fate. So, during Espartero's regency, she expressed a warm regard for him, and had his portrait in her bedroom. When he was driven from Spain, she presented the portrait to the Señora de Mina, observing that she had no further use for it. She even violated Spanish etiquette in the tenderness of her language to Olozaga, before she told the falsehood which overthrew him.

She is as much to be pitied as disliked. As soon as she arrived at nubile years, her aunt, Carlota, wife of Don Francisco de Paula, her father's brother, tried to force her to marry her son, Francisco de Assis, an imbecile creature, who could do nothing but dance. Carlota bought a newspaper to advocate the match; and was so bent upon it, that when England and France thwarted her views, she died of the disappointment. Her scheme was carried into effect after her death. Isabella was duly married to her cousin, and the first greeting of the royal pair, it is said, was a frank confession of their dislike for one another. The birth of a child satisfied the nation; and if patriotic Spaniards occasionally gave vent to their shame at the unvailed gallantries of their queen, the bulk of the people, remembering how little Isabella's feelings had been consulted in the matter, and seeing the utter worthlessness of the man to whom she was united, forgave her for treading in her mother's footsteps. At all events, the dread of a revolution suffices to retain her on the throne.

Queen Isabel makes no pretensions to good looks. She has her father's heavy eye, coarse mouth and chin, and unintellectual expression. Her complexion is sallow, and presents a striking contrast to the girlish beauty of her sister, Louisa, wife of the Duke of Montpensier. Sulen and irritable, her gestures are rude, and her whole demeanor what we should call un ladylike. It is by no means unlikely that a hereditary predisposition to scrofula has contributed to impair her personal appearance and sour her temper.

Such is the history of the Bourbon monarchs of Spain. When we bear in mind that, with the exception of the last, all have wielded absolute authority—disposing of the life, property, and liberties of their subjects as their caprice prompted—and weigh in the balance the capacity for such a task and the fitness for such a responsibility possessed by favorite-ridden imbeciles like Philip V. and Ferdinand VI., a bigot like Carlos III., a worthless profligate like Carlos IV., a monster of perfidy and cruelty like Ferdinand VII., or a wretched girl like Isabella—we may well shed a tear over unhappy Spain, and thank Heaven that we were not born subjects of a hereditary despotism.

BABY BLOOM.

I.

THERE was not a prettier little maiden in all Harlem than Baby Bloom. Cherry-cheeked, bright-eyed, and rosy-lipped, she was the incarnation of rural health and beauty. As she ran, early in the morning, down the meadows that bordered on the river, laughing gleefully to herself, and talking to the birds as if they were old and intimate friends of hers, and had known her for years, many a youth turned his head to look at her, and had visions of her light figure and roguish eyes flitting all day afterward between him and his work.

One young fellow, in particular, was seriously troubled about Baby Bloom. Nearly every morning, as he was walking steadily to his work—he being apprenticed to a carpenter in the village—he would almost certainly encounter Baby Bloom tripping along the road, or gathering the wild plants that crept and twined through the locust fences. When the little maiden saw Reuben Lowe approaching—and I verily believe that the wicked little thing saw him long before she pretended to see him—she would turn, with a merry toss of her head, and chirp out a “Good-morrow, Master Reuben.” Then she would bend her head down, and affect to be very busy with her plants indeed. Reuben, with a hearty greeting, and somewhat rustic bow, would then stop in the centre of the road, looking very much as if he would have given one of his ears to have some pretty speech to make; Baby all the while botanizing with absorbing anxiety. “Won’t you walk a bit of the way with me, Baby?” Reuben would at last blurt out. “I walk with you, Master Reuben!” she would cry, in utter amazement; “what an idea! Go on; you will be late for your work.”

“I’ll work all the better, Baby, if you will walk a part of the way with me. Just as far as the three pollards. Do, now!”

“You are very impudent, Master Reuben, not to take an answer when you get one. I won’t walk with you.”

“Ah! but you will, though,” Reuben would cry, springing desperately over the fence, and seizing Baby’s nosegay of flowers, with which he would retreat in triumph. “Now, Baby, if you want your flowers you must come and take them.”

Baby would pretend to weep, and call Reuben a brute; and a cruel wretch. But she nevertheless would follow the flowers. Then Reuben would march backward along the road, holding the nosegay high out of Baby’s reach, and mocking all her efforts to obtain it, until they reached the three pollards, and often journeyed far beyond them, when he would relinquish his prize reluctantly, and go off to his work, thinking of nothing in the world but Baby Bloom; who, on her side, as she tripped home again, thought of nobody but Reuben Lowe.

How this little maiden came to be called Baby Bloom, I can not tell positively. I know, however, that she came of German parents, whose name, when they first settled in the village, was Blum, which in time came to be written Bloom. Why she was called Baby, is a mystery to me. She certainly was very childish-looking, and was full of juvenile tricks and innocent caprices; so that, probably, she was called so originally in sport, and the name clung to her eventually in earnest. Baby’s father was an old German emigrant, whose trade was harness-making. He had a little store in the village, filled with saddles and bridles, spurs and whips, traces and girths, and all the paraphernalia with which we moderns think it necessary to decorate our horses. He drove a thriving business; and as Baby was his only child, the people of the village settled among themselves that the twenty thousand dollars which the old man kept in the Bruderschaft Bank would become Baby’s property at his death. Baby had a mother also, an excellent old lady, with coarse skin and a thick waist, who wore seven or eight blue blankets by way of petticoats, and devoted all her spare moments to attending to her large stock of poultry. Owing to this partiality of the good lady for such species of stock, the interior of Mr. Bloom’s house somewhat resembled an aviary. But more frequently it might have been characterized as a gallinaceous hospital. Fowls in every stage of infirmity and convalescence were distributed through the establishment. There was generally a white bantam, with his leg in splints, in the parlor. Numerous maimed turkeys hobbled and gobbled about the kitchen; but it was upon a gigantic Shanghai cock, of attenuated form and feeble gait, that Mrs. Bloom’s tenderest care was lavished. This unhappy fowl had been locked out one night in the depth of winter. The next morning he was found frozen into a solid lump, and apparently dead. After incredible exertions, and a course of warm baths, brandy, and flannel wrappings, the Shanghai showed symptoms of returning animation. He presently uttered a feeble crow, and in the course of another hour staggered upon his legs. But his constitution was forever ruined. From being a cock of brave and warlike aspect, he degenerated into a bird of consumptive and rueful appearance. Nothing would fatten him. He tottered along the floor with the gait of premature old age, and his crow was weak and wheezing. Mrs. Bloom believed that something was the matter with his lungs, and he was accordingly kept on a strictly consumptive diet. He slept in a box lined with flannel, and was the only fowl of the establishment who enjoyed the privilege of entering the shop. There he would stand on the doorstep, in the sunshine, all day long, with his head sunk between his shoulders, and the tokens of a confirmed valetudinarian written in his lack-lustre eyes.

Thus Mr. and Mrs. Bloom and Baby and the fowls all lived happily enough, in their old-fashioned house, with its peaked roof and queer dingy staircases. Mr. Bloom himself was a saddler of a meditative habit. He liked his pipe and his glass of Lager Beer, and was never known to have been excited save once, and that was when the news reached him that a schooner from Bremen, laden with a large cargo of sauerkraut, had gone to the bottom in a storm. Sometimes Reuben Lowe would drop in of an evening, on pretense of smoking a pipe and having a friendly glass of beer with the old man; but I strongly suspect that the long, silent sittings were endured by Reuben more on account of the snatches of chat he occasionally had with Baby, than for any pleasure he had in the old saddler's company. Things went on this way for some time, until one evening Reuben marched into the parlor, where old Bloom was sitting alone with his pipe, and boldly asked for Baby in marriage. What internal effect this proposition had on the old gentleman no one could tell, for without even removing his pipe from between his lips, he told Reuben, in the calmest and briefest manner, to call next evening for his answer. Next evening Reuben called. He was received by Mr. and Mrs. Bloom, who, I think, put on an extra petticoat in honor of the occasion. After a short silence, Reuben was informed that his proposition could not be entertained—that he was a very excellent young man, but poor; while Baby Bloom would be possessed of such a fortune at her father's death as would entitle her to look higher than a carpenter's apprentice. I am quite sure that neither the old saddler or his wife thought there was anything cruel or contemptible in such a course. They never thought for a moment of consulting Baby herself. They looked on the whole affair as a sort of business matter, which was to be considered in a purely pecuniary light.

It was in vain that Reuben entreated and vowed. It was in vain that he asked for a conditional engagement, until he became rich, which he promised most faithfully to do, in any period of time that the old people chose to name. Mr. Bloom calmly smoked his pipe, and occasionally shook his head; and Mrs. Bloom bruised a plateful of millet-seed for a poultice that was about to be applied to the white bantam's leg. So Reuben had to depart with his rejected proposal; and as after this he came no more to smoke a pipe with the old saddler, his only opportunity of seeing Baby was in the mornings when he went to work, and then, somehow, by a singular chance, that innocent little maiden was always out gathering flowers.

II.

"When will you be back, Baby?"

"I shan't be long, mother. I will only just run down to Mrs. Foster's, to get the eggs, and shall be back in an hour at farthest."

"There's a good child. And, Baby, take particular care not to break any of the eggs. It's the only chance I have of getting any of that breed, and it won't do to lose it."

So Baby put on her wide-leafed hat, for it was summer, and giving her mother a peck on the cheek, which was meant to pass for a kiss, tripped down the road, chirping out little fragments of songs, as usual.

At the period about which I write, Harlem was not what it is now. The village consisted of a very few houses, scattered along the roadside at considerable intervals. There was no screaming locomotive flying along, in mid-air, within sight of the village. No overloaded stages lumbered along the road that lay between it and New York; and great tracks of swampy land, as yet undrained, stretched between it and the river. At the time I speak of there was much forest yet standing about Harlem. Huge masses of forest, so choked and filled with matted underwood that the daylight rarely shone upon the brown soil beneath. There were talks of bears then among the honest villagers; and black unwieldy shapes were sometimes seen stealing, of moonlight nights, through the orchards, to the great dismay of some belated youth, who made the family circle tremble that night with his account of his interview with the bear. The fierce catamount, too, lurked among the woods, and poultry-yards suffered fearfully from nocturnal depredations. Indeed, not long before, a fine boy, of some eight years old, who had wandered off into the woods to gather huckleberries, was found two days afterward with his young throat torn open, and a tuft of catamount's hair clutched desperately in his little hand.

Mrs. Foster's house lay on the road that stretches between Harlem and New Rochelle, so that Baby Bloom had, at least, a walk of a mile and a half before she could obtain the priceless eggs for which her mother sighed. But she did not mind that, for it was very early in the morning, and it was more than probable that somebody would be passing along on his way to work. So Baby Bloom tripped merrily on, and sang, as she went, a pretty little love ditty about a maiden who followed her lover to sea, and was discovered by him just as the ship was going down. She reached the old locust fence, and, of course, could not miss the opportunity of gathering a nosegay, so she crept through, and was soon plucking, with dainty care, sprigs of lobelia and golden-rod. But now and again she would stop and listen, as if watching for some familiar step, and hearing it not, would resume her task with a mournful expression, and her song would have a sadder cadence.

Presently one that was overlooking her would have seen a sudden change come over Baby Bloom. He would have seen her eyes suddenly brighten, and her cheeks flush. He would also have seen her turn her back resolutely to a certain point of the road, and bend over a piece of convolvulus, as if nothing on earth would ever induce her to look up again. The cause of all this strategy seemed to be nothing more or less than the echoes of a sturdy step upon the road. Tramp, tramp, it came along, and the nearer it came the more steadfastly did Baby Bloom consider the physical economy of the convolvulus. Presently the footsteps came to a halt, and were followed by a creaking of the locust fence, and a heavy thud upon the turf.

"Oh, ho!" thought Baby Bloom, "so you come over the fence to-day without saying, 'By your leave,' Master Reuben. It will go hard with me if I don't punish your impertinence." So she continued to remain quite oblivious of the footsteps, until at last a heavy hand was laid upon her shoulder.

"Oh! is that you?" said Baby, carelessly, without even lifting her head, "there—I can't attend to you now. I am busy."

"It is me, my pretty lass," replied a harsh, powerful voice, "and I am glad to see such a pretty maiden gathering such pretty flowers."

Baby started as if a dagger had been thrust suddenly through her heart. It was not Reuben's voice! She lifted her eyes hurriedly, and, although she did not scream, her lips and cheeks became deadly pale. A tall and singular-looking man was standing over her. His hair, which was bright auburn, hung down over his shoulders in huge tangled masses, and mingled with his matted yellow beard. His face was thin and pale, and his eyes seemed what might be called a fiery blue. His entire appearance was wild and strange. His clothes were torn and dusty, and a curious chain, formed of pine cones strung together, hung around his neck. His glance was wonderfully restless, and a convulsive nervous twitching seemed to play continually around the corners of his mouth. He certainly was far from being the kind of person that a timid little maiden of sixteen would choose for the companion in a tête-à-tête.

Baby Bloom was still with terror as this wild being disclosed himself to her. She still knelt, with the flowers grasped tightly in her hand, gazing fixedly up at him with her large, round blue eyes. A terror that she could not analyze or account for, seemed to have taken possession of her. This man, as yet, had committed no act of violence, nor did he seem intent on such, yet she felt as if she was about to be overwhelmed with some terrible misfortune.

"Well, sweet lass, this is a merry morning," he continued, in a deep, lugubrious tone that contrasted strangely with his avowed appreciation of the bright sunshine and fragrant fields.

"Yes, Sir!" answered Baby Bloom, almost mechanically, never for a moment taking her eyes from his face.

"A merry morning, a merry morning!" he rapidly went on. "The birds are well to-day, lass. My son, the Oriole, came to see me this morning in the gray of the dawn, and told me he was going to give a banquet in the woods to-day, so I came for you."

"For me, Sir!" gasped poor Baby Bloom, still deeper stricken with increasing terror. "Oh! I can not go—I must go to Mrs. Foster's," and she made an effort to rise, but she had scarcely got to her feet when the man caught her hand and held it tightly. Poor Baby felt as if her last hour was come. "Oh, let me go, Sir!—do let me go!" she pleaded, in almost a whisper, for terror had nearly taken away her voice. "My mother is waiting for me, and I am in haste."

"We will have a glorious time of it," pursued the maniac, heedless of her entreaties. Cat-bird and his wife are coming, and all the squirrels are out gathering nuts for the dessert. Besides," he continued, lowering his tone to a whisper, "the Regulus Cristata has promised to come, and bring his top-knot with him!" And he looked at Baby Bloom as if he expected her to be completely overwhelmed by this astounding information.

"Oh!" cried Baby, her eyes filling with tears, and her little heart lying as still in her bosom as a frightened bird in its nest—"oh! if Reuben were only here;" and for a moment she listened intently, thinking she might hear his footstep on the road. But there came no sound. Seeing her so still, the man let drop her hand, and moved away a pace or two, still watching her intently.

"I am the Cock of the Rock, my dear," said he, bowing with much solemnity as he thus introduced himself. "We will make a nest together."

Baby shrank so far into a bunch of sumach, that it seemed as if she really was about to take the hint, and commence the process of nidification immediately.

"I never felt in better plumage," went on her strange companion, rustling his arms as if they were a gorgeous pair of wings; "I am quite over my moulting."

If Baby could have laughed, or if she had a laugh in her, it would certainly have come out at that moment. But the terror that so filled her little heart left no space for any mirthful feeling, and this mad talk seemed to her so awful, that, by a sudden and almost superhuman effort, she sprang to her feet and strove to fly. In an instant, with a weird, unearthly cry, the madman had pounced upon her, lifted her delicate form in his sinewy arms as if she had been a bunch of ostrich plumes, and before she could draw breath twice was scudding with her on his shoulder across the lonely fields.

She did not scream. She could not scream. She lay quite still in a trance of terror. The fields across which they sped were blooming with the crimson tufts of the sumach. The golden-rod lifted up its tall spires from out the parched grass, and the blackbird sat upon the maple bough and sang short love-songs to his dusky mate. She noted all these things idly as her captor bounded along with the sinewy speed of a deer. Then she began to think of Reuben. How he would come along the road, watching for her; and how sadly he would go to his work when he found she was not at the old place. She tried to think what her mother and father would do, when it was discovered that she was gone—for she did not even feed herself with the hope of ever seeing them again—and wondered if the white bantam would miss her. She thought, of course, that this wild man would kill her when he got her into the woods, and racked her brain in trying to imagine the way in which her murder would be accomplished. Whether it would be a stick or a stone; or whether he would light a fire, and dance round her while she was burning, as she had heard the Indians did of old. Now and then she would wearily strain her eyes across the green fields in search of some familiar face—there lurked a faint hope of Reuben's help in her heart yet—but she saw nothing but yellow fields dotted with patches of fiery sumach, with here and there a lonely pond, fringed with hazel copses, into which she sometimes thought the maniac was about to plunge her.

Thus they drew nearer and nearer to the huge lonely woods that stretched away far into the interior of the island; and as Baby Bloom approached their sombre edges, they seemed to her like some black ocean in which she was about to be engulfed.

They were soon immersed in the forest. A deep twilight, that only half revealed the path, made it all the more frightful. Here and there the sunlight struggled into an open patch, and taking the hues of the autumn leaves through which it passed, painted the ground like the floor of a cathedral when the day illuminates its stained windows. Baby Bloom was now getting very weak and exhausted. The attitude in which she was held by the wild man was distressing in the extreme, and her slight frame was almost breaking as he folded her in his arms. Once or twice she essayed a sort of plaintive remonstrance with him, and tried to bribe or cajole him into setting her free; but as the only reply she got was an unearthly hallo, and an increased rate of speed, she gave up all hope of escape by fair means, and had little prospect of getting her liberty by foul ones.

At last they reached a species of open glade far away in the interior of the forest. A huge evergreen oak lifted its sturdy limbs in the centre of the open patch, and spread them abroad until they touched the trees that encircled it. Here the maniac stopped, and placed Baby Bloom on the ground. Poor thing! between fright and exhaustion, her limbs were so weak that she could not stand; so that the moment her feet touched the sward she sank at full length.

"Now, my lass," said the maniac, gazing at her with an approving smirk, "we'll build our nest here, up in that tree"—pointing to the oak—"and it shall be so handsome that the Regulus Cristata will die of envy. But we must hasten," he continued rapidly; "the sun is nearly at noon, and the birds will be here before long. Besides, if we haven't finished to-night, the moon will scold us. And oh! how bitter she is when she is angry. Her words are like ice—so cold, so cold! and she pours them down straight on your head until they cut in—in to the brain, and freeze it up forever. We must not anger the moon, my lass. Come, let us gather moss."

So saying, and heedless whether Baby obeyed him or not, he stooped down and commenced gathering the thick moss that grew all round the place. Several times Baby Bloom thought that his attention would be so occupied with his task that she might manage to steal away unseen. But no! his glance was ever restless and wary, and she had nothing left but to sit still, and watching, praying to Heaven, with all the strength of her young soul, that help might come. She did not long remain so, however. The maniac had soon collected a huge pile of moss, and when he had disposed of it in a heap in the centre of the open space, he beckoned to her imperiously. She did not stir.

"Come!" he cried impatiently, stamping his foot.

"Please—please let me go home, Sir—to my mother—to Reuben. Oh! do let me go!" and Baby wept, and wrung her hands, but did not rise.

"We are wanted up there!" he whispered, pointing mysteriously to a high cleft in the great oak. "We must go."

Baby Bloom clasped her hands in despair, and rocked to and fro on the earth; but the maniac did not give her much time for inactive sorrow, for he seized her once more, and hoisting her on his shoulder, commenced crawling up the rugged trunk of the tree with almost supernatural agility and strength. Higher and higher he climbed until he reached a portion where disease had eaten a large cavity into one of the huge main branches; and this hole, surrounded as it was with twisted limbs, formed a sort of niche in which a couple of persons might easily sit.

"This is to be our nest," he cried triumphantly, as he swung Baby Bloom inside. "Here we'll sit and sing all day long. You sing, don't you? Sing me a song, my Bee-bird."

He looked so imperious and kingly as he said this, sitting at the threshold of the little niche, and had such a dangerous intermittent fire in his blue eye that Baby dared not refuse. So, in hopes that by falling in with his humor she might succeed in softening his heart a little, she began a tremulous ditty that gradually quavered off into a burst of tears. He scarce appeared to listen, and before she ended burst into another fit of talking.

"I am the Chlamydera Maculata, a spotted bower-bird," he went on. "I am principally to be found in New South Wales, and am very abundant at Bezi, on the river Mokai. I am very shy, and my habits are with difficulty observed by naturalists. Mr. Gould gives an excellent description of the manner in which I build my nest. I live in the Australian plains, which are studded with the acacia pendulata; and the bower which I construct, and from which I take my name, is very curious, exhibiting traces of a remarkable architectural faculty."

Baby, to whom this scientific rigmarole was utterly unintelligible, gazed at him with mingled terror and wonder. Suddenly the quick ear of her companion caught some sound in the forest, for he arrested his disquisition, and bept forward anxiously, and listened in perfect silence. Then the sound struck on Baby's ear—a faint hallo, far, far away. Oh! how her heart beat, and how she prayed to God that it might be faithful Reuben seeking for her! Then came the yelp of a dog, growing louder and more furious each moment. It was certainly some one on her track. The maniac grew restless. He fitted like a monkey from bough to bough, casting fiery glances of suspicion at Baby, who sat in her cell with blanched cheeks and clasped hands, listening with all her might. Now the sounds came very near, and Baby, feeling that the time was come, poured forth all her long pent-up terror in one shrill and echoing shriek. It was answered instantly by a shout. The maniac sprang with a howl toward her, when the copse crashed, a small dog leaped panting into the open space. Baby Bloom uttered a cry of joy, and the next moment she saw Reuben Lowe at the foot of the tree gazing up at her.

III.

"Baby, dear Baby! are you safe?" cried Reuben, striving with glances of intensest anxiety to penetrate the thick foliage by which she was screened.

"Quite safe, dear Reuben. But for God's sake take me down out of this."

"In a moment, Baby;" and the next instant Reuben was swiftly creeping up the trunk. But he reckoned without his host. The instant the maniac saw his design, he swung himself with lightning-like rapidity from branch to branch, until he reached the first fork of the tree, and there he waited, peering down into Reuben's ascending face with his fiery blue eyes.

"Let me up, scoundrel," said Reuben, as he neared the fork. "Let me up, or I will kill you."

"Whoo! I am the Cock of the Rock! You shall not rob my nest, or catch my little singing Bee-bird. Whoo!" and the maniac grinned and shouted and flung his arms fiercely about.

Reuben, with a powerful effort, strove to swing himself into the fork, but his opponent was too quick for him, and striking Reuben a fearful blow in the chest with his foot, he flung him, stunned and bruised, to the ground. Baby Bloom from her nest above uttered a faint shriek, and the maniac laughed and shouted, and joyously proclaimed himself to be a number of strange birds one after the other.

Reuben though bruised, was not, however, disabled. He was on his legs in an instant, and after a moment's reflection ran to the foot of a large locust-tree whose branches intermingled with those of the oak. With an agility that could scarcely be expected after his late tremendous fall, he swarmed up the trunk like a wild cat, and the next instant was speeding up through the limbs until he reached one that projected into the leafy heart of the oak-tree. His face was very pale, but his brows were knit darkly, and Baby Bloom could see that he was determined to rescue her at the cost of his life. When he reached the bough, he ran out lightly along the swaying pathway it formed, and the maniac, divining his intention, sprang up the oak boughs to meet him.

"Have no fear, Baby," he cried, as he reached the very end, which swung beneath his weight as if it would break each moment. "I will be with you in a moment. Have courage, lass!" So saying, he leaped boldly into the oak branches, clutching desperately at the nearest ones. Fortunately he succeeded in grasping one strong enough to bear him, just as the maniac reached him. Reuben, now certain of his footing, turned furiously on his opponent, and caught him by the throat with the only hand which he had at liberty. The boughs of the sturdy old tree shook and heaved with the struggle, and the birds flew screaming around the glade. The contest, however, was but brief, for the madman, finding himself overpowered, let go his hold, and dropped with the lightness of a cat upon the sward beneath. The next instant Reuben had Baby in his arms.

There was no time, however, to be lost in caresses. Reuben explained in a few words that Baby had been missed—that the whole village was out in search of her, and that her father and mother were traversing the fields like wild people, looking for their child. He further added, what perhaps Baby was not sorry to hear, that old Bloom had told Reuben that if he brought back his daughter in safety his suit, once rejected, would be so no longer.

This safety was not yet assured. The mad creature beneath seemed possessed with a demon. He foamed, and shrieked, and flung up stones and fragments of turf into the tree, and Reuben felt sorely puzzled how to get Baby down in the face of so infuriated a maniac. He first thought of descending himself, and endeavoring to secure him, and bind him hand and foot. But there was the chance of his failing in the attempt, and if the madman conquered him, Baby was again at his mercy. Neither did he like to wait for the chance of assistance arriving, for night was falling rapidly, and it was more than probable that those who were on the same errand as himself would not pass that way. He was completely at bay, and racked his brain to no purpose for some means of escape.

He was soon roused into activity. The madman, with the devilish cunning so characteristic of the insane, was busy in piling the dry moss he had gathered about the base of the oak. Reuben also saw him take a box of lucifer matches from his pocket. It was clear that his intention was to burn them down. Reuben knew from experience that a forest in autumn was but too easily ignited, and he shuddered at the horrible fate that awaited Baby and himself, if the maniac was not in some way arrested in his purpose.

Bidding Baby remain perfectly still, he crept gently out on one of the lower branches, directly overhanging the spot where the madman was striving to ignite a match. He was so occupied with his fiendish task that he did not once look up. Reuben let himself down until he swung by his arms, and poised himself exactly over the stooping figure beneath. Then breathing a prayer to Heaven for his success, he dropped. He fell on the madman with a fearful crash. There was a fierce groan, as he tumbled over on the sward, and when he rose, half expecting to find a deadly grasp upon his throat, a black mass, that lay quivering, as if in the last agonies, at the base of the tree, was all that could be seen. A shout of joy announced to Baby Bloom her safety, and in another moment she and Reuben were kneeling on the turf, with entwining arms, thanking God for their escape.

Baby's entrance that night into Harlem was indeed triumphal. Every neighbor within three miles hastened to old father Bloom's, and she had to tell her story over and over again, until she grew so weary that she nodded over the most thrilling portions. And brave Reuben Lowe was a hero for many a day after, and when next New Year he and Baby were married in the old wooden church, every one said that he deserved to win her, and that God would bless their union. Even the consumptive Shanghai was heard to utter a joyful crow on that solemn occasion, which so delighted Mrs. Bloom, that she began to entertain serious doubts whether the affection of the chest under which her favorite labored might not be cured after all.

The poor maniac, whose body was found in the forest the same evening, proved to be a crazy ornithologist, who had escaped weeks before from his keeper, and his death, however unavoidable, was the only drawback to the wedded happiness of Reuben and Baby Bloom.

When the heroine of this little story told me the main facts herself, the other day in Harlem, there was a second Baby Bloom running about the floor. Let us hope that if she wins as brave a husband as Reuben, it will not be such a terrible adventure as that by which her mother gained her heart's desire.

AN EPISODE OF THE WAR.

"IF you had a brother there, I could understand it; or if you were going to nurse some old friend; but, as it is, I must say, Sara, this sudden resolution of yours seems to me a very wild-goose scheme," said Mr. H—— to his sister-in-law, as they walked before a handsome summer residence in the gray twilight of a quiet and pensive autumnal afternoon.

"Every Englishman is a brother to me, and a friend also, in one sense," answered Sara, gently yet firmly; "and you well know, George, that my resolution is not a sudden one by any means. Besides, you must recollect how many things have occurred to make me feel that it is right for me to undertake this duty. Remember how peculiarly I have been fitted and prepared for the work. You can not have forgotten that terrible accident at the coal-pits, and how much of the care of the sufferers devolved upon me. And then that awful cholera time! Oh, George! you can not but feel that, far from embarking in a wild-goose scheme, I am only following a course which, without any seeking of mine, has been pointed out to me."

"But you seem to forget, Sara, that it was your own people whose sufferings you relieved, and that the accident took place on Henry's estate. Again, in that cholera time—awful you may well call it—all the sick were known to you; they were your brother's tenants. You had visited them in their own cottages, had made intimate acquaintance with every man, woman, and child among them, before those who were taken ill had been removed to the Hall—a rather Quixotic proceeding, as I still think it was, on Henry's part; but, of course, he is at liberty to do what he pleases. Yet, Quixotic as I have always thought him, I am really very much surprised that he should have given his approval to such a scheme as this. What he and Edith can be thinking of to allow you to go, passes my powers of comprehension!" And here the worthy gentleman shook his head, and quickened his steps in proportion as his vexation rose higher, while glancing at the handsome but delicate-looking woman walking by his side, and thinking how unfitted she was, alike by nature and gentle nurture, for the scenes she must encounter in the hospitals at Scutari.

"What Henry and Edith are thinking of," said Sara, "I can readily tell you. They are thinking that I ought not to shrink from a work for which I have been, as it were, educated. They feel that, in becoming nurse, I am not forsaking duties of more paramount importance. They know, by experience, that I have strength and nerve sufficient for any demands that are likely to be made upon either. They have seen that it was not without a struggle I made up my mind at first, but that afterward I considered it the greatest privilege that had ever been bestowed upon me to be allowed to join that devoted band of women who are using all their energies in the noblest work in which woman can be engaged." And while Sara spoke, her deep-blue eyes brightened, even though they were filling with tears, and her mouth quivered with emotion. But she hastily wiped away her tears, and resumed her expression of calm composure, when her brother-in-law, in a slightly sarcastic tone, replied,

"Oh! if you are going to fly away on your enthusiastic wings, you must excuse me from attempting to follow you. I only profess to look at the common-sense view of the matter; and, notwithstanding all your arguments, you have failed to make me see the propriety of an English lady, brought up as you have been in the midst of every luxury, and carefully guarded from the sight and sound of every thing which, for one moment, might shock a woman's delicacy or refined taste, voluntarily exposing herself to the chance—nay, the certainty—of witnessing scenes which ought never to pass before her eyes, and hearing expressions which ought never to enter her ears. You do not know what soldiers are, Sara. You have no conception of the sort of conversation which takes place among them; you can not possibly form any idea of the wickedness and ribald conversation of their camps and barracks; and you must not expect that because they have been wounded, because they have lost an arm or a leg, they will be transformed into different men. On the contrary, it is in the midst of sickness and suffering that character often shows itself most clearly; and what the real character of most of these men is, I am certainly better able to judge than you. It is very different, let me tell you, from a lady's beau-ideal of a preux chevalier. Then, when they are beginning to recover! Good heavens! that you should be exposed to the chance of hearing their coarse jests, their profane language! No; the more I think of it, the more I am convinced that you are all wrong. Your motive is a good one, but you will forever repent the delusion into which it has led you."

"If I had not prayed often and earnestly to be guided aright," answered Sara, in a low and reverential tone, "then, perhaps, I might have doubted whether I was not undertaking something which was beyond my powers, and out of my province. But ever since it was proposed to me to offer myself—you must recollect that the suggestion, in the first instance, did not come from me—I have met with every encouragement to proceed. I am not blinding my eyes to what I shall have to encounter. And if it should unhappily be as you say, it will only make me feel that it would have been far worse if women had not been there, in some degree to check it by their presence. As for the recollection of it, I have no doubt that it will very soon pass away from my memory."

"All very well, Sara, if there were not others better qualified for the work than you. Far be it from me to wish that our brave wounded men should not all have proper attendance and attention given to them. But this will be much better provided by people who have been regularly brought up to the work—proper hospital nurses, endowed with more physical and mental strength of a certain kind than English ladies can boast, or, indeed, I for one should wish to see them possess. You think, perhaps, you are doing these soldiers a kindness by going out to wait upon them. You fancy most likely that some of them will be gratified by the attendance of real ladies. You will find out that all this is nothing but a species of self-deception. Depend upon it, our soldiers will much prefer being taken care of by people selected from their own class of life, and will only feel awkward, uncomfortable, and constrained, under the nursing of persons so different in every way from those to whom they are accustomed."

"Oh, George! if there were a sufficient staff of proper hospital nurses, I should never for a moment have thought of offering my services. Do you fancy that it costs me nothing to leave this dear place, and still dearer friends? Do you think I would, for a moment, have acceded to the wish of those who have asked me to bid farewell for a time, we know not how long, to all that makes life pleasant or lovely, if I had thought there were others better qualified for the work than I? It was the conviction of the want of such properly-qualified people which mainly induced me to think of becoming a hospital nurse. Surely, if the common run of nurses are spoken of as 'persons accustomed to drown disgust in brandy,' they can not be the right description of people to send out as attendants upon our wounded men. Believe me, that, after all, arduous though our duties may be, they will not be half so trying or distressing as you are apt to imagine." And Sara looked at her brother-in-law with a cheering smile on her face, which ought to have chased every doubt and cloud from his mind, if he had not been so wedded to his common-sense notions—and something more than common sense is needed to understand the motives which prompt to such undertakings.

"But consider what your going out entails," he continued; "you are obliged to take a servant to cook for you, and wait upon you, and separate accommodation must be provided for you; whereas, had common hospital nurses alone been sent out, they would have required no better quarters than such as the wounded men have assigned to them; and if they themselves had been attacked by sickness, they would not have felt the want of comforts which to ladies are indispensable."

"In that case we shall have our own servants to wait upon us, and they will see that we want for nothing that is really necessary. Besides, they will be able to give us help in many things, such as preparing little remedies for the sick, and assisting us in our care of them in more ways than I have time to tell you of just now," said Sara, looking heartily weary of the discussion.

"Well, my dear Sara, I suppose a willful woman must have her way. I am sure you will believe that, although I have thought it right to tell you some of my objections (I have still several others left, which I may give you at some future time), I fully appreciate the generous devotion and unselfish enthusiasm which induces you to leave a happy home, and friends who dearly love you, in order to go and soften the sufferings of our brave fellow-countrymen by your presence and care."

So saying he held out his hand, and fondly was its pressure returned by his sister, though the only words she spoke were:

"Ah, George! the sunshine of my life is over. It is long since I was made to know that I must try to live for the many, instead of devoting myself only to one. You understand me now."

Shift we the scene. Time has passed, and with it many brave souls have been borne on the sulphurous smoke of cannon from a field of blood to the judgment-seat of God. An awful change! The battles of the Alma, Balaklava, and Inkermann, have been fought, and before the yet unbreached walls of Sebastopol a decimated, but undaunted army, lies intrenched. To the desperate and tenacious valor both of Frank and Anglo-Saxon, let the ravages of famine, pestilence, and war bear undying testimony. But, alas! the ends by which such glory is attained only put our civilization and Christianity to the blush. History dares not record, and the world strives to forget them.

History does not tell how many of France and England's bravest soldiery die with curses and imprecations on their lips, and murder in their hearts! History does not tell of the grief, anxiety, and final despair of widowed wives and orphaned children! History tells not the tale of long-protracted suffering, to which death comes as a blessed boon! History does not tell how many stout yeomen would forfeit their claims, even to courage itself, to be once more at their own cottage firesides! History does not truly paint the agony of a single dying soldier on the field! But we can see him. Now he raises himself wearily on his arm amidst a heap of hostile slain—man and beast. The sea of battle has rolled over the adjoining hill, and is hidden from his view. No succor is near. Mercy has mantled her face for very shame. Yet he fought like a Roman for his household gods in the very fiercest of that fiery charge! Damp dews are on the ground. His wounded limbs are already stiffened with cold, and the dusky shadows of night—the precursors of death—are creeping on.

Hark! the tumultuous tide is borne hitherward again. But what mockery to him is that shout of victory! What cares he, at such a moment, to see the red cross or the tricolor carried triumphantly into the heart of the enemy's ranks! His eyes do not glisten now at the sight of those retreating masses of disordered chivalry. The tramp of horses, and the thunder of artillery, are no longer heeded by him; for the heart of the dying soldier, if heart he has, is far, far away. Home, wife, friends, pass in dreary array, to haunt and torment him to the grave. There let him rest. The "pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war" have faded away, and the realities of this royal pastime stand unmasked. They are ruin, despair, death.

Ay, Famine, Pestilence, and War, in the allied armies of France and England, have not left their work incomplete. Ship-loads of sick and wounded are taken from the scene of carnage. Tossed upon the stormy waves of the Euxine during several days, many die before they reach their destined asylum. But vessel after vessel arrives with its freight of human suffering, and the great hospital at Scutari is speedily filled.

The noble women who left England to nurse the wounded soldiers were already engaged in their arduous labors. Sara, too, was there. She had soothed the last moments of many a sufferer, and now looked pale and wearied with unwonted exertion. The sight of their agony was almost greater than she could bear—far, far more terrible than she had ever anticipated. She, too, found that there were realities in war over which history silently draws a veil. Man can face the battle-field, but with all his hardihood and courage he will shrink from the hospital. Woman's fortitude is required there.

Yet Sara did not falter in her self-imposed task, though words in unknown tongues, shrieks of pain, mutterings of prayer, and even execrations were often her only reward. Though uncounted, mutilated forms, which once gloried in the perfection of manly strength and beauty, constantly met her eye, she still persevered with unswerving fidelity to the cause in which she was engaged. A deaf ear was never turned by her to the sufferer's entreaties, especially when they came from one of her own countrymen. The same sympathy, care, and attention was bestowed upon all.

On the day of which we speak, many new patients were brought into the hospital. It was a solemn and distressing sight. Here was a tall grenadier who had lost both his legs, and, though he was now dying in great agony, no murmur or other indication of pain escaped his lips. It was the stoicism of a Spartan hero! From the damp perspiration collected on his forehead, you might conceive somewhat of the agony he endured.

Another near him—in the wild delirium of fever—fancied himself in a cavalry charge, trampling down the enemy's infantry, while he shouted again and again as in the frenzy of the fight. Further on, might be heard shrieks or low convulsive moanings, which told their own tale. A few seemed resigned to their fate, and others were silently praying their last prayer.

Among these, was one brought in that same morning. He had been desperately wounded at Balaklava, and life was now fast ebbing away. Judging from his ghastly face and closed eyelids, he seemed unconscious of all around. He might have been thirty-five years of age, and was doubtless above the rank of a common soldier, for there was a noble appearance about his features, wasted and haggard though they were with suffering, which would have arrested the attention of the most casual observer.

"Who is he?" whispered one of the nurses to Sara.

"Which one?"

"There. He opens his eyes and seems to be looking at you. Do you know him?"

She half uttered a shriek.

"Why, what's the matter?"

But Sara was on her knees now by the bedside. And while her companions were wondering at her emotion, she had placed her arm around the sick man's head, speaking fondly, passionately, and, as they fancied, incoherently to him. His eyes, turned with a troubled expression toward hers, rested there long ere they betrayed any sign of recognition. At last the light of memory flashed over the features of the dying man. He could not speak, but he smiled; and it was a smile that death could not banish from his face. The struggling spirit had quietly severed the silver cord that bound it to earth even then, and the sobs of the kneeling woman were not needed to reveal the secret of a long-cherished but hopeless love.

THE NEWCOMES.*

MEMOIRS OF A MOST RESPECTABLE FAMILY.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

IN WHICH BENEDICK IS A MARRIED MAN.

WE have all heard of the dying French Duchess, who viewed her coming dissolution and subsequent fate so easily, because she said she was sure that Heaven must deal politely with a person of her quality. I suppose Lady Kew had some such notions regarding people of rank: her long suffering toward them was extreme; in fact, there were vices which the old lady thought pardonable, and even natural, in a young nobleman of high station, which she never would have excused in persons of vulgar condition.

Her ladyship's little knot of associates and scandal-bearers—elderly rouds and ladies of the world, whose business it was to know all sorts of noble intrigues and exalted tittle-tattle; what was happening among the devotees of the exiled court at Frohsdorf; what among the citizen princes of the Tuileries; who was the reigning favorite of the Queen-mother at Aranjoz; who was smitten with whom at Vienna or Naples; and the last particulars of the chroniques scandaleuses of Paris and London; Lady Kew, I say, must have been perfectly aware of my Lord Farintosh's amusements, associates, and manner of life, and yet she never, for one moment, exhibited any anger or dislike toward that nobleman. Her amiable heart was so full of kindness and forgiveness toward the young prodigal, that, even without any repentance on his part, she was ready to take him to her old arms, and give him her venerable benediction. Pathetic sweetness of nature! Charming tenderness of disposition!

With all his faults and wickednesses, his follies and his selfishness, there was no moment when Lady Kew would not have received the young lord, and endowed him with the hand of her darling Ethel.

But the hopes which this fond forgiving creature had nurtured for one season, and carried on so resolutely to the next, were destined to be disappointed yet a second time, by a most provoking event which occurred in the Newcome family. Ethel was called away suddenly from Paris by her father's third and last paralytic seizure. When she reached her home, Sir Brian could not recognize her. A few hours after her arrival, all the vanities of the world were over for him: and Sir Barnes Newcome, Baronet, reigned in his stead. The day after Sir Brian was laid in his vault at Newcome—a letter appeared in the local papers addressed to the Independent Electors of that Borough, in which his orphaned son, feelingly alluding to the virtue, the services, and the political principles of the deceased, offered himself as a candidate for the seat in Parliament now vacant. Sir Barnes announced that he should speedily pay his respects in person to the friends and supporters of his lamented father. That he was a staunch friend of our admirable constitution, need not be said. That he was a firm, but conscientious upholder of our Protestant religion, all who knew Barnes Newcome must be aware. That he would do his utmost to advance the interests of this great agricultural, this great manufacturing county and Borough, we may be sure he avowed; as that he would be (if returned to represent Newcome in Parliament) the advocate of every rational reform, the unhesitating opponent of every reckless innovation. In fine, Barnes Newcome's manifesto to the Electors of Newcome was as authentic a document, and gave him credit for as many public virtues, as that slab over poor Sir Brian's bones in the chancel of Newcome church; which commemorated the good qualities of the defunct, and the grief of his heir.

In spite of the virtues, personal and inherited, of Barnes, his seat for Newcome was not got without a contest. The dissenting interest and the respectable liberals of the Borough wished to set up Samuel Higg, Esq., against Sir Barnes Newcome; and now it was that Barnes's civilities of the previous year, aided by Madame de Moncontour's influence over her brother, bore their fruit. Mr. Higg declined to stand against Sir Barnes Newcome, although Higg's political principles were by no means those of the honorable Baronet; and the candidate from London, whom the Newcome extreme radicals set up against Barnes, was nowhere on the poll when the day of election came. So Barnes had the desire of his heart; and, within two months after his father's demise, he sat in Parliament as Member for Newcome.

The bulk of the late Baronet's property descended, of course, to his elder son: who grumbled, nevertheless, at the provision made for his brothers and sisters, and that the town-house should have been left to Lady Ann, who was too poor to inhabit it. But Park Lane is the best situation in London, and Lady Ann's means were greatly improved by the annual produce of the house in Park Lane; which, as we all know, was occupied by a foreign minister for several subsequent seasons. Strange mutations of fortune; old places; new faces; what Londoner does not see and speculate upon them every day? Celia's boudoir, who is dead with the daisies over her at Kensal Green, is now the chamber where Delia is consulting Dr. Locock, or Julia's children are romping: Florio's dining-tables have now Pollio's wine upon them: Calista, being a widow, and (to the surprise of every body who knew Trimalchio, and enjoyed his famous dinners) left but very poorly off, lets the house and the rich, chaste, and appropriate-planned furniture, by Dowbiggin, and the proceeds go to keep her little boys at Eton. The next year, as Mr. Clive Newcome rode by the once familiar mansion (whence the hatchment had been removed, announcing that there was in celo quies for the late Sir Brian Newcome, Bart.), alien faces looked from over the flowers in the balconies. He got a card for an entertainment from the occupant of the mansion, H. E., the Bulgarian minister; and there was the same crowd in the reception-room and on the stairs, the same grave men from Gunter's distributing the refreshments in the dining-room, the same old Smea, R.A. (always in the room where the edibles were), cringing and flattering to the new occupants; and the same effigy of poor Sir Brian, in his deputy-lieutenant's uniform, looking blankly down from over the sideboard, at the feast which his successors were giving. A dreamy old ghost of a picture. Have you ever looked at those round George IV.'s banqueting hall at Windsor? Their frames still hold them, but they smile ghostly smiles, and swagger in robes and velvets which are quite faint and faded: their crimson coats have a twilight tinge: the lustre of their stars has twinkled out: they look as if they were about to flicker off the wall and retire to join their originals in limbo.

Nearly three years had elapsed since the good Colonel's departure for India, and during this time certain changes had occurred in the lives of the principal actors and the writer of this history. As regards the latter, it must be stated that the dear old firm of Lamb Court had been dissolved, the junior member having contracted another partnership. The chronicler of these memoirs was a bachelor no longer. My wife and I had spent the winter at Rome (favorite resort of young married couples), and had heard from the artists there Clive's name affectionately repeated, and many accounts of his sayings and doings, his merry supper-parties, and the talents of young Ridley, his friend. When we came to London in the spring, almost our first visit was to Clive's apartments in Charlotte Street, whither my wife delightedly went to give her hand to the young painter.

But Clive no longer inhabited that quiet region. On driving to the house, we found a bright brass plate, with the name of Mr. J. J. Ridley on the door, and it was J. J.'s hand which I shook (his other being engaged with a great pallet, and a sheaf of painting-brushes), when we entered the well-known quarters. Clive's picture hung over the mantel-piece, where his father's head used to hang in our time—a careful and beautifully executed portrait of the lad in a velvet coat, and a Roman hat, with that golden beard which was sacrificed to the exigencies of London fashion. I showed Laura the likeness until she could become acquainted with the original. On her expressing her delight at the picture, the painter was pleased to say, in his modest blushing way, that he would be glad to execute my wife's portrait too, nor, as I think, could any artist find a subject more pleasing.

After admiring others of Mr. Ridley's works, our talk naturally reverted to his predecessor. Clive had migrated to much more splendid quarters. Had we not heard? he had become a rich man, a man of fashion. "I fear he is very lazy about the arts," J. J. said, with regret on his countenance; "though I begged and prayed him to be faithful to his profession. He would have done very well in it, in portrait-painting especially. Look here, and here, and here!" said Ridley, producing fine vigorous sketches of Clive's. "He had the art of seizing the likeness, and of making all his people look like gentlemen, too. He was improving every day, when this abominable bank came in the way, and stopped him."

What bank? I did not know the new Indian bank of which the Colonel was a director? Then, of course, I was aware that the mercantile affair in question was the Bundelcund Bank, about which the Colonel had written to me from India more than a year since, announcing that fortunes were to be made by it, and that he had reserved shares for me in the company. Laura admired all Clive's sketches, which his affectionate brother artist showed to her, with the exception of one representing the reader's humble servant; which, Mrs. Pendennis considered, by no means did justice to the original.

Bidding adieu to the kind J. J., and leaving him to pursue his art, in that silent serious way in which he daily labored at it, we drove to Fitzroy Square hard by, where I was not displeased to show the good old hospitable James Binnie the young lady who bore my name. But here, too, we were disappointed. Placards wafered in the windows announced that the old house was to let. The woman who kept it, brought a card in Mrs. Mackenzie's frank handwriting, announcing Mr. James Binnie's address was "Poste restante Pau in the Pyrenees," and that his London Agents were Messrs. So-and-so. The woman said she believed the gentleman had been unwell. The house, too, looked very pale, dismal, and disordered; we drove away from the door, grieving to think that ill-health, or any other misfortunes, had befallen good old James.

Mrs. Pendennis drove back to our lodgings, Brixham's, in Jermyn Street, while I sped to the City, having business in that quarter. It has been said that I kept a small account with Hobson Brothers, to whose bank I went, and entered the parlor with that trepidation which most poor men feel on presenting themselves before City magnates and capitalists. Mr. Hobson Newcome shook hands most jovially and good-naturedly, congratulated me on my marriage, and so forth, and presently Sir Barnes Newcome made his appearance, still wearing his mourning for his deceased father.

Nothing could be more kind, pleasant, and cordial than Sir Barnes's manner. He seemed to know well about my affairs; complimented me on every kind of good fortune; had heard that I had canvassed the borough in which I lived; hoped sincerely to see me in Parliament and on the right side; was most anxious to become acquainted with Mrs. Pendennis, of whom Lady Rockminster said all sorts of kind things; and asked for our address, in order that Lady Clara Newcome might have the pleasure of calling on my wife. This ceremony was performed soon afterward; and an invitation to dinner from Sir Barnes and Lady Clara Newcome speedily followed it.

Sir Barnes Newcome, Bart., M.P., I need not say, no longer inhabited the small house which he had occupied immediately after his marriage; but dwelt in a much more spacious mansion in Belgravia, where he entertained his friends. Now that he had come into his kingdom, I must say that Barnes was by no means so insufferable as in the days of his bachelorhood. He had sown his wild oats, and spoke with regret and reserve of that season of his moral culture. He was grave, sarcastic, statesman-like; did not try to conceal his baldness (as he used before his father's death, by bringing lean wisps of hair over his forehead from the back of his head); talked a great deal about the House; was assiduous in his attendance there and in the City; and conciliating with all the world. It seemed as if we were all his constituents, and though his efforts to make himself agreeable were rather apparent, the effect succeeded pretty well. We met Mr. and Mrs. Hobson Newcome, and Clive, and Miss Ethel looking beautiful in her black robes. It was a family party, Sir Barnes said, giving us to understand, with a decorous solemnity in face and voice, that no large parties as yet could be received in that house of mourning.

To this party was added, rather to my surprise, my Lord Highgate, who under the sobriquet of Jack Belsize has been presented to the reader of this history. Lord Highgate gave Lady Clara his arm to dinner, but went and took a place next Miss Newcome, on the other side of her: that immediately by Lady Clara being reserved for a guest who had not as yet made his appearance.

Lord Highgate's attentions to his neighbor, his laughing and talking, were incessant; so much so that Clive, from his end of the table, scowled in wrath at Jack Belsize's assiduities: it was evident that the youth, though hopeless, was still jealous and in love with his charming cousin.

Barnes Newcome was most kind to all his guests: from Aunt Hobson to your humble servant there was not one but the master of the house had an agreeable word for him. Even for his cousin Samuel Newcome, a gawky youth with an eruptive countenance, Barnes had appropriate words of conversation, and talked about King's College, of which the lad was an ornament, with the utmost affability. He complimented that institution and young Samuel, and by that shot knocked not only over Sam but his mamma too. He talked to Uncle Hobson about his crops; to Clive about his pictures; to me about the great effect which a certain article in the "Pall Mall Gazette" had produced in the House, where the Chancellor of the Exchequer was perfectly livid with fury, and Lord John bursting out laughing at the attack: in fact, nothing could be more amiable than our host on this day. Lady Clara was very pretty; grown a little stouter since her marriage, the change only became her. She was a little silent, but then she had Uncle Hobson on her left-hand side, between whom and her ladyship there could not be much in common, and the place at the right hand was still vacant. The person with whom she talked most freely was Clive, who had made a beautiful drawing of her and her little girl, for which the mother and the father too, as it appeared, were very grateful.

What had caused this change in Barnes's behavior? Our particular merits or his own private reform? In the two years over which this narrative has had to run in the course of as many chapters, the writer had inherited a property so small that it could not occasion a banker's civility; and I put down Sir Barnes Newcome's politeness to a sheer desire to be well with me. But with Lord Highgate and Clive the case was different, as you must now hear.

Lord Highgate, having succeeded to his father's title and fortune, had paid every shilling of his debts, and had sowed his wild oats to the very last corn. His lordship's account at Hobson Brothers was very large. Painful events of three years' date, let us hope, were forgotten—gentlemen can not go on being in love and despairing, and quarreling forever. When he came into his funds, Highgate behaved with uncommon kindness to Rooster, who was always straitened for money: and when the late Lord Dorking died and Rooster succeeded to him, there was a meeting at Chanticlere between Highgate and Barnes Newcome and his wife, which went off very comfortably. At Chanticlere, the Dowager Lady Kew and Miss Newcome were also staying, when Lord Highgate announced his prodigious admiration for the young lady; and, it was said, corrected Farintosh, as a low-minded, foul-tongued young cub for daring to speak disrespectfully of her. Nevertheless, vous concevez, when a man of the Marquis's rank was supposed to look with the eyes of admiration upon a young lady, Lord Highgate would not think of spoiling sport, and he left Chanticlere declaring that he was always destined to be unlucky in love. When old Lady Kew was obliged to go to Vichy for her lumbago, Highgate said to Barnes, "Do ask your charming sister to come to you in London; she will bore herself to death with the old woman at Vichy, or with her mother at Rugby" (whither Lady Ann had gone to get her boys educated), and accordingly Miss Newcome came on a visit to her brother and sister, at whose house we have just had the honor of seeing her.

When Rooster took his seat in the House of Lords, he was introduced by Highgate and Kew, as Highgate had been introduced by Kew previously. Thus these three gentlemen all rode in gold coaches; had all got coronets on their heads; as you will, my respected young friend, if you are the eldest son of a peer who dies before you. And now they were rich, they were all going to be very good boys, let us hope. Kew, we know, married one of the Dorking family, that second Lady Henrietta Palley, whom we described as frisking about at Baden, and not in the least afraid of him. How little the reader knew, to whom we introduced the girl in that chatty off-hand way, that one day the young creature would be a countess! But we knew it all the while—and, when she was walking about with the governess, or romping with her sisters; and when she had dinner at one o'clock; and when she wore a pinafore very likely—we secretly respected her as the future Countess of Kew, and mother of the Viscount Walham.

Lord Kew was very happy with his bride, and very good to her. He took Lady Kew to Paris, for a marriage trip; but they lived almost altogether at Kewbury afterward, where his lordship sowed tame oats now after his wild ones, and became one of the most active farmers of his county. He and the Newcomes were not very intimate friends; for Lord Kew was heard to say that he disliked Barnes more after his marriage than before. And the two sisters, Lady Clara and Lady Kew, had a quarrel on one occasion, when the latter visited London just before the dinner at which we have just assisted, nay, at which we are just assisting, took place—a quarrel about Highgate's attentions to Ethel very likely. Kew was dragged into it—and hot words passed between him and Jack Belsize; and Jack did not go down to Kewbury afterward, though Kew's little boy was christened after him. All these interesting details, about people of the very highest rank, we are supposed to whisper in the reader's ear as we are sitting at a Belgravian dinner-table. My dear Barmecide friend, isn't it pleasant to be in such fine company?

And now we must tell how it is that Clive Newcome, Esq., whose eyes are flashing fire across the flowers of the table at Lord Highgate, who is making himself so agreeable to Miss Ethel—now we must tell how it is that Clive and his cousin Barnes are grown to be friends again.

The Bundelcund Bank, which had been established for four years, had now grown to be one of the most flourishing commercial institutions in Bengal. Founded, as the prospectus announced, at a time when all private credit was shaken by the failure of the great Agency Houses, of which the downfall had carried dismay and ruin throughout the presidency; the B. B. had been established on the only sound principle of commercial prosperity—that of association. The native capitalists, headed by the great firm of Rummun Lall and Co., of Calcutta, had largely embarked in the B. B., and the officers of the two services and the European mercantile body of Calcutta had been invited to take shares in an institution which to merchants, native and English, civilians and military men, was alike advantageous and indispensable. How many young men of the latter services had been crippled for life by the ruinous cost of agencies, of which the profits to the agents themselves were so enormous! The shareholders of the B. B. were their own agents; and the greatest capitalist in India as well as the youngest Ensign in the service might invest at the largest and safest premium, and borrow at the smallest interest, by becoming, according to his means, a shareholder in the B. B. Their correspondents were established in each presidency and in every chief city of India, as well as at Sidney, Singapore, Canton, and, of course, London. With China they did an immense opium trade, of which the profits were so great, that it was only in private sittings of the B. B. managing committee that the details and accounts of these operations could be brought forward. Otherwise the books of the bank were open to every shareholder; and the Ensign or the young civil servant was at liberty at any time to inspect his own private account as well as the common ledger. With New South Wales they carried on a vast trade in wool, supplying that great colony with goods, which their London agents enabled them to purchase in such a way as to give them the command of the market. As if to add to their prosperity, copper-mines were discovered on lands in the occupation of the B. Banking Company, which gave the most astonishing returns. And throughout the vast territories of British India, through the great native firm of Rummun Lall and Co., the Bundelcund Banking Company had possession of the native markets. The order from Birmingham for idols alone (made with their copper and paid in their wool) was enough to make the low church party in England cry out; and a debate upon this subject actually took place in the House of Commons, of which the effect was to send up the shares of the Bundelcund Banking Company very considerably upon the London Exchange.

The fifth half-yearly dividend was announced at twelve and a quarter per cent. of the paid up capital: the accounts from the copper mine sent the dividend up to a still greater height, and carried the shares to an extraordinary premium. In the third year of the concern, the house of Hobson Brothers, of London, became the agents of the Bundelcund Banking Company of India; and among our friends, James Binnie, who had prudently held out for some time, and Clive Newcome, Esq., became shareholders, Clive's good father having paid the first installments of the lad's shares up in Calcutta, and invested every rupee he could himself command in this enterprise. When Hobson Brothers joined it, no wonder James Binnie was convinced; Clive's friend, the Frenchman, and through that connection the house of Higg, of Newcome and Manchester, entered into the affair; and among the minor contributors in England we may mention Miss Cann, who took a little fifty pound note share, and dear old Miss Honeyman; and J. J., and his father Ridley, who brought a small bag of saving—all knowing that their Colonel, who was eager that his friends should participate in his good fortune, would never lead them wrong. To Clive's surprise, Mrs. Mackenzie, between whom and himself there was a considerable coolness, came to his chambers, and with a solemn injunction that the matter between them should be quite private, requested him to purchase £1500 worth of Bundelcund shares for her and her darling girls, which he did, astonished to find the thrifty widow in possession of so much money. Had Mr. Pendennis's mind not been bent at this moment on quite other subjects, he might have increased his own fortune by the Bundelcund Bank speculation; but in these two years I was engaged in matrimonial affairs (having Clive Newcome, Esq., as my groomsmen on a certain interesting occasion). When we returned from our tour abroad, the India Bank shares were so very high that I did not care to purchase, though I found an affectionate letter from our good Colonel (enjoining me to make my fortune) awaiting me at the agent's, and my wife received a pair of beautiful Cashmere shawls from the same kind friend.

CHAPTER XLIX.

CONTAINS AT LEAST SIX MORE COURESSES AND TWO DEBETS.

The banker's dinner party over, we returned to our apartments, having dropped Major Pendennis at his lodgings, and there, as the custom is among most friendly married couples, talked over the company and the dinner. I thought my wife would naturally have liked Sir Barnes Newcome, who was very attentive to her, took her to dinner as the bride, and talked ceaselessly to her during the whole entertainment.

Laura said No—she did not know why—could there be any better reason? There was a tone about Sir Barnes Newcome she did not like—especially in his manner to women.

I remarked that he spoke sharply and in a sneering manner to his wife, and treated one or two remarks which she made as if she was an idiot.

Mrs. Pendennis flung up her head, as much as to say, "And so she is."

Mr. Pendennis. What! the wife too, my dear Laura! I should have thought such a pretty, simple, innocent, young woman, with just enough good looks to make her pass muster, who is very well-bred and not brilliant at all—I should have thought such a one might have secured a sister's approbation.

Mrs. Pendennis. You fancy we are all jealous of one another. No protest of ours can take that notion out of your heads. My dear Pen, I do not intend to try. We are not jealous of mediocrity: we are not patient of it. I dare say we are angry because we see men admire it so. You gentlemen, who pretend to be our betters, give yourselves such airs of protection, and profess such a lofty superiority over us, prove it by quitting the cleverest woman in the room for the first pair of bright eyes and dimpled cheeks that enter. It was those charms which attracted you in Lady Clara, Sir.

Pendennis. I think she is very pretty, and very innocent, and artless.

Mrs. P. Not very pretty, and perhaps not so very artless.

Pendennis. How can you tell, you wicked woman? Are you such a profound deceiver yourself, that you can instantly detect artifice in others? O Laura!

Mrs. P. We can detect all sorts of things. The inferior animals have instincts you know. (I must say my wife is always very satirical upon this point of the relative rank of the sexes.) One thing I am sure of is, that she is not happy; and, O Pen! that she does not care much for her little girl.

Pendennis. How do you know that, my dear?

Mrs. P. We went up stairs to see the child after dinner. It was at my wish. The mother did not offer to go. The child was awake and crying. Lady Clara did not offer to take it. Ethel—Miss Newcome took it, rather to my surprise, for she seems very haughty; and the nurse, who I suppose was at supper, came running up at the noise, and then the poor little thing was quiet.

Pendennis. I remember we heard the music, as the dining-room was open; and Newcome said, "That is what you will have to expect, Pendennis."

Mrs. P. Hush, Sir! If my baby cries, I think you must expect me to run out of the room. I liked Miss Newcome after seeing her with the poor little thing. She looked so handsome as she walked with it! I longed to have it myself.

Pendennis. Tout vient à fin, à qui sait. . .

Mrs. P. Don't be silly. What a dreadful, dreadful place this great world of yours is, Arthur; where husbands do not seem to care for their wives; where mothers do not love their children; where children love their nurses best; where men talk what they call gallantry!

Pendennis. What?

Mrs. P. Yes, such as that dreary, languid, pale, bald, cadaverous, leering man whispered to me. Oh, how I dislike him! I am sure he is unkind to his wife. I am sure he has a bad temper; and if there is any excuse for—Pendennis. For what?

Mrs. P. For nothing. But you heard yourself that he had a bad temper, and spoke sneeringly to his wife. What could make her marry him?

Pendennis. Money, and the desire of papa and mamma. For the same reason Clive's flame, poor Miss Newcome, was brought out to-day; that vacant seat at her side was for Lord Farintosh, who did not come. And the Marquis not being present, the Baron took his innings. Did you not see how tender he was to her, and how fierce poor Clive looked?

Mrs. P. Lord Highgate was very attentive to Miss Newcome, was he?

Pendennis. And some years ago, Lord Highgate was breaking his heart about whom do you think? about Lady Clara Pulleyn, our hostess of last night. He was Jack Belsize then, a younger son, plunged over head and ears in debt; and of course there could be no marriage. Clive was present at Baden when a terrible scene took place, and carried off poor Jack to Switzerland and Italy, where he remained till his father died, and he came into the title in which he rejoices. And now he is off with the old love, Laura, and on with the new. Why do you look at me so? Are you thinking that other people have been in love two or three times too?

Mrs. P. I am thinking that I should not like to live in London, Arthur.

And this was all that Mrs. Laura could be brought to say. When this young woman chooses to be silent, there is no power that can extract a word from her. It is true that she is generally in the right; but that is only the more aggravating. Indeed, what can be more provoking, after a dispute with your wife, than to find it is you, and not she, who has been in the wrong?

Sir Barnes Newcome politely caused us to understand that the entertainment of which we had just partaken was given in honor of the bride. Clive must needs not be outdone in hospitality; and invited us and others to a fine feast at the Star and Garter at Richmond, where Mrs. Pendennis was placed at his right hand. I smile as I think how much dining has been already commemorated in these voracious pages; but the story is an everyday record; and does not dining form a certain part of the pleasure and business of every day? It is at that pleasant hour that our sex has the privilege of meeting the other. The morning, man and woman alike devote to business, or pass mainly in the company of their own kind. John has his office; Jane her household, her nursery, her milliner, her daughters, and their masters. In the country he has his hunting, his fishing, his farming, his letters; she her schools, her poor, her garden, or what not. Parted through the shining hours, and improving them let us trust, we come together toward sunset only, we make merry and amuse ourselves. We chat with our pretty neighbor, or survey the young ones sporting; we make love and are jealous; we dance, or obsequiously turn over the leaves of Cecilia's music-book; we play, whist, or go to sleep in the arm-chair, according to our ages and conditions. Snooze gently in thy arm-chair, thou easy bald head! play your whist, or read your novel, or talk scandal over your work, ye worthy dowagers and fogies! Meanwhile the young ones frisk about, or dance, or sing, or laugh; or whisper behind curtains in moonlit-windows; or shirk away into the garden, and come back smelling of cigars; nature having made them so to do.

Nature at this time irresistibly impelled Clive Newcome toward love-making. It was pairing season with him. Mr. Clive was now some three-and-twenty years old: enough has been said about his good looks, which were in truth sufficient to make him a match for the young lady on whom he had set his heart, and from whom, during this entertainment which he gave to my wife, he could never keep his eyes away for three minutes. Laura's did not need to be so keen as they were in order to see what poor Clive's condition was. She did not in the least grudge the young fellow's inattention to herself; or feel hurt that he did not seem to listen when she spoke; she conversed with J. J., her neighbor, who was very modest and agreeable; while her husband, not so well pleased, had Mrs. Hobson Newcome for his partner during the chief part of the entertainment. Mrs. Hobson and Lady Clara were the matrons who gave the sanction of their presence to this bachelor-party. Neither of their husbands could come to Clive's little fête; had they not the City and the House of Commons to attend? My uncle, Major Pendennis, was another of the guests; who, for his part, found the party was what you young fellows call very slow. Dreading Mrs. Hobson and her powers of conversation, the old gentleman nimbly skipped out of her neighborhood, and fell by the side of Lord Highgate, to whom the Major was inclined to make himself very pleasant. But Lord Highgate's broad back was turned upon his neighbor, who was forced to tell stories to Captain Crackthorpe which had amused dukes and marquises in former days, and were surely quite good enough for any baron in this realm. "Lord Highgate sweet upon la belle Newcome, is he?" said the testy Major afterward. "He seemed to me to talk to Lady Clara the whole time. When I awoke in the garden after dinner, as Mrs. Hobson was telling one of her confounded long stories, I found her audience was diminished to one. Crackthorpe, Lord Highgate, and Lady Clara, we had all been sitting there when the bankeress cut in (in the midst of a very good story I was telling them, which entertained them very much), and never ceased talking till I fell off into a doze. When I roused myself, begged, she was still going on. Crackthorpe was off, smoking a cigar on the terrace: my Lord and Lady Clara were nowhere; and you four, with the little painter, were chatting cozily in another arbor. Behaved himself very well, the little painter. Doosid good dinner Ellis gave us. But as for Highgate being aux soins with la belle Banquière, trust me, my boy, he is . . . upon my word, my dear, it seemed to me his thoughts went quite another way. To be sure, Lady Clara is a belle banquière too now. He, he, he! How could he say he had no carriage to go home in? He came down in Crackthorpe's cab, who passed us just now, driving back young Whatdyecall the painter."

Thus did the Major discourse, as we returned toward the City. I could see in the open carriage which followed us (Lady Clara Newcome's) Lord Highgate's white hat by Clive's on the back seat.

Laura looked at her husband. The same thought may have crossed their minds, though neither uttered it; but although Sir Barnes and Lady Clara Newcome offered us other civilities during our stay in London, no inducements could induce Laura to accept the proffered friendship of that lady. When Lady Clara called, my wife was not at home; when she invited us, Laura pleaded engagements. At first she bestowed on Miss Newcome too a share of this haughty dislike, and rejected the advances which that young lady, who professed to like my wife very much, made toward an intimacy. When I appealed to her (for Newcome's house was after all a very pleasant one—and you met the best people there), my wife looked at me with an expression of something like scorn, and said: "Why don't I like Miss Newcome? of course because I am jealous of her—all women, you know, Arthur, are jealous of such beauties." I could get for a long while no better explanation than these sneers, for my wife's antipathy toward this branch of the Newcome family; but an event came presently, which silenced my remonstrances, and showed to me that Laura had judged Barnes and his wife only too well.

Poor Mrs. Hobson Newcome had reason to be sulky at the neglect which all the Richmond party showed her, for nobody, not even Major Pendennis, as we have seen, would listen to her intellectual conversation; nobody, not even Lord Highgate, would drive back to town in her carriage, though the vehicle was large and empty, and Lady Clara's barouche, in which his Lordship chose to take a place, had already three occupants within it; but in spite of these rebuffs and disappointments the virtuous lady of Bryanstone Square was bent upon being good-natured and hospitable; and I have to record, in the present chapter, yet one more feast of which Mr. and Mrs. Pendennis partook at the expense of the most respectable Newcome family.

Although Mrs. Laura here also appeared, and had the place of honor in her character of bride, I am bound to own my opinion that Mrs. Hobson only made us the pretext of her party, and that in reality it was given to persons of a much more exalted rank. We were the first to arrive, our good old Major, the most punctual of men, bearing us company. Our hostess was arrayed in unusual state and splendor; her fat neck was ornamented with jewels, rich bracelets decorated her arms, and this Bryanstone Square Cornelia had likewise her family jewels distributed around her, priceless male and female Newcome jems, from the King's College youth with whom we have made a brief acquaintance, and his elder sister, now entering into the world, down to the last little ornament of the nursery, in a prodigious new sash, with ringlets hot and crisp from the tongs of a Marylebone hairdresser. We had seen the cherub faces of some of these darlings pressed against the drawing-room windows as our carriage drove up to the door; when, after a few minutes' conversation, another vehicle arrived, away they dashed to the windows again, the innocent little dears crying out, "Here's the Marquis;" and in sadder tones, "No, it isn't the Marquis," by which artless expressions they showed how eager they were to behold an expected guest of a rank only inferior to Dukes in this great empire.

Putting two and two together, as the saying is, it was not difficult for me to guess who the expected Marquis was—and, indeed, the King's College youth set that question at once to rest, by wagging his head at me, and winking his eye, and saying, "We expect Farintosh."

"Why, my dearest children," Matronly Virtue exclaimed, "this anxiety to behold the young Marquis of Farintosh, whom we expect at our modest table, Mrs. Pendennis, to-day? Twice you have been at the window in your eagerness to look for him. Louisa, you silly child, do you imagine that his lordship will appear in his robes and coronet? Rodolf, you absurd boy, do you think that a Marquis is other than a man? I have never admired aught but intellect, Mrs. Pendennis; that, let us be thankful, is the only true title to distinction in our country now-a-days."

"Begad, Sir," whispers the old Major to me, "intellect may be a doosid fine thing, but in my opinion, a Marquisate and eighteen or twenty thousand a year; I should say the Farintosh property, with the Glenlivat estate, and the Roy property in England, must be worth nineteen thousand a year at the very lowest figure; and I remember when this young man's father was only Tom Roy, of the 42d, with no hope of succeeding to the title, and doosidly out at elbows too . . . I say, what does the bankeress mean by chattering about intellect? Hang me, a Marquis is a Marquis; and Mrs. Newcome knows it as well as I do." My good Major was growing old, and was not unnaturally a little testy at the manner in which his hostess received him. Truth to tell, she hardly took any notice of him; and cut down a couple of the old gentleman's stories before he had been five minutes in the room.

To our party presently comes the host in a flurried countenance, with a white waistcoat, holding in his hand an open letter, toward which his wife looks with some alarm. "How dy' doo, Lady Clara; how dy' doo, Ethel?" he says, saluting those ladies whom the second carriage had brought to us. "Sir Barnes is not coming, that's one place vacant; that Lady Clara you won't mind, you see him at home: but here's a disappointment for you, Miss Newcome, Lord Farintosh can't come."

At this, two of the children cry out "O! O!" with such a melancholy accent, that Miss Newcome and Lady Clara burst out laughing.

"Got a dreadful toothache," said Mr. Hobson; "here's his letter."

"Hang it, what a bore!" cries artless young King's College.

"Why a bore, Samuel? A bore, as you call it, for Lord Farintosh, I grant; but do you suppose that the high in station are exempt from the ills of mortality? I know nothing more painful than a toothache," exclaims the virtuous matron, using the words of philosophy but showing the countenance of anger.

"Hang it, why didn't he have it out?" says Samuel.

Miss Ethel laughed. "Lord Farintosh would not have that tooth out for the world, Samuel," she cried, gayly. "He keeps it in on purpose, and it always aches when he doesn't want to go out to dinner."

"I know one humble family who will never ask him again," Mrs. Hobson exclaims, rustling in all her silks, and tapping her fan and her foot. The eclipse, however, passes off her countenance, and light is restored; when at this moment, a cab having driven up during the period of darkness, the door is flung open, and Lord Highgate is announced by a loud-voiced butler.

My wife, being still the bride on this occasion, had the honor of being led to the dinner-table by our banker and host. Lord Highgate was reserved for Mrs. Hobson, who, in an engaging manner, requested poor Clive to conduct his cousin Maria to dinner, handing over Miss Ethel to another guest. Our Major gave his arm to Lady Clara, and I perceived that my wife looked very grave as he passed the place where she sat, and seated Lady Clara in the next chair to that which Lord Highgate chanced to occupy. Feeling himself en reine, and the company being otherwise rather mum and silent, my uncle told a number of delightful anecdotes about the bons monde of his time, about the Peninsular war, the Regent, Brummell, Lord Steyne, Pea Green Hayne, and so forth. He said the evening was very pleasant, though some others of the party, as it appeared to me, scarcely seemed to think so. Clive had not a word for his cousin Maria, but looked across the table at Ethel all dinner time. What could Ethel have to say to her partner, old Colonel Sir Donald McCraw, who gobbled and drank as his wont is, and if he had a remark to make, imparted it to Mrs. Hobson, at whose right hand he was sitting, and to whom, during the whole course, or courses, of the dinner, my Lord Highgate scarcely uttered one single word.

His lordship was whispering all the while into the ringlets of Lady Clara; they were talking a jargon which their hostess scarcely understood, of people only known to her by her study of the peerage. When we joined the ladies after dinner, Lord Highgate again made way toward Lady Clara, and at an order from her as I thought, left her ladyship, and strove hard to engage in a conversation with Mrs. Newcome. I hope he succeeded in smoothing the frowns in that round little face. Mrs. Laura, I own, was as grave as a judge all the evening; very grave even and reserved with my uncle, when the hour for parting came, and we took him home.

"He, he!" said the old man, coughing, and nodding his old head and laughing in his senile manner, when I saw him on the next day, "That was a pleasant evening we had yesterday; doosid pleasant, and I think my two neighbors seemed to be uncommonly pleased with each other; not an amusing fellow, that young painter of yours, though he is good-looking enough, but there's no conversation in him. Do you think of giving a little dinner, Arthur, in return for these hospitalities? Greenwich, hey, or something of that sort? I'll go you halves, Sir, and we'll ask the young banker and bankers—not yesterday's Amphitryon nor his wife; no, no, hang it! but Barnes Newcome is a devilish clever, rising man, and moves in about as good society as any in London. We'll ask him and Lady Clara and Highgate, and one or two more, and have a pleasant party."

But to this proposal when the old man communicated it to her, in a very quiet, simple, artful way, Laura, with a flushing face, said no quite abruptly, and quitted the room, rustling in her silks, and showing at once dignity and indignation.

Not many more feasts was Arthur Pendennis, senior, to have in this world. Not many more great men was he to flatter, nor schemes to wink at, nor earthly pleasures to enjoy. His long days were well-nigh ended; on his last couch—which Laura attended so affectionately—with his last breath almost, he faltered out to me, "I had other views for you, my boy, and once hoped to see you in a higher position in life; but I begin to think now, Arthur, that I was wrong; and as for that girl, Sir, I am sure she is an angel."

May I not inscribe the words with a grateful heart? Blessed he—blessed though maybe undeserving—who has the love of a good woman!

CHAPTER L CLIVE IN NEW QUARTERS.

My wife was much better pleased with Clive than with some of his relatives to whom I had presented her. His face carried a recommendation with it that few honest people could resist. He was always a welcome friend in our lodgings, and even our uncle the Major signified his approval of the lad as a young fellow of very good manners and feelings, who, if he chose to throw himself away and be a painter, ma foi, was rich enough, no doubt, to follow his own caprices. Clive executed a capital head of Major Pendennis, which now hangs in our drawing-room at Fair Oaks; and reminds me of that friend of my youth. Clive occupied ancient lofty chambers in Hanover Square now. He had furnished them in an antique manner, with hangings, cabinets, carved-work, Venice glasses, fine prints, and water-color sketches of good pictures by his own and other hands. He had horses to ride, and a liberal purse full of paternal money. Many fine equipages drew up opposite to his chambers: few artists had such luck as young Mr. Clive. And above his own chambers were other three, which the young gentleman had hired, and where, says he, "I hope ere very long my dear old father will be lodging with me. In another year he says he thinks he will be able to come home: when the affairs of the Bank are quite settled. You shake your head! why? The shares are worth four times what we gave for them. We are men of fortune, Pen, I give you my word. You should see how much they make of me at Baynes and Jolly's, and how civil they are to me at Hobson Brothers! I go into the city now and then, and see our manager, Mr. Blackmore. He tells me such stories about indigo, and wool, and copper, and sicca rupees, and Company's rupees. I don't know any thing about the business, but my father likes me to go and see Mr. Blackmore. Dear Cousin Barnes is forever asking me to dinner: I might call Lady Clara Clara if I liked, as Sam Newcome does in Bryanstone Square. You can't think how kind they are to me there. My aunt reproaches me tenderly for not going there oftener—it's not very good fun dining in Bryanstone Square, is it? And she praises my Cousin Maria to me—you should hear my aunt praise her! I have to take Maria down to dinner; to sit by the piano and listen to her songs in all languages. Do you know Maria can sing Hungarian and Polish, besides your common German, Spanish, and Italian? Those I have at our other agents, Baynes and Jolly's—Baynes's that is in the Regent's Park, where the girls are prettier and just as civil to me as at Aunt Hobson's." And here Clive would amuse us by the account which he gave us of the snares which the Misses Baynes, those young sirens of Regent's Park, set for him; of the songs which they sang to enchant him, the albums in which they besought him to draw—the thousand winning ways which they employed to bring him into their cave in York Terrace. But neither Circe's smiles nor Calypso's blandishments had any effect on him; his ears were stopped to their music, and his eyes rendered dull to their charms by those of the flighty young enchantress with whom my wife had of late made acquaintance.

Capitalist though he was, our young fellow was still very affable. He forgot no old friends in his prosperity; and the lofty antique chambers would not unfrequently be lighted up at nights to receive F. B. and some of the old cronies of the Haunt, and some of the Gandishites, who, if Clive had been of a nature that was to be spoiled by flattery, had certainly done mischief to the young man. On one or two occasions I was allowed to become a bachelor again, and participate in these jovial meetings. How guilty my coat was on my return home; how haughty the looks of the mistress of my house, as she bade Martha carry away the obnoxious garment! How grand F. B. used to be as president of Clive's smoking party, where he laid down the law, talked the most talk, sang the jolliest song, and consumed the most drink of all the jolly talkers and drinkers! Clive's popularity rose prodigiously; not only youngsters, but old practitioners of the fine arts, lauded his talents. What a shame that his pictures were all refused this year at the Academy! Alfred Smee, Esq., R. A., was indignant at their rejection; but J. J. confessed with a sigh, and Clive owned good-naturedly, that he had been neglecting his business, and that his pictures were not so good as those of two years before. I am afraid Mr. Clive went to too many balls and parties, to clubs and jovial entertainments, besides losing yet more time in that other pursuit we wot of. Meanwhile J. J. went steadily on with his work, no day passed without a line: and Fame was not very far off, though this he heeded but little; and Art, his sole mistress, rewarded him for his steady and fond pursuit of her.

"Look at him," Clive would say with a sigh. "Isn't he the mortal of all others the most to be envied? He is so fond of his art that in all the world there is no attraction like it for him. He runs to his easel at sunrise, and sits before it caressing his picture all day till nightfall. He takes leave of it sadly when dark comes, spends the night in a Life Academy, and begins next morning da capo. Of all the pieces of good fortune which can befall a man, is not this the greatest—to have your desire, and then never tire of it? I have been in such a rage with my own shortcomings that I have dashed my foot through the canvases, and vowed I would smash my pallet and easel. Sometimes I succeed a little better in my work, and then it will happen for half an hour that I am pleased, but pleased of what? pleased of drawing Mr. Muggins's head rather like Mr. Muggins. Why, a thousand fellows can do better; and when one day I reach my very best, yet thousands will be able to do better still. Ours is a trade for which nowadays there is no excuse unless one can be great in it; and I feel I have not the stuff for that. No. 666. Portrait of Joseph Muggins, Esq., Newcome, Great George Street. No. 799. Portrait of Mrs. Muggins, on her gray poney, Newcome. No. 579. Portrait of Joseph Muggins, Esq.'s dog Toby, Newcome—this is what I'm fit for. These are the victories I have set myself on achieving. Oh, Mrs. Pendennis! isn't it humiliating? Why isn't there a war? Why can't I go and distinguish myself somewhere and be a general? Why haven't I a genius? I say, Pen, Sir, why haven't I a genius? There is a painter who lives hard by, and who sends sometimes to beg me to come and look at his work. He is in the Muggins line too. He gets his canvases with a good light upon them; excludes the contemplation of all other objects; stands beside his pictures in an attitude himself, and thinks that he and they are master-pieces. Master-pieces! Oh me, what driveling wretches we are! Fame!—except that of just the one or two—what's the use of it? I say, Pen, would you feel particularly proud now if you had written Hayley's poems? And as for a second place in painting, who would care to be Caravaggio or Caracci?"

wouldn't give a straw to be Caracci or Caravaggio. I would just as soon be yonder artist who is painting up Foker's Entire, over the public house at the corner. He will have his payment afterward, five shillings a day, and a pot of beer. Your head a little more to the light, Mrs. Pendennis, if you please. I am tiring you, I dare say, but then, oh I am doing it so badly!"

I, for my part, thought Clive was making a very pretty drawing of my wife, and having affairs of my own to attend to, would often leave her at his chambers as a sitter, or find him at our lodgings visiting her. They became the very greatest friends. I knew the young fellow could have no better friend than Laura; and not being ignorant of the malady under which he was laboring, concluded, naturally and justly, that Clive grew so fond of my wife, not for her sake entirely, but for his own, because he could pour his heart out to her, and her sweet kindness and compassion would soothe him in his unhappy condition.

Miss Ethel, I have said, also professed a great fondness for Mrs. Pendennis; and there was that charm in the young lady's manner which speedily could overcome even female jealousy. Perhaps Laura determined magnanimously to conquer it: perhaps she hid it so as to vex me and prove the injustice of my suspicions: perhaps, honestly, she was conquered by the young beauty, and gave her a regard and admiration which the other knew she could inspire whenever she had the will. My wife was fairly captivated by her at length. The untamable young creature was docile and gentle in Laura's presence; modest, natural, amiable, full of laughter and spirits, delightful to see and to hear; her presence cheered our quiet little household; her charm fascinated my wife as it had subjugated poor Clive. Even the reluctant Farintosh was compelled to own her power, and confidently told his male friends, that, hang it, she was so handsome, and so clever, and so confoundedly pleasant and fascinating, and that—that he had been on the point of popping the fatal question ever so many times, by Jove. "And, hang it, you know," his lordship would say, "I don't want to marry until I have had my fling, you know." As for Clive, Ethel treated him like a boy, like a big brother. She was jocular, kind, pert, pleasant with him, ordered him on her errands, accepted his bouquets and compliments, admired his drawings, liked to hear him praised, and took his part in all companies; laughed at his sighs, and frankly owned to Laura her liking for him and her pleasure in seeing him. "Why," said she, "should not I be happy as long as the sunshine lasts? Tomorrow, I know, will be glum and dreary enough. When grandmamma comes back I shall scarcely be able to come and see you. When I am settled in life—oh! I shall be settled in life! Do not grudge me my holiday, Laura. Oh, if you knew how stupid it is to be in the world, and how much pleasanter to come and talk, and laugh, and sing, and be happy with you, than to sit in that dreary Eaton Place with poor Clara!"

"Why do you stay in Eaton Place?" asks Laura.

"Why? because I must go out with somebody. What an unsophisticated little country creature you are! Grandmamma is away, and I can not go about to parties by myself."

"But why should you go to parties, and why not go back to your mother?" says Mrs. Pendennis, gently.

"To the nursery, and my little sisters and Miss Cann? I like being in London best, thank you. You look grave? You think a girl should like to be with her mother and sisters best? My dear, mamma wishes me to be here, and I stay with Barnes and Clara by grandmamma's orders. Don't you know that I have been made over to Lady Kew, who has adopted me? Do you think a young lady of my pretensions can stop at home in a damp house in Warwickshire and cut bread-and-butter for little boys at school? Don't look so very grave and shake your head so, Mrs. Pendennis! If you had been bred as I have, you would be as I am. I know what you are thinking, Madam."

"I am thinking," said Laura, blushing and bowing her head—"I am thinking, if it pleases God to give me children, I should like to live at home at Fair Oaks." My wife's thoughts, though she did not utter them, and a certain modesty and habitual awe kept her silent upon subjects so very sacred, went deeper yet. She had been bred to measure her actions by a standard, which the world may nominally admit, but which it leaves for the most part unheeded. Worship, love, duty, as taught her by the devout study of the Sacred Law which interprets and defines it—if these formed the outward practice of her life, they were also its constant and secret endeavors and occupation. She spoke but very seldom of her religion, though it filled her heart and influenced all her behavior. Whenever she came to that sacred subject, her demeanor appeared to her husband so awful, that he scarcely dared to approach it in her company, and stood without as this pure creature entered into the Holy of Holies. What must the world appear to such a person? Its ambitious rewards, disappointments, pleasures, worth how much? Compared to the possession of that priceless treasure and happiness unspeakable, a perfect faith, what has Life to offer? I see before me now her sweet grave face as she looks out from the balcony of the little Richmond villa we occupied during the first happy year after our marriage, following Ethel Newcome, who rides away, with a staid groom behind her, to her brother's summer residence, not far distant. Clive had been with us in the morning, and had brought us stirring news. The good Colonel was by this time on his way home. "If Clive could tear himself away from London," the good man wrote (and we thus saw he was acquainted with the state of the young man's mind), "why should not Clive go and meet his father at Malta?" He was feverish and eager to go; and his two friends strongly counseled him to take the journey. In the midst of our talk Miss Ethel came among us. She arrived flushed and in high spirits: she rallied Clive upon his gloomy looks; she turned rather pale, as it seemed to us, when she heard the news. Then she coldly told him she thought the voyage must be a pleasant one, and would do him good: it was pleasanter than that journey she was going to take herself with her grandmother, to those dreary German springs which the old Countess frequented year after year. Mr. Pendennis having business retired to his study, whither presently Mrs. Laura followed, having to look for her scissors, or a book she wanted, or upon some pretext or other. She sat down in the conjugal study: not one word did either of us say for a while about the young people left alone in the drawing-room yonder. Laura talked about our own home at Fair Oaks, which our tenants were about to vacate. She vowed and declared that we must live at Fair Oaks; that Clavering, with all its tittle-tattle and stupid inhabitants, was better than this wicked London. Besides, there were some new and very pleasant families settled in the neighborhood. Clavering Park was taken by some delightful people—"and you know, Pen, you were always very fond of fly-fishing, and may fish the Brawl, as you used in old days, when—" The lips of the pretty satirist who alluded to these unpleasant by-gones were silenced, as they deserved to be, by Mr. Pendennis. "Do you think, Sir, I did not know," says the sweetest voice in the world, "when you went out on your fishing excursions with Miss Amory?" Again the flow of words is checked by the stypic previously applied.

"I wonder," says Mr. Pendennis, archly, bending over his wife's fair hand—"I wonder whether this kind of thing is taking place in the drawing-room?"

"Nonsense, Arthur! It is time to go back to them. Why, I declare, I have been three quarters of an hour away!"

"I don't think they will miss you, my dear," says the gentleman.

"She is certainly very fond of him. She is always coming here. I am sure it is not to hear you read Shakspeare, Arthur; or your new novel, though it is very pretty. I wish Lady Kew and her sixty thousand pounds were at the bottom of the sea."

"But she says she is going to portion her younger brothers with a part of it; she told Clive so," remarks Mr. Pendennis.

"For shame! Why does not Barnes Newcome portion his younger brothers? I have no patience with that— Why! Goodness! There is Clive going away, actually! Clive! Mr. Newcome!" But though my wife ran to the study window and beckoned our friend, he only shook his head, jumped on his horse, and rode away gloomily.

"Ethel had been crying when I went into the room," Laura afterward told me. "I knew she had; but she looked up from some flowers over which she was bending, began to laugh and rattle, would talk about nothing but Lady Hautboi's great breakfast the day before, and the most insufferable May-Fair jargon; and then declared it was time to go home and dress for Mrs. Booth's déjeuner, which was to take place that afternoon."

And so Miss Newcome rode away—back among the roses and the rouges—back among the fiddling, flirting, flattery, falseness—and Laura's sweet serene face looked after her departing. Mrs. Booth's was a very grand déjeuner. We read in the newspapers a list of the greatest names there. A Royal Duke and Duchess; a German Highness, a Hindoo Nabob, etc.; and, among the Marquises, Farintosh; and, among the Lords, Highgate; and Lady Clara Newcome, and Miss Newcome, who looked killing, our acquaintance Captain Crackthorpe informs us, and who was in perfectly stunning spirits. "His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke of Farintosh is wild about her," the Captain said, "and our poor young friend Clive may just go and hang himself. Dine with us at the Star and Garter? Jolly party. Oh, I forgot! married man now!" So saying, the Captain entered the hostelry near which I met him, leaving this present chronicler to return to his own home.

CHAPTER LI. AN OLD FRIEND.

I MIGHT open the present chapter, as a contemporary writer of Romance is occasionally in the habit of commencing his tales of Chivalry, by a description of a November afternoon, with falling leaves, tawny forests, gathering storms, and other autumnal phenomena; and two horsemen winding up the romantic road which leads from—from Richmond Bridge to the Star and Garter. The one rider is youthful, and has a blonde mustache: the cheek of the other has been browned by foreign suns; it is easy to see, by the manner in which he bestrides his powerful charger, that he has followed the profession of arms. He looks as if he had faced his country's enemies on many a field of Eastern battle. The cavaliers alight before the gate of a cottage on Richmond Hill, where a gentleman receives them with eager welcome. Their steeds are accommodated at a neighboring hostelry—I pause in the midst of the description, for the reader has made the acquaintance of our two horsemen long since. It is Clive, returned from Malta, from Gibraltar, from Seville, from Cadiz, and with him our dear old friend the Colonel. His campaigns are over, his sword is hung up, he leaves Eastern suns and battles to warm younger blood. Welcome back to England, dear Colonel and kind friend! How quickly the years have passed since he has been gone! There is a streak or two more silver in his hair. The wrinkles about his honest eyes are somewhat deeper, but their look is as steadfast and kind as in the early, almost boyish days when first we knew them.

We talk awhile about the Colonel's voyage home, the pleasures of the Spanish journey, the handsome new quarters in which Clive has installed his father and himself, my own altered condition in life, and what not. During the conversation a little querulous voice makes itself audible above stairs, at which noise Mr. Clive begins to laugh, and the Colonel to smile. It is for the first time in his life Mr. Clive listens to the little voice; indeed, it is only since about six weeks that that small organ has been heard in the world at all. Laura Pendennis believes its tunes to be the sweetest, the most interesting, the most mirth-inspiring, the most pitiful and pathetic, that ever baby uttered; which opinions, of course, are backed by Mrs. Hokey, the confidential nurse. Laura's husband is not so rapturous; but, let us trust, behaves in a way becoming a man and a father. We forego the description of his feelings, as not pertaining to the history at present under consideration. A little while before the dinner is served, the lady of the cottage comes down to greet her husband's old friends.

And here I am sorely tempted to a third description, which has nothing to do with the story to be sure, but which, if properly hit off, might fill half a page very prettily. For is not a young mother one of the sweetest sights which life shows us? If she has been beautiful before, does not her present pure joy give a character of refinement and sacredness almost to her beauty, touch her sweet cheeks with fairer blushes, and impart I know not what serene brightness to her eyes? I give warning to the artist who designs the pictures for this veracious story, to make no attempt at this subject. I never would be satisfied with it were his drawing ever so good.

When Sir Charles Grandison stepped up and made his very beautiful bow to Miss Byron, I am sure his gracious dignity never exceeded that of Colonel Newcome's first greeting to Mrs. Pendennis. Of course from the very moment they beheld one another they became friends. Are not most of our likings thus instantaneous? Before she came down to see him, Laura had put on one of the Colonel's shawls—the crimson one, with the red palm leaves and the border of many colors. As for the white one, the priceless, the gossamer, the fairy web, which might pass through a ring, that, every lady must be aware, was already appropriated to cover the cradle, or what I believe is called the bassinet of Master Pendennis.

So we all became the very best of friends; and during the winter months while we still resided at Richmond, the Colonel was my wife's constant visitor. He often came without Clive. He did not care for the world which the young gentleman frequented, and was more pleased and at home by my wife's fireside than at more noisy and splendid entertainments. And, Laura being a sentimental person, interested in pathetic novels and all unhappy attachments, of course she and the Colonel talked a great deal about Mr. Clive's little affair, over which they would have such deep confabulations that even when the master of the house appeared, Pater Familias, the man whom, in the presence of the Rev. Dr. Portman, Mrs. Laura had sworn to love, honor, etc., these two guilty ones would be silent, or change the subject of conversation, not caring to admit such an unsympathizing person as myself into their conspiracy.

From many a talk which they have had together since the Colonel and his son embraced at Malta, Clive's father had been led to see how strongly the passion which our friend had once fought and mastered, had now taken possession of the young man. The unsatisfied longing left him indifferent to all other objects of previous desire or ambition. The misfortune darkened the sunshine of his spirit, and clouded the world before his eyes. He passed hours in his painting room, though he tore up what he did there. He forsook his usual haunts, or appeared among his old comrades moody and silent. From cigar smoking, which I own to be a reprehensible practice, he plunged into still deeper and darker dissipation; for I am sorry to say, he took to pipes and the strongest tobacco, for which there is no excuse. Our young man was changed. During the last fifteen or twenty months, the malady had been increasing on him, of which we have not chosen to describe at length the stages; knowing very well that the reader (the male reader at least, does not care a fig about other people's sentimental perplexities, and is not wrapped up heart and soul in Clive's affairs like his father, whose rest was disturbed if the boy had a headache, or who would have stripped the coat off his back to keep his darling's feet warm.

The object of this hopeless passion had, meantime, returned to the custody of the dark old duenna, from which she had been liberated for a while. Lady Kew had got her health again, by means of the prescriptions of some doctors, or by the efficacy of some baths; and was again on foot and in the world, tramping about in her grim pursuit of pleasure. Lady Julia, we are led to believe, had retired upon half-pay, and into an inglorious exile at Brussels, with her sister, the outlaw's wife, by whose bankrupt fire-side she was perfectly happy. Miss Newcome was now her grandmother's companion, and they had been on a tour of visits in Scotland, and were journeying from country-house to country-house about the time when our good Colonel returned to his native shores.

The Colonel loved his nephew Barnes no better than before perhaps, though we must say, that since his return from India the young Baronet's conduct had been particularly friendly. "No doubt marriage had improved him; Lady Clara seemed a good-natured young woman enough; besides," says the Colonel, wagging his good old head knowingly, "Tom Newcome, of the Bundelcund Bank, is a personage to be conciliated; whereas Tom Newcome, of the Bengal Cavalry, was not worth Master Barnes's attention. He has been very good and kind on the whole; so have his friends been uncommonly civil. There was Clive's acquaintance, Mr. Belsize that was, Lord Highgate who is now, entertained our whole family sumptuously last week—wants us and Barnes and his wife to go to his country-house at Christmas—is as hospitable, my dear Mrs. Pendennis, as man can be. He met you at Barnes's, and as soon as we are alone," says the Colonel, turning round to Laura's husband, "I will tell you in what terms Lady Clara speaks of your wife. Yes. She is a good-natured, kind little woman, that Lady Clara." Here Laura's face assumed that gravity and severeness, which it always wore when Lady Clara's name was mentioned, and the conversation took another turn.

Returning home from London one afternoon, I met the Colonel, who hailed me on the omnibus, and rode on his way toward the City. I knew, of course, that he had been colliguing with my wife; and taxed that young woman with these continued flirtations. "Two or three times a week, Mrs. Laura, you dare to receive a Colonel of Dragoons. You sit for hours closeted with the young fellow of sixty; you change the conversation when your own injured husband enters the room, and pretend to talk about the weather, or the baby. You little arch hypocrite, you know you do. Don't try to humbug me, miss; what will Richmond, what will society, what will Mrs. Grundy in general say to such atrocious behavior?"

"Oh! Pen," says my wife, closing my mouth in a way which I do not choose farther to particularize; "that man is the best, the dearest, the kindest creature. I never knew such a good man; you ought to put him into a book. Do you know, Sir, that I felt the very greatest desire to give him a kiss when he went away? and that one which you had just now, was intended for him."

"Take back thy gift, false girl!" says Mr. Pendennis; and then, finally, we come to the particular circumstance which had occasioned so much enthusiasm on Mrs. Laura's part.

Colonel Newcome had summoned heart of grace, and in Clive's behalf had regularly proposed him to Barnes, as a suitor to Ethel; taking an artful advantage of his nephew Barnes Newcome, and inviting that Baronet to a private meeting, where they were to talk about the affairs of the Bundelcund Banking Company.

Now this Bundelcund Banking Company, in the Colonel's eyes, was in reality his son Clive. But for Clive there might have been a hundred banking companies established, yielding a hundred per cent. in as many districts of India, and Thomas Newcome, who had plenty of money for his own wants, would never have thought of speculation. His desire was to see his boy endowed with all the possible gifts of fortune. Had he built a palace for Clive, and been informed that a roc's egg was required to complete the decoration of the edifice, Tom Newcome would have traveled to the world's end in search of the wanting article. To see Prince Clive ride in a gold coach with a princess beside him, was the kind old Colonel's ambition; that done, he would be content to retire to a garret in the prince's castle, and smoke his cheroot there in peace. So the world is made.

The strong and eager covet honor and enjoyment for themselves; the gentle and disappointed (once, they may have been strong and eager, too) desire these gifts for their children. I think Clive's father never liked or understood the lad's choice of a profession. He acquiesced in it, as he would in any of his son's wishes. But, not being a poet himself, he could not see the nobility of that calling; and felt secretly that his son was demeaning himself by pursuing the art of painting. "Had he been a soldier, now," thought Thomas Newcome, "(though I prevented that), had he been richer than he is, he might have married Ethel, instead of being unhappy as he now is, God help him! I remember my own time of grief well enough, and what years it took before my wound was scarred over."

So with these things occupying his brain, Thomas Newcome artfully invited Barnes, his nephew, to dinner, under pretense of talking of the affairs of the great B. B. C. With the first glass of wine at dessert, and according to the Colonel's good old-fashioned custom of proposing toasts, they drank the health of the B. B. C. Barnes drank the toast with all his generous heart. The B. B. C. sent to Hobson Brothers and Newcome a great deal of business, was in a most prosperous condition, kept a great balance at the bank—a balance that would not be overdrawn, as Sir Barnes Newcome very well knew. Barnes was for having more of these bills, provided there were remittances to meet the same. Barnes was ready to do any amount of business with the Indian bank, or with any bank, or with any individual, Christian or heathen, white or black, who could do good to the firm of Hobson Brothers and Newcome. He spoke upon this subject with great archness and candor: of course, as a City man, he would be glad to do a profitable business any where, and the B. B. C.'s business was profitable. But the interested motive which he admitted frankly as a man of the world, did not prevent other sentiments more agreeable. "My dear Colonel," says Barnes, "I am happy, most happy, to think that our house and our name should have been useful, as I know they have been, in the establishment of a concern in which one of our family is interested; one whom we all so sincerely respect and regard." And he touched his glass with his lips and blushed a little, as he bowed toward his uncle. He found himself making a little speech, indeed; and to do so before one single person seems rather odd. Had there been a large company present Barnes would not have blushed at all, but have tossed off his glass, struck his waistcoat possibly, and looked straight in the face of his uncle as the chairman; well, he did very likely believe that he respected and regarded the Colonel.

The Colonel said—"Thank you, Barnes, with all my heart. It is always good for men to be friends, much more for blood relations, as we are."

"A relationship which honors me, I'm sure!"

says Barnes, with a tone of infinite affability. You see he believed that Heaven had made him the Colonel's superior.

"And I am very glad," the elder went on, "that you and my boy are good friends."

"Friends! of course. It would be unnatural if such near relatives were otherwise than good friends."

"You have been hospitable to him, and Lady Clara very kind, and he wrote to me telling me of your kindness. Ahem! this is tolerable claret. I wonder where Clive gets it?"

"You were speaking about that indigo, Colonel!" here Barnes interposes. "Our house has done very little in that way to be sure; but I suppose that our credit is about as good as Battie's and Jolly's, and if—" but the Colonel is in a brown study.

"Clive will have a good bit of money when I die," resumes Clive's father.

"Why, you are a hale man—upon my word, quite a young man, and may marry again, Colonel," replies the nephew, fascinatingly.

"I shall never do that," replies the other. "Ere many years are gone, I shall be seventy years old, Barnes."

"Nothing in this country, my dear Sir! positively nothing. Why, there was Titus, my neighbor in the country—when will you come down to Newcome?—who married a devilish pretty girl, of very good family, too, Miss Burgeon, one of the Devonshire Burgreens. He looks, I am sure, twenty years older than you do. Why should not you do likewise?"

"Because I like to remain single, and want to leave Clive a rich man. Look here, Barnes, you know the value of our bank shares, now?"

"Indeed I do; rather speculative; but of course I know what some sold for last week," says Barnes.

"Suppose I realize now. I think I am worth six lakhs. I had nearly two from my poor father. I saved some before and since I invested in this affair; and could sell out to-morrow with sixty thousand pounds."

"A very pretty sum of money, Colonel," says Barnes.

"I have a pension of a thousand a year."

"My dear Colonel, you are a capitalist! we know it very well," remarks Sir Barnes.

"And two hundred a year is as much as I want for myself," continues the capitalist, looking into the fire, and jingling his money in his pockets. "A hundred a year for a horse; a hundred a year for pocket-money, for I calculate, you know, that Clive will give me a bedroom and my dinner."

"He—he! If your son won't, your nephew will, my dear Colonel!" says the affable Barnes, smiling sweetly.

"I can give the boy a handsome allowance, you see," resumes Thomas Newcome.

"You can make him a handsome allowance now, and leave him a good fortune when you die!" says the nephew, in a noble and courageous manner—and as if he said Twelve times twelve are a hundred and forty-four, and you have Sir Barnes Newcome's authority—Sir Barnes Newcome's, mind you—to say so.

"Not when I die, Barnes," the uncle goes on. "I will give him every shilling I am worth to-morrow morning, if he marries as I wish him."

"Tant mieux pour lui!" cries the nephew; and thought to himself, "Lady Clara must ask Clive to dinner instantly. Confound the fellow! I hate him—always have; but what luck he has!"

"A man with that property may pretend to a good wife, as the French say; hey, Barnes?" asks the Colonel, rather eagerly looking up in his nephew's face.

That countenance was lighted up with a generous enthusiasm. "To any woman, in any rank—to a nobleman's daughter, my dear Sir!" exclaims Sir Barnes.

"I want your sister; I want my dear Ethel for him, Barnes," cries Thomas Newcome, with a trembling voice, and a twinkle in his eyes. "That was the hope I always had till my talk with your poor father stopped it. Your sister was engaged to my Lord Kew then; and my wishes, of course, were impossible. The poor boy is very much cut up, and his whole heart is bent upon possessing her. She is not, she can't be, indifferent to him. I am sure she would not be, if her family in the least encouraged him. Can either of these young folks have a better chance of happiness again offered to them in life? There's youth, there's mutual liking, there's wealth for them almost—only saddled with the incumbrance of an old dragoon, who won't be much in their way. Give us your good word, Barnes, and let them come together; and upon my word the rest of my days will be made happy if I can eat my meal at their table."

While the poor Colonel was making his appeal, Barnes had time to collect his answer; which, since in our character of historians we take leave to explain gentlemen's motives as well as record their speeches and actions, we may thus interpret. "Confound the young beggar!" thinks Barnes, then. "He will have three or four thousand a year, will he? Hang him, but it's a good sum of money. What a fool his father is to give it away! Is he joking? No, he was always half crazy—the Colonel. Highgate seemed uncommonly sweet on her, and was always hanging about our house. Farintosh has not been brought to book yet; and perhaps neither of them will propose for her. My grandmother, I should think, won't hear of her making a low marriage, as this certainly is; but it's a pity to throw away four thousand a year, ain't it?" All these natural calculations passed briskly through Barnes Newcome's mind, as his uncle, from the opposite side of the fireplace, implored him in the above little speech.

"My dear Colonel," said Barnes; "my dear, kind Colonel! I needn't tell you that your proposal flatters us, as much as your extraordinary generosity surprises me. I never heard any thing like it—never. Could I consult my own wishes—I would at once. I would, permit me to say, from sheer admiration of your noble character, say Yes, with all my heart, to your proposal. But, alas! I haven't that power."

"Is—is she engaged?" asks the Colonel, looking as blank and sad as Clive himself when Ethel had conversed with him.

"No—I can not say engaged—though a person of the very highest rank has paid her the most marked attention. But my sister has, in a way, gone from our family, and from my influence as the head of it—an influence which I, I am sure, had most gladly exercised in your favor. My grandmother, Lady Kew, has adopted her; purposes, I believe, to leave Ethel the greater part of her fortune, upon certain conditions; and, of course, expects the—the obedience, and so forth, which is customary in such cases. By the way, Colonel, is our young soupirant aware that papa is pleading his cause for him?"

The Colonel said No; and Barnes lauded the caution which his uncle had displayed. It was quite as well for the young man's interests (which Sir Barnes had most tenderly at heart) that Clive Newcome should not himself move in the affair, or present himself to Lady Kew. Barnes would take the matter in hand at the proper season; the Colonel might be sure it would be most eagerly, most ardently pressed. Clive came home at this juncture, whom Barnes saluted affectionately. He and the Colonel had talked over their money business; their conversation had been most satisfactory, thank you. "Has it not, Colonel?" The three parted the very best of friends.

As Barnes Newcome professed that extreme interest for his cousin and uncle, it is odd he did not tell them that Lady Kew and Miss Ethel Newcome were at that moment within a mile of them, at her ladyship's house in Queen Street, May Fair. In the hearing of Clive's servant, Barnes did not order his brougham to drive to Queen Street, but waited until he was in Bond Street before he gave the order.

And, of course, when he entered Lady Kew's house, he straightway asked for his sister, and communicated to her the generous offer which the good Colonel had made.

You see Lady Kew was in town, and not in town. Her ladyship was but passing through, on her way from a tour of visits in the north, to another tour of visits somewhere else. The newspapers were not even off the blinds. The proprietor of the house cowered over a bed-candle and a furtive tea-pot in the back drawing-room. Lady Kew's gens were not here. The tall canary ones with white polls, only showed their plumage and sang in spring. The solitary wretch who takes charge of London houses, and the two servants specially affected to Lady Kew's person, were the only people in attendance. In fact her ladyship was not in town. And that is why, no doubt, Barnes Newcome said nothing about her being there.

PASSAGES OF FOREIGN TRAVEL.*

THIS is the latest book of travels, and one of the liveliest, just from the press; being sketches of men, places, and things in most of the countries of Europe, in Turkey, Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, by a writer whose brilliant style, keen perception of the beautiful in nature and art, truthful description, and vigorous views of every subject in his way, have won for him thousands of admiring readers and friends. Few men have more happily blended the cheerful with the tender, the beautiful with strength. We take, almost at random, a few passages from various parts of the volumes:

ON THE VOYAGE OUT—A MAN OVERBOARD.

The full moon rose on the sea, and hung out from the sky like a silver globe. The ship was sailing well under a fair breeze, and we walked the deck in the enjoyment of one of the most delightful evenings. One after another of the passengers went below, and a few only of the younger and more romantic remained to look out on the waves reflecting the beams of the moon, now riding far up in the heavens. It was nearly midnight when the cry shot through the ship, piercing every ear and heart—"A MAN OVERBOARD!" Except the cry of fire, no sound on ship is more terrible. For days you have been thinking every time you looked over into the deep through which the ship is rushing, of the helpless and hopeless fate of him who shall be cast into the sea; and when the fearful word is given, in that tone of mingled fear and pain which the fact extorts, there is a sinking of the heart, as if each one had a friend now perishing. Mr. Moore, the second mate, had an assistant in the ship's carpenter, who had acted as a seaman during the passage, as we had a miserable crew. He was a fine-looking young man, and the only one of all the men who had interested the passengers: He had been down in my state-room, and told me something of his history. His parents were in Holland, and he was on his way to visit them. A young woman was on board, to whom he was to be married in May, and they were to return to America to spend their days. His manners were very gentle, and he looked to me and spoke as if he had left the comforts of home, and had entered a life for which he was not formed. My heart had gone out to him, and in return for some acts of kindness he had done to me, I was thinking what present I should make him before going ashore, when, at the instant, the shout was made, and this noble fellow, the pride of the men, was struggling in the pitiless waters. Mr. Moore was near him, and had given an order to bear off the boom from the side of the ship—this man stepped over the bulwarks, pushed against the boom, the topping-lift gave way, and he pitched forward, head first, into the sea. The ship shot by him in a moment. Nothing thrown over could reach him. His cries of agony came up, cutting the heart, oh, so bitterly, that it would have been a mercy to be deaf. The mate, with admirable promptness, gave the orders to put the ship about. "Ready about. Luff round. Hard lee. Tacks and sheets, main top-sail haul: let go and haul." Then he leaped into the boat and cried, "Put the helm hard down. Lower away the quarter boat." Never shall I forget the look of the mate, as he screamed "Give me a knife—A KNIFE!" and taking one from a sailor, he passed it through the ropes. "In men, in"—and four stout fellows leaped in with him, and down it went upon the ocean, a little shell of a thing, sent forth to seek and to save that which was lost. I wanted to go with them, and as they struck out into the deep, under that full moon, at midnight, to look for a drowning brother, I felt that their errand was noble though none of them should live to tread the deck again. Then we gathered on the stern of the ship, and looked out into the night and the sea to watch the event. It was light enough to see that tears were falling fast on the cheeks of some in that anxious group. Some of us prayed. It was all we could do. The little boat was soon out of sight. We could hear the shouts they sent up to reach, if it might be so, the ear of the "strong swimmer in his agony," and then all was silent, save the wind among the cordage, and the heavy flapping of the sails as the ship lay to. A dark spot rose on the wave: the flash of the dripping oars in the moonlight met the eye, and we knew they were coming. The mate was soon seen standing at the helm. Our impatience would not brook delay, and we sent out the cry "All well?" Our hearts stood still for the answer; a half spoken "No" murmured along the waters, and we knew that the brave fellow was among the dead. So suddenly—so fearfully! To be swept from among us, in the midst of life and hope. There were many, many tears of sympathy that night, and when I went below and strove to sleep, the vision of a fellow-being struggling in the billows around me, drove slumber from my eyelids; and when it did come, the vision remained among my dreams.

THE MEN OF ENGLAND—SCENES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

There was better order in the House of Commons, than in our House of Representatives—more attention to the business in hand, and less confusion while members are speaking. They sit on long parallel benches with raised backs, with no conveniences whatever for writing. All the notes a man makes, even of a speech directed against himself, and to which he is bound to reply, he must make on a bit of paper in his hand; and even this is rarely done. All wear their hats while sitting, taking them off whenever they rise to speak, or to walk across the floor; and it ill comports with our ideas of propriety to see a gentleman put his hat on his head the moment he has ceased speaking. On the Treasury bench, the seat occupied by the members of the government, and running along at the right hand of the speaker, were sitting the most distinguished of the present ministry, whose names were mentioned to me by my friend. The members on the seat behind them were taking their ease, with their feet on the back of the Treasury bench, so that between the heads of Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston were the feet of a member of Parliament, and between Russell and Sir James Graham were the feet of another learned member, and three or four more were taking their comfort in the same way. At a social party some days afterward a lady said to me, "Now you will be writing a book when you go home, to pay us for all the wicked things that our travelers have reported of your country."

"But," I replied, "I find every thing here so much like what I have left behind, that even the foibles of my countrymen prove to be hereditary; and they are still to be found in the father-land."

"Name some of them, will you?" she demanded, with some spirit, as if she was quite sure I would be put to my trumps.

I then told her that "I had believed the practice of sitting with the feet high as the head upon a table or desk, to be one of the peculiar institutions of my own country; but I had perceived it to have the high sanction of the British Parliament, and the permission of her Majesty's government."

Being still further pressed, I related the facts as above, but it was evident that the company were incredulous. I then told them, that on the previous evening I was in the gallery of the House of Commons, and asked a friend to count the number of members sitting with their feet on the top of the benches, a position which would place them in the same situation with a man in one of our churches with his feet on the back of the pew in front of him. The gentleman counted six members thus sitting before us, and then commenced counting the men stretched out at full length on the benches, but they were so many that, after finding twelve or fifteen, he gave it up. This was more convincing, and it was admitted to be wiser to look at our own faults than to be making merry over the faults of others.

Lord John Russell disappoints expectation when first seen. His figure is not commanding, but it is striking, and, without the prestige of form or feature, he makes an impression even before he speaks. Serious, thoughtful, sincere, his words are waited for, not only that he is in the confidence of royalty, and one of the powers behind the throne, but for the prudence with which he is believed to be endowed. He has the confidence of the country, as well as of the Queen. Never did I see a great assembly so profoundly silent and fixed in their intent to hear, as when he rose to answer an inquiry Mr. Bright addressed to him in relation to the war now going on. Mr. Bright is a fine speaker, more of an orator than any one whom I heard in the house. He had made a very eloquent speech against the Ministry, not hesitating to denounce the war as unjust, and warning the country of its consequences. He spoke of the great danger of provoking hostilities with the United States of America, "a power," he said, "now equal to your own," and he predicted that if Great Britain should attempt to enforce her doctrine of "the right of search," in an American vessel, there would be war between the two countries in less than a year. He then inquired if the government had taken any steps toward securing a good understanding with the United States on this subject. This speech had been listened to with more than usual attention, but the moment Bright sat down, a silence seemed to come over the House, as if some stupendous event was about to transpire which held every breath in suspense. The members did not leave their seats, but each man sat, auribus erectis, and with eyes directed toward one man who would now respond.

Lord John rose: his frock coat was buttoned closely; his thin hair scarce hiding his massive head; a perfect gentleman in dress and manner, and after a momentary pause, while he looked upon the floor, he said in a low, conversational tone, which, so profound was the silence, was heard in the remotest corner of the hall, "that the honorable and learned gentleman might rest assured the subject had not escaped the attention of her Majesty's government." That was all. Other inquiries were made, and were answered with equal brevity and courtesy. Some of them required explanation, and the entire calmness and self-possession—the perfect familiarity with those details which others might have required a week to pick up, extorted the admiration of every hearer of the conversation in the House of Commons that night. At other times, I heard him when in more elaborate and formal efforts he rose to lofty strains of eloquence, and demonstrated his power to sway senates with his words.

Gladstone is the coming man of England. With a transparency of language that is beautiful to observe, he makes the driest financial and statistical matters almost entertaining to his hearers, and when pressed in debate he displays such fluency, elegance, and energy of expression, as to make him one of the most captivating of public speakers. He succeeded Disraeli in the chancellorship of the Exchequer, and it did not seem to me in the best taste, that the predecessor should now direct his terrible energies of invective and sarcasm constantly against the man who had supplanted him in office. But Disraeli, as the leader of the Opposition, is not scrupulous in his choice of weapons or occasions. Always in his place, taking no part in the ordinary business of the House, leaving that to his friends who have less responsibilities, he sits directly in front of Mr. Gladstone, waiting the hour when he may come down upon his victim with the swiftness of the eagle and the fierceness of the tiger. When all the country is on the side of the government, it is a hard matter for the Opposition to make capital out of the war. But it would be harder to find in modern parliamentary speaking, a philippic more terrible than the one which Disraeli delivered one night in March last, reviewing the conduct of the Ministry in bringing on the war. He pretended to be giving his reasons for not meeting the challenge which had been made, that he should move a resolution of want of confidence in the Ministry: and collecting the contradictory statements made by members of the government in the two Houses, and the inconsistent declarations made by the same Ministers at different times, he declared there was no need of his asking Parliament to declare its want of confidence in Ministers, when it was plain they had no confidence in each other, or in themselves.

IN PARIS—THE CHILDREN'S BALL—THE BAL MASQUE.

In the winter, or rather in the month of March, for it was in the last days of the Carnival, I was in Paris, and attended a children's ball: decidedly the most intensely French of any thing I saw in France. It was given in the Jardin d'Iver, a winter garden, a Crystal Palace, where tropical plants and flowers and the genial warmth impart a summer feeling to the place, and make it a charming resort.

In the centre of the palace an arena is floored, and vast enough for a thousand children to wander and play in. From the sides of this arena seats for spectators rise, and the plants and trees of the garden stand among the seats and extend back to the crystal walls. When I reached the gates, a long line of carriages was discharging their precious burdens: elegantly dressed children, with their governess or mamma, and in such haste that it was difficult to keep the little ones from rushing into the crowd and out of the reach of their protectors. I entered, and they were now pouring down in gay and beautiful troops upon the floor, their guardians accompanying them to the door of the arena, and there being obliged to leave them, as none but the young people could intrude upon that ground. The children ranged in ages from three to sixteen. They were of the first families, and dressed in the most elegant yet tasteful style. Some of them were in the costume of the last century—children in the dress of their grandparents, with powdered hair and patches on their rosy cheeks; the boys in short breeches and broad-tailed coats, yet all in the handsomest patterns and colors. For half an hour they promenaded in couples, and although they had no one to give them instructions, they went at it as orderly and politely as if they were men and women grown. Introductions would be given with perfect gravity and easy politeness. Gradually the great mass of little folks became amalgamated, and the performances of the day were ready to begin.

A large orchestra in attendance struck up lively music, and instantly the company seized their respective partners, and the dancing commenced. Then followed the liveliest, laughablest, and prettiest scene that I ever saw among the children. It was a burlesque on balls. It was the folly of dancing illustrated. It was child's play, and seemed just fit for that. Little girls and boys, certainly not more than three, and some said not more than two and a half years old, would go through the motions with profound propriety, holding to one another, and jumping as well as they could, as if unconscious that a thousand others were around them, and two or three thousand looking at them. The larger children had, of course, been taught to dance, and to them this was a great day to show off their airs, in the presence of the fashion and beauty of Paris.

The change of the music was instantly seen in the movement of the gay young multitude. And when it ceased; they dissolved into their several parties, marching and counter-marching, in the easiest and most agreeable manner conceivable, the gayest party that could be found that day in the Emperor's dominions.

Their parents and friends, sitting among the broad-leaved plants and orange-trees, seemed to be quite as much pleased as their children. A fine passage in the dance was applauded with great glee. The fond mother was pointing out to a group of friends her own dear child on the floor. Others received the compliments of their acquaintances on the beauty and grace of their children; and all appeared to enter into the occasion with the greatest zest, thinking it—as I presume it was, for young and old—one of the proudest days of their lives. What can be expected of a people thus trained, but that they will be frivolous, thoughtless, vain, and dissipated? What kind of women will these girls make, who are taught to seek distinction in such a scene? The greatest need of France is mothers—as much now as ever; and the prospect is not promising that France will have them soon.

I saw the bills posted for a Children's Theatre, and was told that they are attended by great crowds, the performances being given in the early part of the evening, that the nurses, with their infantile charges, may get home in season for bed. The little folks ought to have some rest, and must not be kept out too late.

The masked balls of Paris are described as the most picturesque and extraordinary of any of the night-scenes of Paris. As they are usually given on Saturday nights, and the dancing does not commence till midnight, those who have scruples of conscience on the matter of holy time will not attend to see what is to be seen, even if their scruples did not hinder them from going at any other time. A gentleman, who was present at the grand Bal Masque at the close of the Carnival, describes the scene:

"It was given in the Opera-house, the pit being floored over, making an arena for dancing for three or four thousand persons. The boxes are appropriated to spectators. Every conceivable character in the line of the ludicrous was exhibited by the men, and the gayest and frailest costumes imaginable were worn by the women. Men dressed as women, and women as men; and some, in imitation of animals, with horns and feathers, would come suddenly upon the floor, and be received with shouts of laughter, and mingle in the dance. Hundreds of the women were dressed in loose silk pantaloons, and a looser linen waist, so as to have the greatest possible freedom of action on the floor. And when the exciting strains of music summoned them to the work, a scene of bewilderment and revelry ensued that no pen of mine can essay to paint. The most extravagant figures were attempted, but no prescribed extravagance was sufficient for the frenzy of the actors in this extraordinary scene. They leaped, they whirled, they embraced, they raved in the wildness of the hour, as if they had lost all reason, and were now let loose to play the fool with thousands like themselves. After half an hour of the most violent and outlandish dancing, the whole company would promenade, and this was the time for the amusement of the masks with each other. The men wore none, except those who were dressed in some outré style, and the women had usually but a piece of black silk covering half the face, and this they were soon quite willing to drop, especially if they were handsome. The excitement increased as the night wore on. Madder and more mad appeared the dancers. The rooms for refreshments were crowded with men and women, who sought in strong drink the means of recruiting their failing strength. This was fuel to the flame. The restraints of decency became weaker, and then followed scenes more like pandemonium than any thing earthly ought to parallel."

CHURCHES—HOLY STAIRS.

In the church of the Capuchins is a famous picture of Guido—the Archangel Michael conquering a monster. It cost me some trouble to find a monk who would come and withdraw the curtain, for it was the hour for vespers, and they were all engaged; but when I discovered one apparently at leisure, he led me back into the church, and very kindly exposed the glorious painting, the master-piece of Guido. The young angel, with flowing hair and a countenance of heavenly beauty, with ardent courage and strength, is coming down on the enemy, and treading him beneath his feet. Our guide then conducted us to the cemetery of the Capuchins beneath their convent—an extraordinary museum in the court of death. One monk had just completed the pleasant duty of showing three ladies through the tombs, and they were kissing his hand and receiving his blessing as we came near. We entered the subterranean apartments, consisting of a series of cells, which are laid off in little squares, and covered with earth and moss, and here and there a few flowers. In each of these cells was the mummy of a monk, with cowl and cassock on, the cord confining his gown, the cross still held in his skeleton hand, and an hour-glass and book standing by. A card in the other hand tells us the name of the monk and the time of his decease. The walls of this gloomy sepulchre are adorned with carious figures, wrought with the bones of the monks, who are thus made to contribute to the embellishment of the place after they are picked to pieces. Long ago the whole number of cells was filled with the mummies, and now, when a Capuchin dies, he can find a bed below only by crowding out the one who has been here the longest. His bones are then worked up; his skull becomes a lamp, the vertebrae a chain to hang it on, and the shoulder-blade becomes a scythe in the lank fingers of a skeleton, while the columns and arches are all made of thighs and arms, and even the smaller bones are set in curious mosaics, making the queerest of all caricatures in the chamber of the dead.

Every one has read of the Holy Stairs, the Scala Santa, in the noble portico near to the Basilica of St. John Lateran. These twenty-eight marble steps are said to have been in Pilate's house in Jerusalem, and the same which the Saviour trod when he went to the judgment-seat of the Governor. Now no one is permitted to ascend them but on her knees. I say her knees, for of the scores who were slowly climbing when I was there, not a man was to be seen. But at the head of the stairs is a chapel, on which is written in Latin, "In all the world there is no place more holy;" and into this no woman is allowed to enter. I looked through the windows and saw the divinity of the sanctuary, a painting of the Saviour at the age of twelve, said to be a perfect likeness, and painted by the evangelist Luke! Of all the penitents who were toiling up the stairs, a few only appeared to be impressed with solemnity becoming the work in which they were engaged. One lady, elegantly dressed, a plump and pretty woman, laughed all the way up, and chatted with the children, who found it excessively tedious to be toiling in this way, when they would have preferred to mount two or three steps at a time. Another was very much out of breath, and used her handkerchief freely in wiping the perspiration from her brow while she rested a few moments, and then climbed on. It is awkward work going up stairs on one's knees. I have heard it said that going down stairs in this way is a certain cure of the fever and ague. It is just as good for that malady as this uphill work is for the more desperate malady of sin. But here, even here, on his knees, on these very stairs, the great reformer, Luther, was startled by a voice from heaven—"The just shall live by faith"—and the Reformation was conceived.

A TURKISH BATH.

We entered a large apartment with a white marble floor, and a fountain of water playing in the centre. A dome was pierced with many holes, shedding a dim twilight over the room, and its warmth induced a pleasing languor. On a raised platform were divans, and bathers were reclining. We stretched ourselves to rest a moment after our long walk. A servant then assisted me in undressing. Enveloped in a large shawl, and with towels about my head, I rose up from the divan, and stepping off from the platform, put my feet, not on the marble floor, but into wooden clogs, which stood ready to receive them, and marched unsteadily along in the procession of similarly clad, or unclad bathers. Passing out of this room we entered another steaming with heated vapor, all but suffocating. It grew hotter as we advanced, and I paused, fearful to proceed. Becoming accustomed to it in a few moments, we were led into still another room, with a marble circular platform about a foot high in the centre, while all around the sides were niches, a fountain in each, from which hot and cold water was flowing. On the marble floor a naked Turk was lying flat upon his back, and a stout fellow was bending his joints and kneading him all over as if he were dough. I sat down by the side of a faintain and surrendered myself to the soft, enervating influence of the atmosphere. At first it was oppressive, but soon was exceedingly agreeable. A young Turk, a smooth, handsome boy, came now, gently removed the covering from my head and shoulders, letting it fall loosely over my limbs. Taking one of my arms he rubbed it with a cloth mitten, at first softly, and then more briskly, with warm water. Then he took the other arm and went through the same process, my neck, and back, and breast; the cuticle seemed to roll up and off as he continued his manipulations, and I began to fear he was skinning me, or that I had never been washed clean before. With closed eyes and a gradual falling away of consciousness, I let him complete the process in his own way. When he had thus thoroughly cleansed me from head to heels he took a wisp, or mop of palm fibres, like tow, and lathered me with light suds, pouring it over my head and neck, piling it on me, though it would run down on my beard, as the ointment on Aaron's. Dipping bowls of hot water, he poured them on the top of my head; and as it streamed in a fiery torrent over my eye-balls, I thought they must be destroyed. I dared not open them to see if I could see; but I held my hands tightly over my eyes while he continued to dip and pour, till endurance was no longer possible, and I groaned to him to have mercy on me and stop. He did rest, but for a moment only; and once more covering me with the lather, he repeated the douche of hot water till he was satisfied; for I had no words which he could understand in which to convey my fears of the fatal consequences of such a scalding operation. He left me to sit quietly for a while and recover slowly from the effects. Returning with dry napkins, soft and pleasant, he rubbed me gently, and my good-nature came back with the friction. After he had made a turban of a towel and put it on my head, and winding several folds of a large shawl around me, he led me out through two or three successive chambers, becoming gradually cooler as we withdrew, into the grand central hall, where the divans invited us again to repose. The servant now brought the chibouque—the pipe, with a stem four or five feet long, handsomely ornamented—and placing the pipe in a saucer on the floor, displayed his skill in bringing the amber mouth-pieces so that it would rest upon my lips. I took a few whiffs, and then another servant appeared with coffee in a tiny china cup, and this cup in another of silver filigree-work. The coffee is drunk without milk or sugar, black, strong, and bitter, not to my taste at all; but the Turks are fond of it. I preferred the pleasant sherbet that followed; and by this time I was refreshed and ready to be dressed. With all the aches and pains of a week of hardship taken out of me, and rejoicing like a strong man to run a race, I left the bath with my friends, after paying about twenty-five cents for the various luxuries of bathing and refreshment which I had enjoyed. Money must go a long way here, or all this could not be had for a quarter of a dollar.

THE SLAVE MARKET—BUYING WIVES—SHOOTING THEM AT PLEASURE.

Antonio now brought us, after a long ride, to the slave-market. On one side of an open square was a row of boxes or stalls without windows, and the doors closely shut. As we came up, a man in European dress stepped up and asked, in French, if we would look at the girls; and immediately opened the door of one of the pens. Instead of seeing half a dozen beautiful Circassians, whose charms have been the theme of so much poetry and prose, four or five African women, dark as night, fat and funny, jumped up, and laughing merrily, desired us to buy them. Decidedly we had no inclination to make the purchase; and the dealer, seeing that we were merely gratifying our curiosity, slammed the door, and turned on his heel. Other men on the ground had a supply of these Nubian women for sale; but if there were any whites in the market, we were told that Franks are not allowed to look at them. As they are bought only for the harems of the Turk, the profaner eyes of the European must not see them before or after they enter that impenetrable retreat. These are brought to the market by their parents and friends, and often are children of the most respectable families in their own country, who are thus disposed of in the way of marriage perfectly consistent with the Oriental ideas of domestic happiness, however it may be revolting to ours. I had quite an argument with a Turkish merchant on this subject. He would not admit me, of course, into his harem; but the door that led into it was frequently left open, and never failed to disclose one or more of his wives, who disappeared after we had exchanged glances. I told him that one wife was enough if she was good, and too many if she was bad. He replied, that if she was good, the more of the same sort the better; and if she was bad, he must get a good one to console him for his disappointment in the other. He said he had six, and loves them all, and they love him; and not one of them wishes to leave him. My arguments were all wasted; and I left him to the enjoyment of the field and the harem.

Slavery among the Turks is about the same as adoption into the family. The boy, bought of the trader, rises to the rank of his owner, becomes a member of the state, may be an officer of the government, take the daughter of the Sultan to be his wife, and aspire to the throne. But the power of the master is absolute over the slave; and the lordly Turk, not the Sultan only, but his ministers and his rich subjects, surrounded with their harems of fair women, bought with their money, and brought here in the budding loveliness of youth from the vales of Georgia and Circassia, do not hesitate to gratify their unbridled passions at any sacrifice in the exercise of their unlimited power. Not long since, one of the Sultan's present ministers accused one of his wives of stealing a trinket that belonged to another. She denied the charge with the warm indignation of injured innocence. In her youthful beauty she stood up before him as he sat on the crimson divan; and the whole bevy of his wives gathered around to see the trial of the accused, now trembling before her lord and master. She could only assert her innocences, while he repeated the charge, and drawing a pistol from his girdle, shot her through the heart. The frightened women fled from the shocking scene, as she fell bleeding and dead at the monster's feet. How common these things are, no man can say; but that such things are not uncommon, even at the present day, there is too much reason to fear.

LOVE AND CHARCOAL.

BY G. P. R. JAMES.

CURIOSITY often leads one into strange places and unpleasant circumstances. I have found it so, and perhaps experienced the evil consequences of indulging that propensity more than most men. Indeed, with me it is rather a passion than a propensity—a passion in certain circumstances quite irresistible. To give it force with me, however, there must be something more than the mere desire of knowing and investigating things secret or concealed from me. All the young people in the world might make love, lawfully or unlawfully, within ten steps of me without exciting the slightest desire on my part to know what they were about. Rogues might rob, plunder, or cheat; politicians lie, swindle, and corrupt; scandal-mongers calumniate and backbite, without inducing me to lend an ear or turn an eye in that direction. But when there is any thing gloomy, any thing awful, any thing terrible to be discovered, or, indeed, attached in any way—real or fanciful—to events or objects brought under my observation, an overpowering desire, an impulse not to be resisted, impels me to probe the matter to the bottom; to trace the circumstances through all their tarnings and windings, although every step be accompanied by pain and terror to myself.

I remember, in the year 1819, when I was detained for some months in Paris on business, I was fond of rambling through the older parts of that very remarkable city, and used frequently to pass through the Rue des Petits Champs. It had at that time a very dingy and somewhat squalid appearance about it; and one house especially seemed more dingy, more squalid, more ancient than the rest. At all events, it was more dirty. The brush of the painter, the trowel of the mason, the saw and chisel of the carpenter, did not seem to have been exercised upon it since it was built. It was a tall house, six stories high at least, and it had an ever-open porte cochère—for that had once been a fashionable street—which gave a view into a small court-yard, round which the great mass of the house arose. The windows upon the five upper stories toward the street were thickly coated and dim with the alternate rains and dust of many years; but there were two windows on the ground floor, or rez-de-chaussée, as they call it, one on each side of the porte cochère, which were a little cleaner; one of them, indeed, tolerably clean. The one displayed an inscription, giving the passing stranger notice that cigars and snuff were to be had within (this inscription, by the way, was written in a crabbed French hand upon a long strip of dingy gray paper much the color of the smoke-begrimed stone of the building), and the other window indicated the profession of those within by a display of somewhat soiled gloves and fly-marked articles of lingerie.

I passed it two or three times a day for at least a week, and every time I passed I looked up at the windows. Nothing, however, was to be seen but the dirt; no face appeared at any dusky pane; no head or hand was protruded to gaze on the passing crowd below or to water a sickly box of mignonnette which somewhat menaced the heads of the passengers. Gradually I grew interested in that house: it was so lean, so sordid, so woebegone, it looked like one of those men in threadbare black coats and pantaloons with glossy knees, whom we all conclude to have known better days, and who, we imagine—especially if their linen be scanty and somewhat yellow—have ruined themselves by gin or gambling. I began to ask myself curiously what sort of inhabitants that house could contain; to whom it belonged; what were its purposes, its applications.

I rarely saw any one go in or out in the earlier hours of the day; but once or twice, passing about four o'clock, I perceived several men enter in haste, and once a young and pretty girl and an old lady, both ex chapeau—then a sign of claims to the rank of gentlewoman—and tolerably well dressed. The interest grew more intense; the house itself appeared to assume a more dingy hue—to look more forlorn and sickly. "I will know what it all means," I said to myself; "I will find out how this place is tenanted. There are things in every great city which no one dreams of but the actors in them. Almost every house has its tragedy and its farce going on within it, while we pass by the door unmoved."

The next time that I went down the street, I quietly turned and entered the porte cochère. On the left hand was a little dingy den, with a door glazed in the upper half, and an inscription thus: "PARLEZ AU PORTIER." But I had nothing to do with the porter. He was not likely to give me any information, and so I walked on into the court-yard. The aspect of the place was not much improved by nearer inspection. The windows that looked into the court were as dim and dusty, the walls were as black, the window-sills and doors as ancient and colorless as those on the street; and, besides, there was a quantity of long rank grass growing up between the paving-stones, and showing clearly that horses seldom trod and vehicles rolled there. Neither was there any thing apparent to satisfy my curiosity, except where, from a pole stuck out of an upper window, and dangling by a piece of string, was a board with the words, "Chambres garnies à louer."

I then determined to go into the little glove-shop on the rez-de-chaussée and make inquiries, for by this time my fancy was excited to a high pitch, and I was resolved my curiosity should be satisfied. I found within a little old shriveled Frenchwoman, the very pink of politeness, and, of course, as the great preliminary, I bought a pair of gloves. All Frenchwomen love to talk when they have nothing else to do, and often whatever else they have to do; and thus I and Madame were soon in full conversation. I was not very ceremonious in bringing her to the point; for asking all sorts of impertinent questions is perfectly polite in France, if it be done in a polite manner; and I soon obtained sufficient information to stimulate my curiosity still farther. I found that the house was used as a boarding-house, and the old lady informed me that it contained "une société charmante," and, moreover, "table d'hôte excellente." There I found several young artists of whom the great world had never heard, and never will; several clerks in second-rate shops and warehouses; several ladies who gave lessons in various arts and accomplishments; and a number of others, whose occupations my informant did not pause to particularize, either lodged and boarded, or took their meals. She, moreover, assured me that if I were looking for such a place, I could not find a better in Paris.

This last observation gave point to my purpose. I had often longed to know—to see and examine with my own eyes—how the people whom nobody knows, live in Paris, and I determined, without giving up my other lodging, to hire a room in the Rue des Petits Champs. It was a foolish idea—an extravagant one in some respects; but I was impelled to it by sensations I could not resist—sensations which I knew always mastered me in the end, and against which, therefore, there was no use of struggling. The Boodhists say that a man who wishes to overcome his faults and passions must take them one by one, like a man counting a rosary or string of beads; but I never could get over that first one, which has so often put me in painful situations.

Well, I walked straight in from the glove-shop to the porter's den, and began to chaffer about board and lodging. I am plain enough in my apparel, God knows; but the man eyed me all over, and then was all civility and attention. He would have the honor of conducting me immediately to "Madame," he said. She would be charmed to show me all the vacant rooms. There was an "appartement délicieux au premier," and an "sur le grand escalier," and another nearly equally good "sur le petit escalier," but he counseled the former. It was more suited to the position of "Monsieur."

Madame was as courteous as the porter. She was a great tall strapping Flemish lady, very good-looking, though of large dimensions, and she instantly hurried with her keys, giving sundry orders to sundry maids as she went to show me the vacant rooms. Sagaciously she took me to the worst before the best. She took me up the "petit escalier," narrow and crooked, lighted principally by borrowed lights. Up three flights of steps she led me to a small dingy room, out of which the clothes and effects of an occupying tenant had not yet been removed. There was a trunk in a corner, a cravat over the back of a chair, and a pallet, paints, and brushes on the table. She explained, however, that the monsieur would be out in two or three days, "poivre jeune homme!"

As I had lost more breath in going up than I should like to lose three or four times a day, I declined that chamber, and explained the reason. She then led me down to the floor below, where she showed me the counterpart room, and enlarged upon the excellent society which I should have around me there. One apartment was occupied by "Madame —," an excellent old lady of good family, who had condescended to be governess to the only daughter of the "Duc de Quatrevingts Tourelles," and was now living on an annuity she received from the family. Then she pointed to the very next door to that which she intended for my entrance, telling me, with a very knowing look, that there lodged a "charmante demoiselle—belle comme une ange," who gave drawing and painting lessons to young ladies. "Une personne charmante," she said, looking as cunning as possible all the time, "mais sage, très sage;" and then she laughed, fit to kill herself, at the very idea of there being such a thing as female virtue on the earth.

However, neither the neighborhood of the old lady, nor that of the young one, proved temptation enough. It was still too high. In short, I was resolved to see the apartment upon the ground escalier, which the porter had mentioned, and thither at length the good dame led me. She had to conduct me to the floor below, where she pointed out the salle à manger, or dining-hall, upon a good large vestibule, with the grand escalier running down to the ground floor. At the distance of some ten steps from the door of this dining-room was on either side another large door, and one of these she opened, rushed in, put back the blinds, and then, after a quick glance round at what she considered the grandeur of the "pièce," she fixed her eyes upon me to see how I would be struck.

The apartment consisted of a little anteroom about twelve feet square, and beyond that a good large bedroom, with a bed in an alcove or recess, having a closet for clothes at each end. This alcove was on the left hand side, and no great calculation was needed to show me that it and the two closets, which occupied the whole length of the wall of the room, abutted upon the dining-hall. Just opposite the door by which I entered were two large windows, looking out into the court-yard, and affording so much light that I was surprised to perceive on the side opposite the bed another small window of an oblong shape, about three feet in width by two in height, perched up at the top of the wall just under the cornice. This was soon explained, however, for when I pointed it out to Madame, she not only informed me that it was what is called a borrowed light, to enable people to see their way upon the petit escalier, but dragged me up again, crying, "Tenez, Monsieur; je vais vous faire voir," and then took a great deal of pains to convince me that it was impossible for any one passing up or down that staircase to see into my room, for although it was so high up in the wall of the chamber, it was on a level with the feet of the passengers. This perfectly satisfied me, and I engaged the apartment, paid a small sum as earnest, and promised to move in the next day. This promise I faithfully fulfilled, but in the mean time did not give up my apartments in the Rue d'Antin, which, for a longer residence, suited me much better. In fact I went there merely from curiosity to see how people live. Madame assisted me with the greatest politeness in making all my little arrangements, changed the place of this piece of furniture and that, and as I was very courteous to her, spoke French, and paid her a small compliment now and then, I seemed to rise high in her good graces.

After all was arranged, as we had raised some dust in our manoeuvres, she invited me down to her little salon while the garçon swept the room and waxed the floors, and passing through the dining-hall, she led me to a neat sitting-room beyond, where I found two ladies already in occupation and one gentleman. I was introduced in form, and soon settled rightly who and what my new companions were. The first was an elderly lady—about sixty-five—with a somewhat pretentious air, and a certain degree of minauderie, to say nothing of rouge and a wig; and she I settled in my own mind was the admirable lady of good family who still enjoyed a little annuity from the family of the Duke de Quatrevingts Tournelles.

The other lady was the pretty girl I had seen once going into the ports cochères, and a mighty pretty girl she was, especially without her bonnet, with her black hair as smooth and glossy as a raven's wing, and her full black eyes deeply shaded, but replete with a soft, tender light. This was, of course, the young lady who gave lessons in painting, etc., to other young ladies. The gentleman who sat by her side seemed not at all insensible to her beauty, and their conversation was carried on in low and evidently very intimate tones, with glances of the eye, and looks of intelligence, which left no doubt of the quality of their friendship. He was a young, pale, rather haggard-looking man, but with good features and a fine person. His beard and hair were wild, and in this respect corresponded well with the expression of his eyes, which had a quick, eager, impetuous flash in them that savored a little of frenzy—whether of that which we are told assists the poet's eye in rolling or not, I can not say—but to me it looked a little unsettled and unsafe. When I was introduced to him and his fair companion, those eyes fixed upon me eagerly, but he seemed soon to settle in his own mind that I had not the qualities of a rival—I believe it was a glance at my drab gaiters which decided the question—and after that he was civil and courteous enough.

In the mean while I heard Madame informing the old lady that I was vieux garçon, but a charming, excellent man; and after a while, when I had a little private conversation with her, she told me that "pauvre Monsieur L—" was madly in love with Mademoiselle Elise, but, poor people, what could they do? He had not a son, and could not sell his pictures, and she was forced to live by her teaching." She whispered in the most profound confidence a little bit of scandal in regard to the extent of their intimacy; but enjoined secrecy, inasmuch as such a suspicion would ruin the prospects of the young lady, observing very properly that it was none of her business—she was not bound to play duenna to every lady who did her the honor of boarding in her house.

I never believe any tales of scandal, much less mere insinuation—I would rather not believe them, and so I do not—and in the present case they only served to make me take an interest in the two young people, who seemed to be in an unhappy but not unusual predicament; and as I was placed at dinner next to Monsieur L—, I contrived to get tolerably intimate with him in a short time. His fair friend sat just opposite, so that he had something to feast his eyes upon while he talked to me. The dinner was really very good to the taste. What it was composed of I do not know—who ever does know the composition of a French dinner? But after it was over, I asked my new acquaintance to join me in my apartment, and partake of a very fine bottle of Clos de Vougeot, of which I had brought a store with me. He said he would come in a few minutes, and I saw him soon after walk across the court with Mademoiselle Elise, who parted from him at the door. He then returned and joined me in my rooms, and I could not help perceiving that he was very sad. The wine did not seem to cheer him much, and though Frenchmen are generally very facile in talking of their own affairs, he did not even approach the subject of his. To lead the way, and really with a kindly feeling toward him, I started the topic of painting, alluded to his profession as an artist, and expressed a wish to see some of his productions. He entered with enthusiasm into matters of art, and after a long disquisition, promised to bring me some of his drawings on the following morning. This he did not fail to do, and I found that they really had merit, though not that commanding merit which insures success. They were mere sketches, but vigorous and artistical, and I thought I could not spend a few Napoleons better than in buying some to hang up in my library at home. I selected six, and asked him to fix the price. He did so, naming a very moderate sum, and I paid him immediately in gold. I shall not easily forget his look or manner when I laid the four Napoleons down upon the table. He gazed at them and sighed, and seemed to hesitate whether he should take them up or not. Then pointing to them with his hand, he said, in a sort of cynical tone, "Tenez, Monsieur; I recollect the time when to have sold half-a-dozen of my sketches for four Napoleons in one morning would have filled my heart with hope and expectation—I should have seen fame, and wealth, and honor before me, and the gratification of all my brightest hopes. But now—I have so often had such gleams, and so often seen them vanish the next instant, that they are to me like the handfuls of couscous which the Moors give to a man whom they have impaled, to keep him just living on in his agony till he rots upon the stake."

There was something so unutterably sad in his whole tone, that his words touched me to the heart; and I was just thinking what I could do to serve, or say to comfort him, when he snatched up the money and ran out of the room.

He did not dine at the table that day, and I could see that Mademoiselle Elise was somewhat uneasy and absent, till a gentleman with large mustache—an officer of the Swiss Guard, I believe—who had been added to our party, drew her notice and her conversation by some little gallant attentions. During the evening I just caught a glimpse of Monsieur L—— passing down the stairs, and feeling rather unwell I retired to rest earlier than usual. I could not sleep, however. The borrowed light, which I have mentioned as just facing the alcove in which I lay, disturbed me. There was a perpetually-burning lantern on those stairs, and people passed up at all sorts of hours; but it was the dull glare of that square eye of light at the top of the wall, forever looking at me as I lay, that annoyed me most. Half an hour—an hour, passed without any one going up or coming down; but still I lay awake, looking at that dull glare. There were cobwebs and dust enough to dim it, beyond doubt; but that only added to the annoyance. At length ten o'clock struck by the pendule in the dining-hall, and shortly after I heard somebody rustling up the petit escalier. The lantern hung on the opposite side of the stairs, so that I had the advantage of seeing their shadows—at least the lower parts of their shadows—as they passed up or down—a sort of ombre chinoise. It was that of Madame——, the elderly pensionary of the Quatre-vingts Tourelles family, which now passed. I am sure of that. There was the immensely extensive amplitude of gown, and the little foot—very neat and well preserved—raised, to go up the step in sight, like that of an antelope in a coat of arms. But her shadow passed away like the rest. I could hear that she made a pause at the door of her room. I imagined her fumbling for her key in her pocket. She applied it audibly to the key-hole, and then went in and closed the door.

Another hour passed, and still I could not close my eyes. Then I heard a step in the court-yard below, and then there was a quiet footstep again upon the petit escalier. At the same time there was a light step in the room overhead, crossing the floor in a direction that seemed to lead from the window toward the door. In the day time, what with sounds inside the house and out, I had never yet distinguished a sound in that up-stairs room, and I did not remember having heard one even that night till then. But now it was distinct, and the moment after I saw a pair of men's boots cross the borrowed light. I listened with all my ears. The steps stopped at one of the doors on the flight above. I could not hear the door opened, but a minute or two after I am sure I heard the murmur of voices, and I think I heard sobs.

"Imprudent young people!" I thought; and felt the full force and necessity of the prayer, "Lead us not into temptation!" Unhappily, it is we who are always seeking it ourselves. Whoever was the visitor, he staid but a few moments, and I heard him mount farther up the stairs. He certainly went to the room of Monsieur L——. Half an hour after I was sound asleep.

The breakfast hour in that house was not very exactly fixed like the dinner hour; and when I went in, rather late, I found Mademoiselle Elise seated, with the officer of the Swiss Guard on the opposite side of the table saying pretty things to her. I was hardly supplied with a cup of coffee, when Monsieur L—— appeared at the door. He paused, gazed in for an instant, and I could see his wild eyes flash fire. He calmed himself, advanced, sat down without speaking, took one mouthful of coffee, and cut a long French roll in two. By the time that feat was accomplished, the officer had finished his breakfast, and rising, with a low bow to Mademoiselle, quitted the room. Still Monsieur L—— did not speak—no, not one word—and then he started up, and was making toward the door. But Elise could not bear it any longer, and she cried, "Charles! Charles!" He paused an instant, and she joined him at the other end of the room. I did not listen, but a casual glance of the eye that way showed me eager conversation and the gesture of entreaty and expostulation upon her part—upon his, an averted eye, a gloomy brow, a gnawing of the nether lip. At last he said a few words; and exclaiming, "Attend—attend!" to my great surprise, Elise ran up to me, and laying her hand almost familiarly upon my arm, she said, "Would Monsieur confer a great favor upon her, and change seats with her that day at dinner, excusing the great liberty she was taking in making such a request?"

She was so pretty, and she said it so prettily, that if it had been a desire to sit with my back to the stove or at an open window, I could not have refused her; and I replied, "Certainly. I shall be but too happy to concur in any arrangement that gives you pleasure."

We three were now the only persons in the room—for the garçon had gone away with dirty plates—and what we said was quite aloud. Elise brought her lover back to the table, and I thought it better to leave them alone together. "Jealousy," I said, as I walked up the stairs; and after pondering a short time upon the euzious perversities of love, I went out to transact some business.

By the dexterous arrangement which Elise had made, by the aid of my concurrence, she was placed next to Monsieur L——, and I next to the officer of the Swiss Guard. Poor man! he looked quite disconcerted when he came in and found how the pieces had been altered on the board—his queen mated, and he himself in check. The game, however, was not quite up with him—at least he seemed to think so—and he said several things to Mademoiselle Elise across the table—all very pretty in their way, but all very insignificant. They fell short of their mark, however; for some Elise did not hear, some she would not hear, and the rest she did not seem to attend to.

"This is atonement," thought I; and, taking a little interest in the game that was played, when my fair young friend and her lover retired into the sanctum of Madame, I walked in after them, and engaged the elders in conversation, that the younger ones might have their conference all to themselves. Nevertheless, from time to time I caught a few words of what was passing between Monsieur L—— and his companion, as they sat in a corner engaged in very eager and animated discussion.

I tried to divine what it was all about; and perhaps I was not wrong in thinking that, like two fish caught in a net, the meshes of which were formed of passion and poverty, they were struggling to find some means of getting out, but still found themselves entangled.

At length there came a long, and, as it seemed to me, a solemn and gloomy pause; and then Monsieur L——, bending down his head, said something in a whisper to his beautiful friend.

She did not raise her eyes, but answered, in a low but distinct tone, "Soit (so be it); mais c'est mourir de faim (but it is to die of hunger)."

Again Monsieur L—— bent down his head, and added something in as low a tone as before. She gave a quick, almost painful start; then suddenly a light, almost like that of joy, beamed in her eyes, and laying her hand upon his arm, she repeated more than once, "Soit—Soit!" It is the only resource. We may be happy at length."

After some more conversation, which I did not overhear, she rose, and, taking Madame apart, conversed with her for several minutes, during which time I could see several significant shakes of the head, as the eyes of the two turned from one to another of the company present, and at length fixed upon myself.

All this time, Monsieur L—— had been looking down at his thumb nails, which he had been diligently cleaning and polishing with a pen-knife. A moment after, Elise was by his side again; and during the whole of the evening her spirits were excessive—unnaturally so, it seemed to me, for her countenance was not of a very joyous cast, and I had always thought that there was a degree of habitual melancholy—not gloom—in its expression.

As I left the room that evening, Madame followed me, and when we were alone, told me she had a message to deliver me from Mademoiselle Elise. "She is going to be married to-morrow," she said, "quite in secret, la pauvre, and she wishes you to accompany her to the church and the mairie—but you are not to say a word of it to any one; for you and I are the only persons to know it in the house."

What could I do?—nothing but consent; and therefore, the following morning, Madame and myself, Monsieur L—— and Elise, set out at an early hour, and I saw her united to her lover forever. It was indeed forever!

After the ceremony was over, we all separated, and went upon our different errands, to all appearance as if nothing extraordinary had happened. There were no smart clothes, no bridal toilet—nothing but a pair of white gloves here and there, which were put in the pocket as soon as used; and doubtless the scholars of poor Elise entertained not the slightest suspicion that day that her heart was full of emotions which almost rent it in twain. At least, when the whole party assembled at dinner at the table-d'hôte, no one could have discovered from her face or manner that there was the slightest agitation within. She was peculiarly calm indeed, and I thought I had never seen her looking more beautiful. The greatest liar, I do believe, on earth is the human countenance.

Well, the day passed by; and, at my usual early hour, I retired to rest. Sleep I certainly did not get for some time. That great yellow eye on the opposite wall, which I have already mentioned, would keep looking at me.

About eleven o'clock I heard some noise in the room above—there were footsteps, and people speaking; and it seemed to me that some one was carrying or moving a heavy object of some kind across the room, and set it down with a curious sort of clang near about the centre. Then all was still, and I fell asleep. I could not have slept much more than an hour, I suppose, and had been dreaming of I know not what—but of something frightful, when I started up with a feeling of terror upon me. The first thing I heard distinctly was a sort of staggering step overhead, and then the rattle and fall of something made of iron—at least so I judged, by the sound it made. Then some one seemed to try and open a door; and then came a heavy fall.

I was very much alarmed, but I knew not what to do. The sounds were evidently in Elise's room, but there was nothing to indicate positively that anything had gone amiss. There had been no cry—no shriek—nothing, in fact, which might not be attributed to some little, ordinary accident. Nevertheless, I could not divest my mind of the idea that something had gone amiss; and although I would not take the liberty of going up to the door of two newly-married people, I lay awake for some ten minutes, with my ear bent eagerly to catch the lightest sound. There was none, however. It was another organ which, at the end of that time, confirmed my fears, and induced me to rise. I perceived a smell of fire in the house, distinct, though not very strong; and partly dressing myself, and casting on my dressing-gown, I ran out of the room. In the vestibule I found Madame coming forth from her room, and a waiter running up the stairs from below.

"Don't you smell fire?" I cried.

"Mais oui, mais oui!" answered the lady, and ran farther up, with the agility of a cat. We all stopped at the door of Elise's room, for there was a light smoke issuing through the cracks. We knocked—we tried to open—but all was still, and the door fast locked. There was no time to be lost, however; the waiter put his strong shoulder to the door—which, like the rest of the house, was old, and not very sound—and he and I together contrived to drive it in.

The man fell staggering in with his own weight, but instantly drew back; and the fumes of charcoal which issued forth almost suffocated me and Madame. For her part, she began to shriek with all her might, and by that means soon brought a number of people out of their rooms with lights. At all risks I made a rush at the window, and threw it open, holding my breath till I got out again.

And now let me describe the appearance of that room, when, after various little incidents not worthy of detail, we were at length able to enter and look about us.

The first object that met the eye was a large iron brasier, mounted on three long legs, which had been knocked over, and had scattered the lighted charcoal, that had previously filled it, over the floor. That floor was of old polished oak, and had been burned in several places by the pieces from the brasier, producing the smell of fire which I had perceived. Between the brasier and the door, but much nearer to the latter, lay Monsieur L—, in his night-dress. His face was considerably contorted, and it seemed evident that he had made an effort to open the door, and in staggering across the room, had knocked over the brasier and its contents. I lifted his arm; it was quite flaccid, but there was no breath came from his lips, and his face was the face of death. With a sad heart I walked across to the little alcove in which Elise's bed was placed, and drew back the curtain which shaded it. There she lay; and but that she was deadly pale, one might have thought her in a tranquil sleep. In her there was no contortion of features—no disturbance of limbs. One arm lay across her bosom, the other was stretched easily by her side. Her eyes were closed—her lips partly open, showing the pearl-like teeth within—and nothing indicated death but the wax-like hue of the skin, and the awful stillness of the whole form.

Some means were tried to recall the unhappy pair to life, but all without effect; and thus passed away two of this earth's children, who had impatiently bartered for an hour's happiness the life below—let us humbly hope not the life above.

Oh, that mess of pottage, that mess of pottage! We are all of us more or less Esaus in this world.

LOCUSTS IN THE EAST.

AN Eastern summer is full of wonders; but there is, perhaps, nothing about it more awfully appalling than those vast flights of locusts which sometimes destroy the vegetation of whole kingdoms in a few days, and where they found a garden leave a wilderness.

I am riding along a pleasant hillside—toward the end of May. There is a sharp pattering noise, like that of April rain in Scotland, falling on hard ground. I look attentively toward the earth, knowing that it can not be a shower this clear, balmy morning, and I see a countless multitude of little black insects no bigger than a pin's head. They are hopping and springing about in myriads, under my horse's feet—along the hard stony road, which is quite black with them, and far away among the heather, which is turned black also. I ride miles and miles, yet the ground is still darkened with those little insects, and the same sharp pattering noise continues. They are the young of the locusts, who left their eggs in the ground last year. They have just come to life. Three days ago there was not one to be seen.

A little later and I am passing through a Greek village. The alarm has spread every where, and the local authorities have bestirred themselves to resist their enemies while still weak. Large fires are burning by the river-side, and immense caldrons full of boiling water are streaming over them. The whole country side has been out locust-hunting. They have just returned with the result of their day's exertion. Twenty-three thousand pounds weight of these little insects, each, as I have said, no bigger than a pin's head, have been brought in already in one day.

They have been caught in a surface of less than five square miles. There has been no difficulty in catching them. Children of six years old can do it as well as grown men. A sack and a broom are all that is necessary. Place the open sack on the ground and you may sweep it full of locusts as fast as you can move your arms. The village community pay about a farthing a pound for locusts. Some of the hunters have earned two or three shillings a day. As the sacks are brought in they are thrust into the caldrons of boiling water, and boiled each for some twenty minutes. They are then emptied into the rapid little river swollen by the melting of mountain snows.

My Albanian, Hamed, watches these proceedings from his embroidered scarlet saddle with much melancholy gravity. "Ah," he says, "if there was but one dervish or good man among those rogues he could pray them away in an hour. There are no locusts in my village, because we have a dervish—a saintly man—there."

It appears that no dervish comes, and the plague goes on spreading daily from village to village—from town to town. This is the fourth year since they first appeared at Mytilene, whence I am writing. It is said that they seldom remain at one place longer, but that, in the fourth generation, the race dies out unless it is recruited from elsewhere. I am not aware whether this is a mere popular superstition, or a fact based on experience. They show, however, certainly no symptom of weakness or diminution of numbers. In ten days they have increased very much in size; they are now as long as cockchafers, only fatter. They seem to be of several distinct species. Their bodies are about an inch and a half long, but some are much larger round than others. They have six legs. The hind-legs of the largest kind are nearly three inches long, or twice the length of the body. They have immense strength, and can spring four or five yards at a time. The legs are terminated by sharp, long claws, and have lesser claws going about half way up at the sides of them; their hold is singularly tenacious. Their heads and shoulders are covered with a kind of horny armor, very tough. Some are of a bright green color all over, some have brown backs and yellow bellies with red legs, and are speckled not unlike a partridge. Some are nearly black all over, and have long wings. The largest species have immensely long feelers projecting out near the eyes. I noticed some of these feelers twice the length of the rest of the body. The bite of the largest kind is strong enough to bend a pin. This locust has immense sharp tusks, furnished with saws inside. His mouth opens on all four sides, and closes like a vice. His eyes are horny, and he can not shut them. The largest kind have two short yellow wings and a long pointed fleshy tail, the smallest have four long black wings and no tail. The head is always large in comparison to the body, and not unlike that of a lobster. In moving, its scales make a noise like the creaking of new leather.

The locusts are on the wing, they have risen from the ground into the air. They darken the sky in their steady flight for hours, and they make a noise like the rushing of a mighty wind. Far as the eye can see over land and water broods the same ominous cloud. The imagination refuses to grasp their number. It must be counted by millions of millions. Count the flakes of a snow-storm, the sands by the sea-shore, the leaves of summer trees, and the blades of grass on dewy meadows. For days and days the locust storm and the hot south wind continue. At night the locusts descend on the gardens and cornfields. They struggle for pre-eminence on the points of palings, and the topmost overlooks the rest with extraordinary gravity. They crawl and hop loathsomely on fruit and flower. They get into eggs and fish, which become uneatable in consequence. There is no help against them because of their multitude. They eat holes in my bedding; they get into my pockets, and into my hair and beard. The Greek women are obliged to tie their trowsers on above their gowns as a protection against them. You tread upon them; they blow against you, they fly against you, they dine off the same plate, and hop on a piece of food you are putting into your mouth. Their stench is horrible, and this lasts for weeks.

I was tempted to impale one of them as a specimen, and left it sticking on a pin in the wall. Hamed slyly removed it, believing the proceeding to be a charm or magical device to counteract the designs of Heaven.

"It is God's will!" he said, sententiously, when I found him out and reproached him.

So they ate up the corn lands and the vineyards, wheresoever they fell. I counted nine on one blade of wheat. When they left it, it was as bare as a quill.

"They have still left your apples untouched," I said to a gardener.

"Helas!" replied the man. "They have eaten up all besides; and what is the use of your eyebrows if you have lost your eyes!"

Three days after they had eaten his apples too.

I noticed, however, that in the years the locusts appear there is no blight or smaller insects about. Perhaps, therefore, they are mercifully sent to destroy the smaller and more dangerous insects when they have multiplied exceedingly under the prolific suns of the East.

But they are a dreadful visitation. They ate holes in my clothes as I walked about. They got among Hamet's arms. They choked up the barrels of his pistols, and fed upon his sash of silk and gold. They ate away the tassel of his cap and the leathern sheath of his sword. My French dressing-gown might have been taken for a recent purchase at Rag Fair. They ate the sole of my slipper while I was asleep on a sofa. They ate my shirts in the wardrobe, and they ate my stockings. Hamed's "good man" never arriving, he catches many and puts them out of the window with much tenderness. The pasha, my host, with a touching faith in the goodness of God, goes about with a long stick to save them from drowning when they are driven by the winds into his reservoir of gold fish.

Perhaps the pasha is right: but I can not be so good as he is. For the locusts eat the back hair off women's heads while washing at the fountain, and the mustaches off gardeners while they sleep in the noonday shadow. They strip trees till they look as if struck by lightning or burnt by fire. I see the plants green and gay in the moonlight. In the morning their freshness and beauty have departed.

Families sit wailing in their fields over the ruin of their little all. There is a story that the locusts have eaten a child while its mother was away at work. There is a tradition that they once ate a drunken man who fell down in the kennel. Neither event is improbable. I saw a locust draw blood from the lips of an infant in its mother's arms.

They will not die. They seem to have neither sight nor hearing—vile things with nothing but mouths. If you catch one he will spring from your hold, and leaving his legs behind him go on as well as ever. The Cadi had a little garden; he had it watched day and night, for it was his pride, and full of far-away flowers. He kept fires surrounding it night and day to prevent the locusts crawling in. When they had learned to fly he fired guns to turn aside their course. When they came in spite of this he turned a garden engine upon them. Then he buried them, but every green thing and every blossom was stripped from his garden for all that.

They will not die. They can swim for hours. Hot water, cold water, acids, spirits, smoke, are useless. I plunged one in salt and water. He remained four minutes, and sprang away apparently uninjured. I recaptured him and smoked him for five minutes. Two minutes afterward he had revived, and was hopping away. I recaptured the same locust, and buried him as deeply in the ground as I could dig with a pocket-knife. I marked the place, and the next morning I looked for my friend, but he was gone. Nothing will kill them but smashing them to a jam with a blow, or boiling them. There is no protection against them. They despise and eat through the thickest cloths, or sacking, or matting; and glass coverings for a large extent of ground would be of course too expensive. The only way in which one of my neighbors was enabled to save part of his harvest was by gathering his fruits and cutting down his corn when the locusts came, and then burying his property in holes dug in the ground and covered over with a heavy stone at the aperture, as I had seen the peasantry do in some parts of Western Africa. This saved him a little. No barn or room would have done so.

Yet another three weeks, toward the end of July, and the cloud which has hovered over the land so long is clearing away. And there arises a great wind, so that the locusts are swept off in countless armies to the sea, and so drowned. It is impossible to bathe for days, or to walk by the sea-shore, because of the stench of them. But they are gone, and their bodies float over the sea like a crust, extending to the opposite coast of Asia Minor.

I found out while busy with this subject, that the locusts were supposed to have come from Asia Minor to Mytilene; that when they first appeared on the northern coast of the island, they were few in number—a greater portion of the flight which settled here having been probably drowned on their passage. It was not till the third year that they became so numerous and so mischievous as to cause alarm. Their devastations were principally confined to the vines and olives; afterward they grew more general.

Last year the inhabitants, dreading their return, endeavored to take timely precautions for their destruction. There was some difficulty about this, however. It was necessary to apply to the Turkish local authorities. The local authorities were obliged to refer the matter to the Grand Schoul-Islam, who published a fetfah, or decree, on the subject. But the fetfah was not obtained without a great deal of importunity, as it was believed by many learned doctors that the demand was altogether contrary to Moslem law. However, as the ravages of the locusts continued to increase to an extent which seemed to menace the revenue derived from the island, a fetfah was at last issued. In virtue of this, permission was given to destroy the locusts by all means save those of fire and water. It was necessary to evade this provision, since fire and water were universally acknowledged as the only effectual means of destruction.

The matter was now made the subject of a fixed legal regulation, by which every family was required to destroy from about twelve to twenty-five pounds weight of locusts, according to their numbers, for the common benefit. Some of the villages where labor was scarce, paid this tribute in money. Twopence a pound was first given for locusts; but the price afterward sunk to a farthing. The efforts of some places were, however, defeated by the indifference or superstition of others; so that labor, time, and money were all lost. More than seven hundred thousand weight were destroyed without any visible effect on their numbers. Their weight at this time was about two hundred and seventy to the ounce.

The Turks resolutely refused to assist in these proceedings. They looked upon the visitation as the will of God, with which it was impious to interfere. The captain of a Turkish man-of-war, seeing a locust drowning in the sea, bade his favorite coffee-boy plunge into the water to save it.

Some of the uneducated Greeks had also their own peculiar way of going to work. They insisted that the locusts had arrived in punishment for the sins of the community, and consequently that human efforts against them would be vain. It appeared to them that public prayers and processions were much more reasonable. They also applied to a certain St. Tryphon on the subject—for St. Tryphon is the recognized patron and protector of fields and plants. They likewise sent a deputation to Mount Athos, requesting St. Tryphon to come and pass a few days at Mytilene—but he didn't.

It has been noticed that they appear, invariably, about the middle of May, and that they die or depart in August. They are most mischievous during the month of June. They have an objection to damp or marshy grounds. The females bury themselves in the earth when dying, probably to conceal their eggs. The males die aboveground, where the ants and smaller insects speedily devour them. Neither rain nor cold, however severe, appears to destroy or injure the eggs, which lie in the ground like seed during the winter, and burst forth into life in the first warmth of summer. Each female is understood to have about fifty young, which, in some measure, accounts for the astounding increase of the tribe. They require about twenty days to attain their full growth; sometimes longer, if the weather is unfavorable.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

THE UNITED STATES.

THE past month has been unusually meagre in events of importance or permanent interest, both at home and abroad. The proceedings of Congress have related mainly to local and private matters, and have thus far resulted in no positive legislation. In the Senate, on the 18th of January, a letter was presented from Hon. Rufus Choate, tendering his resignation as one of the regents of the Smithsonian Institute, partly because of his inability to attend properly to the discharge of the duties of the position, but mainly because he could not concur in the policy which had been adopted by the majority of the Board. He regarded that policy as a direct violation of the law of Congress, by which their action was to be regulated and controlled, and as exactly contrary to the designs of the institution, as indicated by that law and by the will of the founder. The receipt of the letter occasioned some debate in the Senate, several Senators regarding it as derogatory to that body, and offensively peremptory in its condemnation of the majority of the Board from whose views the writer differed. It was laid upon the table, with the intimation that a committee would be hereafter appointed to investigate the complaints against the Smithsonian Institution. Mr. Cooper, of Pennsylvania, on the 25th, addressed the Senate in support of resolutions he had previously offered, calling for the interference of the Government to put a stop to the practice of foreign countries in shipping their paupers and criminals as emigrants to the United States.—A Bill has passed both Houses of Congress authorizing the establishment of a Commission to investigate and pay the losses sustained by American citizens from the spoiliations of the French upon American commerce. On the 5th, in the Senate, Mr. Cass presented resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Michigan, instructing him, as one of the Senators from that State, to procure the passage of a law prohibiting Slavery from the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska. He said, that, a few years since, he had declared his purpose to obey such instructions, when fairly exercised, and under proper circumstances. He desired now to show that the circumstances under which these resolutions of instruction had been passed, were not such as should give them any binding force. The Democratic party in Michigan had recently lost its ascendancy, and been succeeded by another party whose sentiments he did not share. The practical question, therefore, was whether a political party, whenever it accedes to power, by whatever combinations, has a right to pass resolutions which its opponents, in legislative trusts, are bound to obey; or, if prevented from obeying by their conscience and consistency, to resign their consistency. Such a rule, he believed, would introduce changes into the Senate radically affecting its organization, and incompatible with the objects of its institution as the representative branch of the Sovereignty of the State. It would deprive it of every characteristic of permanence, and would always be used to the disadvantage of the Democracy, since the opponents of that party do not admit the binding obligation of such a rule. He declined to discuss the general principle involved, saying his only object was to show why he acknowledged the obligations of the former instructions and denied those of the present. Strange doctrines were now abroad, and strange organizations employed to promulgate and enforce them. The grave questions of policy which have hitherto divided parties are now cast aside, and religious and political intolerance finds zealous, and, it may be, successful advocates. While he believed the existence of political parties essential to the welfare of the country, he thought we needed no new experiments, and no new organizations. While the new party was in process of formation, upon a narrow basis of exclusion, seeking unity of action not in individual conviction and responsibility, but in the surrender of the will of each to the dictation of those who may gain the direction of the party, the public mind must be kept in a state of feverish excitement, unfriendly to calm deliberation; and majorities acquired by combinations arising out of such a state of things do not act under those fair and proper circumstances which he had declared to be essential to the obligatory force of legislative instructions. He believed the adoption of the measures, for which he was instructed to vote by the Legislature of Michigan, would be the signal for the breaking up of this confederacy, and he should, therefore, not obey them.—In the House of Representatives various subjects have been discussed, but no action of importance has been taken. Governor Causey, of Delaware, in his inaugural address, discusses at some length the evils that threaten the country from the increase of foreign influence, and the augmented number of foreigners who arrive among us. He congratulates the State on the spirit of resistance to these injurious influences which has been aroused throughout the country, and predicts from it the happiest results. He urges also the importance of affording more efficient protection to American labor against the effect of foreign competition; and concludes by representing all the fears that have been entertained for the safety of the Union as unfounded and absurd.—Public attention has been largely directed to an emigrating expedition in process of preparation, under command of Colonel Kinney, to colonize and settle certain portions of the territory on the Mosquito coast. The settlement is to be made under a grant alleged to have been made to two British subjects, named Sheppard and Haly, by the predecessor of the present king of the Mosquito country. The government of Nicaragua has protested against this expedition, as an invasion of its territory, and as in violation of the Neutrality Laws of the United States. To these representations Mr. Marcy, the Secretary of State, has replied, that there was no evidence of any hostile intent on the part of the expedition, but that, on the contrary, it was merely a peaceful emigration company, intending to settle upon lands to which they had a claim, not for purposes of conquest, but of cultivation and improvement; and that it was not in violation of our Neutrality Laws, inasmuch as the members of the expedition would be in all respects subject to the authority of the country. To these representations Mr. Marcoleta, the Minister from Nicaragua, has replied, under date of January 16th, setting forth the various attempts of Great Britain to establish a protectorate over the Mosquito coast, and to plant an English colony there, and the declaration of the government of the United States that they would never acknowledge any such protectorate, nor permit the European governments either to interfere with the domestic concerns of the American republica, or to establish new colonies upon this continent which should jeopard their independence or ruin their interests. The American Secretary of State, also, in 1849, and at other times, informed the British authorities that the American government could never acknowledge the independence of the Mosquito Indians, or admit that they have any right of sovereignty over the territory they claim. The Minister urges that by these declarations, so frequently repeated, and so explicit and emphatic in their terms, the government of the United States has denied the right of the Mosquito king to make any grants of land, and denounced the policy of planting new colonies upon those territories. It can hardly be supposed, therefore, that it would attempt to establish such colonies itself, or permit the invasion by its citizens of the rights and territories of the State of Nicaragua.—Colonel Kinney, on the 28th of January, writes to Secretary Marcy, declaring that the objects of the expedition are to occupy and improve the lands within the limits of his grant, and that every thing is to be done peaceably, and without invading the rights of either communities or States. He says he intends to establish municipal regulations for the government of the colonists, so that it may be in his power to enforce order, and keep up the forms of civilized society from the beginning. The Secretary, in his reply, dated February 4, states that if the expedition is a mere peaceful emigration, and if those connected with it choose to abandon all claim to the protection of the United States, and submit themselves to the jurisdiction of some other country, this government will not interfere with it; but the Ministers of the various Central American governments deny that he has any grant of lands within their dominions, and our government does not acknowledge the Mosquito king.—Elections have taken place for United States Senators in several of the States. In New York, on the 6th of February, Senator Seward was re-elected for six years from the 4th of March, when his present term of service will expire. He received 18 out of 31 votes cast in the Senate, and 69 out of 126 in the Assembly. The election had excited a great deal of interest, and was preceded by animated and vehement discussions, of several days' duration, in both Houses.—In Massachusetts, Henry Wilson, "Free Soil," has been chosen to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Edward Everett. In Wisconsin, Charles Durkee, "Republican," has been elected to fill the place of Isaac P. Walker. In Illinois, Lyman Trumbull, "Anti-Nebraska Democrat," succeeds James Shields. In Iowa, James Harlan has been chosen to succeed Augustus C. Dodge, who has been appointed Minister to Spain, in place of Mr. Soule, who has resigned. Hon. John Sidel has been re-elected from Louisiana.—Lieutenant C. G. Hunter, in command of the United States brig Bainbridge, forming part of the United States squadron on the Brazil station, returned to New York, without orders, on the 23d of January. In an official report to the Secretary of the Navy, he assigns, as a reason for this step, the refusal of the commander of the squadron to permit him to carry into effect a plan he had formed for punishing the Dictator of Paraguay for insults offered to a Consul of the United States. Lieutenant Hunter was immediately dismissed from the service by the President for this violation of his duty.—Rev. William Capers, D.D., Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, died suddenly, on the 29th of January, at his residence in Anderson, South Carolina. Dr. Capers was born in St. Thomas parish, on the 26th of January, 1790. He received the degree of M.A. from the South Carolina College, where he was educated, and was received into the annual Conference of his native State as a traveling minister in 1808. In 1828 he was sent to England as the representative of the American Methodist Episcopal Church to the British Conference, and for several years he was one of the general Missionary Secretaries. In 1846 he was elected Bishop. He was distinguished for the urbanity of his manners, the elegance of his style, the oratorical finish and force of his pulpit ministrations; and also for the prominent part he always took in the affairs of the Church, of which he was ever a distinguished ornament, and which will deeply feel his loss.

From California we have intelligence to January 16. The railroad across the Isthmus of Panama is completed, and trains passed from Aspinwall to Panama for the first time on the 28th of January. There is no intelligence of any importance from the Pacific coast. The Legislature was in Session. The returns of emigration show that while 47,730 persons have arrived in California during the year, 24,477 have taken their departure, so that there has been a clear addition of only 23,253 to the population, and of these only 10,185 were American.

From Oregon our dates are to the 28th of December. The winter had been unusually mild. The Legislature was in Session. Business was dull and money scarce. The question of organizing a State Government was agitated with a fair prospect of success. Difficulties were still encountered with Indians east of the Cascade Mountains.

From the Sandwich Islands we learn that King Kamehameha died on the 15th of December, aged forty-one years, and was succeeded by his son, Prince Liholiho, who had requested the members of the old Council to retain their places until he could make arrangements for appointing their successors.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Parliament met on the 23d of January, and the war immediately engaged the attention in both Houses. The resignation of his seat in the Cabinet by Lord John Russell was announced, and on the 26th, his Lordship gave at length his reasons for this important step. The principal reason grew out of the notice given by Mr. Roebuck that he should move for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the conduct of the war. When he saw that notice, his Lordship said, he felt that it could only be met in one of two ways—either by denying the existence of the evils which were said to require investigation, or by saying that efficient measures had been taken to apply a remedy. The first declaration he could not make—for, unhappily, the condition of the British army in the Crimea was most melancholy and deplorable; nor, on the other hand, could he say that the conduct of the war department was in the hands of a man of the vigor and energy necessary to insure reform. He stated that he had held a long correspondence with Lord Aberdeen for the purpose of placing the control of the war in the hands of Lord Palmerston, believing him to be more capable than any other man of reforming the abuses the existence of which could not be denied. These endeavors, however, had been unsuccessful, and he had made up his mind that the only course proper for him to pursue was to retire from a Cabinet the responsibility of whose measures he was not willing to share.—Lord Palmerston followed, in a speech deeply regretting the retirement of Lord John Russell, and complaining that he had not given the Government time enough for making the new arrangements which such a step would render necessary. He agreed, however, with him in the opinion that the war ought to be conducted with a greater degree of vigor than had yet been shown. Mr. Roebuck then urged the passage of his motion, and was answered by Mr. Sidney Herbert, in an attempted vindication of the action of the Government and the conduct of the war. In the House of Lords no important discussions had taken place. The Earl of Winchelsea made a speech, assailing with great bitterness the course of the Times newspaper, and was followed, in nearly the same strain, by the Duke of Newcastle. Lord Lyndhurst gave notice of a motion of censure upon the Government for its conduct of the war.

The public mind throughout England is greatly agitated by the reports from the Crimea—by the failure of the Allied armies to take Sebastopol—and especially by the loud complaints of the sufferings from disease, exposure, and insufficient care of the British troops. The most serious charges of incapacity and reckless neglect are urged against the Commander-in-chief and the Secretary of War, and the necessity of radical changes in the organization and conduct of the army is boldly urged. Several of the highest of the subordinate officers have returned to England, and among them is Sir De Lacy Evans, who has resigned command of the Second Division. A correspondence between him and Lord Raglan has been published, in which he assigns the very feeble state of his health as a sufficient reason for this step, but in which he also states certain facts concerning the attack of the Russians upon the British troops on the side of Inkermann on the 5th of November, which throw the responsibility of that fatal affair upon the commander. Sir De Lacy states that the weakness and exposed character of that position had attracted his notice as it was under his command, and he had frequently directed the attention of both Lord Raglan and General Canrobert to the subject. The weakness and precariousness of the position, its liability to be suddenly attacked, and the small means at his disposal to render it more secure, it was at all times his duty to represent. But the various exigencies to be provided for on other points at that time, he says, rendered it scarcely possible to afford any material reinforcement or means for the construction of defenses. The public press and public sentiment in England have availed themselves of these statements, and of others still more explicit from other sources, to sustain the most vehement complaints of the conduct of the war. Lord Raglan, in a letter acknowledging the receipt of Sir De Lacy's resignation of his command, compliments him very highly on the value of his services, and regrets the necessity of his departure.—Admiral Dundas has resigned his command of the Black Sea fleet, and returned to England: in his parting address he pays a high compliment to the officers and seamen of the fleet under his command, for the courage with which they have encountered danger in various forms, and for the high character they have sustained for enterprise, discipline, and devotion to their sovereign and their country.—Great interest has been excited by an autograph letter from the Queen to Mr. Sidney Herbert, begging him to assure the "poor, noble, wounded soldiers and sick men, that no one takes a warmer interest, or feels more for their sufferings, or admires their courage and heroism more than their queen."—Lord Elgin, in his return from the Governorship of Canada, was honored with a public reception by the authorities of Liverpool. In his reply to the congratulatory addresses made to him, he said his endeavor had been so to develop the resources of Canada as to render her people absolutely contented with their condition, and also to promote that free intercourse with the people of the United States on which the welfare of both countries must always so largely depend. He thought he had done something toward the accomplishment of both these objects. Highly as he valued the independence of nations, he thought the present war proved conclusively, what ought never to be forgotten, that no two nations could engage in war without affecting injuriously the interests of the whole civilized world.

CENTRAL EUROPE.

In France the Emperor has called for a new loan of five hundred million francs: it is announced that more than three times that sum has been placed at the disposal of the Government, and that the number of subscribers to the loan was over one hundred and seventy-seven thousand. A bill has been adopted by the Legislative Corps calling out 140,000 men of the class of 1854.

In Prussia the course of events indicate a fixed determination on the part of the Government not to extend the character of its obligations to the Western Powers. On the 19th of December, Baron Manteuffel, on behalf of the Prussian Government, addressed a note to the English and French Envoys in regard to the request made that Prussia should give her assent to the arrangement they had made with Austria. He states that although the King had not thought proper to participate in the exchange of notes between the Four Powers, he had still endeavored to give a practical force to the guarantees provided for at Vienna, by inducing the Cabinet of Russia to adopt them. In a subsequent communication, dated January 5, the Baron reiterates the same views, and conveys the refusal of the Prussian Government to mobilize her army. The French Minister has replied to these representations in a dispatch not yet published, the purport of which is that Prussia will not be allowed to participate in the Conference to be held in Vienna, unless, 1. She accedes to the treaty of December; 2. Does not oppose the demand of Austria for the mobilization of the Federal contingents; and 3. That she shall herself mobilize a force of 100,000 men. On the other hand, Prussia claims a right to participate in these conferences, in her capacity of a great European Power, and because she was a contracting party to the treaties which are under revision. Prussia has, therefore, sent a protest to the Cabinets of Vienna, Paris, and London, against the validity of any resolutions adopted without her participation.

In Austria further conferences have been held and negotiations opened, which hold out expectations that peace may be restored. At an interview held at the house of the British Minister at Vienna, Prince Gortschakoff repeated the declaration that the Emperor was ready to accept the four guarantees as "points of departure" for a negotiation; adding a request that the representatives of the Triple Alliance would explain the meaning they attach to the guarantees. As England, France, and Austria, had previously come to an understanding on the subject, their reply was communicated to the Russian Envoy by the French Minister. Two days afterward, Prince Gortschakoff demanded a new conference. It was granted; and here he put in a document giving the interpretation which the Emperor of Russia puts on the four guarantees, of which the following are the points: 1. Abolition of the Russian protectorate in Moldavia and Wallachia, and placing the privileges granted by the Sultan under the joint guarantee of the Five Powers: 2. Free navigation of the Danube: 3. Revision of the treaty of 1841, the Minister stating that he does not refuse to "come to an understanding, in formal conference for peace, on the means which the three Courts may propose to put an end to what they call the preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea, on condition that, in the choice of those means, there be not one of a nature to infringe upon the rights of sovereignty" of the Czar on his own territory: 4. The guarantee of the privileges of Christians in Turkey by the Five Powers. This note was received, and further negotiations were postponed to a Conference to be held about the middle of February at Vienna.

EASTERN EUROPE.

From the Crimea there is no news of the slightest importance. The operations of the siege are still continued; the English army is deplorably in lack of clothing, provisions, etc., and the Russians are said to be in the constant receipt of reinforcements. Special efforts have been made to concentrate large bodies of troops at Perekop, so as to prevent the landing of reinforcements for the Allies, and if deemed desirable to make an attack on Eupatoria. The severe weather had rendered it very difficult for the Allied armies to press the siege with any vigor, and hostile operations were almost entirely limited to occasional skirmishes and cannonades.

From Russia we are in receipt of a manifesto issued by the Emperor on the 14th of December, in regard to the war he is waging with the Western Powers. The causes of the war, he says, are well understood. The whole country knows that neither ambitious views, nor the desire of obtaining new advantages to which he had no right, were the motives for those acts and circumstances that have unexpectedly resulted in the existing struggle. He declares that he had solely in view the safeguard of the solemnly recognized immunities of the Orthodox Church, and of its co-religionists in the East. His views, however, had been entirely misinterpreted by the Western Powers, who had attributed to him designs he never entertained, and commenced a war which he had done nothing to provoke. He says he shall omit no opportunity of restoring peace that may be consistent with honor; but that, if it be necessary to the protection of his dominions or the defense of his faith, he will prosecute the war to the last extremity.—Nesselrode has addressed a note to the Russian Minister at Berlin, expressing satisfaction at the language held by the two courts of Mecklenberg at the Frankfurt Diet, declining to become parties to the Western Alliance, which, he says, under a pretense of restoring peace, tends to make the present war a struggle which will embrace the whole of Europe.

Editor's Table.

ARE THERE MORE WORLDS THAN ONE?

Is a question which is generally thought to have arisen solely out of modern science. But it is, in fact, a very ancient one. We can hardly conceive of a time so early when there did not, now and then, flit across the mind the thought that perhaps there were other worlds than this—other regions of space, whether visible or invisible, as densely occupied, as full of life, as widely diversified, as the portion of the universe which constitutes our own peculiar residence. The idea is as much a priori as a posteriori. It comes as much from the inward thinking of a serious mind as from outward observation. A race of blind men, or a world of blind men, might have had it, and even carried it much farther in their conceptive thinking than our most scientific astronomers with all the quickening aid the telescope can give to the mere scientific imagination. The soul, thus shut up to its own musing, might not have roamed so far out in space; but then, the idea once obtained of an objective universe without, it might have carried it to worlds above as well as worlds beyond us. From the very peculiarity of its condition, it might have had a tendency to the upward view, and loved to rise into that region of thought which science generally ignores because it prefers to think of nothing higher than man, and its own boasted display of intellectuality.

By worlds above us, we mean not simply in altitudinal space; for away from our own earth, and our own system, the topographical distinctions of above and beyond are wholly lost. The idea has respect to degree rather than to place. It suggests the query, whether there may not be worlds, properly so called, differing not merely in extent, or locality, or density, or any material condition, but in their very essence, or order of being—so as to make it something more than a mere figure when we speak of the material world, the spiritual world, the natural world, the supernatural world, the sensible world, the intellectual or intelligible world, the angelic worlds, the archangelic worlds, the celestial world, the Divine world—all distinguished from each other, not by any terms of quantity, or extent, or material greatness of any kind, but by their respective ranks in the order of ascending being. Such thoughts as these are independent of science, or any outward discovery. They belong to the innate constitutional thinking of the serious mind; and science can neither prove their rationality, nor show them to be absurd.

But, even as a philosophical speculation, the notion is very old in the world. It comes into the mind from that argument of the "sufficient" or "insufficient reason," which has been so powerfully presented in one of its aspects by Leibnitz, and has been, in all ages, one of the chief stimulants of philosophic, in distinction from merely scientific, inquiry. It is the argument that a thing may be believed to be, not simply on the ground that it is positively proved to be, but because there is no reason why it should not exist, either in itself, or as well as something else which is positively known to exist. Pourquoi non? Why not? Why should it not be? It is the argument used by Montaigne for a plurality of worlds in his popular sense of the term; and it is the same argument so powerfully applied by the author of a late very remarkable book, in refuting the conclusions such popular writers would too hastily draw from the surface observations of modern science.

It is this work of Dr. Whewell, entitled "The Plurality of Worlds," that has suggested our train of editorial remark, and we hope to say more about it; but to return to the antiquity of the idea. It was this argument, pourquoi non, that brought out the thought long before the telescope was known, or even dreamed of. The mind made the discovery, if discovery it be, from its own interior thinking, ages before there had been obtained this powerful aid to the exterior sense. Why not? it would say to itself—why not? Why should there not be other worlds than this, whether we see them or not? Just as we say now—Why should there not be other universes over, and above, and beyond, all that has ever been brought within the field of vision by the most powerful instrument? We are not to be limited in this matter by sight, either natural or improved by the highest conceivable aid. The argument does not come from the world of sense; it is not born out of it, and can not, therefore, be bounded by it.

It is all contained in the reasoning that Plutarch, in his book De Placitis Philosophorum, ascribes to Metrodorus. "We think it strange," says he, "that there should be but one spear of wheat in a great wheat-field; much more strange would it be that there should be but one kosmos in the infinite space." And then, according to Plutarch's account, he goes on to reason from another ground, supposed to be peculiar to some modern French and German metaphysicians—in other words, the infinity of causation, or, as some of our more pantheistically pious would name it, from the eternal and infinite necessity of creative power eternally and infinitely energizing. "It is evident," says this ancient forerunner of Messrs. Cousin, Morell, Hegel, and Co., "that the universe is infinite in number and quantity, from the fact that the causes are infinite, and therefore it can not be bounded, neither can the world be one." The old philosopher had in view what he would call elements and causalities, or powers, αἰτια καὶ στοιχεῖα. The modern French, German, and Anglo-Germanic school would use a somewhat different phraseology, and would seem, some of them, to talk more piously; but their doctrine, and the reasoning by which it is supported, would come to just about the same thing.

Such is the tendency of this innate query of the soul, when it goes forth unchecked in its roamings by any higher elements of belief. It may, however, assume a more truly religious aspect. It may be asked without having in mind any physical or metaphysical necessity of creation, but with direct reference to the divine moral attributes. Here, too, the soul inquires why not? with a reverent attitude, and yet with an assured confidence that it is asking no irrational question. Why not? Why should not God have made other worlds than this—made them, not from any necessity of creation reducing him to a position undistinguishable from that of a mere natural power, but according to the "eternal counsel" of his own most holy and rational will, working when and where, and to what extent, it pleaseth Him? Why should he not, in this we have made more worlds, and even more universes, for the exercise of his benevolence, for the promotion of happiness, for the artistic excellence of the workmanship irrespective of extrinsic utility; or for other sublime ends unknown to us, and inconceivable by us, but which, unknown and inconceivable as they are, even our reason teaches us may exist; or, finally, for that still more transcending and ineffable end, which embraces all other ends, His own Eternal Glory?

Such reasons are indeed not conclusive. There may, especially, be fallacies attending the first, or what is called the greatest-happiness-theory of ends, and we believe it greatly calculated to mislead, if taken as our sole guide in theological investigations. Yet still, all these grounds and modes of thinking are natural to the human mind, and all of them, with less or greater force, suggest the question which science so arrogantly and so falsely claims as all her own.

But let us confine ourselves more strictly to this position of the old philosophy, only taking the word causation in its moral and religious, as well as in its physical and metaphysical senses. It may then be thus widely stated. The same causes, be they moral, or be they natural, or both classes combined, that produced one world might have produced more. Why, then, should they not have produced more? Since the mind can more easily conceive of their going on, than of their stopping right short at the bounds which shut in our own feeble observation, our own natural or telescope-assisted sense.

It is true, there was among these curious speculators—and the word has a far different sense from that which it obtains in the dialect of Wall Street—among these curious speculators, world-watchers, or world-students of the olden time, there was another theory, or another aspect of one, seemingly the opposite of this, but which, when carefully examined, is found in perfect harmony with it. Some, and the mightiest among them, maintained that the kosmos, or world, was one. Not that our earth was all the kosmos—they hardly thought of our earth in their far-reaching speculations—but the world, be it what it might, however great, however wide, however high, however varied, however full of orders of being, from the worm to Deity, was one, and could be but one—a unity, perfect, finished, and finite, or a unity infinite—but, in either sense, a unity beyond which, whether more or less, there was no other.

Empedocles, the philosophic poet, although he held to this, yet made a verbal distinction between the Kosmos and the Whole. The kosmos, he said, was one, but not the all, τὸ πᾶν. It was only a portion, a small portion, of the all, while the rest was bare hyle, the term the old philosophers used for the ultimate matter, or the material out of which the kosmos was made. With some of them this hyle was a purely metaphysical idea, the abstract matter, or matter in the abstract, or that which remained when all properties and qualities were gone—with others, it was something like the modern lecturers' star-dust, or elemental nebulous fluid, as near to nothing in density as a thing could be and yet be something.

In this sense, too, Plato held the world to be one, perfect, and all-containing. The reason he gives is most sublime. It must be one because its divine paradigm was one; the divine paradigm must be one, because the Eternal Mind in which it dwells, and dwelt from everlasting, was one.

Hence he gives it a name which we shrink from applying to the world, in any view of it, because for us its Scriptural usage connects it with a higher and holier association. He calls this paradigm, or Eternal Idea, the Only Begotten, and declares it incorruptible and imperishable, although its outward material manifestations in time and space might undergo numberless mutations and dissolutions.

The material world, too, was one, not simply in the sense in which it might be said the all was one in quantity, or the universe was one regarded as one extended and multiplied existence; but it was one because of one principle of organic unity, one law of mutual interdependence running all through it—penetrating, pervading, and embracing the whole and every part. What this principle of organic unity was, the ancients did not know scientifically—that is, they had not brought it in connection with forces already known upon the earth. They had not linked the series; which was what Kepler and Newton are supposed to have done, when they first vaticinated and then verified, in this way, the universal law of gravitation. How wide the chasm that parted this known from that great unknown they could not tell. They could look over from the land of sense, or experimental knowledge, to the opposite far-off coast of philosophic faith or a priori conviction; but they could not determine how many, or how few, the arches required to bridge that gulf which we think we have securely passed, although advancing science may throw still farther back the ever-distant shore, leaving our great law of gravitation still at an immense remove from that ultimate physical principle of unity in the universe that stands next to Deity.

And yet the thinking men of old were as firmly assured of such a law, such a principle, call it what we may, as we are. Their belief was independent of science; and so is ours, too, if we will but closely examine the ground of it. This innate conviction of the soul is a distinct thing from scientific knowledge, or scientific proof. The latter may tell us, or attempt to tell us, what the law is, or how it is, but can not make us more certain of its objective reality. Science or no science, the sound mind is as sure of this as the algebraist is of there being a real determinate answer to an equation of the fifth degree, though its solution has for centuries baffled all the mathematicians of Europe.

Thus thought, we say, the meditative men of old; at least all who intelligently employed that grand old word kosmos in its most significant, most beautiful, and perhaps, heaven-derived sense of fitness, order, harmony, all which ever imply the conception of variety in unity, and, thence, the theistic idea of unity in thought and design. Ages before Kepler and Galileo, serious Greek minds had their all-embracing oneness. Ages before Davy and Dalton, Pythagoras and Isaiah* had taught that the universe was made by weight, and number, and proportion. Ages before Newton, the devout Hebrew thinker had his "Word settled in the heavens,† according to which all things stand," his "line" of cosmoal harmony which went out to the very "ends of the world,"‡ his celestial law "ruling in the armies above" and "making peace in the high places" of the Lord.§

plurality and even infinity. The great world, the great kosmos, might contain the lesser worlds. Still this plurality as maintained by some of the old thinkers was not, after all, that of modern science. It was not the belief, or the fancy, of each planet or star being a world like the earth, or a separate earth, as we sometimes express it. There is, indeed, a slight trace of this sometimes to be met with. Proclus, in his commentary on the Timeaus, quotes an ancient hymn in which the moon is spoken of as the seat of life similar to our own, and filled, like the earth, with hills and plains, and streams, and habitations, and works of men. In another place a similar view is presented of every star in the firmament. But, in general, the old idea of the infinity of worlds was of a very different kind from this. It took in, in its conception of the world, or of one world, all that was visible from our earth regarded as the centre of the rolling mundus, including sun, moon, planets, visible fixed stars, and the far off terminating empyrean in which they appeared to be bound or fixed. This was one world or mundus. It embraced all they saw, or that they would have seen had they had the modern telescope. But the belief, the fancy, the reasoning, call it what we may, would not be confined by the sense; it went forth beyond these visible bounds, and took in numerous, and even numberless, repetitions of the kosmos thus conceived. It was, in other words, the universe infinitely repeated throughout infinite time and infinite space. Whether these worlds, or worlds of worlds, were regarded as exact resemblances of each other, an endless going over of the same idea, does not appear; although if such had been the supposition, it would have been analogous to another favorite speculation of antiquity—the old cyclical idea, or doctrine of periods, in which all things come over and over again, just as before, and so on forever, and forevermore to all eternity.

But we are rambling. Let us come back, therefore, to the illustration of our leading thought. This old conception, though thus differing from the modern, by being on a so much grander scale, was built substantially upon the same argument, the same a priori reasoning. It was this same query, pourquoi non, ever carrying us forth in its demands, and allowing no stopping place as it thus speeds ever onward farther and farther into the infinite. Why not? Why should there not be other worlds, and other worlds of worlds? It belongs, we say, to the soul itself. It is as much the property of the common as of the scientific mind. In truth, science can not keep up with it. The fact that such views, whether true or false, are put as rhetorical ornaments in scientific text-books, does not alter the real nature of the case. They may come into the introductions of such works, or be paraded in a note, but they have no place in the analysis, the experiment, the induction, or the demonstration. They belong not to science but are borrowed by it.

It is the great merit, and the great strength, of the modern work to which we have referred, that it so completely separates between these two things, or so runs its dissecting-knife, we may say, between the strictly scientific and those a priori analogies from which modern science is ever stealing, and then treating them as her own. But he takes a step beyond this, and we think successfully. Without denying that "plurality of worlds" to which the soul so tends, or underrating the innate grounds on which it rests, he does show with a lucidness, and a power of argument which Sir David Brewster, his chief antagonist, has greatly failed to meet, that the latest decisions of science are opposed to the cherished notion rather than in favor of it. The latest and closest observations are against the conclusions drawn from the more early and superficial. Every improvement of the telescope casts farther back the probability, the scientific probability we mean, that our moon and sun, and the planets of our system, are the seats of life resembling that which exists upon our earth.

Thus he reasons, and reasons successfully, from actual observations that lie within the field of the telescope. Equally powerful is he in refuting certain scientific analogies and conjectures, or meeting one conjecture by another of equal or greater weight. There is a favorite argument of the lecturer drawn from the ascertained velocity of light. Some worlds are so remote that thousands, it may be millions, of years are required for their light to reach us. Hence those which were in their infancy when this long journey first commenced, and that light first set out by which we now see them, may have become far advanced, even to a condition equal to, if not perhaps far surpassing our own. But why, for all that science can say against it, is not the contrary supposition equally tenable? This whole case, of which the lecturer makes so much, the author dispatches in one sentence of a note. "Why may we not suppose, as well, that many of them have been long since extinct, and survive in appearance only by the light they at first emitted?" We would not think of adding to the real force of this concise argument, but the thought may be carried farther. These apparent worlds may have all become extinct, and our sun may be the only one remaining. They may have all gone out after having had their day as worlds, either of lower or higher animation, or no animation at all. They may have so gone out that vast numbers have in past ages wholly disappeared, that is, from the sense of predilection as well as from actual being; while of those yet reflected in our firmament, some may have ceased to be millions of years ago, others at shorter periods, perhaps before our own system came upon the stage of existence, with here and there a long surviving ray of a world long gone, disappearing at last within the bounds of our own historical chronology. Yes, they may have all gone out. The whole array of our nightly heavens may be but the ghosts of perished worlds—

"All—all but we departed."

They may be all mere undulations in a diaphanous medium—mere pictures on the retina of the eye, with no more objective reality than the light in the mirror, or the moonbeam on the surface of the waters. Does any one say, What mad conjectures these! Let him point out the difference between them and those that are often urged for a contrary purpose under the imposing name of science.

There is another part of Dr. Whewell's book to which we would devote a little space. Whatever may be thought of his scientific reasonings in respect to the particular fact of the planets being inhabited, there can be no doubt of the masterly power he has shown in calling in question one of the favorite positions of the most modern natural theology. We refer to that cherished dogma of the physical school, that benevolence, taken, too, in the lowest sense of this very ambiguous term, is the only source, final cause, motive, or reason, of the Divine action. In other words, the end of the universe, of all worlds, of any particular world, is the promotion of happiness, and happiness is pleasing sensations, and pleasing sensations run down into some agitation of a material organism. Hence this happiness, and its consequent and corresponding benevolence, become matters of quantity, to be measured either by numerical or massive amount. The happiness of oysters, and polypi, and mollusks, if there are only vast numbers of them, may be as good a reason for creating a world, and for continuing it ages in existence, as the happiness of higher beings, fewer in number, yet capable each of a larger quantity of enjoyment. But without going in to such measurement, there is one thought, suggested by this common talk about happiness, that ought to press itself upon the most serious attention of every thinking mind. Even though happiness, or pleasing sensations in this sense, may be admitted as one of the ends of the Divine action, have we not been rash in assuming it as the only one? May there not be many other ends in the Divine government, some of which, as well as happiness, we may comprehend, while there may be others, too, which are utterly unknown, utterly ineffable, yet as real as the one on which we speculate and dogmatize so confidently? Instead of every thing being made for organic life, and organic life itself being made only as the means to pleasing sensations, may there not be an artistic design, if we may so call it, which is worthy of the Divine mind, a design terminating in the very workmanship itself, without regard to any extrinsic utility in the promotion of the happiness of any class of beings? May there not be the making of a beautiful thing, or a harmonious thing, for the sake of its own beauty and harmony? It may be said that beauty and harmony are inconceivable without minds to which they are beautiful and harmonious. But may there not be innumerable unseen beings, if not immaterial, yet still not dwelling on earthy planets, or in houses of clay as we do, to whom that artistic beauty and harmony may be a manifestation of the Divine excellence and glory beyond any amount of happiness merely regarded as pleasing sensations? Or may it not be a design worthy of Deity to have made beautiful things and great things, for their own sake, for their own beauty and greatness, though no eye but his own should contemplate them, or because he deems it more worthy of himself thus to occupy the regions of space with beautiful workmanship, than to leave them to utter vacuity? There may be replies to this, we are well aware, but, after all, no objections half so strong as those which are ever suggested to the thoughtful mind, when the favorite utilitarian dogma of happiness, or "pleasing sensations," is pushed out to its extreme, and to the exclusion of any other end in the Divine work.

And then, again, may there not be what may be called an ideal design—the exhibiting in material forms the divine ideas, the dynamical laws, the mathematical ratios, the geometrical truths, of which a celestial work may be the glorious diagram—the exhibiting them thus to be read by far off rational beings, or because Deity may delight to render objective his own ideas to his own eternal mind. We would not rashly reason from the human rational to the divine, but there may be some analogy; and might we not say, that if there were but one man in the world, or but one rational being, it might be wise in him, it might be beautiful, it might be noble, to write a book for his own reading? And so Deity may make of creation a book wherein to read himself, although the reason why he should do this may be ineffable to us. Or he may have meant it for earthly astronomers to read. For this end he may have hung out the rings of Saturn, or the moons of Jupiter. And may we not soberly see, even in this, a higher reason than though he had created them for the residence alone of fishes and reptiles, with all the happiness these mutually-devouring monsters could enjoy? Why should we make so much of mere life, as though the lowest kinds of it were higher than the highest inanimate production? There is surely some fallacy here. Solomon does, indeed, say, that "a living dog is better than a dead lion;" but there are certainly some bounds to the doctrine. We would not carry it so far as to maintain that a living dog, much less a living oyster or mollusk, is a higher thing than the Apollo Belvidere, or the temple of St. Peter, or the diagrams in Newton's Principia, regarded as diagrams alone and nothing else—diagrams of glorious truths though unseen by any gazing eye.

But God has certainly thus created worlds it may be said. If geology be true, this was once the condition of our own planet. For ages it had upon its surface, and beneath its waters, no higher life, no higher happiness, than that of the lowest semi-animate self-devouring orders. We do not pretend to answer the objection, or to solve the mystery; but then it only furnishes an opportunity to turn the battery against those who maintain, on the ground of the divine goodness, that other worlds must be all inhabited by rational and moral beings like our own. The pourquoi non is as powerful one way as the other. Why may not God have made other worlds so? Why may not all worlds, except our own, be now in this condition? Why may there not be worlds in which there is no life at all? For ages there was no life of any kind upon the earth. For millions of years was this true of one world. And, then, if it may be thus true of one world for millions of times, yea of long times, one after another, why may it not be true of millions of spaces, or worlds, existing contemporaneously?

We have indulged in a rambling editorial, but we should regret it if the nature and design of our remarks were in danger of being mistaken. The aim has been to expose the conceitedness of certain forms of science, in its assuming to sit in judgment on the divine works as the only assumed evidence of the divine designs. It has been to show how little, after all, we know of what we so confidently affirm. And such is the far better executed design of the work to which we have referred. There is a good as well as an evil skepticism. The latter often comes from a vain conceit of natural knowledge, leading one to doubt all beyond its narrow bound, or that does not perfectly square with its assumed analogies. There is another kind that may seem to underrate science, and to call in question some of the surface teachings of what is called natural theology. But then it is only to fall back the stronger upon that inner conviction that there is truth, glorious truth, certain, ascertainable truth, and that this truth is to be found in the close study of that outward, objective, written revelation which has been graciously given as the strength of our weakness, the light of our ignorance, and the guide of our faith.

Editor's Easy Chair.

WE had recently a visit from Goldsmith's old friend, the Chinese Philosopher and Citizen of the World, whose observations upon England and English life, about a century since, have not been surpassed for keen insight and a delicate, humorous satire, which was not only bright, but—what is rarer in satire—was also warm.

It was none of our business to inquire how he chanced to be in New York, any more than to ask how he happened to be in this century. It is not reckoned good manners in China, as we had read, to ask impertinent questions; and if we had asked him why he suffered his queue to grow, he might have retorted upon us, with perfect propriety, by demanding in turn, why we cut our hair. We therefore, after the usual salutations, inquired concerning the health of the Reverend Fum-Hoam, and expressed a natural curiosity as to what so profound an observer as the Philosopher might have to say about our native institutions and habits. To see America reflected in China would certainly be an edifying spectacle, and might even satisfy Burns, who so earnestly longed for us all to have the power to see ourselves as others see us.

"The truth is," replied the Citizen of the World, "that I have just finished a letter to the gracious Fum, and if it would please you to hear parts of it, I shall have no objection to reading them to so accomplished and capable a critic" (at this point we bowed gravely, as old Easy Chairs will); "for I am sure if you find any thing to disapprove, you will honor the honest difference of my views."

"A friend of the Reverend Fum's," we replied, "could hardly say any thing that we should not be glad to hear. Sympathy of opinion is pleasant, but not at all necessary to friendship. We shall not allow the less weight to your views because your hair is twisted into a queue behind. If Plato should 'promenade himself'—as our French friends have it—in Broadway, the boys would hoot at him, and we respectable people should wonder that a wise man was willing to make himself a spectacle. Plato's costume was not ours, nor his habits, nor his religion. But good sense, just observation, charity, and kindly censure are cosmopolitan. So pray proceed. We envy the Reverend Fum-Hoam that he has a Citizen of the World for his correspondent."

The Philosopher bowed, and proceeded to read his letter:

"I have now been several months in this Western land, most benign Fum, and am delighted day by day. I find that I am loth to leave its metropolises, for I am never done observing the variety and peculiarity of its habits. No sooner do I persuade myself that I have made some progress in knowledge of the native customs, than I am plunged back again into a mortifying consciousness of ignorance.

"It was but a few months since, that I was shown, by a merchant of clothes, a garment worn by the ancient Americans of twenty years since, and called a surtout. I surveyed it with natural interest. I contemplated its long skirts, its inconvenience, its disproportions. Behold, said I, the sartorial relic of an era of barbarism. An outer coat is designed for warmth and protection. See how the earlier Americans, while still not emancipated from European savageness, mistook its meaning, and used this graceless and incomplete robe.

"I thanked the merchant, and retired with the placid consciousness of a man who had gained one fact. The inconvenient and unhandsome surtout is a thing of the past. I should now see the young bloods of this gay city in spacious and comfortable garments. As I walked away, musing upon the knowledge I had acquired, I naturally fell into pondering the reasons that influence fashions, and to praising the good sense of this young and modest people. But I was suddenly jostled by a man passing me rapidly, and looking up I was surprised to see a surtout. That, said I to myself, looking curiously after the passer, that is some obstinate adherent of the old school, some uncompromising conservative, who will not yield an inch of skirt. Judge my consternation when he suddenly turned, and proved to be the very head and front of fashion, the model of youth, and the admiration of the fair! Others passed me, with the indescribable air of fashion, clad in the same garment. I fancied myself dreaming of old times and old clothes, until I suddenly seized the skirt of one of the perplexing coats, to assure myself that I was awake, and was suddenly seized myself, in turn, for picking pockets, and could scarcely save myself from prison upon the plea of philosophy. The Justices declared it was a new plea, not found in the books, altogether without precedent, and in itself undoubtedly a misdemeanor, if not worse.

"I am, therefore, forced to believe that this people willfully returns to its exploded fashions, or that I have lost my power of observation. If it be the latter case, I might as well return to the bosom of my honored Fum. And if the former, of what use is philosophical acumen, since the subject presented is not worth consideration? Oh! my wise friend, I am taught humility by a surtout.

"I went the other evening, in pursuance of my studies of man in different climates and varying civilizations, to a great ball designed for the relief of the wretched who about this year more than ever before. I beg you to mention to the mandarin who presides over emigration, that not every street in the New World is paved with gold, and that some pigs run round without puddings in their bellies. You will naturally figure to yourself a ball for the relief of the wretched as an occasion of gravity and sacrifice; the finer feelings of our nature would have play, you think; there would be a gracious emulation in the preparation and bestowing of relief. Men and women, plainly clad, as becometh the object, would wear serious faces of sympathy, and the sad hearts of poverty would be warmed by the cheerful kindness of the ministers of relief, as the chilled frames would be comforted by the alms.

"Benignant but benighted Fum! Do you remember the hard saying of Kon-fut-see, whom the foreigners call Confucius? 'My children, eat your cake and have it.' Which of our philosophers has yet done that? I blush for my country; for there is not a mis who can dance who did not do it on the evening of which I speak. And shall a young girl teach a philosopher?

"You are burning with impatience to know the secret. Beloved Fum-Hoam, it is known to you that when many people combine and pay each an equal sum for a commodity, it often chanceth that the sum of the single contributions surpasses the whole expense. This is especially the case in combinations for purposes of amusement, and in this lies the secret which the loveliest youths and maidens here may teach the philosopher in China.

"When a man presents himself with a silver tea-service in this country, it is considered good taste to do it quietly. But when he pays for a certain amount of individual pleasure, of a dining or dancing character, he is at liberty to call it charity at the top of his voice. There are certain societies founded for the purpose of dining luxuriously once a year, for which the members pay a certain amount of dollars; and these societies are called, with a pleasant humor, charitable, because the members annually pay about a quarter of the price of the dinner for the purpose of furnishing a poor dinner to poor people. The comical power of this people is very great. You will be surprised that such customs should prevail. But, Fum, the world is large. It may be that this appears to be charity to the mind of the people. To serve duty and pleasure, or, as it is put by their priests, to serve God and Mammon, might perplex the Chinese. But, Reverend Fum, the Chinese are not Yankees; and although charity be a singular commodity to purchase, it is often the best economy to buy it. For it is not to be denied that in a time of general distress large sums of money, say six or seven thousand dollars, for purposes of relief, are just six or seven thousand times better than no money at all. The humor of the thing lies, of course, in the supposition that it is charity. Charity is, in its nature, an unselfish virtue. When, therefore, in a time of want I behold fellow-men regretting the general woe, and giving nothing to help it, until they receive an equivalent in whatever form it may be, I am not in haste to call them charitable. And the most obvious advice to such seems to be, 'Dear Sirs, be quiet about it.' For evidently if the good people who pay a certain sum for charitable uses, and tax that sum heavily for their own amusement, by way of sugar in the mouth after that ugly dose of goodness, would only hand in the sum, and decline to have it reduced for their own enjoyment, it might be accounted a very pretty charity. Only in that case they would eat their cake without having it, and any body can do that. Money-giving is not charity, I mean it is not the virtue of charity, although I have found it hard to persuade the friends I have made here that money-giving does not include all the virtues in itself.

"To us philosophers it seems sad that a time of distress should not sober the minds of the gay, and we ask ourselves with anxiety about that state of society in which public sorrow suggests an opportunity of enjoyment. It is a kind of trading in misfortune, which would be as repugnant to the mind of this people as to that of any other, if it were truly stated. I am glad that there was the festival, and rejoiced to hear of the goodly sum collected for the suffering. I wish there had been no expenses to deduct from the sum, for the expenses were not those of disbursing, but of fiddles and gas, which do not feed the hungry. Do not say, my Fum, that except for the fiddles and the gas there would have been no money to disburse, for that is the very thing I deplore.

"Ah! my dear philosopher, a century ago in England I wrote that mankind were always the same. They may wear blankets or broadcloth, but they both cover the same human heart. We philosophers scorn the ignorant, and they in turn ridicule us behind our backs. I smile at the complacency which considers what I have described as charity; but what shall I do with the infatuation that crushes the human foot into deformity, and then calls it beautiful? At the charity ball I learned to be charitable. The guests had no bird-nests, not even rat-tails, for supper; but they consumed their customary viands and were content. Oh, Fum! I have been in the slave-bazaars of Constantinople, and in the drawing-rooms of London and Paris. The one is Mohammedan, the others are Christian. But however pretty and different names may be, things seem to me to be about the same. Certain things we do not like to think of, nor do, we look at them as they are. Why do we ever cease to be boys, or why does Heaven not love us all well enough to nip us in the bud?

"But unwilling to be a prey to such reflections, which my judicious Fum will call morbid, I seek consolation from the incomprehensible habits of this people by turning to the record of their lives, as several of the natives have recently related their own histories. From experience I fly to literature. I never think well of these hospitable foreigners. Let me, therefore, show their characteristics as they appear in the three most popular books of the moment. One is by a female whose name, singularly enough, is also the name of a wild wood-plant that grows luxuriantly and bears no flower. The second is by an eminent citizen, who, it is reported to me in well-informed circles—although I am loth to betray political secrets—will be made Governor of his native State just so soon as he rides upon a woolly horse to marry a mermaid. This secret implies habits with which I am not yet familiar. But I despair of nothing, benignant Fum. I hope yet to master these mysteries. The third is a chevalier's account of his unsuccessful pursuit of a fortune. The candor of the chevalier—a title evidently borrowed from the French language—is only surpassed by his freedom from many hesitations which some gentlemen cherish.

"In these volumes I hope to find relief for that skeptical spirit toward my fellow-creatures, which you have told me I sometimes too much indulge. Let us be grateful that there is always the sweet retreat of letters from the asperities of life. My honored Fum, what is it that somebody says about books?"

The Chinese Philosopher paused here, and told us that he had as yet written no farther. He said that he was only waiting to read the books to conclude his letter. By his means the Chinese public can thus know of our most recent literature, and perceive the character of the books we read with the most avidity.

Farewell Philosopher—but why is philosophy so sad? It is pleasant to reflect upon the improvement, in the Philosopher's view of us and our habits, which a perusal of the books will effect.

AN Easy Chair, however, has sometimes the advantage of a philosopher, and we have already read the works in question. We did so because they were universally spoken of; and the friends who come in from traveling assure us that no other books have sold. There was our cousin Amanda, too, who decried the wickedness of such exposures as were promised in "My Courtship." Careless Amanda! in less than a week the book dropped from under her apron, as she was hastily escaping from a room we had suddenly entered.

Now let us have a little plain speaking about these books. If the Literature of a people be at once a symptom and an influence, a symptom of its moral and intellectual condition, and an intellectual and moral influence, we shall naturally look closely at the books which are sold with rapidity and read with avidity. There was Uncle Tom's Cabin, which had a sale unprecedented in literary history. No Northerner and no Southerner denied the great power, and pathos, and dramatic discrimination of that romance. It was more than a partisan, or even humane tract. It was a work of high literary art. There was less waste matter in it than in that of any literary work of any woman. The characters were typical and individual; they were portrayed with subtle skill; the tale developed through a series of incidents and dialogue, which constantly rose in interest and dignity; it dealt with a subject comparatively new to literature, and, apart from its peculiar success as the Veda of a party or a section, it had the qualities of permanent literary value. Uncle Tom's Cabin was an addition to the literature of the world. And those who think it a dangerous and mistaken book will not deny it that praise.

Here lies Ruth Hall. Has it a single great literary merit? Is there any story at all? Is there any individualization or development of character? Is there any sentiment which is not sentimentality of the worst kind? Is there any thought which is not a thin echo of some noble word of one of the great minds that warm the age with their humane wisdom, and so distorted in the echo that it becomes untrue? Is there any pathos which is not puerile and factitious? Is there any thing more in the book than an easy smartness?

Its pictures are as like life as the portraits of an itinerant painter are like the sinewy farmer and the red-cheeked wife whom he paints. They are executed, and then hung upon the parlor wall. The farmer has some vague notion that he has patronized the fine arts. The wife thinks with satisfaction that Abimelech and Joab will know how handsome Grandma was when she was young. The farm-hands look at the work with wonder, and guess it isn't easy to do such things. Its prettier than samplers—than the crewel-work which the accomplished daughter of the house is doing. It is an unsightly daub; but it gives pleasure. It is a faint reminiscence of the human forms known to the farm-boys as the farmer and his wife, and gratifies the childish fondness for imitation. It is not more than this. If the farming-boys had the eyes and the minds that give fame to pictures, they would not gloat upon these portraits.

Now it is to the thoughtful and not to the trifling, to the generous and not to the mean, to the intelligent and not to the ignorant, that a noble-hearted author or artist addresses himself. And he knows that, for such a tribunal, truth is the first condition—truth of conception, and truth of treatment.

We can not find this truth in such a book as Ruth Hall. The characters have a dull and distant resemblance to the characters of life, as a face inked on blotting paper may vaguely resemble a face. But as they figure on the pages of the story they have no point, no moral, no interest. The whole book is embittered. It is not easy to say why, nor to what good result. If the work was written to sell, it has succeeded. It has sold universally; and that profoundly interesting question, whether Ruth Hall is Fanny Fern, has been debated from the Penobscot to the Mississippi. Let us suppose that it is. How glad, in that case, we are that Fanny Fern has raised herself from penury to plenty. Let us suppose that it is not. How glad we are that there is one less victim of poverty. But then the fortunes of an individual, as such, are not interesting, unless that individual has given to his personality a kind of representative significance. Milton's individuality and Shakespeare's are interesting, because they are measures of human emotion. They feel, think, and speak for mankind. But Smith's emotions are an impertinence. If Smith is poor, let us give him work or a ticket to the Soup Society; but don't let Smith insist upon giving us in return a roll of very bad engravings.

If you can treat your private experience so that it becomes historical and of universal meaning, then you are one of the great few whom the world holds to its heart. There are very few autobiographies that the world values for any thing more than amusement. Cellini, Rousseau, Haydon, Leigh Hunt—do we reverence them more, or admire their works more, for the self-told story of their lives? Ruth Hall, if it be such an autobiography, Barnum, Wikoff—are we instructed, or helped in any way? are we even entertained by the stories?

Let us now tell the truth about Mr. Barnum. He has challenged truth-telling by inviting us to pay a dollar to hear his confession, and every Yankee has the right to discuss the value of the wares he buys. Mr. Barnum had peculiar reputation. He was said to have humbugged a large fortune out of the American people. Three facts were indisputable. Mr. Barnum had the best Museum in the country; he had done the State great service in bringing over Jenny Lind; and he punctually paid his bills. Mr. Barnum was also a strict temperance man, and generous in his management of his affairs. Gradually there was less and less said about mermaids and woolly horses. A man of enterprise, of sagacity, always cheerful and ready, a good neighbor, a generous friend; on the whole, it was considered that the difference between some men and others was only this, that some men made money by showing their woolly horses and mermaids, and other men by concealing them.

What a pity that shrewdness is too shrewd! How unfortunate that the "little joker" should always joke once too much for the proprietor; so that the little joking business was never known to be very profitable in the long run! How sad the infatuation that persuades us to show every man who admires our pretty palace that it is not marble, only ingenious stucco!

Why is it a pity, and unfortunate, and sad? Because there is a painful sense of untruth, and a want of manly sincerity. Because men love at heart what is genuine, however they may wink and shrug outside. Because, if you have suffered yourself to be gulled, although with your eyes open, you do not wish to see the dubious victory of a moment recorded as a permanent triumph. Because, to say that a child is five years old when you know him to be ten; to buy a horse in Cincinnati, and say that Captain Symmes caught him in his hole at the North Pole, is to do that for which a man would be expelled from a gentleman's house; and might, without stretching, be termed obtaining money—if money were involved by the statement—under pretenses not strictly true.

Does every man do the same thing in business? It is none the less mean for that, and most men have a kind of instinct that leads them not to publish the details of the transaction, and advertise it extensively in the newspapers. If Mr. Barnum had kept silence the laugh would have grown less, and, if he were as good as the average of men, he would have enjoyed the advantages of his position.

Every thoughtful and self-respecting man is insulted by the pompous publication of the story, because it implies that the public will read it with pleasure. Unless, indeed, it is put forth as a confession and a promise to woolly horse no more, which is not pretended. How, also, about the advertising of the sale of the copyright? Do names alter things? Is a cabbage a rose because it is called so? Is a—something, a something else, because it is called humbug?

We have read with astonishment in our Easy Chair many of the notices of the press of this book of Mr. Barnum's. It has been praised as if the hero's story were worth telling, or as if his example were to be cherished and followed. He has even been called the most successful business-man and the representative American; as if an American were only a man who was little less scrupulous at a bargain than any body else.

Now this Easy Chair has spoken well of Mr. Barnum. When he assumed the Presidency of the Crystal Palace we insisted that he should have a fair chance, and confessed that he was a man of shrewdness and tact. So also we said and say, that if the Jenny Lind business was a humbug, let us have more humbug. But now the things that every man was anxious to forget in his estimation of Mr. Barnum's position are complacently thrust in our faces by this autobiography. Dogberry desired to be written down an ass. But Mr. Dogberry was not considered to be a particularly clever man.

Does the public applaud this kind of thing? What a bitter satire lies in its applause. For it is clear that this shrewd gentleman thought that he was never shrewder than when he felt sure of the approving sympathy of the public, if he could only show that he made enough money.

Saltimbanque stands on his head and walks along the ceiling upon his elbows. When the performance is over, he receives an immense sum for his labors, and an envying public huzzas. But the poet passing by says to Saltimbanque, "As you are a man, how can you value your human dignity less than your dinner?" Saltimbanque leers at the poet, slaps his hand upon his pocket, which rings again, and the crowd huzzas once more to hear its silver rattle in the pocket of the mountebank.

Our Citizen of the World meant also to read Mr. Wikoff's history. This is a plaintive strain. The ex-secretary, the ex-concocter of articles for the French journals supporting English policy, the ex-man of fashion, the ex-man of fortune, bemoans his fate in two or three hundred pages and demands gently of his Dulcinea,

"But why did you kick me down stairs?"

Here was a hero of romance who comes perfumed from Paris to Portland Place, London, to court and conquer. The lady had been young, and since the earlier days of acquaintance with our hero had become wealthy. Time, let us hope, had touched her gently. And oh, sympathetic hearts, pray that she may stontly resist or softly yield, for now comes the King of Hearts to take his Queen—now arrives the man of fortune, who could not be suspected of mercenary matrimonial intention, to draw his quarter's salary as an English agent. And you will conceive that his pay as an official to give an English tone to the French press must have been prodigious.

It is clear that the lady was fascinated, and mistrusted. She mistrusts to that degree, that after leading him—to speak it gently—by the nose all through Europe, she finally leads him into a Genoa jail, and there ruthlessly leaves him for eighteen months. Vainly the Chevalier appeals to Pope, Marquis, Charge, Consul, and American Minister in England. They turn deaf ears. They have been—who knows?—influenced by the lady. Hope gradually expires, and the Chevalier makes the best of it, turns a doubtful mental glance sometimes toward the fair Fate who has pursued him so relentlessly; whispers to his repining heart, "she did promise in the garden at the Hotel Byron to be mine," and recalls doubtless with joy the little piece of paper to which he playfully compelled her signature in the apartments of the absent Russian somebody in Genoa, and which humorously promised that he should have half her fortune if he could not have the whole of herself.

Probably the reflections of this ill-starred hour, in the Genoa jail, were such as we should all envy. Probably they were not more miserably mortifying than those of any prisoner ever before jugged. Probably he had that supporting sense of rectitude and good intention which prisoners, who are not common criminals, often have. Probably he did not gnash his teeth at being outwitted by a woman whom he did not too much respect, as the record shows. Probably it was a pleasant position for the bon ami of the Emperor and D'Orsay and the other jeuneune dorée of the gay capital. Ah! well, it is no wonder he climbed up to the window and looked in upon the victim who was to be beheaded next day. Oh, Miss Gamble! Miss Gamble! why did you kick him down stairs? Of course we are all anxious to know. Of course, in a great commercial crisis, with a great war to prolong it, it is of the last importance that the Chevalier's tale of jilting should be made public. We have such an interest in his career; we are so indebted to him for bringing Fanny Ellsler to help us complete Bunker Hill Monument; we have been so proud of him as a social representative of America in Europe; we have hung upon his movements with such eagerness, and the country so deeply deplored his Italian incarceration, that it was only common charity to tell us all about it.

We must grant that our Cupid and Psyche are a little ancient. We must concede that this graceful play of forty-pounders verges just a little upon the clumsy. It is, perhaps, not the purest grace. We do not survey the game with increasing respect for the players. What then? Have we not the great fact made patent that Miss Gamble beat Mr. Wikoff at his own game, and that the merry little adventure at the Russian Rooms in Genoa, one of his amusing gambols, ended, somehow, wrong; and, by some hocus-pocus, wherein the "little joker" was at fault, landed him in a jail instead of putting half a fortune in his pocket? It was an unkind turn of the cards. The Chevalier had mistaken trumps. But he has made a clean breast of it. Let us freely forgive a man who takes pains to publish that he has failed in a very foolish endeavor. Yet why, Chevalier, were you not even more sincere? Had Paris paralyzed your remembrance of the fact that Yankees had not only cut their eye-teeth, but had also opened their eyes, some time since? Did you suppose we were going gravely to believe that it was the fair hand you were pursuing?

But our hero keeps up heart throughout. The stormy winds do blow upon his love from first to last—from Portland Place to Genoa jail. But they only kindle it the more; they do not blow it out. He tells the story with a cheery spirit, that is truly refreshing, and the frank and fearless want of toadyism in the concluding chapters commends itself to the attention of every honest man.

On the whole, the Chinese Philosopher will probably inform the reverend Fum that the three books which have monopolized the sale of the season, are books for Americans and American literature to be proud of. Where are those foreign carpers who demanded "Who reads an American book? Where are those domestic crows who ask "Where is American literature?" Granting that literature is at once an influence and a symptom, as we said, how pleasing the consideration that these are the books which are read with ardor—these, and the long list of novels whose moral is that wealth is naughtiness, and that a man can not be rich and good at the same time.

A NEW broom, says the adage, sweeps clean. But who supposed that there would ever be a broom new enough to sweep this city clean? Mr. Genin did admirably in Broadway a year ago. We all wanted to make Mr. Genin mayor, as if the sole duty of the mayor of New York was polishing the pavement so perfectly that our wives and daughters could cross to Stewart's without soiling the edges of those lovely robes for which we pay Stewart such lovely prices. The truth is, we were all ready to compromise for any one thing done well. Municipal order, in general, being a hope beyond the dreams of poets, if we could only secure order in a single detail, we were willing to shout Jo paan!

With the new year arrived Mayor Wood, and Mayor Wood's Message apprised us that something was to be done. It was an old story. Inaugurals are always promises. But let us record, with pleasure and astonishment, that things have been done. A man does not feel it necessary to make his will before going out to pass the evening. He does not part with his wife in the Sir Walter Raleigh style upon the eve of execution. The fact is now understood that there is a law and a law-officer. There is a city and a head of the city.

If we have any grievances we may call attention to them. So may we in any city? Yes; but here they will be attended to. Officers and relief will come when we do call for them; and it should be noticed, as a pleasant sign, that the public conscience is right, that the mayor is so cordially supported by the good-sense and co-operation of the intelligence and industry of the city.

We are glad to say to our country friends that they may come to town with more fearlessness. We are not, indeed, altogether perfect yet. Virtue is not an irresistible conspiracy, carrying every thing before it, as—let us hope—it soon will be. There are still some red flags at small shops down town, but they flutter very tremulously. It is reported that a glass or two of eau de vie is still taken in some quarters—probably as medicine. Constables and watchmen are not altogether out of work, nor is the police in general quite yet an antiquated and unnecessary form. It is not entirely wise, as yet, to hang your purse on the button of your coat behind. It might catch in a door, you know, and be pulled off. Nor is it advisable to leave rolls of bank bills upon the hydrants until you return that way. The wind would be quite sure to blow them off, and you might not be able to put your hand upon them when you returned.

But these things will undoubtedly be. Perhaps they are so now, and you can easily try the experiment, and prove them for yourselves when you come down. We all "go in" for Mayor Wood here. We believe him to be the man who has been "coming" so long, and we are very glad that he has arrived. We had a desperate fight when he came in. It was the hardest possible work for every man to discover whom he wished to make mayor; but it was absolutely impossible for him to say why he wished it. There was a general scramble, and Mayor Wood came out half a length ahead. As soon as we could recover from the bumps and bruises and open our eyes, we were all glad of it. For many years there has not been so popular a magistrate, nor one that better deserved popularity.

A new broom sweeps clean, says the adage, with an unkind emphasis upon the "new." But shall we spoil every thing by some skepticism? Do you refuse to eat dinner to-day because the beef was underdone yesterday? Perhaps even you and this old Easy Chair swept cleaner when we were newer. Perhaps we had better not scoff at a mayor until he gives us occasion.

DID you go to the Calico Party, gentle reader? What is a Calico Party, and, above all, why is a Calico Party? Was it supposed that the garment would take an excellence from the wearer? Was it to be charged with virtue, permeated with piety, so that the recipient might wear it as an enchanted robe, and be inevitably girt with goodness? Or is calico suddenly found to be becoming? We do not pretend to totter after the caprices of fashion, and would not foolishly theorize about it. But really, with all serious respect for good intentions every where, it seems hard that great distress should only stimulate fashion to new freaks, and that instead of quietly going and giving a certain quantity of calico to those who need it, the donors should cut it to fit themselves, then let it leak into the papers that they were doing so, and then give away the material of the masquerade, and cross their hands with an air of charity.

The Philosopher is right. If this is charity at all, it is the poorest kind. Are we such inveterate traders that we can not even do good without paying ourselves for it?

Of course have the Calico Party, and then give away the calico, if the alternative is no Calico Party, no charity. But why give it a false name? If you pay a shilling for a pie and eat it, that transaction is completed, and if the pie cost but sixpence, and the balance is given to the poor, you may call it charity if you choose.

Our young constituents tell us that there has been less gayety on the great scale than heretofore. The truth is, when Wall Street is touched, the Avenue shivers. But we do not hear that there has been less social intercourse, nor less general good-feeling. The young people have danced, as it is natural and becoming for young people to do, and as good floors, good music, and good partners, are not very expensive, they have had their greatest pleasure and the hosts less cost. Society is so much a necessity, that it should not be made a luxury by foolish extravagance. Children and young nations are wasteful and prodigal. The young American in Paris orders three times as much dinner as he and his French guest can eat. The French gentleman invites his host in turn, and they dine with a hundred times more elegance and ten times less expense. In our picture of society we never make things keep their places. Paris and Versailles should be subdued in the composition to beauty, grace, and wit. Life is an art, society is an art. Every thing is an art if we only choose to have it so. And as a matter of art it deals with truth and beauty. You can not make a Calico Party, in a time of public want, beautiful nor interesting because you give away the gowns afterward.

OUR FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE over-ocean telescope, through which we now set ourselves to read the phases of foreign life, we have constructed in our own way with a great coil of journals; and by putting this paper tube to our eye, and directing it toward the dim light that flows in at our office window, we see—or seem to see—athwart the houses, and through the mists that hover over the long line of the East River, and through the storm-clouds of spring that sweep over Montauk and the Georgia shoals, and through the vexed air that swims in the ocean hollows, and through the Channel coast fogs, and through the dreary atmosphere of a Paris winter—the stalls, and stir, and strangenesses of a Paris Christmas.

We see a world of people threading the bituminous pavements, slimy with mud; we see a multitude of rough-board shops in the very centre of Paris, crowded with toys and Christmas knick-knacks; we see stout provincial men gadding here and there, with wife and daughter on their arms; we see smart blouses bargaining for pasteboard models of Sebastopol; we see errant sellers of pop-pistols very urgent to impress upon the passers-by that their guns are very loud, and (like those of the Allies) very innocent.

We see stout Englishwomen, very tall, very red in the face, very masculine of gait, very determined in speech, who overlook the crowd of low-statured French—whether soldiers or grisettes—and peer into the showy shop fronts, which, by their splendor, seem to mock at the cheap Christmas offerings upon the stalls. We see brocadees jostled by ten-penny woolen stuffs, and velvet hats with ostrich plumes sidling against the towering, starched muslin chateaux which the nurses of Normandy wear on their heads. We see a giant of the New Guard of the Imperial household, in jaunty sky-blue coat, and sleek mulberry pantaloons, and snow-white buckskin gauntlets, befingering the hilt of his sword, and striding through the crowd, to the great wonderment of maids and children. We see the new police of Napoleon in their snug cape, and with their sword tips scarce showing below the skirt of their warm winter cabane, looking here and looking there, and passing—yet always looking. We see a squadron of cavalry in the heavy bear-skin cape of the new Civic Guard come dashing down the street, and a space rapidly clear amidst the carriages, and a momentary stare of the street throng follow their gallop, and again the bustle and the hum of the shops and the walk renew themselves.

We see a blind man, with only a little child to guide him, feeling his way cautiously through the midst of the great crowd upon the Boulevards, with outstretched hands, and with a dish suspended from his neck half full of copper pieces; and we see people sidling away to give him free space, and dropping sous into his pewter dish, and straightway forgetting their pity in the sight of some brilliant equipage.

We see a cumbersome carriage, with a powdered footman, stop against a shop door, amid the crowd agape for a moment, while a brocadeed lady traverses the pavement and enters, and then the tide goes flowing on as before. We remark upon the stalls an infinity of warlike instruments—adapted to children; there are wooden field batteries, representing all grades of artillery, from 18 to 32 pounders; there are red and white horses, much more plump and well-fed to the eye than those in the Crimea; there are muskets of Minié shape, and such swords as the chasseurs wear at the end of their guns; there are bastions in pasteboard of prodigious elevation, and trenches in pine plank from which deadly shots are supposed to be made; there are ammunition wagons, and commissariat wagons, such as would surprise and delight an infant Duke of Newcastle, or the grandson of a Crimea veteran of the staff; there are ambulance carts, on springs of cotton, with invalided soldiers within, who have wooden legs and wooden bodies—better cared for than the live ones after Inkermann; there are figures of Russian bears, worried—only worried—by French and English dogs.

Opposite to the stalls where such things meet our eye, we remark diamond jewelry in the shape of grenades and rockets; we see sleeve-buttons in the form of a pair of chain-shot; we see small enameled bombs made to do duty upon a lady's corsage; we see a small piece of artillery served with rubies, and mounted on pearls; we see a new casquet of the Imperial Guard diminished to a brooch of jet and emerald.

Changing our regard only the distance of a shop front, we see brilliant plans of Sebastopol, with little banners marking the stations of the outlying camps, and miniature ships in lithography lying far out upon a calm sea of lithographic ink; we see hospital marquees erect and strong and warm, where the soldiers are well cared for, and promptly healed—in lithography; we see great guns toiling up the barren heights, and men and horses in plump lithographic condition; we see, on looking closely, the walls of the outermost forts of Sebastopol sadly battered, and huge remnants of granite wall seeming to totter, and to invite a speedy lithographic assault.

We do not, however, see so frequent as once the lithographic portraits of Lord Raglan, or of Canrobert, or of the Duke of Cambridge, or of the Prince Imperial, who is lying sick of gout and war in a warm palace at Constantinople. We do not see any longer the Turkish scarf, which were so favorite a matter of Parisian wear not long ago; we do not see many crimson caps with blue tassels: we do not see many chibouques figured among the Christmas toys; we do not see so many dolls in turbans; we do not see many people smelling attar of roses, or buying the Turkish bottles for precents. We see more of strong volatile salts; we see evidences that the Turkish enthusiasm is not so strong as the Polish or the Hungarian; we see that people remember Balaklava, and the running of the red-caps; we see that Paris boys have no admiration for runaways, and that the Ottoman glory has passed away, like the smoke of an Eastern pipe—languidly, fragrantly, and utterly!

The French are quick appreciators of courage (and we lay down our paper telescope to make the observation), and they are very ready and determined foes to all show of cowardice, even among allies. The Turks will have to give very positive and very bloody proof of their daring, before their reputation gains any thing like a fair level upon the French Exchange. It would seem almost that they (the French people) were growing distrustful of Omar Pacha even; most of all, since hints have been bruited that he shows reluctance to put himself under the strategic orders of their General, Canrobert. What gives the worst complexion of all to the Turkish shortcomings, is their immovable stolidity and indifference to such charges as would crush or make the courage of a high-spirited man. They wear the reproaches of craven-heartedness as they wear their Bloomer petticoats—easily, slouchingly, and carelessly. The conviction is forced on people, nowadays, whatever Lord Redcliffe may say, that the barbarian people of the North, who wear bear-skin, and allow their priests to marry, have, after all, more of the vigor of manhood about them, and more of the promise of growth, than the clouded masters of the Byzantine harems, and the worshipers of Allah and the Prophet.

Putting again our telescope to the eye, and suffering it to bear as it bore before, we see the crowd growing greater around the stalls and the shops, as the short winter's day wears toward the setting. We see nursery-maids weighed down with children and woolly horses; we see rabbits and Chinese puppets shaking their heads (by machinery) with dismal solemnity; we see fat geese of Strasbourg put up as prizes over tables of roulette; we see lotteries of gingerbread and bonbons; we see hungry people gloating at the windows, where are displayed, with tempting profusion, turbots, and bananas, and boned capons, stuffed with truffles, and delicious, lithe-looking salmon, and potted pheasants, and pâtés of Strasbourg, and Spanish grapes, and luscious figs from Candia, and huge apples that have been bloated under glass, and crisp salads, and red-pomegranates.

Presently we see a stir in the throng, and all eyes turned from the windows to the street, where a little corps of the Imperial Guides, in their green jackets, come dashing through the thicket of cabs and carriages; and after them we see the Imperial jockeys in their buckskin breeches, see-sawing upon the Imperial horses, that whirl up the Imperial coach to the shop-front of some great purveyor of Christmas toys; we see the people flock like flies around some sudden leak of sweetness, and the cabanés police, appearing as it were from the ground, and multiplying with the crowd, and pressing them back, and keeping an open passway from the coach to the shop-door; we see the Imperial footmen doff their hats, as the sallow-faced Louis Napoleon, in citizen's dress, descends, and assists in his turn (as if she wore no crown) the Imperial Eugénie; we see her finish of excitement at this near contact with the throng, and her smile of gratification as they (the crowd), one and all, salute her with a warm Parisian greeting; we see the paleness in her face of an unsound body, and her step has none of the lightness in it which belonged to her three years gone by; we see what care has presided over her toilet, albeit she is wearing mourning-dress for some unknown German princess; we see that she bears herself toward the Imperial monarch as though there was more in the tie than the conventional bond of an Imperial marriage; we see the fondness of a woman's nature in her look; and yet we see, far off as we are, that the griefs and cares that belong to us all have written lines, even now, upon her face, which will deepen, as they deepen on the faces of all, as the Christmases wear out, and the play of life's shadows thicken and close!

Turning now the bearing of our glass by ever so slight a degree, we look upon the bustle and the stir of the Paris Christmas in the faubourgs, or along the narrow Rue Mouffetard. We see no equipages here; we see no shops of jewelry; yet we see as great a throng pressing around the rude stalls, where the Russian bears are rampant, and the wooden artillery is drawn up in order of battle. We see old women who have cheered their festal day with a new earthen pot, and an extra onion to their soup; we see fathers in blouses treating their be-bloused boys to a sight of paper griffins and tin guns, and perhaps lavishing on them half the earnings of a day in an earthen statue of the first Napoleon, or a vessel of war in pottery.

We see chiffonniers, the rag-pickers of the capital, hanging hopefully about the booths for some falling tid-bits of paper or sticks, and reckoning, at most, upon a Christmas gift of a quarter-loaf of white bread; we see them afterward making their way through foul streets to high, filthy houses; we see their homes reeking with the spoils they have gathered in foul places; we see disease and dirt, like those of the Crimean story, marking the home and the people; and we see the eyes of those used to this dimness and wretchedness beam only when they light up with the fever of crime, and a pale joyousness steal over their pinched faces only at thought of the comfort which friend Death may have in his keeping.

We see the Seine running high and full; the yellow tide, yellow as the Tiber, with its wintry rains, gurgles drearily under the arches; and from time to time we see floating on it, even in the Paris Christmas season, some victim of his own or of his fellow's crime. Beside the river, stretching a thousand yards, we see the glazed roof of a palace upon columns of stone, which they call but a temporary structure, but which has in it more materials of permanence than half of the buildings of our city.

We see, also, to the right, above the dried rooftops, the sheen of the great crystal building, which is to cover, four months hence, so many of the tokens of industry as the war fever, the war anxieties, and the war afflictions shall have left in the hands of Europe. In the workshops scattered along the Rue St. Antoine, and across by the Van-girard, we see the artisans in their dim ateliers furnishing up the chairs of Henri II. and Louis Quatorze, dressing with stamped leather, which rivals the best days of Venice, carving fruit and flowers that would have honored Gibbons, and preparing for a medal with the Imperial face.

We see the American commissioners gathering for speeches and resolves (the Americans like "meetings"); we see they count already, by official rolls, more in number than all the commissioners of Europe combined (the Americans like office); we see our earnest friend, M. Vattemare, in the midst of his books, and parchments, and medals, forgetful of his old stage triumphs, when he wore the name of Alexandre, and forgetful of every thing save his one purpose of building up his system of literary exchanges—contriving how the Great Exhibition may be made to count toward his design; and arraying, even now, a great collection of American books and papers in a hall of the Hôtel de Ville, where he may show to France that the young Western country is not wholly given over to trade, and to the hewing of wood.

We see the flowers budding in the gardens of Paris, even in the wet December, and roses fully bloomed when January has put its wintry foot into the circle of the Paris months; but the warmth and the wet together, we see, bode no good; and by the flying phantoms of the doctors we know that typhus is lying low for victims, and is brushing away old men and young men, with a dismal shaking of hearse plumes, to Père la Chaise and Mont Parnasse.

We see, upon a certain day (Débats for 19th December), a throng of people passing along the Pont des Arts, and urging their way into the Palace of the Institute of France; we see the galleries and balconies filling up with gayly-dressed ladies, and with foreign German faces, and hundreds of piebald men. We see the reserved chairs around the stage fill up with the representatives of French philosophy and science—weazen-faced, thin men, in fur-lined cloaks—gaunt, big-featured people, like old Dupin—plump, round-chinned philosophers, like Thiers—and all of them unnoticeable in feature or in carriage, if you had met them stealing around the street corners—yet under the dome of the Institute, growing great by association, and greater still by the conviction that forces itself upon you, that you are looking upon the chosen ones of a people which, however frequent their political somersets and tergiversations, have yet been always the pioneers in the realms of pure science, and have given growth, under the forcing-glass of this same Institute, to such men as Arago, and Cuvier, and Lacépède, and Leverrier, and Guizot.

We see—when the hall is full, and the minute-hand of the clock has pointed within a fraction of a second to the appointed hour—this same Guizot, in his black coat, broided with a green garland of oak and olive leaves, take his place in the chair of the President; we see him, with a touch of the French vanity that belongs to the race, dress his scant hair with an ambling thrust of the fingers, and throw a little of his youth-time expression into an eye that is now dimmed with near seventy years, as he begins his address.

And we seem to see the earnest look of attention as he goes on to expose with verve, with wit, and in beautifully rounded periods, the aims and purposes of that branch of the Institute over which he has the honor to preside; we observe, too, the mirthful and satisfied expressions upon the faces of his fellows of the Academy as he paints, with a few satiric touches, the calm and quiet level which characterizes at this day the political philosophy of France. "Only in the regions of purely scientific inquiry does political liberty now reside."—(Débats, for 17th December, 1854.)

he rises into an eloquent assertion of the dignity of that manly pursuit of Truth which belongs to them as the scholars of science, and which no material force can divert or annul—which conducts them into regions above the conflicts of the day—regions of a high intellectual freedom, where no grasp of human tyranny can reach—where only Right is the standard, and only God the arbiter!—we see the hangings of the hall shake with one great sterm of applause.

After this we see a stately man, in the flush of middle age—a handsome man withal, the historian Mignet—take his place at the reading-desk, and with an attention scarce less than that which has belonged to the hearing of Guizot, we see a crowded audience hold their places undisturbed through an address, from the historian of the Revolution, which covers two long pages of the Débats.

In contrast with this phase of the winter life in the Continental Capital, we divert our glass now to one of the theatres along the Boulevard—to the pretty, the graceful, the winning performances at the Gymnase.

Madame de Girardin, the wife of the half mad, half prophet Editor, has written a graceful comedy, at which all the Paris world are laughing as heartily as they cried heartily over the Joie fait Peur, which we detailed to you—our courteous readers—some four months ago. Thanks to the feuilletonistes (whose columns make up our tubular lorgnon), we can see this laughing humor of Madame de Girardin as well as we saw her pathos in the "Fear joy makes."

She calls the play "The Hat of the Clock-mender." We see the curtain rise upon a dining-room; we hear (for our telescope transmits sounds as well as sights) a crash; a Paris garçon rushes upon the stage from an adjoining salon, perfectly overcome with terror; he has broken his master's clock—his prized clock—an object of art; his place is gone; his character ruined; what is to be done?

The maid comes in, and seats herself at work upon one of her mistress's dresses; the garçon shrinks away to the salon, and in his vain efforts to repair the damage, puts the clock upon the strike. The maid counts, to know the hour. It strikes fourteen: her attention is aroused, and she presently hears a terrible whirl of wheels, and a sudden snap of the works. She rushes toward the salon, and discovers the accident which has so afflicted poor Maurice.

He is more disturbed than ever; determines to quit the house at once; but after several moments of self-crimination, and of tender adieux to the maid, she suggests that he should go for a clock-maker. He revives at the thought; reties his apron—when there is a ring at the door, and his master enters. The servant conceals, with most ludicrous effort, his anxiety; and his master withdraws, to his infinite relief, leaving word that he shall return at five.

He has now the day before him; he tries to tempt the maid to go for the horologer, but the maid refuses—she is expecting the orders of her mistress. In this dilemma, a porter arrives with letters for the household; poor Maurice bribes him to go for a clock-maker, and feels encouraged. The mistress (a newly-married wife, who had promised to wait her husband's return, but who finds the hours long) appears, in walking costume, and, after a chat with the maid, goes out for a visit to a neighbor.

The clock-maker comes, and, in a state of immense trepidation, Maurice conducts him to the salon. His groans are heard through the partition which skirts the stage. He is, however, reassured by the representations of the clock-maker, who engages to put her right in three or four days at the latest.

In his exhilaration of spirits Maurice ventures upon a quiet embrace of the maid, and a joyful dance about the dining-table. In the midst of this, and while the clock-maker is groping his way out of the salon cautiously, with the clock in his arms, there is a ring at the door.

The mirth of the poor servant is over in an instant. Who can it be? Not his mistress, for he knows her ring; not his master, for he was not to return until five. The ring is repeated violently. The servant is aghast; the poor clock-maker is trembling with his load, entreating that the door should be opened.

In despair, poor Maurice bethinks himself of his mistress's chamber; he opens it—thrusts in the clock-maker with his burden, and locking the door upon him, places the key in his pocket.

The ring is repeated with nervous frequency. What excuse can Maurice make for his delay? Only one—he was dressing. Thereupon he stripes off his coat, vest, boots, cravat, and snatching them up stamps about the room, runs toward the door, and meets his master entering in a fury.

His condition explains itself. It was an awkward hour to be dressing, to be sure; but then, a servant must have his toilet as well as his master. He diverts attention by placing the letters, delivered by the porter, in the hands of his master. Among them, it appears, is an anonymous one, suggesting to the husband a close watch upon the conduct of his wife. He is naturally of a jealous disposition: he will observe her action and her bearing toward him more closely; like all jealous husbands, he has great confidence in his powers of penetration.

He goes toward her chamber and calls; but there is no answer.

The servant, meantime, has observed, with great distress, that the clock-maker has left his hat upon the table; he makes one or two vain attempts to cover it with his vest; he succeeds finally in placing himself between the hat and his master, and bears it off behind him. His master hands him his own, and poor Maurice, with a hat before and behind, dodges about the room with the most ludicrous expression of trouble imaginable.

When his master has called two or three times, vainly, at the chamber-door of his wife, the agony of the servant is indescribable. He believes Madame is trying on her dresses. The husband in a passion tries the latch—it does not yield; the door is locked upon him.

The servant bethinking himself, suddenly, of the escape of the clock-maker, dashes down the hats and runs around to a private door.

The husband, with the anonymous letter of the morning in his mind, is giving a very hasty growth to his jealous suspicions; he observes a strange hat upon the table; he rushes again to the door of his wife's chamber, braves all proprieties, and takes a peep through the key-hole; he sees dimly the figure of a man standing by the chimney-piece.

An instant after the chamber-door opens from within, and Maurice appears with a glow of satisfaction on his face, and assures his master, with the blankest countenance in the world, that there was nobody within!

The husband, overcome with distress, points to the strange hat. The servant regards it with a strangely mingled look of anxiety and feigned curiosity, and stammers forth a very confused account of his ignorance. The suspicions of the husband run higher and wilder; he pushes the distressed servant away from him, and goes around to the private staircase to see if there are any traces of her flight.

Maurice, meantime, dashes the clock-maker's hat into a cupboard of the dining-room.

The husband returns utterly disheartened, and strides gloomily toward the salon. The poor Maurice is now in an agony of terror; his master will surely observe that his prized clock is missing.

The husband re-enters, exclaiming with an air of desolation—"Gone, gone!"

Poor Maurice throws himself on his knees. He imagines that the fatal discovery is made. His master's worst suspicions are kindled by the abject air of the servant; he seizes him by the collar, and demands in a voice of thunder—"Villain, where is she?"

The servant bows his head more abjectly than ever.

The grieved husband renews his question.

The servant stammers out—"Home; he's taken her home."

And frightened by his master's affliction, he says, by way of softening the grief, "He will keep her only three days—four days at farthest."

The husband can listen to no more; the abashed servant crawls away to his service.

A gentleman friend enters, and can not account for the disturbed state of his host. They sit down together to a déjeuner, served in the most awkward fashion by the disconcerted garçon.

The visitor plies his host with questions; and being an old family friend, learns his suspicions.

He endeavors to encourage him; but unfortunately by his very effort aggravates the suspicions of the husband. The friend represents that if his wife were really guilty, she would artfully show a most minute attention to his special tastes—would order such dishes as he had expressed a fondness for—would arrange his déjeuners with the most piquant art imaginable.

Alas, this is just what the poor woman has always done! The husband guards his grief in silence, and the friend retires in disgust.

The wife presently enters, gay, chirruping, with a bridal joyousness in her face; but she meets only cold looks. She had promised to wait his coming!

True, but she had gone across the way only to sit with her cousin.

(Very great gloom and doubt on the husband's face).

She approaches him more closely, and seeks to win him to a smile by a variety of affectionate attentions and caresses.

All in vain.

She gives up in despair, and goes toward her chamber with a mournful air, calling, as she enters, to the servant—"Maurice!"

The enraged husband throws himself in the man's way; he sees now that she has made a confidant of that idiot of a servant; the whole scheme flashes upon him. He forbids him to go near the chamber of his mistress; flings his wages for the month upon the floor, and orders him to be gone.

The trouble of the poor garçon now grows into a fearful kind of despair. He flings off the badges of his servitude, asserts his dignity and rights as a man, meets his master's abuse with abuse in return, and defies him!

In the excess of his indignation he runs to the cupboard, draws out the bruised hat of the clock-maker, avows that notwithstanding his denial he did know to whom it belonged, and that in spite of his master he would return it to its proper owner.

The husband's rage blazes anew; his worst thoughts are realized; but still he is cunning enough to divert the indignation of the servant to some purpose.

"Ah, villain! and so you will return it to the Count—"

Servant (with a very blank face). "Count!"

"And is not this a Count's hat?"

"Dam! it's a clock-maker's hat."

"A clock-maker!"

"Oui, monsieur; the clock-maker who came to carry her off to be mended, and who was in madame's room when you made such a devil of a fuss at the door."

In short, the aggrieved husband sees through his folly on the instant—learns the story of the clock—doubles the wages of his servant—kisses his wife into forgiveness, and the curtain drops upon a quiet household once more.

We see again—in that same strange world of Paris—a huge hulk of building upon the outskirts, with a high stone wall closing it in, and skeleton trees hanging over it; we see a great gate in the wall, rarely ajar, and rarely stirring on its hinges; we see, beside the gate, a curious revolving cage of iron; we see women, with bundles under their arms, stealing thither at night, with a silent pace and cautious looks; we see them lift the bundle they carry to their faces often and often, as they approach the lumbering building, with its high wall, and its skeleton trees, and its gates so rarely ajar; we see their step grow faint—as if some secret grief were gnawing in the bundle, or in themselves—as they draw nearer to the wicket gate that swings in the wall; we see them stop when the gleam of a lantern shines on the road, or when the light of a star peers from the clouds, and look upon the bundle they carry, and press it to their hearts; we see them push on with swift, but unsteady pace after this, and lay the bundle within the basket of iron rods, and twirl the cage around upon its well-oiled pivot, and pull nervously the bell-wire that hangs at the gate; and we see the poor women go away in the night, having offered up a child to poverty or to pride.

We keep our eye upon the bundle within the cage, which is accessible now from within the walls; we see the bundle stir, as if life were in it; we see servants, who wear the livery of the great house, go out to answer the bell that has sounded; we see them gather up the bundle from the cage of iron, without once setting ajar the gates; we see them unroll a packet of clothing by the light of the lamps within; we see them searching for some paper to give a name to the child they find; finally, we see the paper itself, which says, "I am Antonio by name, christened in the Church of St. Germain; a gold pin is in my blanket, which my mother will know when she comes to claim me, if she ever comes at all."—(Galigani, Jan. 1864.)

AGAIN we see—shifting our glass—the mother of a family, boys and girls, living in a huge house of stone, with ramparts and bastions, more for show than use, upon the banks of a river; we see a wide but bare forest stretching around the house and the ramparts, and troops of deer browsing upon the twigs, or hiding under the scattered thickets of firs; we see great dignitaries of the British court and government coming and going through the gates of the great house, which is called Windsor Castle, and we see a disturbed look upon all their faces, and upon the face of the mother, who is Queen.

We see them conning dismal reports of a grand army, which, no long time ago, they sent into a stranger's country, with the hope of conquering the stranger's strongest fortress in a month, but which is stronger now than ever before; we see the calm Scotch face of Lord Aberdeen—so courteous to sovereigns, and so hopeful once of the Nicholas of Russia—taking on now a puzzled and an anxious look; we see the jaunty figure of a little old man—Lord John Russell—catching now for the first time a stoop of trouble and of apprehension; we see Englishmen along Piccadilly, and in the square before the Exchange, who looked so charmingly after Alma, growing blue and petulant; we see ladies in black in a hundred country churches, that are dressed with mistletoe and holly, but bringing very little cheer to their hearts; we see, here and there, at a country dinner, some disabled officer, very pale and forlorn in aspect, who tells sad stories of the camp life in the Crimea, and of the Russian balls, which he has seen and felt.

And if we look still farther eastward, we see them, in their outlying posts and tents, upon the heights before Sebastopol; the horses dragged with mud, the sod of the pasturage lands trampled into mire, the brush-wood burnt, the stone fences turned into bastions, the balls lying thick in every gully, the pipe-clay of Gallipoli gone, the potted pheasants of the staff consumed, the curries and sauces of less worth than a loaf of fresh bread, the Duke of Cambridge half-crazed and away, Cathcart, the hero of the Caffir war, cut down—and to add to all, the conviction forcing itself on the proud British army, as well as on every observer, that their whole army system of supply and of organization is utterly worthless.

In contrast with this, we see all the French Zouaves lounging in the trenches, and smoking the cigars which the Emperor has given them in memory of Christmas; we see their stout army horses—not over-delicate with grooming at home—still sleek and full; we see warm sheep-skins upon the shoulders of the night sentries; we see the chassecours carousing in the tents, which are warmed with Paris stoves, and polishing their bayonets and rifles with the same mud which sticks so fearfully to the British camp and clothes; we see even their fleet, in Kamiesch bay, lying in the same order which belongs to the convoys in the harbor of Toulon; we see no clashing of orders—no misinterpretation of command—no offended pride of caste, no shirking of unpalatable duty, but every where that thorough and complete system which makes the French as easy, and as apt, in the camp of the Crimea, as they ever were in the caserne at Vincennes.

In another month, if we turn our telescope that way, we shall have more to see.

Editor's Drawer.

OBSERVE one thing, reader, if you please. We have entered upon what is usually termed the "wild and tempestuous month of March;" but, to our poor conception, there is not a month in the year in which pleasant days are so pleasant as in this much-abused month. Winter may not be "over and gone," nor hath the "time of the singing of the birds come," nor is there the voice of a single turtle heard in the land; and yet, what a glorious sunshine is the sunshine of a warm day in March! What an avant-courier of the mature spring-time! In the country, the blue smoke from "sap-bush" and "sugar-works" coils up through the tops of the reddening maples; the overture to the frog-opera begins with scattered instruments; some early flowers, frail children, peep from beneath the dead leaves, in close proximity to heaps of half-melted snow; white and red toad-stools appear; the winds are bland, and the sky is like molten, burnished silver. How far you can see!—how the blue landscape stretches away to the far horizon!

Well has our own poet sung:

"The stormy March has come again,
With wind, and cloud, and changing skies;
I hear the rushing of the blast,
That through the sunny valley flies.

"Ah! passing few are they who speak,
Wild, stormy month, in praise of thee;
Yet, though thy winds are loud and bleak,
Thou art a welcome month to me!

"For thou to Northern lands again
The glad and joyous Sun doth bring;
And thou hast joined the gentle train,
And wear'st the gentle name of Spring.

"And in thy reign of blast and storm
Smiles many a long, bright, sunny day,
When the changed winds are soft and warm,
And heaven puts on the blue of May.

"Then sing aloud the gushing rills—
From Winter's durance just set free;
And brightly leaping down the hills,
Begin their journey to the sea.

"The year's departing beauty hides
Of wintry storms the millen threat;
But in thy sternest frown abides
A look of kindly promise yet."

THE late Dr. Chapman, of Philadelphia, mourned of many who will laugh at his wit no more, has left behind him a memory that will be transmitted through successive generations. His wit was equal to his skill. It was hard to say which did his patients the most good, and as he always gave his best of both at the same time, they probably helped each other. Just as it happened when one of his patients revolted at a monstrous dose of physic, and said:

"Why, Doctor, you don't mean such a dose as this for gentlemen?"

"Oh, no," said the Doctor, "it's for working men!"

And a good laugh is often as good as a medicine. With him the pleasantry was as certain as the opportunity. Even in extremis it would come out of him. He was walking in the streets, and a baker's cart, driven furiously, was about to run him down. The baker reined up suddenly, and just in time to spare the Doctor, who instantly took off his hat, and bowing politely, exclaimed, "You are the best bred man in town."

At the great gathering in Philadelphia of the Medical Society of the United States, our literary and distinguished Dr. Francis and Dr. Chapman met, as they had done a thousand times before, having been friends for half a century. At a large dinner party a pompous little Dr. Mann, presuming that these gentlemen were strangers, said to Dr. Francis, "Let me introduce you to Dr. Chapman, the head of our profession in Philadelphia." It was too much for Dr. Chapman, who retorted, "Dr. Francis, let me introduce you to Dr. Mann, the tail of our profession in Philadelphia." Little Mann let the lions alone after that.

Very much against his will the Doctor was made a vestryman in his parish church, and one of his duties was to pass the plate for the contribution at the morning service. He presented it with great politeness and becoming gravity to the gentleman at the head of the pew nearest the chancel, who was not disposed to contribute. The faithful collector, nothing daunted, held the plate before him, and bowed, as if he would urge him to think the matter over and give something, a little something, and refused to go on till he had seen his silver on the plate. In this way he proceeded down the aisle, victimizing every man till he came to the pew nearest the door, where sat an aged colored woman. To his surprise she laid down a piece of gold. "Dear me!" said the astonished Doctor, "you must be a Guinea nigger." They never troubled the Doctor to go around with the plate after that.

But we are telling too many of the good things of this good physician. A volume might be made, and a racy one it would be, by any one who would take the trouble to gather up the trifles the Doctor let fall in his public and private walks. One more, and we will leave him.

Dr. Chapman was a delegate to the convention of the church, which was to hold its annual session at Pittsburgh. Party-spirit ran high, and the members, both clerical and lay, being men of like passions with other men, became more excited and violent in word and tone than was becoming so reverend and grave a body. When things had gone on at this rate for two days, and were nothing bettered, but rather grew worse, one of the most venerable members arose and said, that he thought these scenes were highly indecorous, especially as they were enacted in the presence of God, whose servants we all profess to be. Dr. Chapman for the first time now stood up, and with a peculiar twisting of his words, and the profound attention of the whole convention, remarked: "Mr. President, I think so too. It is too bad. The members ought not to go on so. But I do not feel the force of that last remark. The gentleman says 'we ought not to conduct in this manner in the presence of God;' now, Sir, to my certain knowledge He has not been in this place since we came together."

The rebuke was so just, so pertinent, that priest and people felt it alike, and the business of the convention was conducted with decorum to its close.

The better half of Dr. Chapman's happy hits were made in the social circles of which he was the life and soul, and they can not be retailed without trenching on the confines of good fellowship, which ought to be sacred against intrusion. Perhaps we have erred on the wrong side in relating some of these. But they are good nevertheless.

THE great Dr. Mason, in his day the most eloquent of preachers in the city of New York, was in the habit of walking every morning down the street to Washington Market. A certain lawyer, of no less celebrity in his line, was wont to take the same walk, but being earlier than the Doctor, usually came up the street as the parson went down. One morning a deep snow was on the ground, and a single path only was beaten by the few who had been out before them. The two gentlemen had often met in their walks, but never in private, and had not even a speaking acquaintance. Now they met face to face, and the morning being cold, and neither of them in good humor, they stood waiting the one for the other to give way by stepping out into the snow. Presently the stalwart divine moved a step toward the wall; the lawyer came up to pass; the Doctor returned too suddenly, and bringing his shoulder into contact with the lawyer's, tipped him into the gutter. The discomfited lawyer picked himself up, and as he brushed off the snow, very coldly remarked,

"You belong to the Church militant, I should think."

"Ay," said the Doctor, as he strode onward, "and to the Church TRIUMPHANT too."

This was not very amiable in the reverend gentleman certainly, and he was not so well reputed for the softer graces as for pulpit eloquence, in which he was without a peer. One of his members left his church and became attached to one of the other congregations in this city. He had been absent more than a year, when he chanced to meet the Doctor in the street and attempted to make an apology for having left. Said he,

"I suppose you have missed me from your church the year past?"

"No, I have not," replied the Doctor, very gruffly.

"Yes, I have found an easier road to heaven than the one you preach."

"Easier road, is it? but you'll have a hell of a toll to pay," said the Doctor, as he pushed by and left his quondam parishioner to digest the answer.

HOGARTH refused, after much experience, to paint portraits, as men and women were never satisfied with a picture that painted them truthfully, and he declared that whoever would succeed in this branch, must adopt the mode recommended in one of Gay's fables, and make divinities of all who sit to him.

"I was preaching one evening," writes a clerical friend, who relishes a good thing richly, "from the passage in the history of Moses where he, with his two friends Aaron and Hur, was standing on a hill and beholding the battle between Israel and Amalek. My text was 'Aaron and Hur stayed up his hands;' and I argued the duty of the people to hold up the hands of their minister, from the example of these good men of old who thus supported Moses. On my way homeward from the church one of the leading men of my parish joined me, and after expressing his great satisfaction in my discourse, begged leave to suggest one point that I had overlooked.

"Ah," said I, 'and what can that be?'

"I mean," he answered, 'the powerful argument which that history furnishes in favor of female influence.'

"I confess I do not perceive that the subject is hinted at—how do you discover it, my dear Sir?"

"Why, does it not read," he said, with some surprise, "that Aaron and her held up his hands? I suppose the woman helped as much as the man."

"He was obliged to explain it once or twice over, before I understood that the vulgar error of using her for she had led him to think that Aaron was assisted by a lady in his kind attentions to Moses."

THE anecdote is well known of the young men in Boston whom Dr. Bethune overtook as he was walking to the Hall, where he was to lecture on "The Age of Pericles." One of them said to the other, "Where are you going to-night?"

"To the Hall, to hear Dr. Bethune on the Age of Pericles."

"Oh hang it, who cares how old Pericles is? let's go to the theatre!"

But a better one than that was told the next day of Smith in Washington Street, who said to Johnson, confidentially, "I say, Johnson, I say, do you know what perikles is? My wife asked me, and I said, 'Pshaw, don't you know?' The fact is, I don't. Tell a fellow, if you do."

In a rural parish steady and stirring, in the northern part of the State of New York, some forty years ago, there lived an elderly woman, who had unfortunately been shattered in her intellects. She was a great church-goer, a good mother and neighbor, but ready to fly off the handle whenever she was excited, and this was likely to occur under circumstances when no one supposed that her paroxysms were at hand. Deacon Williams sat in the same pew with her—the old-fashioned square pew—with his back to the preacher, and his face to Aunt Tabby. He had a habit of taking a nap that lasted through the sermon; so that he was called not only one of the pillars, but one of the sleepers of the church. It was a warm summer Sunday afternoon, when the preacher was describing, with graphic power, the famine scenes in the city of Jerusalem, sacked by the Roman armies. Aunt Tabby listened with attentive ears, and was thrilled with tales of horror that made her tremble. "Women were driven to that extremity of distress," said the speaker, "that they cooked and ate their own children. A soldier rushing into a house, and smelling the meat, demanded it, and the terrified mother was compelled to bring out the remains of her own child, and set it before him." Aunt Tabby had been more and more excited as the narrative went on, till the baked baby came out, and she started from her seat, and pouncing upon Deacon Williams, fast asleep, with his reverend head upon his breast, she struck her fingers like talons into his hair, and cried out, with a shrill, clear voice, that rang through the house, "Where's the man that killed my child?" The people were electrified. The preacher paused in his discourse. Two of the elders, seeing the occurrence and understanding Aunt Tabby's weakness, stepped over, untangled her claws from the Deacon's head, and gently led her to the door.

SPEAKING of retorts, the chemists make great use of them, and they are very handy for public speakers, often answering a better purpose than an argument, be it ever so able. We have heard of one or two that, to our knowledge, have never slipped into print:

The late Roger M. Sherman, of Connecticut, one of the ablest men ever raised in that man-raising State, was often pitted at the bar against Mr. Daggett, who was afterward Chief Justice, and who was a fair match for Sherman. It happened, on one occasion, that Daggett was a long time in hunting up a reference in a law-book, and to increase his embarrassment—for he was on his legs, in the midst of his speech, and the Court impatient for him to proceed—Sherman said to him,

"Brother Daggett, will you have my spectacles?"

"No, I thank you," said Daggett, quietly; "there was no truth ever seen through your spectacles."

In a great ecclesiastical battle in Philadelphia, Dr. Krebs, of this city, was pressing his antagonist, Dr. Breckenridge, hard up with his authorities, and at last he came down on him with this—"And now I will proceed to quote Breckenridge against Breckenridge."

Instantly, without rising from his seat, Dr. B. exclaimed, "And you could not possibly cite an authority that would have less weight with me."

The readiest and severest retort we ever heard or heard of, was made in the Senate of the United States, by John C. Calhoun. Of its justice we say nothing; every man may have his own opinion. Calhoun had recently lent his support to the Van Buren administration, and Henry Clay was denouncing him for apostasy. With his eagle eye darting fire across the Chamber, Clay cried out, "The gentleman has gone over to the enemy, and time alone can disclose the motive."

"The gentleman," said Calhoun, "went over to the enemy, and did not leave it for time to disclose the motive."

EVERY body in Alleghany county knows old Lawyer Martin. He had the coolest way in the world of transferring money from the pockets of his clients to his own. Old Ben Brooks, a rich but close-fisted farmer in the neighborhood, was one of his clients, and in their conferences there was always a pretty sharp contest as to who should outwit the other, the lawyer, in the end, generally getting the upper hand. One day they had been sitting for an hour or two, trying their wits to get the advantage of each other, when the farmer got excited, and suddenly turning to the lawyer, said,

"Martin, I had a remarkable dream last night."

"Ah! had you," said Martin; "what was it?"

"It was a terrible one," said Brooks, looking very solemn—"an awful one. I haven't fairly got over the effects of it yet. I can't keep it out of my mind for a minute."

"Well, tell it," said Martin, evidently struck with the farmer's manner.

"I dreamed," said the other, "that I was in hell, and the devil sat in his big chair, pointing out their places to his new subjects as they entered, one after another. I was surprised to see so many of my old neighbors come in. At length the door opened, and looking around I saw you enter. The devil told one to take this seat and another that; but when he saw you come in he rose up, and pointing to his own chair, he said,

"Here, Lawyer Martin, you can take my seat—you can fill it a great deal better than I can."

EMIGRATION to the State of Michigan was so great during the years 1835-6 that every house was filled every night with travelers wanting lodging. Every traveler there at that time will remember the difficulty of obtaining a bed in the hotels, even if he had two or three "strange bedfellows."

The Rev. Hosea Brown, an eccentric Methodist minister, stopped one night at one of the hotels in Ann Arbor and inquired if he could have a room and bed to himself. The bar-keeper told him he could, unless they should be so full as to render it necessary to put another in with him. At an early hour the reverend gentleman went to his room, locked the door, and soon retired to his bed, and sunk into a comfortable sleep. Along toward midnight he was roused from his slumbers by a loud knocking at his door.

"Hallo! you there," he exclaimed, "what do you want now?"—particular stress on the last word.

"You must take another lodger, Sir, with you," said the voice of the landlord.

"What! another yet?"

"Why, yes—there is only one in here, is there?"

"One! why here is Mr. Brown, and a Methodist preacher, and myself, already, and I should think that enough for one bed even in Michigan."

The landlord seemed to think so too, and left the trio to their repose.

A GOOD story was told some years ago of old Bunce, who prided himself upon never being mistaken in his judgment of a person's character from his phiz.

He was in Washington Market one day, to get a goose for dinner. In looking about, he saw a lot before a young woman with a peculiarly fine open countenance.

"She's honest," said Bunce to himself; and at once asked her if she had a young goose.

"Yes," said she; "here's as fine a one as you will find in the market;" and she looked up in his face with a perfect sincerity that would have taken his heart, if he had not already made up his mind as to her character.

"You're sure it's young?"

"To be sure it is;" and Bunce took it home.

All efforts to eat it were fruitless, it was so tough; and the next day he hastened down to the market, angry with himself, and more so with the honest-faced girl who had cheated him.

"Didn't you tell me that goose was young yesterday?" he exclaimed, striding up to the girl wrathfully.

"To be sure I did."

"You cheated me," said Bunce; "it was a tough old gander."

"You don't call me old, do you?" she asked.

"No—I should think not," he replied.

"No—I should think not, too. I am only twenty, and mother told me that goose was hatched just six months after I was born."

Bunce had forgotten that a goose lives a hundred years.

AMONG the contents of the "Knickerbocker Gallery," the "Testimonial" to the Editor of our contemporary, the "Knickerbocker" Magazine, a notice of which had the "place of honor" in our Literary Review department for January, is the following exquisite poem by BRYANT. Aside from its character as a beautiful painting from Nature, the similitude which it bears to the progress and end of "this mortal life," will commend it to the heart of every reader:

THE SNOW-SHOWER.

Stand here by my side, and turn, I pray,
On the lake below thy gentle eyes;
The clouds hang over it heavy and gray,
And dark and silent the water lies;
And out of that frozen mist the snow
In wavering flakes begin to flow:

Flake after flake,
They sink in the dark and silent lake.

See how in a living swarm they come,
From the chambers beyond that misty veil:
Some hover a while in air, and some Rush prone from the sky like summer hail.

All, dropping swiftly or settling slow,
Meet and are still in the depth below:

Flake after flake,
Dissolved in the dark and silent lake.

Here delicate snow-stars out of the cloud
Come floating downward in airy play,
Like spangles dropped from the glistening crowd
That whiten by night the milky way:

There broader and burlier masses fall—
The sullen water buries them all:

Flake after flake,
All drowned in the dark and silent lake.

And some, as on tender wings they glide
From their chilly birth-cloud, dim and gray,
Are joined in their fall, and side by side,
Come clinging along their unsteady way:

As friend with friend, or husband with wife,
Makes hand in hand the passage of life;

Each mated flake
Soon sinks in the dark and silent lake.

Lo! while we are gazing, in swifter haste
Stream down the snows, till the air is white;
As, myriads by myriads madly chased,
They fling themselves from their shadowy height.

The fair frail creatures of middle sky,
What speed they make, with their grave so nigh:

Flake after flake
To lie in the dark and silent lake.

I saw in thy gentle eyes a tear—
They turn to me in sorrowful thought;
Thou thinkest of friends, the good and dear,
Who were for a time, and now are not:

Like these fair children of cloud and frost,
That glisten a moment and then are lost,

Flake after flake,
All lost in the dark and silent lake.

Yet look again, for the clouds divide;

A gleam of blue on the water lies;
And far away on the mountain side
A sunbeam falls from the opening skies;

But the hurrying host that flew between
The cloud and the water no more is seen:

Flake after flake,
All met in the dark and silent lake!

WE are indebted to a correspondent for the following "Inscription on the Window of a Public House in Germany, in four languages:"

"In questa casa trovate,
Toutes les choses que vous souhaitez;
Vinum bonum, costea, carnes,
Neat post-chaise, and horse and harness."

A SOUTHERN correspondent has transmitted us several authentic anecdotes for a place in the "Drawer." We select two or three. The first embodies a trenchant juvenile "cut" at Commodore Barron, which must have been all the more cutting that it was not without foundation:

"Many years ago, before the Philadelphia navy-yard was inclosed by a brick wall, the children of poor families in the neighborhood were in the habit of procuring chips, etc., from the work-shops, for fuel. This gave opportunity for thefts of copper sheathing, bolts, and other valuables; which determined the commandant, Commodore James Barron, to issue orders against the practice. Some days after the promulgation of this order, sauntering down the yard one morning, his eye fell on an urchin whose basket was well filled with the interdicted chips; and the little rebel, in conscious guilt, skulked behind a large stack of timber, hoping he had thus escaped official vigilance. But the Commodore detected the 'dodge,' dragged the culprit from his concealment, overturned the basket, and, tweaking the nose of his captive, ordered him to beat a speedy retreat, and never again to be guilty of a similar trespass. Taking himself off to a safe distance, the little fellow hailed his captor with:

"I say, Commodore, I guess that's the first prize you ever took!"

"IN C—, South Carolina, was lately located a preacher whose modesty never deterred him from urging upon his congregation liberal subscriptions of money for all church and benevolent purposes. In his private solicitations he one day met a good, but eccentric member, who for a long time steadfastly refused his aid to an object the preacher was solicitous to secure. At last importunity triumphed, conditionally. He agreed to contribute on condition of being allowed to choose the text from which the preacher's funeral sermon should be preached. The matter being thus settled, the minister wanted to know what the text was. His friend answered: 'And the beggar died!'"

"IN an interior town of Pennsylvania, not long ago, attached to the Presbyterian Church, was a distinguished clergyman, whose nervousness revolted at monotonous interruptions during service. On several successive Sabbaths his attention had been attracted to a young man, in the fullness of pride at the possession of a showy gold watch establishment, deliberately drawing it forth, in ostentatious prominence, to ascertain the hour. This display nettled the divine, who determined to end it. On the last day of its exposure, the preacher was dilating to a rapt audience on the great theme of eternity, and his own feelings and imagination were lending unusual eloquence to a gifted tongue, when, to the horror of the preacher, out came the glittering bauble. Fired to abrupt reproof at this stolidity and disrespect, without a pause long enough to attract general attention to the digression, he exclaimed, looking full at the offender:

"Put up your watch, young man; we are speaking of eternity—not of time!"

A "UNION of forces" is well exemplified in the following:

"A Turk wears so many fleas in his shirt, that a mathematician has recently demonstrated that if they should all jump at once, they would carry him across the Bosphorus!"

WHEN the following passage from a political speech of Colonel Thomas H. Benton was placed in the "Drawer" for future use, it struck us as embodying not a little true pathos. It impresses us so still:

"What is a seat in Congress to me? I have sat thirty years in the highest branch in Congress; have made a name to which I can add nothing, and

I should only be anxious to save what has been gained. I have domestic relations sorely lacerated in these times; a wife whom I never neglected, and who needs my attention now more than ever; children, some separated from me by the expanse of oceans and continents, and others by the slender bounds which separate time from eternity. I touch the age which the Psalmist assigns as the limit of manly life, and must be thoughtless indeed if I do not think of something beyond the fitting and shadowy pursuits of this life, of all of which I have seen the vanity.

"What of my occupation? Ask the undertaker, that good Mr. Lynch, whose face, present on so many mournful occasions, has become pleasant to me. He knows what occupies my thoughts and my cares: gathering the bones of the dead—a mother, a sister, two sons, a grandchild; planting the cypress over assembled graves, and marking the spot where I and those who are most dear to me are soon to be laid!"

SOME country journalist thus discourseth concerning taking opium, and its effects in his own case:

"We never could understand how people can get a taste for opium fastened upon them. We tried a small quantity of it the other day, for 'a pain internally.' We were ordered to take two pills a day for four days. The first dose was really delicious. It gave us a pink-tinged sleep, filled to the brim with girls made of rose-leaves. We indulged in dreams of the most Oriental character. In one of them we had a mother-of-pearl hand-axed, with golden runners. With this we glided down a rainbow made of ice-cream, and brought up on a terrace the supports of which were great spars of emerald.

"The second night things began to change. About the supports of the terrace anacondas began to appear; while, in the distance, a lot of green monkeys, with their tails burned off, were quarrelling about the propriety of making a pin-cushion of us!

"The third evening matters grew appalling. The terrace had gone, and so had the rainbow and the girls made of rose-leaves; and in their stead we had a bed filled with rattlesnakes, and on the head-board four grizzly bears pulling at a hawser, one end of which was fastened to our neck and the other to an iceberg!"

There must have been a "tendency of blood to the head" in that vision!

THIS is a very striking remark of De Quincey, in one of his essays:

"Russia, a mighty empire as respects the simple grandeur of magnitude, builds her power upon sterility. She has it in her power to seduce an invading foe into vast circles of starvation, of which the radii measure a thousand leagues!"

PERHAPS there is not a more offensive feature of dandyism than over-scenting with high-flavored sweets. As the Scotch proverb has it, it is "over sweet to be wholesome." An amusing rebuke of this vulgar habit was given at Niagara last summer, which is worthy of preservation:

Sitting on the piazza of the "Cataract House," was a young, foppish-looking gentleman, his garments very highly-scented with a mingled odor of bad cologne and very powerful musk. A solemn-faced, odd-looking man, after passing the dandy several times, with a look of aversion which drew general notice, suddenly stopped, and in a confidential tone said:

"Stranger, I can tell you what will take that scent out of your clothes. You take—"

"What!—what do you mean, Sir!" said the exquisite, filled with indignation, and starting from his chair.

"Oh! get mad, now—swear—pitch round—fight; just because a man wants to do you a kindness!" coolly replied the stranger. "But I tell you I do know what'll take out that smell—phew! You just bury your clothes—bury 'em! only for a day or two. I had an uncle who once got foul of a sk—"

At this instant there went up from the crowd a simultaneous roar of merriment; and the dandy very sensibly "cleared the coop," and vanished upstairs.

The fact is, there is no parrying such good-natured satire when well founded.

"TIGHT TIMES," a good deal "about" as we write, is well personified in the following:

"This chap has come around again. He may be seen on 'Change every day. He bores our merchants, and seats himself cozily in lawyer's offices. He is every where.

"A great disturber of the public quiet, a pestilent fellow, is this same 'Tight Times.' Every body talks about him; every body looks out for him; every body hates him; and a great many hard words and not a few profane epithets are bestowed upon him. Every body would avoid him, if they could; every body would hiss him from 'Change, hustle him out of Broadway, kick him from the banks, throw him out of the stores, out of the hotels—but they can't. 'Tight Times' is a bore—he will stick like a brier.

"An impudent fellow is 'Tight Times.' Ask for a discount, and he looks over your shoulder, winks at the cashier, and your note is thrown out. Ask a loan of the usurers at one per cent. a month, he looks over your securities, and marks two and a half. Present a bill to your debtor, 'Tight Times' shrugs his shoulders, rolls up his eyes, and you must 'call again.' A wife asks for a fashionable brocade and a daughter for a new bonnet, 'Tight Times' puts in his caveat, and the brocade and bonnet are postponed.

"A great depreciator of stocks is 'Tight Times.' He steps in among the brokers, and down go the 'favorites of the market.' He goes along the railroads in process of construction, and the Irishmen throw down their shovels and walk away.

"A great exploder of bubbles is 'Tight Times.' He looks into the affairs of gold companies, and they fly to pieces; into 'kiting' banks, and they stop payment. He walks around 'corner-lots,' draws a line across lithographic cities, and they disappear. He leaves his footprints among mines, and the rich metal becomes dross. He breathes upon the cunningest schemes of speculators, and they burst like torpedoes.

"A hard master for the poor is 'Tight Times'—a cruel enemy to the laboring classes. He takes the mechanic from his bench, the laborer from his work, the hod-carrier from his ladder. He runs up the prices of provisions, and he runs down the wages of labor. He runs up the prices of food, and he runs down the ability to purchase it at any price.

He makes little children hungry, and cry for food; cold, and cry for fire and clothing. He makes poor women sad, makes mothers weep, discourages the hearts of fathers, carries care and anxiety into families, and sits, a crouching desolation, in the corners and on the hearth-stones of the poor. A hard master to the poor is 'Tight Times.'

"He is a wanderer, too. Where he comes from, nobody knows; and where he goes, nobody knows. He flashes along the telegraph wires—he takes a free passage in the cars—he seats himself in the stage-coach, or goes along the turnpike on foot. He is in every great city—every rural district—every where.

"There is one way to avoid being bored by this troublesome fellow. It is the only way for a country, a city, or town, as well as individual men, to keep out of his presence always. Let the country that would banish him beware of extravagance, of speculation, of over-trading, of embarking in visionary schemes of aggrandizement. Let the city that would exclude him be economical in its expenditures, going right along, taking care of its own interests, and husbanding its own resources. Let the individual man who would exclude him from his domestic circle be industrious, frugal, keeping out of the whirlpool of politics—laying by something when the sun shines to make up for the dark days, for 'Some days must be dark and dreary; working on always in the cheerful hope of 'a good time coming.'"

WE have heard of a child "taking after his father," but not exactly in the way recorded by a contemporary journal:

"We once knew an eccentric old man in the 'Nutmeg State,' in its northern part, who went by the familiar title of 'Uncle Aaron.' The old man had raised a large family of boys, the youngest of whom—a wild, roystering blade—was named after himself. In speaking of his family, the old man said, with a very long face:

"Among all my boys, I never had but one who took after his father, and that was my Aaron; he took after me—with a club."

PERHAPS few readers of the "Drawer" have ever encountered the Written Language of the Indians. Those who have not, will regard the subjoined as somewhat of a literary curiosity. The extract contains two verses from a chapter in the New Testament, copied from the "Mohawk Testament." Any thing more "jaw breaking" than some of the longest words it has never been our good fortune to meet:

"Nonwa ne o-nenh ne rajihhengstowanen neoni ne ratssteristha ne Ononghsadokenghdikey neoni ne thadiysadake-niyu ne radjihhengstajyh ro-nathonde jineken nikarihodense, waghshakodinowenghde hanaondawe ne ken-iken ne sodegharon.

"Ethone shayadat eghwarawe neoni waghshakoghrory, wahhenron, Jatsagthoh, ne ronnonkweh ne ne yetahinodonghkwe eghyehhadikenn-yade Ononghsadokenghdikey, ony shakodirihhonyenny ne Onkwehhokon."

THE following advice deserves to be printed in letters of gold, and treasured up, if not printed and hung up:

"That you have had just subjects of indignation and anger often, I do not doubt. Who can live in the world without some trials of his patience? But believe me, the army with which the ill dispositions of the world are to be combated, and the qualities by which it is to be reconciled to us, are moderation and gentleness, a little indulgence to others, and a great deal of distrust of ourselves; which are not qualities of a mean spirit, as some may possibly think them, but virtues, of a great and noble kind, and such as dignify our nature as much as they contribute to our repose and fortune; for nothing can be so unworthy of a well-composed soul, as to pass away life in bickerings and litigations, in snarling and scuffling with every one about us. We must be at peace with our species; if not for their sakes, yet very much for our own."

"THE following (writes 'G. C. B.,' of New Orleans) is an actual occurrence, and that only a few days since:

"I had directed my man, a rather 'clever' Irishman, to bore a large hole in the side of my cistern, near the top, and had given him a 'brace and bit' with which to do it. After a short time he came to ask me for a gimlet, which I gave him; and being somewhat curious to know what he wanted of it, I soon followed him to the yard.

"He was at the top of the ladder, boring into the cistern a small hole alongside of the partly-bored large one.

"What are you doing?" I asked.

"Why, you see, Sir, if I bore the big hole through, the wather 'll come all over me, intirely, because the cistern's full; so you see I'm after boring the little hole, to draw off the wather, and thin afterward I'll plug it up!"

"But," said I, 'why don't you open the faucet, and let off the water?'

"Why," said he, 'it's from the top I want the wather, Sir!'

"I had always supposed, until then, that the story, in the old Greek school-book, of the wine that was wanting from the top, and not the bottom, of the foolish fellow's cask was an invention; but Paddy taught me more respect for that friend of my early days."

SOME idea of what a Western citizen can "turn his hand to," in the way of business, may be gathered from the following extract from a work by Mr. SOLOMON SMITH, a retired actor, and now a distinguished lawyer in St. Louis, where he has resided for some twenty years:

"The citizen of whom we rented the log building for a theatre, which we temporarily converted into a temple of Thespis, was named CLOUD: 'Caleb Quotem' would have been a more appropriate appellation, for his occupations were as various as those of the individual so named, if not 'more so.'

"He was town-clerk, constable, clerk of the market, auctioneer, nuisance-master, painter (sign and ornamental), carpenter, joiner, negro-whipper, tyler of a masonic lodge, sexton, hair-cutter, shaver (both of bank notes and chins), grocer, white-washer, proprietor of the theatre, guager of spirituous liquors, baker, and—deputy-sheriff!"

A near neighbor was not much behind him in the number and variety of his "callings."

"He was a dealer in dry goods and groceries, saddle-and-harness maker (all at different stores), tanner and currier, trunk-manufacturer, tinner, butcher, carpenter, justice of the peace, member of the town council, and—had a monkey to show!”

HERE is a little picture of the “Home Grandmother,” which we find in the “Drawer,” with the printed credit of “Exchange Paper” (slightly vague that!), which would have made a good subject for the pencil of Wilkie the Burns of the Scottish pencil:

“She sits by the fire—dear old lady!—with nicely crimped and plaited cap-border, and the old-fashioned spectacles; as pleasant a picture of the Home Grandmother as any living heart could wish to see. She is the oracle of the family; the record of births, deaths, and marriages; the narrator of old revolutionary stories, that keep bright young eyes big and wide awake till the evening log falls to ashes. What should we do without the Home Grandmother? How many little faults she hides! What a delightful ‘special pleader’ she is, when the switch trembles over the little erring favorite’s head!

“‘No!’ was the prompt and half-indignant answer; ‘no! I’ve got a grandmother!’

“Love that good woman. Sit at her feet, and learn of her patient lessons from the past. Although she knows no grammar—perhaps can not tell the boundaries of distant states, or the history of nations—she has that, perhaps, which excels all learned lore. She has life’s wisdom. She has fought life’s battle, and has conquered. She has laid her treasures away, and grown purer, stronger, through tears, and sorrow, and suffering!

“Never let her feel the sting of ingratitude. Sit at her feet. She will teach you all the dangers of life’s journey, and tell you how to go cheerfully and smilingly to the gate of death, trusting, like her, in a blissful hereafter.”

Every reader of the “Drawer,” who is so fortunate as to count among his children’s “household gods” a good grandmother, will see, in this graphic little sketch a reflection of an influence which is only second to that of the mother of his offspring.

In that diversified book of Southey’s, “The Doctor,” he describes the tranquil pleasures of a be-reaved husband. They were to keep every thing in the same state as when the wife was living. Nothing was to be neglected that she used to do, or that she would have done. The flowers were tended as carefully as if she were still to enjoy their fragrance and their beauty; and the birds who came in winter for crumbs were fed as duly for her sake as they formerly were by her hands. This calm communion of the present with the absent becomes religion, hope, fidelity; enduring tenderness, beyond the stern rigidity of time. And well may each one of that retrospective brotherhood, large always in the world, who have loved and lost the lovely and the good, and have, with theirs, to meet the world’s encounters, thus greet adoptedly the dear departed:

“The love where Death has set his seal,

Nor age can chill, nor rival steal,

Nor falsehood disavow;

And, what were worse, thou canst not see

The wrongs that fall on thine or me.”

“For me,” says the eloquent Sir Thomas Browne, “I count this world, not as an inn, but an hospital; where our fathers find their graves in our short memories, and sadly tell us how we may be buried in our survivors.” How comfortable a thing it is, then, to remember the dead, knowing that it is but for a season, and then union will come! Thus, with him who mourns the absence of a beloved consort or sister,

“The memory of her shall sweetly creep
Into his study of imagination;
And every lovely organ of her life
Shall come appareled in more precious habit;
More moving delicate, and full of life,
Than when she lived indeed.”

A VERY laughable instance of a Lunatic’s Cunning is given in a late English provincial paper. A parish officer, with the proper order, was taking him to the Asylum at Lancaster, but they passed one night on the way at an inn. Very early in the morning the lunatic got up and searched the pockets of the officer, where he found the magistrate’s order for his own detention, which, of course, let him completely into the secret.

“With that cunning which madmen not unfrequently display, he made the best of his way to the asylum, saw one of the keepers, and told him that he had got a mad fellow down at Lancaster, whom he would bring up in the course of the day, adding: ‘He is a queer fellow, and has got very odd ways. For instance, I shouldn’t wonder if he was to say I was the madman, and that he was bringing me! But you must take good care of him, and don’t believe a word he says.’

“The keeper promised compliance, and the lunatic walked back to the inn, where he found the officer still fast asleep. He awoke him, and they sat down to breakfast together.

“‘You are a lazy fellow, to be sleeping all day; I have had a long walk this morning,’ said the lunatic.

“‘Indeed!’ said the officer; ‘I should like to take a walk myself, after breakfast; perhaps you will go with me?’

“The lunatic assented; and after breakfast they set out, the officer leading the way toward the asylum, intending to deliver his charge; but it never occurred to him to see whether his order was safe.

“When they got within sight of the asylum, the lunatic exclaimed:

“‘What a fine house that is!’

“‘Yes,’ said the officer; ‘I should like to see the inside of it.’

“‘So should I!’ replied the lunatic.

“‘Well, I daresay they will let us go through it: I will ask,’ was the response.

“They went to the door; the officer rang the bell, and the keeper whom the lunatic had previously seen made his appearance, with two or three assistants. The officer then began to fumble in his pockets for the order, when the lunatic produced it, and gave it to the keeper, saying:

“‘This is the man I spoke to you about. You will take care of him; shave his head, and put a strait-waistcoat on him!’

“The men immediately laid hands on the poor officer, who vociferated loudly that the other was the madman, and he the officer; but as this only confirmed the story previously told by the lunatic, it did not at all tend to procure his liberation. He was taken away, and became so indignantly furious that the strait-waistcoat was speedily put upon him, and his head was shaved secundem artem.

“Meanwhile the lunatic walked deliberately back to the inn, paid the reckoning, and set out on his journey homeward. The good people in the country were of course surprised on seeing the wrong man return. They were afraid that the lunatic, in a fit of frenzy, had murdered the officer; and they asked him, with much trepidation, what he had done with Mr. Stevenson, which was the officer's name.

"Done with him!" said the lunatic, 'why, I left him at the asylum, as mad as a March hare!'" "And this was not far from the truth; for the wits of the officer were well-nigh upset, by his unexpected detention and subsequent treatment.

"Further inquiry was forthwith made by his neighbors, and it was ascertained that the man was actually in the asylum. A magistrate's order was produced for his liberation, and he returned home with a handkerchief tied round his head, instead of the covering which nature had bestowed upon it. The unfortunate officer has been the standing joke of the neighborhood ever since."

AMIDST the many sad things that one must see and feel as he journeys through what good old John Bunyan calls this "wilderness world," it is good, now and then, to laugh. "Laughter," says poor Hood—(and who had more cause, at times, to be sad than he?)—"is a divine faculty. It is one of the few, nay, the only redeeming grace in that thundering old profligate, Jupiter, that he 'sometimes laughs.' He is saved from the condemnation of all respectable people by the amenity of an occasional broad grin."

"I love a hearty laugh," says a pleasant American magazinist. "I love to hear a hearty laugh, above all other sounds. It is the music of the heart; the thrills of those chords which vibrate from no bad touch; the language Heaven has given us to carry on the exchange of sincere and disinterested sympathies." Herein we differ from the brutes. Animals don't laugh.

We don't know when we have met with a more amusing series of Little Annoyances (which are oftentimes more vexatious, and almost harder to bear than greater troubles), than in the following sketch:

"I went into my barber's this morning with my temper soured by letters from the attorneys of five different bankrupt creditors at the Southwest—postage unpaid, of course—oh, yes; bankrupts don't pay postage on letters to their dupes—oh, no! I was vexed, too, at a painter who had been paid in advance to paint me a new sign; but he must go a-sailing in the Bay on Sunday and get drowned—just as like as not on my money; any how, he died, and made no sign.

"I was in an awful hurry, for I had to raise money to take up a note, and was 'short' full one-half. There was a young sprig in the barber's chair, who had passed me, and got into the shop about half a yard before me, by acting as if he wanted to speak to a man who was ahead of me—a contemptible trick!

"Well, Sir, there he sat, feeling of his chin after every round of the razor, and 'asking for more,' till his sparse beard was close-reaped into the middle of the next week; reading the whole time the only paper that I ever do read, which he continued to do all the while the man was curling his hair and whiskers, evidently just to spite me! It was an hour before I got away from the barber's; and then the friend who would have loaned me five hundred dollars in my strait, had taken the morning cars for Newark.

"After attending to some necessary business at the store, I sallied out for a 'shin'-dy in Wall Street, for the times were very hard. It was not far from three o'clock, and the day was of the 'nastiest' August kind—hot as melted lead—muggy and sticky. Every body was 'short to-day,' although each one 'could have done it yesterday, if I had called,' which struck me as very curious. I had on a pair of new boots, which my boot-maker, for the first time in fifteen years, had made too small. How they did bite at the heels, blistered as they were from slipping up and down in them! My neck-stock was constantly twitching around 'hind-side before,' and I couldn't keep my shirt down behind. It kept crawling up, and finally rolled into an inaccessible lump, saturated with perspiration, and rested in the small of my back. This annoyed me almost as much as a flea—the first I had felt this summer—that was nipping me at his leisure, in a secure position which he had taken up between my shoulders.

"At this interesting juncture I was seized by the button by perhaps the most perfect specimen of a bore to be found in the city, large as it is, and plenty as they are; not one of your big pod-auger sort, but a fellow that twists a gimlet into you with his right hand, while he detains you by the button with his left, taking it out now and then, when he thinks it is going rather hard, and forthwith inserting it in another place. He was telling me, in a loud voice, of a shabby trick that had lately been served him by a man who had just passed us, and what he had that morning said to him:

"'Sir!' (said I) 'you are a liar and a scoundrel!'"

"I could see, as passers-by turned round to look at us, that they thought he was addressing this complimentary remark to me! I don't wonder, either, that they should have thought so, for my face must have been a good deal inflamed with impatient endurance.

"Well, when I could stand it no longer, I broke away, to drop in upon the only friend whom I thought could and would 'help me out,' and—what do you think?—he had just 'lent every dollar he had to Mr. — (the very man whom my button-holder had been serving up to me in parcels),—his 'particular friend!'"

"As I came out of his office, the clock struck three! I went home, more annoyed, more vexed, than I remember ever to have been before in my life.

"I was now wrought up to the highest pitch. I went straight to my bedroom, and after a long search, I found the little black rascal that had covered my back and shoulders with thick oblong welts of blotches; and was glancing at the demoniacal revenge depicted in my countenance when I passed by the looking-glass, rolling my prisoner as 'a sweet morsel' of revenge between my thumb and finger, when the door-bell rang, and the girl came to say that 'a gentleman wanted to see me.'

"I stepped below, with something of exultation in my manner, and in the hall found the bank notary. He handed me a protest and walked out, and when he had gone, I said to him: 'You and your bank may go to thunder! I'd rather have the pleasure of torturing this little torment to death, than to have my paid note in my pocket!'"

"After manipulating my victim with due economy of enjoyment, I thought I'd see how he bore it. Now, would you believe it? it wasn't the flea after all! It was only a little bit of black lint that had worn off from the lower side of my stock!"

This, to the complainant, was "the last hair that broke the camel's back!"

THE subjoined beautiful domestic picture is from the pen of Mr. William Gilmore Simms, the distinguished Southern poet and novelist:

"My little girl sleeps on my arm all night,
And seldom stirs, save when with playful wile
I bid her rise and press her lips to mine,
Which in her sleep she does. And sometimes then,
Half muttered in her slumbers, she affirms
Her love for me is boundless. And I take
The little bud and close her in my arms;
Assure her by my action—for my lips
Yield me no utterance then—that in my heart
She is the treasured jewel. Tenderly,
Hour after hour, without desire of sleep,
I watch above that large amount of hope,
Until the stars wane, and the yellow moon
Walks forth into the night."

A NEGRO preacher recently, in Virginia, referring, in a desultory and characteristic discourse, to the day of judgment, said, with great earnestness and fervor:

"Bredren and sistern!—in dat day de LORD shall divide de sheep from de goats; and bress de LORD, he knows which wears de wool!"

It is seldom that one sees a more forcible instance of the "Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties," than is recorded in the following sketch of a verdant Connecticut youth's first voyage in a steamboat:

"His curiosity was unbounded. He examined here, and he scrutinized there; he wormed from the engineer a compulsory lecture on the steam-engine, and mechanics in general; and from the fireman an essay on the power of 'white heat,' and the average consumption of pine cord-wood, etc.

"At length his 'inquiring mind' was checked in its investigations. He had mounted to the wheel-house, and was asking the pilot,

"What you doin' that for, Mister?—what good does it do?"

"He was here observed by the captain, who said, in a gruff voice:

"Go away from there! Don't you see the sign—'No talking to the man at the hellum?' Go 'way!"

"Oh, certing—ye-es; but I ondly wanted to know—"

"Well, you do know now that you can't talk to him—so just go away!"

"With unwitting willingness the verdant youth came down; and as it was soon dark, he presently went below; but four or five times before he 'turned in,' he was on deck and near the wheel-house, eying it with a thoughtful curiosity; but, with the captain's rebuff still in his ears, venturing to ask no question.

"In the first gray of the morning he was up and out on deck; and after some hesitation, perceiving nobody near save the pilot, who was turning the wheel as when he had last seen him, he asked his suppressed question in an oblique style, somewhat characteristic of his region:

"Wal—goin' it yet, ha? Been at it all night, ha? A-screwin' on her up, ha?"

What vague ideas of "screwin' up" a boat to make her "go ahead," must have bothered the poor fellow's brain during the night!

DEACON JOHNSON was very much given to finding fault with his minister. The Deacon said it was a very easy thing to preach a sermon, and he should like very well to show the people how well he could perform that service, though he had no book learning, and had never preached in his life. One Sunday morning the minister was taken suddenly ill, and sending for Mr. Johnson, requested him, as a special favor, to conduct the public services of the day. Delighted that the time had at last arrived for him to exercise his gifts, he hastened home to make what little preparation he could for the grand display. He was at the church, and in the desk, when the cold chills began to come over him; it was too late, however, to retreat. He rose to give out a hymn, and commenced by saying, "Our pastor is detained by sickness, let us sing to his praise the nineteenth Psalm." The evident amusement of the people increased his agitation, and he finished reading the Psalm, saying, "Please to sing five verses, omitting the last line of each verse!" At length he came to the sermon: he announced his text; he read it once; he read it again; but the more he sought for something to say, the less could he find. He looked down at the people, and the people looked up at him. Matters were growing desperate; something must be done. Mortified and humbled by the result of his experiment, he at length cried out, "Brethren, if any of you think it is an easy thing to preach, all I have to say is, just come up here and try."

The "meeting" was soon dismissed, and the minister had no warmer friend and greater admirer, after that time, than Deacon Johnson.

But greater men than this rustic deacon have been the victims of embarrassment, and their first essays at eloquence suddenly blasted at the very moment of their promised development. Many a verdant Congressman, fresh from his constituents, has found the floor of the national bear-garden quite a different theatre for the display of his abilities from the tavern or the store up-country, where he has been wont to hold forth to his admiring friends. Mr. Collier, who became one of the leaders in the Lower House, was taken all aback when he was first on his legs in that hall. He rose and said, "Mr. Speaker."

"The gentleman from New York," said the Speaker.

It began to grow dark in front of the rising member, but he managed to exclaim again, "Mr. Speaker."

"The gentleman from New York," said the Speaker.

By this time attention was arrested, and the sudden silence was even more confounding than the uproar in which he had risen. Once more he cried out, and now on the verge of despair, "Mr. Speaker."

"The gentleman from New York," said the Speaker, with the faintest smile of compassion on his face.

But no words came to bear the thoughts of the embarrassed member, and turning to a friend sitting next to him, he burst forth,

"I say, Ellsworth, do you know where I can charter a knot-hole for a fortnight?"

That was his maiden speech. His next was a decided hit, and he speedily rose to the front rank of speakers in the House.

HERE is a song that is vastly popular in Old England. The ideas in verses seventh and eighth are also in the "Persones Tale" of Chaucer, and in the Commentary on the Holy Bible by Matthew Henry. The sentiment is as good as the melody:

"YE SEXES GIVE EAR TO MY FANCY.

Ye sexes give ear to my fancy;
In the praise of good women I sing:
It is not of Doll, Kate, nor Nancy,
The mate of a clown, nor a king.

"Old Adam, when he was created,
Was lord of the universe round;
But his happiness was not completed,
Until that a help-mate was found.

"He had all things for food that was wanting,
Which give us content in this life;
He had horses and foxes for hunting,
Which many love more than a wife.

"He'd a garden so planted by Nature,
As man can't produce in this life;
But yet the all-wise, great Creator
Saw still that he wanted a wife.

"Old Adam was laid in a slumber,
And there he lost part of his side:
And when he awoke, in great wonder,
He beheld his most beautiful bride.

"With transport he gazed all on her:
His happiness then was complete,
And he blessed the bountiful Donor,
Who on him bestowed a mate.

"She was not took out of his head,
To reign or triumph o'er man;
She was not took out of his feet,
By man to be trampled upon.

"But she was took out of his side,
His equal and partner to be:
Though they are united in one,
Still the man is the top of the tree.

"Then let not the fair be despised
By man, as she's part of himself;
For a woman by Adam was prized
More than the whole world with its self.

"Then man without woman's a beggar,
Though of the whole world he's possess'd;
And a beggar that has a good woman,
With more than the world he is bless'd."

A CORRESPONDENT writes to us that the case of sharp practice related in the February number is not sharper than one recorded as long ago as 1781, in the London Chronicle:

"An attorney in Dublin, having dined by invitation with his client several days, pending a suit, charged 6s. 8d. for each attendance, which was allowed by the Master on taxing costs. In return for this, the client furnished the master-attorney with a bill for his eating and drinking; which the attorney refusing to pay, the client brought his action and recovered the amount of his charge. But he did not long exult in his victory; for, in a few days after, the attorney lodged an information against him before Commissioners of Excise, for retailing wine without a license; and not being able to controvert the fact, to avoid an increase of costs he submitted, by advice of counsel, to pay the penalty, a great part of which went to the attorney as informer."

THE importance of one vote is illustrated in every closely-contested election, but the value of one letter every man is made to feel who writes for the press. From the discovery of the art of printing down to this present, when there is so much of it that one sometimes wishes the good old times were back again when there were no books, the blunders of the types have been the most provoking experiences to the author, and perplexing or amusing to the reader. No book in the world has been so often printed, none has suffered so much in printing, as the Bible. "The vinegar Bible" is so called from the misprint of the title to the twentieth chapter of Luke; "the Parable of the Vineyard" was printed "the Parable of the Vinegar." It was printed in 1717, in England. The Stationer's Company, having a monopoly of the Bible printing business, were mulcted in a ruinous fine for issuing an edition in which the not was left out of the seventh commandment!

But even worse than that, was the fate of a poor woman. She was the wife of a printer, and had knowledge of the business enough, and mischief too, to enter his office after the types were all ready to print an edition of the Bible, and taking out the word Lord from Genesis iii. 16, and putting in its place the word fool, she destroyed the sentence of subjection to her husband pronounced upon Eve, so that instead of reading "he shall be thy lord," the passage appeared "he shall be thy fool." The poor woman actually paid for her folly by the forfeit of her life. But some copies of that edition have been bought by collectors at a very high price.

One of our own Bible societies committed the most amusing of all Scriptural blunders in printing an edition in which the 27th verse of Galatians fourth is murdered. The Apostle says, "For the desolate hath many more children than she which hath an husband;" which the printers made to read, "than she which hath an hundred." Some copies of that edition are abroad, but great pains were taken to get them all in.

We sympathize with the author who received the last sheet of his elegantly printed book, and was shocked to find that where he had written Pope Gregory, the types had made him say Tom Gregory! But it was not too late. He was just in time to correct it, and carefully putting the Pope in the margin, that the printers might be sure to get it right, he thought no more of it till the bound volume was in hand, with the error rectified from Tom Gregory into Pope Tom Gregory.

THAT truth is always better than falsehood has an illustration in the counsel given by Sir Henry Wotton, to a friend who asked his advice on going abroad as an ambassador. Sir Henry said, "To be in safety yourself and serviceable to your country, ever speak the truth; for you shall never be believed, and your adversaries will always be on the wrong track."

THE well-known lines on "tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee" are quoted in the Encyclopædia Britannica, and are said to have been written by Swift. They were suggested by a feud among the friends of two rival musicians, and in their connection read:

"Some say, that Signior Bononcini
Compared to Handel's a mere niny;
Others aver, that to him Handel
Is scarcely fit to hold a candle:
Strange! all this difference should be,
"Twixt Tweedle-dum and Tweedle-dee!"

The World a Work-shop; or the Physical Relationship of Man to the Earth, by THOMAS EWBANK. (Published by Appleton and Co.) In proposing an exclusive theory of man's destiny, the author of this volume has met with no better success than the troops of metaphysicians who have attempted to solve an infinite problem by finite means, and have "found no end, in wandering mazes lost." Mr. Ewbank's method, however, is precisely the reverse of theirs. Instead of speculating on the spiritual capacities and functions of human nature—striving to penetrate the depths of the "inner consciousness"—and reasoning from the endowments and aspirations of the soul to the character of its destiny, he plants himself in the bosom of the material universe, considers its wonderful adaptation to the bones and muscles of the human frame, and thence derives his conclusions as to the purpose of the Almighty in the creation of man. As the result of his inquiries, he announces that physical industry is the true destiny of the race. The living swarms that people the earth are all workers in matter. Our planet is arranged with express reference to this purpose. The earth was intended for a manufactory, and its inhabitants for manufacturers. This is shown, according to the author, by the materials of the earth being made amenable to human power. Its interior fires and forces, which have usually been regarded with such superstitious dread, supply him with minerals essential to his use. The same design is indicated by the alternation of strata in the structure of the earth. In fact, the whole constitution of the universe is to the writer but one grand argument in support of his theory. It exhibits nothing to encourage the absorption of life in spiritual thought. The mind is to exercise its activity, not on itself, but on material objects. It is not the mission of man to become a spectral recluse, dozing away his life over legends and relics—limiting his views of the world, like an oyster, to his cell—leaving the earth to grow up a jungle, and his thews and sinews to wither for want of employment. He is to be no dreamer within doors, but an active and vigorous worker without, devoting the energies of his nature to the manipulation of matter. Such is a brief outline of Mr. Ewbank's view of the destiny of man. It shows the enthusiasm of the mechanician, wishing to absorb the comprehensive endowments of the human microcosm in his own limited sphere. But it is not to be concealed, that man is born for contemplation and emotion no less than for action. This our author fails to perceive. Regarding the capacities of the race merely on the practical side, he ignores the infinite realms of poetry, religion, science, ideal beauty, and goodness, for which man is no less adapted by the organization of his nature, than he is to subdue and cultivate the earth. This is the radical defect of Mr. Ewbank's book; and, on this account, it will produce a less favorable impression on intelligent readers than if it had been less exclusive in its pretensions. Considered merely as a panegyric on mechanical industry, it may be perused with no small profit and pleasure. It abounds in ingenious and striking views, illustrative of the adaptation of the universe to human powers, and of the vast resources in the bosom of nature for the employment and reward of her favorite offspring. As a tribute to the dignity of labor, it is surpassed by few, if any, recent works, and can scarcely be read without fresh admiration of the beneficence of the Creator in the constitution of the world.

A new story by the highly-gifted authoress of "Mary Barton," entitled North and South, is reprinted by Harper and Brothers. It is equally remarkable with that admirable fiction for its keen penetration of character and motives, its fine touches of humanity, its comprehensive and genial sympathies, and the combined terseness and grace of its style. The incidents are drawn from the common social life of England, and are described with such exquisite naturalness as to produce an ineffaceable impression of reality. A great diversity of character is introduced in the progress of the story, forming effective contrasts in the picture, and sustaining an intensity of interest until the final crisis. Such a succession of vivid home-like scenes as form the substance of this volume, is rarely enjoyed in works of fiction, and they derive an additional charm from the unaffected and expressive diction in which the narrative is clothed. English literature can boast of no living female prose writer who commands a style of such blended sweetness and strength as the author of "Mary Barton."

A Journey through Kansas, with Sketches of Nebraska, by C. B. BORTON and T. B. MASON. (Published by Moore and Co., Cincinnati.) A graphic record is here given of a tour made in the autumn of 1854, with a view to exploring the resources of the vast territories beyond the Missouri. The region visited by the travelers has been but imperfectly described, and their volume accordingly contains a mass of details which had not before been spread before the public. Many amusing incidents are related of prairie life, showing the enterprise and zeal of the pioneers, and the whimsical methods to which they are often obliged to resort for the support of their daily existence. The description of Indian manners and habits with which the volume abounds are not only fresh and lively, but are valuable as the testimony of credible eyewitnesses to aboriginal character. The authors write with admiration of the capabilities of the new territories, and with wise hopefulness in regard to their future development.

Poems by WILLIAM WINTER. (Published by George W. Briggs and Co.) This volume is the first venture of a juvenile poet, and therefore may claim protection from rough critical handling. It indicates a maturity of thought beyond the years of the writer, and in many passages a considerable mastery of poetical language and imagery. The faults of inexperience are sufficiently frequent to betray the origin of the poems, but not so glaring as to forbid the promise of future excellence.

Literary Fables of Yriarte, translated from the Spanish by GEORGE H. DEVEREAUX. (Published by Ticknor and Fields.) Yriarte is indebted for his position in Spanish literature almost exclusively to his fables. His dramatic productions, though popular in their day, present no features of permanent interest. The fables, however, which are here translated by an accomplished amateur scholar of Massachusetts, have the merit of originality, terseness of expression, and admirable moral purpose. They aim at the correction of the faults and follies of men of learning—a novel application of the fable—and a design, certainly, of which the execution can not be regarded as a sine-cure. The translator has performed his task with a degree of success that could scarcely have been anticipated, considering its intrinsic difficulties. He has followed, to a great extent, the peculiar measures of the original, which presents an endless variety of style and construction, reproducing them in nervous, elegant, and expressive English. His volume is well entitled to a place at the side of the favorite inventions of Æsop and Lafontaine.

An original novel, entitled Inez: a Tale of the Alamo, is published by Harper and Brothers, embodying the incidents of a romantic life in Texas, and illustrating the influence of the Catholic priesthood on the social and domestic relations. It is a story of deep passion, and written in a style of uncommon vividness and beauty, though not without an occasional careless expression. Harper and Brothers have issued an edition of Arvillon and other Tales, by the popular author of "Olive," "The Head of the Family," and other admirable works of fiction. The principal story in this volume is a weird, imaginative creation of singular power, which Poe might have written in his most lucid intervals, showing equal intensity of conception and mastery of language. The remainder of the volume consists of a great variety of attractive tales, forming the most fascinating miscellaneous collection of fictitious composition that has been given to the public for a long time.

Ups and Downs; or Silver Lake Sketches, by COUSIN CICELY. (Published by J. C. Derby.) The anonymous writer of these stories has acquired an enviable reputation by her previous publications of a similar class. They are remarkable for the ease and truthfulness of their descriptions, their acute discrimination of character, and their high moral aims. The grace and animation of the diction is in admirable keeping with the pure and noble sentiments which the volume inculcates.

Sermons, chiefly Practical, by THE SENIOR MINISTER of the West Church in Boston. (Ticknor and Fields.) In these discourses we have an example of how much may be effected in the department of pulpit instruction by simple earnestness of conviction, devout energy of feeling, and affectionate tenderness of appeal, without the aid of artificial rhetoric, profound reasoning, or brilliant illustration. They are the sincere expression of a pure and pious mind. They bring us into the presence of a good man rather than of an accomplished orator. Filled with persuasive exhortations to duty, they exhibit no trace of the formality of the schools, but echo with the natural eloquence which flows from glowing sympathies and a high religious purpose. Free from dogmatical subtleties, they breathe the spirit of Christian devotion, with no admixture of sectarian zeal. Although the name of the author is only officially designated on the title-page, few readers will need to be informed that he is the Rev. Dr. Charles Lowell, the venerated father of the distinguished American poet.

Chemical Atlas, by EDWARD L. YOUNG (published by Appleton and Co.), is an ingenious and convenient apparatus for presenting the first principles of chemistry to ocular inspection. The author was led to its construction by noticing the defects of the abstract method by which the science is usually taught in books. Laboring under partial blindness, while pursuing his own studies, he became deeply impressed with the importance of visual demonstration, in obtaining a knowledge of physical phenomena. He has, accordingly, invented a system of colored diagrams, representing the properties and relations of chemical agents, by which, once understood, they are almost indelibly imprinted on the memory. These diagrams are accompanied by lucid explanatory remarks, clothed in a style of simple elegance, and every way adapted to furnish the student with clear and accurate information. We do not hesitate to say that no method has come under our notice by which the beginner in chemistry can be so effectually and so agreeably initiated into the rudiments of the science as by the process made use of in this volume.

A new volume of Harper's Story Books, by JACOB ABBOTT, entitled Willie, describes the history of a young country lad, whose sterling honesty, kindness, and common sense made him the means of rescuing his parents from ruin, to the verge of which they had been brought by the intemperance and consequent thriftlessness of the father. Willie, the little hero of the story, is thrown upon his own resources at an early age; he always has his wits about him; does the right thing at the right time; shows a discretion uncommon at his years, though he does not cease to be a boy; and at length becomes the sole reliance of the family when destruction stares them in the face. The tale is one of great interest throughout, both to old and young, graphically describing familiar scenes of village life, and presenting an impressive and not over-charged picture of the disastrous influence of "liquor-stores" on a rural population.

Lilies and Violets, by ROSALIE BELL (published by J. C. Derby), is a collection of thoughts, in prose and verse, on the "true graces of maidenhood," compiled from a variety of eminent writers, with introductory notices by the editress. A judicious taste is shown in the selections—more so than in the original portions—which are written in a style of too gaudy splendor for everyday earthly uses. The work is brought out with the adornments of dainty typography, and, as a volume of "elegant extracts," may be recommended to those who have a passion for choice-culled bouquets of literature.

Manual of Sacred History, by JOHN HENRY KURTZ, translated from the German by CHARLES F. SCHAEFFER. (Published by Lindsay and Blakiston.) The author of this volume is an eminent theologian of the school of Tholuck, a native of Germany, and now a professor in a Russian university in Livonia. It aims to unfold the essential idea of the relations between God and man, in connection with the incidents recorded in the Biblical narratives. Following the chronological order of the Old and New Testaments, it presents an instructive comment on the facts of sacred history. Profound in thought, vigorous in style, and thoroughly Christian in spirit, the student of theology will find it a suggestive and valuable guide, although he can not be expected in every case to accord with its conclusions. The translation has evidently been made with conscientious accuracy, and has succeeded to a remarkable degree in reproducing the spirit of the original. We regard it as an important and seasonable aid to the understanding of the Holy Scriptures.

THACKERAY's "Newcomes" furnishes a text for some of the most genial and appreciative criticism of the day. The Edinburgh Review greets the good Colonel with unqualified cordiality. "We could almost fancy," says the reviewer, "that in the scorn of genius for that accusation that pronounced him unable to manage the ideal, Mr. Thackeray has showered a glory of manliness upon the inhabitants of this lower world. There has never been a nobler sketch than that of the Colonel. The innocent heart and simple honor of this old man, and his horror of all falsehood and impurity, are enough to cover a multitude of Mr. Thackeray's sins. We can understand how every individual in the story or out of it rejoices to gain the acquaintance of Thomas Newcome. The keynote of the story is struck high and sweet in his character, which is at once so lofty and so child-like. We think the great mass of his readers will bear us out in our opinion, that the Newcomes is not only the most agreeable story but the cleverest book which Mr. Thackeray has yet contributed for the amusement and edification of the admiring public." The clever critic of the London Leader thus discourses of the work, in phrases as dainty as those of the author himself, which we commend to the consideration of those who perversely refuse to read the story as it appears, and persist in waiting for its completion so that they can swallow it whole: "Let us say a word about the Newcomes. The story lingers, and loses itself willingly in those by-paths of humor and sentiment which are worth all the beaten tracks of all the most exciting novels in the world. To enjoy Thackeray demands the palate of a dégustateur, not the gross appetite of a novel reader, ravenous for plot and incident. To drain a number of the Newcomes at a draught is to drink Lafitte or Clos-Vougeot in pewter, and to insult your host by swallowing what you are expected to sip, and pouring down your mouth what you should first taste with the breath of your nostrils. Thackeray's stories, we say, are to be sipped like the finest and rarest wine; and it is neither to his praise nor to his shame, but simply to his liking, to invite none but the epicures of life's various feast of joys and sorrows to his select table. Only those who have shed their illusions and passed through a premature cynicism into a larger and more complete philosophy of life—less bitter and more compassionate, less trustful and more sympathetic, saddened rather than sad, and smiling genially through unshed tears at human weakness and human vanity—only those can feel the subtle charm of a humorist like Thackeray."

The new volume of Miss STRICKLAND's Life of Mary, Queen of Scots, meets with the same cordial reception that has been accorded to the previous volumes. We hazard nothing in predicting that this work will set at rest the vexed question as to the character of the unfortunate Mary.—Two lively volumes by Mr. HUC, descriptive of China and the Chinese, form a welcome addition to our accumulating stores of information respecting the Flowery Land and its inhabitants.—Professor CREASY's History of the Ottoman Empire is opportune. It is not a little remarkable that our language has been destitute of even a respectable history of the rise and fall of the Turkish State. This is the more to be wondered at, because Von Hammer's able and elaborate work furnishes an abundant collection of material, drawn with true Teutonic labor from the abundant sources furnished by the Oriental writers. For the history of the Ottomans down to the treaty of Kainardji, in 1774, nothing was required beyond an artistic elaboration of these material. The subsequent history is so connected with that of Europe, that he who should undertake to write it need be at no loss for his authorities. Mr. Creasy's work loses nothing of its value from its large indebtedness to Von Hammer.

The war has given occasion to books upon Russia almost without number. For the most part they are mere party pamphlets, through which one may grope his way without gaining a particle of new information. The truth is, we know nothing, or next to nothing, about Russia or the Russians. No traveler who has visited the country has possessed the first requisite to understanding a people, an acquaintance with their language. Kohl has indeed furnished a brilliant picture of St. Petersburg; and Schnitzler gives a laborious detail of such portions of the statistics of the country as are accessible. Custine is more intent upon displaying his own epigrammatic talent than upon delineating the phases of Slavonic character. We know something of the Russian court, a little more of the worst side of the police, and a little less of the army; but of the modes of life and thought of the great masses of the population we are as ignorant as of the inhabitants of the moons of Jupiter. The Russians do not themselves describe them, and nobody else can. In such a dearth of Russian pictures of the Russians, let us make much of a very clever book by TOURGHENIEFF, entitled Zapiski Okhotnika, that is, "A Hunter's Journal." We know it only in the French version of M. Charrière. It would be too much to hope that we may have a translation directly from the original; but we would commend the French version to the attention of some of our translators who are casting about for a subject.

BARNUM's Autobiography furnishes a subject for some sharp paragraphs in the London Journals. The Literary Gazette is very mild in its strictures. It delicately hints that the "business adventures" of the renowned showman seem "repulsive to fastidious tastes and scrupulous consciences;" adding the comforting assurance that the "Prince of Humbugs" deserves the success which he has obtained, though many would scruple to use the means employed by him. We can hardly take for a compliment the astute discovery that the book gives an "insight into American life and character." The Critic, a journal of amazing pretensions and slight merits, moralizes in an edifying strain. It makes the sapient discovery that the great aim of Barnum was to make money; and that "truth was as nothing in his calculations;" but consoles itself by the belief that it will "do something toward preventing other men from following his example." This good has been accomplished by disclosing the secrets of the trade, and thus "rendering the business of the charlatan not so very easy to its future professors." The grave Examiner pours out good hearty indignation upon the devoted head of the luckless showman. "If one word would express our full contempt," it says, "for this disreputable book, one word would be sufficient notice of it. Its dullness, its concealed coarseness, and the disgusting way in which it puts cant about the Bible face to face with a glorying in shameless frauds upon the public, have astonished us." We shall await with some impatience the reception which will be given across the water to that other disgusting book of personal confessions by the companion of Fanny Ellsler, BELIEVING that we could not offer a report more acceptable, we designedly forestall the season somewhat, presenting to our readers a style of over garments which properly befits a period of the year a little later than the wild and stormy month of March. It is a style which awaits only the incoming of the milder portion of the spring to be received with the favor which its elegance de-manda. The TALMA, which we select for illustration, from many others almost equally worthy of presentation, may be fashioned of taffeta of any desirable shade. Every lady of taste will, of course, in selecting the color, have special reference to that which accords best with her complexion. The upper portion of the Talma, it will be observed, adjusts itself closely to the figure. From the shoulder to within a fourth of its depth to the elbow it is slashed and cross-laced, with a silk cord terminating in tassels. From about the level of the bend of the arm, a frill gathered into box-plaits of ample fullness sweeps gracefully around the figure, just covering the upper extremity of another frill similar in all respects, only that it is about one-third deeper than the one above it. These two frills are gracefully looped up at the inner bend of the arm. Besides the larger freedom thus allowed for the wrist, this adds greatly to the gracefulness of the outline of the garment. This Talma is ornamented with embroidery.

The styles of Dresses generally appear to have undergone no especial change. We are, indeed, gratified to observe the rapid emancipation from the tyrannous rule of Parisian fashions, from which formerly no appeal was permitted, so long as a lady now regards the prevailing mode with some degree of respect: the details, to a large extent, are entirely optional; and she is perfectly at liberty to display her taste and judgment in the selection of color, material, and the almost entire mode and adornment of her toilet. This freedom from constraint, however, entails with it the necessity of every lady exerting her taste, and not supinely receiving the dicta of the Dressmaker.

We remark, then, that flounces are as highly in favor as heretofore, and may be of any depth or number that the wearer may fancy. Sleeves are almost as varied in construction as there are various tastes in the makers. We notice one that is with many a favorite. It consists of two deep frills, one overlapping the top of the other. The first is set on about 4 inches from the apex of the shoulder; above which the sleeve is ornamented with a band similar to the trimming round the lower edge of the frill. This frill reaches to the elbow, just covering the top of another which is somewhat deeper, and is similarly trimmed. The under-sleeves are perhaps in better taste when closed at the wrist, for this season of the year, although flowing ones are as much the ton.

Basques are much in vogue; those that are made of black velvet are generally trimmed with guipure laces. We saw one fashioned of taffeta, the construction of which much pleased us, as it adjusted itself so well to the fullness of the skirts. The back seams were continued, from the waist in the basque, by a fold of the material, very similar to the style of a gentleman's coat-skirt—a button being placed at the head of the fold. This simple arrangement, by permitting the basque to expand with the fullness of the under-skirt, prevented the unpleasant rising up, or the too loose drooping of this portion of dress, which we too often have noticed in ill-adjusted basques—when the under-dress was not adapted to the fullness of the upper portion of apparel.

THE CHILD'S DRESS is made of maroon silk velvet. The sleeves cut in lozenge-shaped openings, which permit the delicately-wrought under-sleeves to appear through the interstices. At the juncture of the points which form these diamond-spaces are set highly-ornamented buttons. The breast is open, and arranged so that the needle-worked linen falls over the revers of the jacket. The belt and pantaloons are likewise of velvet, all embroidered to match.

We present the laces for this dress en suite upon a larger scale; they are of needle-wrought embroidered linen. The under-sleeves are arranged to permit the transverse embroidery to occupy the centre of each opening upon the sleeve.

ENTRANCE TO THE CEMETERY OF ST. PRISCILLA.

VISITS TO THE DEAD IN THE CATACOMBS OF ROME.

BY PROFESSOR G. W. GREENE,
FOR MANY YEARS UNITED STATES CONSUL AT ROME.

"La terre avait gémi sous le fer des tyrans ;
Elle cachait encore des martyrs expirans,
Qui dans les noirs détours des grottes reculées
Dérobaient aux bourreaux leurs têtes mutilées."

BERNIS—Poème de la Religion Vengée, ch. viii.

A VISIT to the Catacombs usually comes in as a part of the prescribed round of rights which fill up the traveler's ten days at Rome. You ride out to St. Sebastian: a Cistercian monk leads you through the church, from chapel to chapel, and altar to altar, points out the spot where the holy relics are kept, the head of St. Calixtus, an arm of St. Andrew, the oratory where the primitive popes gathered their little flocks around them to say mass over the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the very chair in which they used to sit, and where one of them, St. Stephen, received the crown of martyrdom. It is an old story for him; he has told it half a dozen times to-day before you came, and now goes through it again with the self-same words and genuflections, and in that monotonous showman's tone which would disgust you with the Vatican itself. Then lightning a taper, and giving you another for yourself, he leads you down a narrow staircase, through winding galleries, chilly and damp, which cross and interweave with each other in inextricable labyrinths, and after going a few turns, tells you that it is unsafe to go any further, and that many a rash explorer venturing merely a step or two out of the common track, has been led no one knew whither, and was never heard of again. You follow him back, picking your way by the dim light of your taper, asking yourself, as you look into the darkness of the forbidden galleries, if this is all; pay your fee at the head of the stairway; and drive home just in time for dinner and your torch-light excursion to the Vatican.

Next morning you talk the matter over at breakfast, and come to the conclusion that the interest of the catacombs is, after all, merely a question of the imagination.

And you are right. All of these things depend upon the imagination. The pleasure of living at Rome is in a great degree a pleasure of the imagination. The Coliseum is merely a vast pile of stones for nine-tenths of the travelers who work themselves up into raptures over its crumbling arches. I once went through the Vatican by torch-light with a very respectable gentleman from Wall Street, who entertained me all the way by a disquisition upon the probable cost of such a building in the United States. If you wish to enter into the spirit of such scenes, and enjoy them as they ought to be enjoyed, you must not be in a hurry. They belong to a part of our nature which is too far removed from the common questions of life to be merely the slave of the will. The power of bringing ourselves into communion with those who have lived before us, and for us, was given to us as a means of refining and purifying the soul, in order to strengthen ourselves for the sacrifices which we, in our turn, must make for those who are to come after us. There is something in it which elevates and expands; and the man who can thus enlarge his conception of his relations with the universe, has brought himself nearer to that Being for whom all events and all time are but a single perception, calling forth the same feelings of compassion and love.

I had been to the catacombs myself, just as every body else does on a first visit to Rome; carrying away with me no definite impression, and soon mingling them up in my memory with twenty other objects equally indistinct, because they had all been run over in equal haste. It is wonderful how soon sight-seeing may become a bore, particularly with a regular ciccone. I was glad when I was through with it, and could enjoy myself in my own way.

At last St. Peter's day came; the first that I had passed in Rome. The church was to be illuminated in the evening, and there were to be fire-works at the castle of St. Angelo. In the morning I went to see the procession, and hear the pope say mass in St. Peter's. It was in the last year of Leo XII., and the last time, if I remember right, that he ever appeared in public. Even then he looked so faint and feeble as he knelt before the host, that the contrast between his pallid features and the gorgeous pageantry around him, reminded you of the corpse of St. Charles Borromeo at Milan, glaring out livid and ghastly from under its robes of state. Still, it was a magnificent spectacle; friars, monks, priests, bishops, and cardinals, moving round that vast square in solemn procession, and slowly passing into the church amidst strains of thrilling music: it is only at Rome that such things are to be seen; and when you have once seen them there, every where else they look like childish imitations.

In the afternoon I strolled over to the Capitol. Near the foot of the hill, on the side toward the Forum, and nearly opposite to the remains of the Temple of Concord, there is a little church consecrated to St. Joseph and St. Peter. I had passed it a hundred times, but some how or other had never been in it before. But that afternoon there was a crowd about it, and a constant moving in and out, as if there were something more than usual to be seen. I joined the in-goers, and in a few moments found myself in the midst of a throng of men and women, chiefly peasants and people of the lower classes, who were kneeling before the altar. I was decidedly out of place, and was upon the point of stealing quietly out again, when I saw some of them rise, and crossing themselves, go down a stairway at the side. I followed them. A few steps brought us into a square chapel, with an altar richly decked and illuminated with immense wax tapers. Here, too, there were other worshippers praying, and some on the outside looking through a doorway that led directly into the Forum. I now remembered that there were two churches here, and that this was St. Peter's, built, as tradition said, directly over the prison where St. Peter and Paul had been confined just before their martyrdom.

I was now determined to see it all. Through the open door I could see the first shadows of evening sinking gently upon the Forum. The music from the chapel above came down upon me in mellow strains, mingling with the whispered prayer of the suppliants at the altar. There was devotion in the atmosphere. I had merely come out for a quiet evening walk, and now found myself yielding for the first time to the Christian associations of Rome.

Another flight of steps brought me to the first prison, a square room, built of large blocks of tufa, vaulted, cold, and grave-like, as a Roman prison should be. On one side were the remains of a doorway that led to the "Steps of Groans," where the bodies of criminals used to be thrown after execution. In the middle of the floor was an opening just large enough for a body to pass through it. Through this prisoners were lowered down to the executioner, who stood ready to seize and strangle them in the dungeon beneath. I shuddered as I looked down into the darkness. Modern piety has cut through the floor, and made a narrow stairway to the lower prison. It is but a few steps and you stand in the chamber of death; a low vaulted room, square, and of the same massive blocks of tufa with the prison above, but smaller, colder, and with darkness and the silence of the grave on its walls. It was built by Servius Tullius, and is often mentioned in the annals of Rome.

Here Jugurtha was thrown. The fiery monarch knew his victors too well to hope for mercy. "How cold are thy baths, Apollo!" he was heard to exclaim as the chill air of the dungeon struck upon his frame still glowing with the fiery sun of Africa, and he was left in darkness and alone to the slow torture of starvation.

Others followed, but who or why we know not, till one day the consul, Cicero himself, brought a band of criminals to the prison door. The executioner descended into the lower prison, all ready for his fatal office; and one by one Roman nobles, men of ancient descent and illustrious names, but whose dark minds had nourished horrid hopes of devastation and slaughter, were lowered through that narrow opening. Did they shrink from the deadly grasp, and writhe and struggle against their fate? or did they yield themselves calmly up, and die with Roman fortitude? It is hard to die in open day, with earth and heaven smiling around you, and life looking freshly upon you from hundreds of human eyes; but how easy must even that seem when compared with the silence and solitude of a death like this!

And after many years the gloomy door was opened for two other prisoners, who were lowered through this same narrow opening, not indeed to die, but to wait for death. When the jailer had performed his task, and turned to go away, he heard their voices mingling in tones unlike any that he had ever heard from that place till then. Threats and execrations he had been used to; but there was something in the tender and earnest fervor of these men which moved him strangely. At noon he returned with food, and was thanked for this simple performance of a daily duty. At evening the same voices were heard—first in the sweet notes of a hymn of praise, and then in the fervent outpourings of an imprisoned Christian's prayer. Through the night he could hear them still; the strain lingered in his ears, stealing into his soul with a calm and soothing freshness, and awakening thoughts and hopes that he had never known before.

At last he descended into the dungeon, for an irresistible impulse seemed to draw him toward these strange beings, who could speak and sing so cheerfully in a place that filled every other soul with horror. And when they saw him they made haste to meet him, greeting him with the Christian's salutation—"Peace be with you." The Lord has chosen you to be a witness with us of the marvels of his grace. Hasten, then, and bring your fellow keeper, that we may expound to you the doctrines of salvation." And when the two were seated together at the apostles' feet, they were told how Christ had come to redeem the world, and build up a kingdom more glorious than Rome or Babylon. And as they listened their eyes were opened, and they believed, and prayed that they might be baptized. Then Peter touched the floor with his right hand, and behold a fountain rose up from the rock, filling the dungeon with the light and music of its waters. And they knelt down and were baptized there; and when the day came in which their teachers were to die, they too acknowledged that they were Christians, and received, like them, the crown of martyrdom.

That fountain is still there, its waters welling forth as pure and limpid as if no taint of earth had ever mingled with their current. Their birth-place in the dark recesses of the hill is not darker than the spot in which they came out on their errand of mercy. The sun and moon have never shone upon them. They have never reflected the soft light of the stars, or felt the breath of the airs of heaven. Rising and flowing in mystery, they still keep their course unchanged, ever filling their fountain without overflowing it, and passing away again to depths as mysterious as those from whence they came.

As I turned to go away, the light of my taper fell upon an opening in the wall, which in any other place I should have taken for a window—but what had a window to do there? It was closed tight too, by a board, secured by a bolt, neither of which appeared, by the mould and rust that had gathered upon them, to have been touched for many years. It was evidently no part of the original prison. "Where does this lead?" I asked the priest who had accompanied me. "To the catacombs." "To the catacombs, from the very heart of the city!" "Yes; they are around and beneath you, every where; and no one knows where they begin or end."

I would have given any thing to have drawn back that bolt and looked down into the darkness. Who could tell what awful secrets lay hidden there; what forms had mingled with that damp and polluted soil; what groans and supplications had been poured forth unheeded in that rayless atmosphere; what unrecorded heroism had bowed there serenely to the fatal decree, and met death with the calm smile of submissive hope! I never walked the streets of Rome again without feeling that with every footfall I was awakening an echo in the caverns of death.

THE CEMETERY OF ST. PISCELLA.

Still many years passed before I returned to the catacombs. I could not forget the old Cistercian monk, with his taper and his monotonous sing-song. Whenever the wish to see them came over me, I would go back to the Mamertine prison, and look in imagination through that bolted window. At last a learned archæologist, of the order of Jesuits, was directed by government to make accurate researches in the catacombs of St. Agnes. He set himself to his task with all the patience of an antiquary, pushing his researches cautiously from passage to passage, and carefully studying every object that he met. The chapels were cleaned, the corridors freed from the dirt that had blocked them up, many of the tombs opened, the inscriptions deciphered and copied; and to give a more lasting character to his studies, the Pontifical corps of engineers was employed for months in tracing out accurate plans of this subterranean labyrinth. Day after day, and month after month he spent in his task, with an enthusiasm that never flagged, and a patience that never grew weary in the minutest details. I have often met him at nightfall, on his way back to the city, with a triumphant glow upon his face, and the quick tread of a man who feels that the day has left a lasting record behind it.

It was some time before I could prevail upon him to let me go with him. He seemed to feel an instinctive aversion to opening the doors of this sanctuary to a heretic, and always found the way of putting me off for the moment with some plausible excuse, without actually refusing me. At last, by the intercession of a common friend, he was prevailed upon to name a day, and allow me to take a small party with me. We were five in all—the Padre, two Romans, Cole, and myself.

It was a beautiful morning in February—a Roman February, with its cloudless sky and balmy atmosphere. As we rode along toward Porta Pia, we could not but pause a moment in our conversation, to look over into the vineyard where vestals who had broken their vow were buried, still living, in a narrow cell underground, to die there when their loaf was eaten and their cruse exhausted. Their grave may have become a part of the catacombs; and the bones that had lain for centuries unwept, been covered by Christian hands. Passing through the gate, we left the Prætorian camp on our right. How often had the fierce soldiery set forth from their stronghold to search for victims in the very spot that we were about to visit as a shrine! Our onward to the foot of the mountains, with that undulating surface, that death-like silence, and that intermingling of ruined aqueducts, temples, and tombs, which give the Campagna, in despite of its luxuriant vegetation, the aspect of solitude and desolation.

The entrance to the catacombs was in a vineyard on the left. A small hut had been built over it, and before we entered we paused a moment to look on the mountains. There was Soracte, far to the north; there were the Sabine mountains, girding the horizon with their stern and craggy wall; there were Tiber and Præneste; there, too, were the Alban hills, with their silent volcanoes and soft outline; there was Rome, with its gray walls and towers; and around us, on every side, the solemn expanse of the Campagna. The sun shone brightly on them all, as it had shone upon them still through all their changes, and the sky seemed to lay its hand gently upon the mountain tops with a touch of love. We gazed for a few moments in silence, and then turned to descend into the city of the dead.

The steps were the old ones with a few repairs. Each of us had a lighted taper in his hand, and Padre M—— was so familiar with the path that we had no fear of losing ourselves. A short descent brought us into a vaulted corridor, about six feet wide and eight or nine high. It was cut out in the bed of tufa which extends in every direction around Rome, and in many places the marks of the pick and spade could still be distinctly traced on the walls. As we advanced we found that it varied in width and height, sometimes rising to twelve feet or more, and then again shrinking to five. Here and there you could see that the arch had given way, and masses of earth fallen into the passage. On each side were tiers of shelves rising one above the other, like the berths in a steamboat. Some of them were carefully closed up with plaster, with occasionally an olive branch, or a dove, or some other symbol upon them, as distinct as when they were first traced there by hands that mouldered hundreds of years ago. Many of them had been broken open, and the bones removed for relics. In others we saw the skeleton lying just as it had been placed after death, with a few handfuls of dust gathered closely around it—dust that had once clothed it with loveliness or with strength. Here and there a small opening had been made into the funereal cell, and by thrusting in a torch it would light up for you with a ghastly glare that fell fearfully upon the fleshless bones. It was, indeed, a solemn sight; like standing face to face with death itself, stripped of all his concealments: no sculptured monument to admire, no green road led us for a couple of miles between villas and vineyards. The grass was already green. The almond buds were swelling with the blossoms of the new year; men and women were singing merrily at their work; and every thing looked as bright and full of life as if war and famine and pestilence, and all the scourges of humanity, had never descended upon this lovely spot. But as soon as you pass the villas you leave every trace of cultivation behind you. The ground sinks down to the bed of the Arno, to rise again into precipitous banks, and spread mound to remind you, by its springing grass and fragrant flowers, that the manifold forms of life are full of sweet and soothing exhortations even on the border of the grave. But a narrow cell in the cold, damp earth; and for the decent limbs that the hand of reverence or affection had composed there with pious care, a skeleton, grim, repulsive, and fearfully distinct.

While our companions were busy with the inscriptions and symbols, Cole and myself lingered about these open and half open sepulchres. For us, whose home was in a land unknown when these skeletons were living beings, there was a peculiar feeling about them which we knew not how to analyze. They were like voices from some unknown land, such as may sometimes reach the ear of the mariner on a midnight sea, with revelations full of mysterious warning. We could not but ask ourselves whose hands had laid these bodies in their silent cells; whose tears—a father's, mother's, sister's, or friend's—had bathed them before they shrunk into the shapeless dust and grinning skeleton? Once I put my hand in and touched the hand of the skeleton, and it sent a thrill through my veins. It was some time before we could command our feelings enough to observe the other objects that were becoming more and more interesting with every step.

In a short time we came to another descent, leading to a second corridor, eight or ten feet below the first. Here, too, the sides were lined with funereal cells, from which the dead grinned horribly upon us as we passed. The arch was cut out in the same way as in that above, and you could still see by the marks on it what kind of tools it had been made with. Below this was still another line of passages, making three stories in all. But one of them—the widest and highest—had no tombs in it, and had evidently been cut out for the tufa and puzzolana above. Padre M— stopped as we reached the lower corridor. "You see now," said he "the history of the catacombs. It is written on the walls plainer and more impressively than I can tell it. In the vast edifices which were built for the pride or wants of old Rome extensive materials were required. They brought stone from Albano and Tivoli, marble and ornaments from every part of their dominions; but puzzolana, the most important ingredient in that admirable cement which has stood the changes of more than two thousand years, was found at home in their vineyards, under their streets, every where around them. They dug it out, just as you see them dig it now in the Campagna; and if you will take the trouble to compare the modern quarries with the old ones, you will find them running into the hill-side in arches and winding galleries just like those we are standing in. The only difference is in the extent.

"This was the origin of the catacombs; and you have only to remember how early they began, and how many thousands of private and public edifices were built from them during the thousand years of Rome's infancy, youth, and manhood, to see how naturally they would spread their net-work in every direction. As one was exhausted, or carried too far to be used readily, another would be opened; and then again, as the new ones began to fail, or the demand for puzzolana was raised by any sudden emergency, the old ones would be opened and worked again, till, in the course of time, half the city was undermined, and the very material that was to be used in building the walls, and temples, and palaces that we still admire in their ruins, were drawn from under the very spots on which they were to stand. And—stern lesson to human pride—the humble quarry remains unchanged, while the pompous structures it helped to furnish forth have long since crumbled away. So much for the beginning of the catacombs. Let us go a little further before we take up the second epoch in their history."

By this time we were somewhat familiarized with this new aspect of death, and could walk between the graves without shuddering. Still we had no disposition to converse, but asked our questions in a whisper, or pointed with a mute gesture to the objects we wished to call attention to. Even the whisper seemed to have a strange sound, and our footsteps, as we passed slowly and cautiously along, awoke from time to time a hollow reverberation amidst the arches, that filled them for a moment, and, growing fainter and fainter, gradually died away in recesses far beyond the light of our tapers.

At first we had been so absorbed by the solemn aspect of every thing around us, that we had scarcely observed the new galleries that branched off in every direction from that which we were following. Every few steps there was a new opening, with the same style of vaulted ceiling, the same countless rows of skeletons, each in his narrow cell, and connected in the same way with other passages that ran out in the same inextricable labyrinth. Here and there, too, there was a passage that had been blocked up, either by design or by the casual falling in of the earth. I stopped from time to time to look in at the open ones, and once ventured a few steps forward to the opening of a third branch. It was easy to see how one might lose himself in them, and easy too to conceive what a horrid thing it must be to wander about without clew or light in that awful darkness, and sit down at last to die in the midst of the dead. As I held up my taper, the light fell faintly for a few feet upon the arches and graves, giving a deeper and livid hue to the darkness beyond. I hurried back to my companions, glad enough to reach the gallery in time to see their tapers like dim stars, and catch the sound of their footsteps.

My companions, two of whom were zealous antiquarians, were immediately engaged in deciphering inscriptions and interpreting symbols. But it was some time before Cole and myself could bring our thoughts into a fit state for a calm examination of any thing. We could only feel that we were among the dead of nearly two thousand years ago; that the bones around us had once been the earthly tenement of men who had borne the religion in which we believed through the fierce persecutions of paganism; some of them, perhaps, had seen Christ himself; many of them had received their baptism from the hands of the Apostles; and above, far above the dark arches that covered us and them, the vineyards and green fields were still smiling in the sweet sunlight and balmy air. At last, though without losing this pervading consciousness of the hallowed influences around us, we began to take our part in the peculiar archaeological characteristics of the place.

It was evident that the catacombs had been carefully examined long before our day. The greater part of the inscriptions had been removed to the Vatican, where they form that long gallery so full of materials for Christian history, but which travelers often pass through with a hasty glance. Enough, however, remained to show us how the graves must have looked when they were all there.

The rows of cells were often as many as six, one above the other; and whatever the origin of the gallery may have been, they had evidently been cut out for graves. The bottom, on which the body lay, was solid tufa, with an opening in front large enough to put the body in without discomposing it. The opening had then been filled up with tiles and plaster, forming in some places a sort of panel-work, in others a smooth surface of masonry, and then again with a place for the slab that bore the inscription. These slabs were mostly of marble, of various lengths, from one foot to three, more or less polished and ornamented according to the rank of the dead or the wealth of his relatives. Those of the earlier ages, the ages of persecution, were by far the rudest, for they belonged to a time when Christians had seldom the means or the opportunity of adorning their graves, however dear the relics which they contained. But at a later period, when their num-her comprised men of all classes, and still more when Christianity became the religion of the State, money and skill were both directed to this object, and many works of unquestionable merit have been drawn from the catacombs to decorate the museums of the curious and the learned.

The inscriptions were cut in the stone, and then colored with some kind of pigment very similar to Venetian red. It is by no means sure, however, that the custom of coloring them was universal, for many are found without any traces of color; so much so, indeed, that it is hard to believe it could have been so completely effaced. The letters are from half an inch to four inches high, some very rudely cut, and just the kind that an antiquary loves to pore over. Others neat, and in the most approved style of lapidarian art.

The symbols were usually traced with a sharp instrument, sometimes a chisel. The more elaborate apart by themselves, the others interwoven with the inscription.

"But wait a few moments," said Padre M——, "in answer to our demands for explanation: a little further on there is a chapel in which we can sit down and talk more at leisure."

FONT FROM THE CATACOMBS.

The chapel was one of those enlargements made by the Christians when they came to look upon the catacombs as places of asylum or worship. It was cut out in the tufa on each side of the corridor, in a style of architecture which will be more readily understood by the annexed engraving of a similar one in another catacomb than by any description of it that I can give. The graves were empty, and every thing that was thought worthy of a place in the Vatican removed. Over the altar there was a head of the Virgin, which the Padre pointed to with an eloquent gesture that was intended to silence our Protestant scruples forever. Cole examined it very carefully, and whispered in my ear that it was later by several hundred years than any thing else that he had seen there. "Ask him to let me sketch it," said he; but the Padre answered "No."

"And now," said he, "I will go on with my history of the catacombs. They were first opened, as I have already told you, for the sake of the puzzolana. Cicero speaks of them in his oration for Cluentius, as arenarias quasdam extra Portam Esquilinam. Now the Esquiline Hill was so notorious a place, both on account of the bad air and the robbers that infested it, that it was at last entirely abandoned by the better classes, and came in time to be used only as a burial-place for the poor. Horace speaks of it as a place to which slaves brought the corpses of their fellow-slaves in miserable coffins; the common sepulchre of the wretched plebs.^{*} And I remind you of Cicero and Horace because some writers have supposed that when the catacombs came to be used for burial-places, Christians and pagans were both interred in the same spot. This we know by positive testimony to be incorrect. The arenarias used by the heathen were those of the Esquiline, which were closed up when Mæcenas built his gardens there, many years before the introduction of Christianity; and another spot, three miles from the city, was set apart for burning the bodies of the poor.

"Under Augustus the work of building and embellishing was continued upon the largest scale. You remember his boast, that 'he had found a Rome of brick, and left one of marble.' And for brick-work and marble-work both, the arenarias or sand-pits were in constant requisition. The workmen employed in them were naturally men of the lowest class, who, devoting themselves especially to this kind of labor, passed all of their days under ground, and became perfectly familiar with all the passages of the subterranean city they had built. Their only guide was in the veins of puzzolana;[†] and when these failed, they stopped or turned off in another quarter. In this way quarries were opened in every direction around the city, and sometimes in the city itself. You can easily conceive what many hundred men could do, constantly working to supply the wants of a city like Rome.[‡] Bosio tells us, as the result of his own observations, that every where between the Pincian and Salarian gates the ground is undermined. He

Conservus villi portanda locabat in arca.
Hoc miseræ plebi stabat commune sepulcrum."

Serm. Lib. i. Sat. viii.

† Such is the opinion of D'Agincourt, which has been disputed by other writers.

‡ At a later period puzzolana from Pozzuoli, or perhaps from Rome also, was sent to Constantinople to be used in the building of the new city. Diarchæa translatur pulvis arenæ, says Sidonius Apollinarius, using the old name of Pozzuoli.—Vid. Carm. xi. 99.

found entrances in almost every vineyard, some of them more or less blocked up, but still with a sufficient opening to allow him to make his way into them.* Many villas and houses that had been built above them have fallen and been abandoned; for often, when the foundations had been carried down to the first gallery, a second, and even a third and fourth, were found still deeper down into the heart of the soil.† Occasionally, when they had run their vein very far, they would open an air-hole into the vineyard or field above, through which a faint ray and warmer atmosphere would steal in to cheer them. These were the luminaria, which are occasionally mentioned by old writers, and which you must have seen more than once in your rambles over the Campagna. Many a traveler has found them in his path when he least suspected it.

SECTION OF CEMETERY WITH LUMINARIA.

"Now we must remember that the early converts to Christianity were chiefly of the lower class; men and women to whom paganism held out no certain promises of future happiness as a compensation for their actual suffering. They were degraded, abject, oppressed beings whom the new doctrines raised at once to the consciousness of moral dignity. Some, too, were of the better classes, with wealth and power at their command, but whose minds were too earnest and their hearts too warm to allow them to hesitate between Christ and Jupiter. The two classes now met for the first time, drawn together by common hopes and dangers, and many a proud Roman learned to embrace as a brother the being whom, but a little before, he would hardly have deigned to recognize as a man.

"When persecution came, it naturally fell first upon the wealthier and more prominent members of the new society, leaving their humbler brethren for a while under the shelter of their social insignificance. Here the poor sand-diggers could become the protectors of their fellow-Christians, secreting them in the grottoes and caverns which nobody else could venture into with safety. While the persecution lasted they would naturally watch around the entrances to keep dangerous feet aloof, now and then, perhaps, open a new passage for greater convenience or security, and choose the safest hours for conveying food and clothing to their guests. If the storm increased, they, too, found themselves obliged to seek shelter there, and call upon other friends for means of sustenance. When the persecution was over they would all come out again to the light of day, the rich to return to their houses, the arenarii to divide their time once more between their sand-pits below ground and their houses above.

"Yet when they met again in their agapite or for worship, they would find many places empty that had been filled till then by the holiest and best beloved of their order; and when they went out into the world and mingled once more with their fellow-citizens, they would be told how this one or that whom they loved had died by the hand of the executioner or in the combats of the arena. How gratefully would they then look back to their own escape, and the place which had given them refuge! and how naturally would they begin to feel as if they could see the hand of Providence in this hollowing out of their subterranean asylums!

"And soon they would wish to find an asylum for their dead also, where their bones could be laid in peace, secure against the insult to which they were exposed in common sepulchrea, and, what they had equally at heart, secure that no pagan corpse would contaminate the ashes of those who had died in Christ. I could give you more than one passage in confirmation of this, if the feeling were not too natural a one to admit of a doubt. To make a place for the corpse these little cells were opened which still line the corridors: a circumstance which gives us the means of deciding what parts of the catacombs were mere sand-pits, and which the asylum and burial-place of the early Christians.

"Thus they soon found themselves bound to these places by a double feeling: a grateful recollection of their own escape, and that veneration which we naturally feel for the burial-place of our kindred and friends. In the intervals of persecution they would come back to them, from time to time, to converse more freely with the companions of their peril, the poor sand-diggers. Whenever a new body had been laid there, they would feel that the spot which held it had acquired a new claim upon their affections. Whenever their hearts faltered or grew faint, they might come here, too, to seek strength in prayer at the side of the graves of those who had died for the faith. And may we not safely say that oftentimes the veteran Christian would bring some new convert with him, to show him what he must be prepared to do, if he would hold fast to his profession? Have they not often paced these galleries together?—a wife, perhaps, with a newly-converted husband; a father with his son, or a friend, holding in the warmest grasp of love the hand of the friend whom he had won over by prayers and entreaties—pausing, now and then, to point out the grave of some martyr, from whose holy life, and holier death, he had drawn his most touching appeals, and exciting each other by sweet communion to stronger faith and more fervent love! How sweet must it have been to talk of heaven in these sunless depths of earth! How must their imaginations have been exalted by the objects that surrounded them; and with what an increase of boldness and vigor must they have gone forth again to preach, to reason, and perhaps to die!

* I have seen some of them myself in the vineyard of a friend about a mile from Porta Salara. The peasants use them for a rod or two in, to keep wine, etc.; and though they never venture far, they often find curious fragments of antiquity in them.

VAULTED CHAPEL IN CATACOMBS.

"New persecutions brought them or their successors back again to the catacombs; where at first they lived, as they had done before, dependent upon their friends for the means of sustenance. However, as the number of Christians went on increasing, it would become more and more difficult for them to live here in safety without some surer supply of food than what they could thus receive, day by day, from above. Water they found in abundance in the wells and springs, so many of which still remain scattered here and there through the grottoes. But bread could only be obtained in safety and abundance by laying in supplies before the danger came.

"There can be but little doubt that the danger of their position made them peculiarly attentive to all the signs of the times. Every circumstance would be carefully noted, and every new indication of peril instantly perceived. They would become clear-sighted; but firm, vigorous, and ever watchful—like men whose path leads them along the brink of a precipice. It would soon be natural for them to look forward to persecution as a danger for which they must always be prepared, and to the catacombs as a place which might at any hour become their asylum or their grave. I will not say that it was so; but I think we have every reason to suppose that there were careful men among them, who kept supplies of grain where they could convey them at a moment's warning to some one of the numerous entrances to the catacombs.

"And for the same reasons the catacombs themselves were enlarged, and new passages pushed forward, till they all became united into a vast net-work that undermined the whole city.* Thus escape became easy and pursuit difficult. The Christian would readily plunge into those dark recesses wherever he found an entrance, for he knew that he could not wander far without meeting a friend. But his pursuer would pause, and weigh the danger well before he ventured to follow him into a labyrinth to which he had no clew, and where every step might bring him unawares into the midst of men whom he believed capable of the most revolting crimes. For, if we would form a just conception of the position of the Christian among pagans, we must remember that he was looked upon as a fierce, morose, and hateful being, who united himself with men equally detestable, to eat the flesh of human victims, and partake of rites too horrible to be described. And it may well be supposed, that when they were known to have chosen their asylum in these dark vaults under the gardens and vineyards of the city, where the sun had never penetrated, and whose recesses were known to themselves alone, their choice would be employed as a new argument against them, if not an open confession of guilt.

"The first catacombs that we positively know to have been used for this purpose were the catacombs of St. Sebastian, though we have no authentic account of their opening. Puzzolana, as you well know, is very abundant in all that region, and it is not improbable that the first excavations were begun at a very early period. However this may be, our earliest records of persecution speak of them as the asylum of the Christians; and they continue to be expressly mentioned long after the number of converts had become so great as to compel them to seek for safety in others. It was in these that St. Stephen was put to death. The soldiers came upon him as he was in the act of saying mass; and whether from a momentary feeling of compassion, or a desire to see with their own eyes one of those ceremonies of which they had heard such horrible descriptions, allowed him to go on and accomplish his holy task in peace. But the moment that it was done they thrust him back upon his chair—the very chair which you have seen in the relic-chamber of the church—and cut off his head. Well might the recollection of the atrocious deed sink deep into the memory of his horror-stricken brethren; and the ground that had drunk his blood become sacred to all succeeding generations.

"You must remember that all this while the work of building still went on, and new excavations were constantly making to meet the demand for materials. There was the golden house of Nero, stretching from the Palatine over the Esquiline, where he died; there were the baths and the Coliseum, which Titus built upon the site of that vast and odious edifice, and forums, and temples, and theatres, and mansoleums, and the baths of Caracalla, and the baths of Diocletian; all built while the Christian was still an odious and dreaded member of the great empire. Sometimes he was condemned to work, as a punishment, in these caverns, which might soon serve him for an asylum, and which he alone was known to look upon with affection. And thus various and often opposite causes seemed to concur in preparing for him a home in the hour of danger; and showing how easily God converts the designs of his enemies into means of protection for his own children.

"We have no authentic description of the beginning of a persecution; but it is a scene which the imagination easily draws in a place like this. I have often sketched it to myself in my daily walks hither. It would seldom come wholly unawares upon men so well read in the signs of danger. Here and there a significant cloud would be seen by them, however pure the horizon might seem to an untrained eye. Some friend in the palace—anxious, though not a Christian himself, for the safety of a Christian relative or friend—would secretly convey the warning that a new edict was preparing, and the names of prominent victims already marked. Then the infirm and weak, women and children, and all those who might become incumbrances in a sudden flight, would repair secretly to their places of refuge, with provisions and all the appliances of comfort which they could carry with them. Daylight would find many an empty dwelling where evening had closed upon a crowded home.

"Then the edict would issue forth, and soldiers, guided by spies and informers, set out upon the search of victims. Some they would always find either willing martyrs or men whom the hope of a day's respite had prevented from flying in time. These they would hurry off to prison and trial. When night returned, there would be a great stir among the Christians, and hasty preparations for flight. They would scarcely dare to go in large bodies, for fear of attracting attention, but steal away one by one, or at the utmost two or three together of those whom no peril could separate. The soldiers, too, would be off the alert, watching the gates and the principal entrances to the catacombs. Often the flight must have been a perilous one, over vineyards and fields, through by-ways and lanes, finding the path already occupied by their enemy, or hearing their footsteps and seeing the gleam of their torches as they came on in full pursuit. But there were many entrances unknown to any but the Christians themselves, and sometimes perhaps a band of soldiers, in full sight of their victims, may have paused in amazement well-nigh bordering upon terror, at seeing them suddenly disappear when their hands were already almost upon them. Then they would recall all the horrible things that they had heard about these worshippers of unknown gods, and hasten back with strange tales of magic and enchantment. Sometimes, too, they must have met face to face, and here, all that we know of these fathers of our faith assures us that they yielded themselves up, like their Saviour, unresisting victims. Sometimes, too, they would meet together at the mouth of a catacomb, and then the Christian would plunge boldly into the darkness; and though it is known that the soldier would sometimes follow them a little way, they seldom ventured far. It was on these occasions that some of the passages which are still blocked up were closed; and while the pursuer was cautiously advancing by the broader gallery, the fugitive would already be far on his way, by other paths, toward the deep recesses of his asylum.

"We know more positively what kind of lives they led here. Their first impulse on finding themselves in a place of safety was to unite together in thanksgiving and prayer. Then here, as in the city above, the different offices of social and religious life would be assigned to different persons: some to watch over the sick; some to preside over the distribution of food; some to allot appropriate places to different ages and sexes; some to watch the entrances, and keep up some kind of communication with their friends in the city. The community of feeling and interests which bound them together in the world would become a yet stronger tie in these homes of common peril and privation; and few would think of preserving here those distinctions of rank and power which might so soon be confounded in a common death. For light, they used those little lamps of which you see so many in every museum: the larger were suspended from the ceiling in the chapels and main galleries, and they would carry about the smaller ones in their hands whenever they wished to go from one place to another. Some of the wells from which they drew their water may have been dug expressly for that purpose; but others were evidently found in the natural progress of excavation. Some, too, seem to have been used as drains. Their supply of food must, even on the supposition of long preparation, have been a precarious one whenever the persecution lasted more than three or four months. In the cases of individuals, we know that they depended entirely upon their friends above. St. Chrysostom finds materials for an eloquent reproof to the Christians of his own day in the picture of a noble lady awaiting in fear and trembling the return of her maid with her daily supply of food. There is that beautiful story of Hippolytus, too, who lived for a long while in the catacombs of St. Sebastian at the very time when St. Stephen was secreted there. He was apparently the only Christian of his family, and when he took refuge in the catacombs he was still obliged to look to his relations for the means of sustenance. They sent it to him by his nephew and niece, children of ten and thirteen, whose daily visits in this hour of trial made the poor Christian feel how dear he still was to his friends. And as he thought of them, and mourned over their idolatry, he felt his heart bleed and yearn for them, and could not still its longings till he had found out some way for bringing them also to the knowledge of Christ. Then he went to St. Stephen and told him of his sorrows; and the holy pontiff bade him keep the children by him the next time that they came; 'For their parents,' said he, 'will become alarmed when they see that they do not return at the accustomed hour, and will come to seek them themselves.' And when the children came he kept them; and their parents, seeing that the hour was past and they had not returned, went to seek them in the place where they knew that their brother was hidden. And when they had reached it, they found their children there, and Hippolytus and the holy bishop with them. But they turned a deaf ear to the prayers and entreaties of their brother, and refused to hearken to the words in which St. Stephen would have reasoned with them. Yet, although they knew it not, their hearts were touched, and the words had sunk into them, and in God's chosen time ripened into repentance, and they too became Christians and martyrs.

"Still it was only in individual cases that a large number could have been fed by daily supplies. The very sight of so many persons going regularly to the same places would have excited suspicions in those suspicious times, and led to effectual measures for cutting off the communication. No large body of men could ever have been fed by means like these, and the inhabitants of the catacombs must often have been exposed to great want.

"But while they remained there they passed the greater part of their time in religious conferences, in attending the holy ceremonies, and in prayer. There was no sun to tell them of the passage from day to night. The light that faintly stole in through the luminaria reached at the utmost but a few feet in the upper corridors; and the luminaria themselves were found only at great intervals. All the rest was lighted by lamps, which shed a soft twilight around them, fainter even than this of our tapers, and many a passage was left in unbroken darkness. When I first came here I could not look into that darkness without a strange feeling. You see how the light falls there, struggling for a little way through the thickening shadows till its redness fades to a sickly white, resembling that foco lume, that pale light which Dante saw the spirits by on the shores of Acheron.* And then, too, how dark is the darkness beyond. The eye shrinks from it, and turns for relief to that pale ray again which seems to fall blunted and powerless from the ebon mass. How truly does that other epithet of Dante apply here too—loco d'ogni luce muto—a spot mute of all light—for nowhere do darkness and silence seem to walk hand in hand as they do here. I have repeated it a hundred times.

DECORATED CHAPEL.

"By degrees, however, I became accustomed to it, and so it must have been with the Christians who made their homes here. Some of them found employment, too, in enlarging the passages into chapels and forums where they could assemble in larger numbers for conference and worship. It was then, probably, that the rough shell of the chapels was made, though the ornament and finish must have been the work of a calmer and happier period. Sometimes, it is related, the soldiery came upon them while they were engaged in prayer, led thither, perhaps, by spies. Few only could have been taken in these rare inroads, for there were too many avenues of escape to admit of a general arrest. Sometimes, too, their relentless persecutors would attempt to distress them by throwing in stones and dirt through the luminaria, and shutting out their scanty share of daylight. But none of these things could have broken their general feeling of security in such hiding-places as these.

"The air, as you can tell by your own feelings, was temperately cool, though in some places I have found the dampness unpleasant. Had these grottoes been less extensive, the crowds that were sometimes collected here, and the numerous lamps that were always burning would have made the air unpleasant with such imperfect means of ventilation as the luminaria afford. But these numberless passages running off in every direction would give it a circulation that the lungs would play in as freely as on a mountain side."

"Do you suppose," asked Cole, "that many died here?"

"We have no means of ascertaining how many," replied the Father; "but without some miraculous suspension of the ordinary laws of nature, there must have been the usual proportion both of births and deaths. Whole families were living here together, and often for many months, and doubtless some came who were never to look upon the sun again. Death must have been very solemn in a place like this. But it was one from which the Christian's soul would take its flight with exultation. And I doubt whether, amidst all their vicissitudes, these asylums of holy men have ever witnessed such touching scenes as when a dying saint has breathed his last farewell to kindred and friends, and calmly closed his eyes amidst the prayers and congratulations of those who longed to follow him. You would almost fancy the spirit hovering for a moment above them with the last yearnings of human love, and blending, as it were, the purest feelings of earth with its first fruition of heaven.

"The funeral rites were simple. The corpse was bathed, anointed, and wrapped in its grave-clothes, and then placed on a bier in the chapel, where it remained till a sufficient time had elapsed to guard against its premature burial. Meanwhile, relatives and friends would gather round it to watch and to pray: and when the hour came, they would take it up in their arms and bear it to the grave that had been opened for it, laying it decently in its narrow dwelling, with its arms stretched by its sides and its face upward. Then there would be a last farewell, a parting glance; and when all had joined once more in prayer, the mason would come with his tiles and mortar and shut it out from their sight forever. I have never opened a grave without asking myself, where were the hands that closed it hundreds of years ago? Often in opening them you perceive an odor of incense, as if precious gums and spices had been used in preparing the body for its last resting-place."

"And were the remains generally found in the state which we see them in?"

"Frequently, but not always. You have seen that many of the cells were empty. Now you must not always take this for a proof that the bones have been carried away. The nature of the ground, the age of the dead, and various other causes have acted after death, producing a great diversity in the state of the bones. The bones of children decay rapidly, and in their graves we never find any thing but dust. Where the puzzolana is dry the bones become white and soft, falling away like ashes beneath your touch. Where it is damp you often find the skeleton well preserved, and always more or less perfect. And if it has been reached by the water, an incrustation forms upon it, giving it the color and hardness of stone.* Sometimes a striking change takes place the moment that the air penetrates, and I have seen parts crumble away and sink into dust before I had well caught the outline. You remember what happened to Campana? He was carrying on his excavations in his vineyard at Porta Latina, and had just opened a columbarium. All the upper part was arranged just as the columbaria always are, with the urns in their niches and each with its inscription beside it. But on reaching the bottom and clearing away the dust and rubbish from the floor, they came unexpectedly upon a stone coffin a little more than five feet long and perfectly closed. By good fortune, Campana himself was there, and with the proper instruments for raising the lid without breaking it. And what should he see there but a body stretched at full length in the coffin, as if it had never been disturbed since the day when it was first placed there: the funeral robe, the hands, the limbs in perfect preservation, and the face that of a girl who had died in her freshness and bloom two thousand years ago. But as he was gazing upon it, it suddenly began to dissolve and fade, and in an instant all that was left was the outline of a human form traced in dust upon the bottom of a coffin."

"The same thing occurred in an excavation at Cere," says Gennarelli, "and I mean to make the most of it in my dissertation. The figure was that of a man, and some of the gold ornaments of his robe resisted the action of the air, though all the rest and the bones crumbled away immediately."

"Do you believe," asked Cole, "that the emblems and inscriptions were placed upon the grave at the time of burial?"

"Many of them undoubtedly were. The simpler emblems and ruder inscriptions may have been easily traced by the common workmen. Some of them evidently were made with the point of the trowel."

"What is the meaning of the palm leaf?"

"The Christian's triumph—victory over sin and death. Many writers have supposed it to have been a sign of martyrdom. But the only unquestionable proofs of martyrdom are the little vase of blood which you have seen inserted in the cement that closes the grave, and the instruments of martyrdom which are sometimes found in the grave itself."

"I have been told that these were indications of the buried man's trade."

PAINTED CELL.

PAINTED VAULT.

"Yes, when you find them cut or painted on the outside, of which we have many curious instances. I remember a slab which once stood upon the grave of a wool-comber. The inscription gives nothing but the name with the common addition of—in peace:

VENERE IN PACE;

but there, in the same rude style of carving, are the shears, the comb, the speculum, and a plate with a rounded handle, all implements of his trade. It was a symbolical language, intelligible even to the unlettered. The man who would have been forced to turn away unsatisfied from an inscription, would recognize at once the familiar indications of a trade.

"Men, too, situated as the Christians were, would naturally resort to symbols for the expression of ideas which none but they could appreciate. Their thoughts and hopes were not those of the heathen who adorned their sarcophagi with choice sculptures and exquisite embodiments of mythology. They did not care to employ in commemoration of their dead the forms which had been defiled by a corrupt superstition. They were in the warmth and fervor of a new hope, which they took every opportunity of expressing in language perfectly intelligible to all who shared it with them. You can not take ten steps in the Lapidarian Gallery of the Vatican without feeling that you are standing between two worlds. On one side are the inscriptions of paganism, whose dead, sinking into their graves without a hope, seem to cast back longing glances upon the pleasures they have left behind. The mourner has nothing to console him, the dying man nothing to cling to; but when the name has once issued from the fatal urn, he leaves forever his woods, his villas, and his home for the bark that is to bear him to an eternal exile. (I have ventured to borrow from one of the saddest yet most beautiful of Horace's odes—the third of the second book—to Dellium.) Then from his tomb comes a cold voice that chills you by its heartlessness; an idle enumeration of idle pleasures, or a spiteful warning that yours too will soon be ended.

"What language for the grave! You remember the dying question of Augustus to his friends: 'Have I played my part well? Then applaud.' Shocking as this is to our conceptions, even from such a wretch as Augustus, the following inscription is still more so:

VIXI · DUM · VIXI · BENE · JAM · MEA

FABULA · VALETE · ET · PLAUDITE

"But the Christian, for whom death was a passage not to exile but to the home of all his hopes and aspirations, writes nothing upon his grave but the simple expression of his faith:

FLORENTI IN PACE.
Florentius in peace.
VALERIA DORMIT IN PACE.
Valeria sleeps in peace.
DORMITIO ELPIDIS.
The sleeping place of Elpidis.

"Often too, the expression is fuller and more distinct, referring this peaceful slumber to the Lord who gives it; as in the following form which is found at the close of many inscriptions:

IN PACE DOMINI DORMIT.
He sleeps in the peace of the Lord.

"In the epitaph of Albania, by her husband Placus, the idea of repose is expressly limited:

Vol. X.—No. 59.—P 2

the resurrection of the body, an idea that, to a pagan, would have seemed still stranger than the more common assurance of peace, being held up as the end of this temporary slumber.

RELICTIS TUIS IACES IN PACE SOPORE
MERITA RESURGIS TEMPORALIS TIBI DATA
REQUITIO.

Thou well-deserving one, having left thy [relations], lie in peace—in sleep.

Thou wilt arise: a temporary rest is granted thee.

"Indeed, it is to this belief in the resurrection of the body that we are indebted for the preservation of these precious remains. Natural as it is to honor the dead—and your favorite Vico makes funeral rites one of the first elements of civil union—the Christian, living in the midst of a hostile community, and often dying the most degrading or revolting death, would frequently have been tempted to cast aside, with comparative indifference, the mutilated remains of the friend whose spirit he knew to be far beyond the reach of human decay. But when he saw in them, all disfigured as they were, the substance which was to rise again refulgent with the immortality of Paradise, he gathered them together with a pious care, washed and anointed them, and filling the wounds with spices and precious ointments, laid them reverently in the sepulchre. Prudentius tells of a martyr who, on his way to death, begs not for life, but burial. Sometimes they chose their burial-place during life. There is an inscription in the Lapidarian Gallery, one of the rudest both in the style of writing and its almost unintelligible Latinity, which records the name of an old man of ninety, by the name of Martyrius, who had done so:

ELEXIT DOMUM VIVUS.

"Then too, we find epitaphs denouncing a wretched death to any one who should dare to violate the sanctity of the sepulchre:

MALE PEREAT INSEPUTUS
JACEAT NON RESURGAT
CUM JUDA PARTEM HABEAT
SI QUIS SEPULCHRUM HUNC
VIOLAVERIT.

*If any one shall violate this sepulchre
Let him perish miserably, and remain unburied;
Let him lie down, and not rise again;
Let his portion be with Judas."*

"Strange," said Cole. "Why, it is the very sentiment that we find in the epitaph of our great poet, Shakespeare, though much more definite in its imprecation:

'Good friend, for Jesu's sake forbear
To dig the dust inclosed here.
Blest be the man that spares these stones;
And cursed be he that moves my bones.'"

"Yes, it is man's natural feeling. Even the pagans felt it as keenly as we do. Archytas begs for a little sand, in the sweetest notes of the lyre of Horace:

'At tu, nauta, vage ne parce malignis arenæ
Ossibus et capiti inhumato
Particulam dare.'

And the imprecation, though less minute, is as strong as that of our inscription:

'..... precibus non linquar inultis:
Teque piscula nulla resolvent'

But the heathen dreaded the sad wanderings on the banks of Styx. Palinurus cries to Æneas:

'Eripe me his, invicte malle; aut tu mihi terram
Infice, manu potes.'

Funeral rites carried a privilege with them, but the body itself had done its part and could never be reunited with the spirit. A decent grave or even a little dust "thrice sprinkled" would secure the soul a passage in Charon's bark, and then all the rest might be left to slumber undisturbed. How different from the feeling with which the Christian laid his brother in the grave, firmly trusting that every particle which had entered into the composition of that lifeless form would be gathered together and united again in the day of his reward.

"Another trait which strikes you in these inscriptions is their simplicity; not merely the simplicity of good taste, but the meekness and resignation of men who looked upward, receiving all things as expressions of God's will, and claiming nothing for themselves but the privilege of submission. The epithets are terms of endearment or respect; sometimes the manner of death is mentioned, but without any tokens of exultation or any complaints of persecution. They sleep in peace, in the peace of the Lord, in the hope of resurrection, and thus their story is told.

"The names too, you must have observed, are merely the name of baptism. The Roman distinction of personal, family, and surname is dropped. They have renounced the pride of birth and place, and care nothing for the pompous titles of worldly power. Many of them were poor laborers who were known only by their trade; the weaver, the wool-comber, or any other of the humbler arts that minister to the wants of life. But they all had been baptized by some distinctive appellation, and this they gloried in. It was the token of their regeneration, the mark by which they were known among their brethren, a record of the day in which they began to live anew, casting their errors and unholy affections behind them."

"Here then," said Gennarelli, "we have the explanation of the loss of family and surnames in the middle ages, which was followed by such a confusion of persons that the genealogist is completely at fault, till the crusades come to his aid, with their armorial bearings and new distinctions."

"Undoubtedly; and hence the futility of attempting to trace any of our modern families up to the Romans of old. And thus, too, you see another reason for the natural growth of a new symbolical language. These men, who wished to separate themselves both in life and death from their pagan neighbors, would naturally inscribe the distinction on their graves in some simple and definite manner. One of the simplest was the monogram of the Greek name of Christ, a X and P crossed in various ways, which appears in a very large number of inscriptions, sometimes alone, sometimes adorned with palm branches, or other emblems of the same expressive character. In one inscription, that of a child of four, only a part of one of the legs of the X appears, and that is wrought into the P in such a manner as to produce a cross. Then two other letters were added, expressive of the attribute of eternal existence as applied to God— α and ω —one on the right, the other on the left of the cross, and either higher or lower, as best suited the engraver.

"Another emblem, and which I believe to be a probable, if not a certain, indication of martyrdom, is the furnace which we often find, and in various shapes. It alludes to death by fire, or by boiling oil, both of them common forms of martyrdom.

THE THREE CHILDREN IN THE FIERY FURNACE.

"This symbolism was not confined to tombstones. We find it on gems, on lamps, and in pictures. The 'Christian Museum' contains many curious and instructive specimens of it. There is a signet-ring from the catacombs with the monogram of XP interwrought and supported by what would seem to have been intended for doves. A full A is cut on the right of the P, and a little higher, on the opposite side, a very small ω .

"Another common symbol is a fish, which we find both on slabs and on lamps. Here the idea is a little more difficult to seize, and gave free scope to a play of fancy better suited to an Eastern than a Western mind. You will see the direct meaning by remembering that the Greek word for fish is $\iota\chi\theta\upsilon\varsigma$ each of whose letters is the initial of one of the words in the inscription:

$\text{Ιησους Χριστος Θεου υιός Σωτήρ.}$

Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour.

"This symbol was regarded with singular

favor by some of the Fathers, and is especially recommended by St. Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian, as suggestive of the holy rite by which Christians were received into the bosom of the church.

"But a more pleasing and less fanciful symbol is that of the anchor; the soothing monitor on life's troubled sea that there is still a haven and rest for the tempest-tost and weary. It was a thought full of a consolation which none but the Christian knew; and when he traced the symbol on the grave of one whom he loved, and called to mind the perils they had encountered together, 'Rest,' he would say, 'sweet spirit, rest in thy Lord. Thy cares and trials are over, and now thou canst hold strongly to the haven thou hast won.'

'..... fortitur occupa
Portum.'

"The ship belongs to the same class, and is still the symbol of the church. La navicella di San Pietro—The bark of St. Peter—is one of our current expressions, and the rudest peasant will interpret this symbol for you as easily as the profoundest antiquarian. We find it on tablets and rings. Clement, of Alexandria, speaks of certain signet rings with 'a heaven-bound ship' upon them—ναῦς οὐρανὸς παραπορεύσα. In some of them the symbols are very complicated, but generally it is perfectly simple; a ship more or less accurately drawn, and with a cross for its mast."

"Does not this symbolism extend to painting and sculpture?" asks Cole.

"Yes; as, for example, in the painting from the catacombs of St. Calixtus, in which our Saviour is represented as a lamb standing upon a rock, or perhaps a mountain. From the base of the rock four streams issue like four catacombs, and within a circle that surrounds the lamb's head are the monogram of the XP, with an α and ω . The rock is supposed to be the rock of paradise, and the four streams the four evangelists.

"But what strikes you most in the art of the catacombs, is the general absence of painful elements. The subjects are drawn chiefly from the Old and New Testament, and more especially from the life of Christ. The sacrifice of Abraham is a favorite subject, which reappears in different places, but mostly with the same types. Noah, too, supplies the pious artist with the means of adorning a great many chapels, but almost always in the same way—a man in a sort of open tub, and a dove with an olive branch. The trial of the fiery furnace, Jonah and the whale, Moses striking the rock, Daniel and the lions, and various other passages of sacred history are repeated again and again, but always in a way that does more credit to the artist's piety than to his skill.

"Some of the most singular, if not the most pleasing of these pictures, represent the miracles or other passages in the life of Christ. The raising of Lazarus is one, the miracle of the loaves and fishes another; neither of them very successful in invention, for in the miracle of the loaves and fishes the artist not knowing how to bring in Christ and the Apostles, has contented himself with a group of men kneeling, as if the miraculous supply had just been consumed, while the fragments are piled up in seven baskets in the foreground. The most common emblem under which Christ appears, is that of the 'Good Shepherd.' He is generally represented by the figure of a youth in shepherd's clothing, standing in the midst of his sheep, with one of them upon his shoulder. In some of these, though we find the same monotony and poverty of invention to complain of, the general effect is very pleasing, and the figure of Christ often happily conceived.

"But we must remember that though art was sometimes resorted to by the Christians as a means of embellishment, they never looked to it for their chief pleasures as the pagans did. Indeed, they were necessarily cut off from the great school of Greece, whose mythological subjects were loathsome and revolting to them.* It was not till after the days of persecution were past that they could openly address themselves to the task of adorning their sanctuaries with choice sculptures and paintings; and then, alas, the progress of decay had been too great to afford the Christian school any chance of competing with the bright ages that were gone.

"One thing, however, to which all writers, and the works themselves bear witness, is the gentle and soothing spirit which pervades it. It is eminently the school of love, the school of pure thoughts, ennobling suggestions, and elevating impulses. The atmosphere that you breathe there has a freshness and purity in it which it would be in vain to seek in the palmiest days of pagan art. Artistically you may be dissatisfied, and even annoyed; but still, if you have any of the Christian's spirit within you, you will go back and look, and look again, till your fancy pictures to you the unlettered believer struggling with his conceptions, and striving to convey to the stone or roughly plastered wall, some part of that love and devotion that glow in his heart. And then you will feel with him, and these rude lines will swell out into soft and graceful proportions, and the half-formed features will beam with the light of the soul, and you will learn to number among your happiest days the day in which your eyes were first opened to the real characteristics of Christian art."

THE GOOD SHEPHERD.

The Padre paused as though his story were ended, but we all called earnestly for the sequel to the history of the catacombs.

"It is not a very long one," said he. "The catacombs had gradually become the exclusive property of the Christians; if not formally, yet for all purposes but the mere quarrying of sand, for which the demand necessarily diminished when the troubles of the empire began. After they had become accustomed to them as places of burial and refuge, they began to resort to them for worship also, and those agapæ, or feasts of love, which were so incomprehensible to the pagans. Soon we find in the edicts special clauses expressly forbidding them to collect together in their 'cemeteries,' or even to visit them. And here we may remark that the name of arenarî was rapidly changing into that of cemeteries, though we do not meet with that of catacombs till many years later; and as cemeteries they were regarded as belonging solely to the Christians. The wealthy Romans still loved the costly monuments of the Appian Way, and the emperors built themselves mausoleums, that their ashes might lie, like those of Egyptian kings, in piles that would defy the tooth of time. But the costliest monuments of the Appian were destroyed centuries ago; rope-dancers and mountebanks play their antics over the ashes of Augustus, and the frescoed cell of Hadrian re-echoes with the wailings of guilt and despair. While here, around the bones of the humble and persecuted Christian, the children of a land unknown to Rome, come, as you have done to-day, to unite with the children of the soil in tributes of gratitude and veneration.

* Prudentius, Peristephanon, Hymn. x. v. 293, calls Mentor and Phidias,

"Fabri decorum, vel parentes numinum."

"At last the persecutions ceased. Constantine came with privileges and favors, and the great offices of the empire passed into the hands of the Christians. They could now build their churches above ground, and celebrate the ceremonies of religion openly. The foundations of great edifices, consecrated to the service of the true God, were laid; and the whole city began gradually to assume a new aspect. Not that the inhabitants willingly renounced their idols, or abstained from the pollution of pagan rites. Long and obstinately did many still cling to their national and household gods, vainly trusting that the day of their dominion would again return. History, and what they called religion, had become so strangely blended in their minds, that they scarcely knew how to tear Romulus from his shrine without blotting the name of their founder from their annals. They loved, too, the bloody arena, with its combats of men and wild beasts, and the brilliant festivals which brought a grateful release from labor, or interwove a pleasing variety into the dull monotony of common life.

"Thus while the empire accepted Christianity, and the followers of Christ were free to profess their faith openly, they were still surrounded by secret or avowed enemies, who would willingly have renewed the persecution if they could have found an emperor of their own. The immediate bearing of this upon the catacombs you can easily conceive. They were no longer resorted to as the only places which Christians could worship in with safety, but held rather as sacred spots, which helped to keep alive the pure spirit of devotion. It was still good to meet together in them on the anniversaries of the martyrs whose bones they held, and renew at these graves the vows of penitence and renunciation with which they had turned away from the world. These graves gradually became like shrines, which they adorned with marbles and paintings and rich offerings. Then it was that the decorations of the catacombs assumed that form which has supplied such abundant materials for our museums and galleries. The chapels were enlarged and painted, and furnished with every thing that was necessary for celebrating the sacred rites worthily. The tombs were carefully watched, to preserve them from injury, and many of them decked with inscriptions and sculptures which the original makers must have been either too poor or too much in danger to have placed there. Churches were built over the entrances, giving convenient access to them for the devout: a circumstance which has led to the subsequent distinction of names." Thus, those beyond the gate of St. Sebastian took their name from the church; and those in which we are, from the neighboring church of St. Agnes.

"As burial-places they were held in singular devotion. The Christian might now lay the bones of his brother in any tomb with equal safety. But he loved best these quiet resting-places, where his fathers had found refuge in the hour of danger. There was a calm and a peace here unlike the ostentatious grief of the Appian. The ashes of holy men had made the place holy, and the dim galleries, with their countless rows of dead—many of whom he or his father had known in life—were full of eloquent exhortations. He would bring hither the precious remains, and help with his own hands to compose them in their cell, and then perhaps mark out the spot where, when his pilgrimage was ended, he wished to be laid at their side.

"At a still later period a stronger feeling became blended with this, and men came to look upon burial among the saints and holy men of the day of trial, as a privilege which might extend its influence beyond the grave. It was natural for the Popes to choose it for their graves. Leo IX. was buried here, as late as the middle of the eleventh century. Honorius and Valentinian lie here; and when a new empire of the West had arisen, an emperor from beyond the Alps, the second of the Othos, came to lay his bones in the consecrated soil. Here are the graves of kings of Saxon England, and empresses, and queens, and, greatest perhaps in the long list of sovereigns, the great Countess Matilda, the friend of Hildebrand and chief benefactress of the Church.

"But the day was at hand when Rome herself was to become the scene of the infinite sufferings she had so long inflicted upon others. It is difficult to ascertain what was done with the catacombs in the different sacks of the imperial city. When Alaric took it, there was too much booty in the palaces and houses of the wealthy to leave the barbarians any pretext for disturbing the ashes of the dead. And when, forty-five years later, it fell into the hands of a ruder and fiercer conqueror, there was still enough left to load his ships with silver and gold, and statues and vases of precious workmanship. But the records of these great events are imperfect and contradictory. The chronology itself is not always to be relied upon; and when we look for the details that would interest us most, we find but scanty materials for a clear and authentic history.

"The country around the city was in the hands of the enemy, who pushed their advanced posts up to the gates. They held thus the principal entrances to the catacombs during a greater part of the siege; and Alaric, you remember, besieged Rome three different times before he finally took and sacked it. Genserik came from Ostia; but during the Gothic wars the environs were again in possession of the enemy, and when Totila retook the city, he threw down the walls, and carried the inhabitants into captivity.* We know that the monuments of the catacombs suffered more or less at different periods, but what part of the violation must be attributed to the Goths, and what to the Vandals, and what, alas! to Romans themselves, we have no means of deciding.

"It does not appear that in either siege the inhabitants took refuge here, though it would be natural to suppose that, with so many means of entering them from within the city, and with such certainty of finding in them a sure asylum, they would have fixed upon them as one of the first rallying points in their flight from the conqueror. My own conclusion from this would be that, during the preceding century, the Christians, ceasing to frequent them as they had done in earlier times, had gradually lost their knowledge of the more intricate passages, although certain parts were still used for burial and religious festivals. We know that as late as 352, Pope Liberius took refuge in these very catacombs of St. Agnes during the Arian persecution. But the interior recesses, which had been regarded as the surest asylum when the knowledge of their intricacies were still fresh in the minds of hundreds who had worked and lived in them, would soon become as inaccessible, or rather as difficult of access, to a new generation as they are to us.

"A long period follows, during which our knowledge of all historical events is so imperfect that we can not wonder at finding ourselves very ignorant of the history of the catacombs. Chroniclers who dispatch entire reigns in a sentence, and compress the history of a siege into capta est urbs, can hardly be blamed for passing over a great many things which a more curious age would gladly know in detail. There are blanks of many years in the authentic history of Italy herself.

"Then comes the period of storm again—that turbulent and destructive age which converted the Coliseum into a fortress, and set battlements upon the beautiful masonry of the tomb of Cæcilia Metella; when Virgil was spoken of as a great magician, and the equestrian statue of Marcus Aurelius, attributed sometimes to Constantine, and sometimes to a mysterious soldier, of gigantic frame, who had freed Rome from the hand of the barbarians by the help of an owl.

"In the wars of the Roman nobles the catacombs were often used as hiding-places in danger, and safe spots for conspirators to meet in, and plot their inroads and surprises. Sometimes opposite factions met unexpectedly in those labyrinths, and the fierce war-cry rang wildly through the arches, startling, you would almost say, the very bones of the dead. But no general conflict could ever have taken place where the falling of a lamp might plunge both parties in total darkness. It is natural to suppose that the chapels, and even the more ornamented tombs, suffered more or less at the hands of these rude men. The slabs that are found in different parts of the city, and which evidently once belonged to the catacombs, show that veneration for the dead was an insufficient protection against cupidity and violence. But here again we are at a loss for authentic details, and the general history is evident enough to every one who has ever walked around the walls of Rome, or carefully observed the buildings of the middle ages.

"During all this time the catacombs were visited by pilgrims, and occasionally used, as I have already said, for burial. The pilgrims to Rome (Romei—Romipeti) were the most numerous of all that numerous class. They came from all parts of Christendom, some as a voluntary act of devotion, some as an atonement for great crimes, and some perhaps, led hither by a roving and restless spirit. Occasionally they were attacked by robbers, and sometimes even murdered. But the feeling that moved them was too strong a one to be checked by personal danger, and they continued to flock hither in considerable numbers throughout the whole course of the middle ages. It was for their use that the 'Mirabilia' and other guide-books were written, which, with all their imperfections, are invaluable to the topographical archaeologist.

"Most of them visited some parts of the catacombs to pray or carry an offering to the tomb of some particular saint; but their devotion would seldom lead them far into the depths of the labyrinth. Some of them even wrote their names on the walls as a record of their visit, and if you are curious about these things, you will find the list in Agincourt. The period of study and research began with Bosio, who devoted thirty years to the subject, or rather passed thirty years of his life under ground, and died at last, before he could enjoy the satisfaction of giving the fruit of his labors to the world. You know the volume, that compact and solid quarto, with its drawings and inscriptions, and a typography that would have driven Bodoni mad. He must have been a rare lover of curious details that Bosio, and a most persevering fellow too. Some of his explorations, lamp in hand, crawling along on his knees through passages blocked up with dirt and mortar, and leading he knew not whither, are as adventurous as a search for the northwest passage. And then, if he came out at last upon a new inscription, or found wherewith to confirm some previous conjecture, he felt himself richly repaid for his toil and danger. His Roma Sotterranea, and the translation and enlargement of it by Arringhi, will always be the starting-point for a thorough study of the catacombs."

"And how far may we rely," I asked, "on the stories that are told of men being lost in their attempts to explore them."

"Many of them are true," said he. "Delille has wrought up that of the French artist into a thrilling description."

"I have never seen it," said Cole.

* "Post quam devastationem," says the chronicler of these sad events; "xl. aut amplius dies, Roma fuit ita desolata, ut nemo ibi hominum, nisi bestie morarentur."
—MARCELLIN. in Chron., p. 54.

"I can not pretend to give you Delille's words," replied the Father, "but in simple prose the story runs thus: Sometime in the last century a young artist, inspired by the enthusiasm of his profession and his age, undertook to explore the catacombs from one of the entrances in the Campagna, with nothing but a torch and a thread for his guide. As he wandered on through gallery and passage, pausing from time to time to decipher an inscription or sketch a monument, he gradually became so absorbed in his study that the thread slipped from his hand, and he had already gone some distance before he perceived his loss. Immediately he turned back and tried to retrace his steps. But how should he distinguish amidst the passages that opened on every side the one which had brought him there. He had gone but a few steps when his taper began to fade, and in a few minutes went out. He was standing before an open grave, and the last object that met his eye was the outstretched skeleton. All was darkness and silence. Advance he dared not, for there were pits and openings in the path like those we have seen so many of this morning. And then what had he to gain by plunging deeper into the hopeless labyrinth? He thought he heard a sound, and listened. But all was still. He shouted, and his voice rang through the vaults with a lugubrious knell that chilled his soul. Should he lie down by these bones and die? Should he rush blindly forward and meet a quicker death? Oh, for a ray of the sunlight that was shining so brightly above; only a few feet, perhaps ten or twelve feet, and there were the green grass, and the pure heavens, and the sweet light! And now all his life came back to him, as they say it does to drowning men; all, all, with its evil deeds, and its vain thoughts, and its idle hours, and talent misapplied, and fond hearts wantonly wounded; all, all came back fearfully magnified, knocking awfully at his soul as he stood alone where none but God could see him. And so young, and with such hopes, to die this lingering death! But a few hours ago he had set forth so cheerfully to his day's work, and now— He could bear it no longer. His brain whirled, his breath came thick and painfully, his limbs trembled, and he sank hopeless upon the ground. But as he sank, his hands touched something there unlike the cold earth. Can he believe it? He draws it cautiously toward him, raises it from the ground—it is his thread! Slowly now and watchfully, step by step, clinging fast to the precious ball, feeling his way with hands and feet, lest a mistep should precipitate him into some helpless pit, he winds his course back toward the entrance; and oh, how kindly did the stars look upon him—for day was long past—and how sweet was the air that came laden with the scents and sounds of life!

"And is the story of the collegians true also?"

"Too true. There were sixteen of them in all, and they went in as a holiday's excursion. It was several hours before any alarm was excited, and then men set out to look for them. I fear they did not do as much as they might have done; but still I know the difficulties of these labyrinths too well to cast my reproaches heedlessly. All that we can say is, that the poor collegians were never heard of again."

The Padre rose as he spoke and returned to the gallery. We continued our walk nearly two hours longer, sometimes in the first, sometimes in the second tier, and then for a while still deeper in the bowels of the earth. At last, weary almost with our sensations, and silent as the graves around us, we turned upon our steps and ascended to the day.

"There are the mountains again!" cried Cole. "From their stern heights they have looked down upon Roman, and Goth, and mediæval knight, and still they stand there the same calm emblems of duration!"

And still they stand there in the glorious sunlight, or pointing upward to the stars, as when we stood and gazed upon them together. But thou, friend and companion of happiest hours, from whose sweet converse I drew hopes and thoughts that make life a double blessing, how can I think of them without remembering thee! Years have past since last we met, years checkered with life's strange vicissitudes, and thou hast long been sleeping in an untimely grave. And when, a few weeks ago, I sat in the chair where thou didst love to sit, and gazed upon the last touches of thy pencil, and then went forth to the hillside to look upon thy grave, the memory of the hours we had passed together in the homes of the dead came back to me like a dream of yesterday. The awful veil that shuts out the living from the knowledge of all beyond the boundaries of life has been rent, and the mystery of the grave is no longer a mystery for thee. Thou hast stood side by side with those whose bones we touched in veneration and awe, and made thy home with their glorified spirits around the throne of the Almighty. For in heart thou wast of them even here, and the path by which thou walkedst on earth was like that of thine own Pilgrim, the steep and difficult path of the Cross. Peace to thy remains! Peace to the sweet spot where they lie! Other mountains—thine own dear Catskills—look fondly upon thy slumbers from their calm and majestic heights. The stream thou lovedst flows near; and hard by, with its pine groves and shady bowers, stands the home of thy affections. And thy gentle spirit pervades them all, shedding over the landscape the hallowed influences of purifying thought, and making that modest tomb on the hillside a shrine for every sincere admirer of the beautiful and the true.

DARIEN EXPLORING EXPEDITION,*
UNDER COMMAND OF LIEUT. ISAAC C. STRAIN.
BY J. T. HEADLEY.

THE following is a narrative of the proceedings of the main body of the Expedition, from a Journal kept by Mr. Kettlewell, under the supervision of Passed-Midshipman Truxton, actually in command of the party:

On the morning of the 13th, after Lieutenant Strain, with his party of three, had left, the main body, under charge of Mr. Truxton, also took up its march, and slowly followed down the stream.

The feeble seemed more lively, as the marching was good along the banks of the river and through the forest, and early in the day they thought they would make a longer journey than had been accomplished for some time. But this crooked river so doubled upon itself that they frequently retraced their steps. For instance, if the stream was running west, it would take a turn in the almost level forest and come back for miles to the east. Returning on this, the party would often get a glimpse of the river a little way off in the wood, and supposing it was farther down, cross over, and at length discover they had struck it up-stream.

Depressed in spirits, the weak and sick were soon unable to advance; and after making some two miles, they were forced to go into camp on a high bank where water was obtained with difficulty. It being still early in the afternoon, Truxton and Maury went ahead to clear a path for the next day's march through the undergrowth, where every step had to be cut with the macheta. The only food which they had was a very inferior species of nuts. During the night Vermilyea (one of the best men) suffered very much from acute pain.

On the following morning, the party left camp 25 at a quarter-past nine. The trail cut on the preceding evening was through a dense jungle, which was thickly festooned with vines, crossing and recrossing in every direction, and filled with thorns and prickles. After cutting and forcing their way in this manner for nearly a mile, they found that the edge of the stream beneath them furnished better walking; and catching hold of the vines, they slid down one by one to the beach. Here Mr. Castilla threw away his carbine, declaring he could not carry it any further. The journal says, "The necessity for the advance of Captain Strain becomes the more evident as we proceed, and is displayed in the frequent breaking down of the men, the slowness and constant halts during the march, and the increasing suffering, attributable to our diet of acid nuts, the fibres of which, remaining undigested, produce painful effects."

On the river bank, about two miles from the last camp, they found some palmetto and some nuts, which were divided among the party. Mr. Truxton shot an iguana, which was given to the sick and feeble, and an hour granted them to recruit. A handsome scarlet-blossomed tree relieved the eye from the sameness of the ordinary forest growth.

At four o'clock they went into their 26th camp, and made a scanty supper on "pulsely" and nuts.

The next morning they left camp at half past eight, and on climbing the river bank started a fawn, which, however, disappeared in the wood as an unsuccessful shot was fired, carrying the very hearts of the hungry travelers with him. After advancing about a mile and a quarter, Lombard became very faint, and compelled them to halt. While awaiting his recovery, they cut down some acid nuts, which by roasting they made out to eat. A little later, Mr. Truxton shot a crane in a wet ravine. During the day heavy reports were frequently heard of falling trees, which sounded like distant guns; and every time the deep echo rolled away, the men would look at each other and exclaim—"The Captain must be through, and is firing guns on board the British ship for us." The river became wider and deeper as they advanced, and the current slower.

Soon after, Harrison, one of their best men, broke completely down, and they were compelled to encamp, after having made less than five miles from their last resting-place. These were short marches; but this fact, at the time, caused but little uneasiness, as they supposed Strain was making long ones.

A slight shower fell toward morning, and a little before ten o'clock, Mr. Castilla breaking down, they halted; and while waiting for him to recover, cut down some palmetto and nut trees. Mr. Castilla getting no better, declared he could march no farther, and so they went into their 28th camp, not having made more than a mile and a quarter. He always broke down when they came to any food. In this case, however, it was fortunate, otherwise they would have passed a note written by Captain Strain, which was found near the bank. The party at the time were a little back from the river, and Truxton, speaking to Maury, said, "Jack, push in and find the river." In doing so, the latter came upon this note stuck in a split stick. He immediately called out, "Here's a note from Strain!" They all rushed together, when Truxton read it aloud. The following was the note:

"DEAR TRUXTON—We encamped here the night we left you (Monday night). Look out for a supply of palm-nuts, as they appear to grow scarce as we descend. We are off at once, and hope to make a very long march to-day. This river appears to me more and more like the 'Iglesias,' and I have strong hopes of popping out suddenly in Darien Harbor. You may rely on immediate assistance, as I will not lose one moment.

"Your friend, I. C. S."

After the reading, Truxton called for three cheers, and "Hurra! hurra! hurra!" rang in excited accents through the wilderness. "Now, my lads," said Truxton, "You see how far the Captain has got ahead; he'll be back in a few days." This cheered up the spirits of all the party, and especially the sick, who now felt that the probabilities of assistance from below were very strong. Owing to the debility of Mr. Castilla and the inflamed condition of Holmes's foot, they did not attempt to march the next day, and subsisted solely on palmetto, "pulsely," and palm-nuts.

The third day poor Holmes could not lift his swollen foot from the ground, and the order to march was not given.

The men lay scattered around on the ground, with the exception of a few who went out hunting. Harwood shot a turkey, Harrison and Mr. Maury each a hen buzzard, while Mr. Maury brought in some palmetto. The men then gathered round the fire, and began to pluck the buzzards and turkey. The entrails were given as an extra allowance to the shooters.

The next day was Sunday, and owing to the debility of Mr. Castilla and continued illness of Holmes, no attempt was made to advance, and early in the morning Harrison went out to hunt.

The men lay under the trees listening; and as each report echoed through the woods would exclaim, with the eagerness and delight of starving men, "There's something!" The spot where they were now encamped was a little tongue of land, running out into the river, overshadowed by trees, and presented, with its location and surroundings, a most picturesque aspect. Truxton lay on his back, pondering the condition and prospects of his party, when Harrison returned with his haversack loaded down. Looking up, he said to the latter, "What have you killed?" "The devil," replied Harrison; and pulling out an animal weighing some eighteen pounds, he threw it down, exclaiming, "Tell me what that is, if you please." "A wild hog," replied Truxton. This windfall filled the men with high spirits, and they fell to cutting up the animal. Truxton took the liver for himself, and soon all hands were gathered round their fires, toasting each his piece of wild hog on a stick. By the time the meat was done the bristles had all disappeared. This was a good substantial meal, and proved very opportune; as the men, covered with boils and suffering from hunger, had become very desponding. They named the place "Hospital Camp," from the number of sick in it. No one thought of marching, for Holmes could not move unless he was carried, and the party was too weak to do that. They had only, therefore, to wait till death should relieve him from his sufferings. The next day the hunters got only two buzzards and some palmetto, which were divided among the fourteen and soon consumed. About sunset a heavy report came booming through the forest, electrifying the men into life. "There's a gun! there's a gun from the Virago!" was shouted by one and another. "The Captain's safe, and will be here in a day or two." The British steamer Virago was known to be in Darien Harbor, waiting to give assistance to any of the parties that might need it on the Isthmus, and they supposed that Strain was on board and fired a cannon to let them know of his safe arrival. The cheering announcement was like life to the dead; but like many other suddenly excited hopes, this one also was doomed to bitter disappointment. What was taken for the report of a cannon proved to be the heavy crash of a falling tree—falling without wind or ax, eaten down by the slowly corroding tooth of decay. The next day two hen buzzards and a little palmetto, "pulsely," and nuts were all they had to subsist on. Even the buzzards gave out the day following. They were revived, however, by the sound of what appeared to be the report of three heavy guns. The night, however, wore away in silence, but at daybreak another report was heard, kindling hope only to deepen despair. Parties went out hunting during the day, but were unsuccessful in obtaining game, so they were obliged to subsist upon nuts and palmetto this day also.

Says the journal: "Thursday, February 23. Holmes still unable to walk. Harrison had a chance at a piccary, but unfortunately his cap missed. About 5.30 all in both camps simultaneously exclaimed, 'A heavy gun from S.W.' At sunset, Harrison shot a small animal called a 'coingo' by the natives, although it bears no resemblance whatever to a rabbit. 'It was very small, with flat ears, nose and teeth squirrel-like, color gray, long-backed, short-tailed, and with four claws on its fore-feet and three on its hind-feet; its weight was about ten pounds.' Harrison slept out in a ravine during the night to watch for game, but obtained nothing.

"Friday, February 24. Holmes's foot still very sore, and Mr. Polanco suffering from a swollen leg. No food but nuts and palmetto."

During these days of darkness and famine, rendered still worse by the want of occupation, thus giving them time to reflect on their forlorn condition, the two young officers, Truxton and Maury, as soon as the camp got quiet, would crawl away into the bushes, and discuss, in a low tone, their prospects, and the probable fate of Strain. The journal continues:

"Saturday, February 25. Mr. Maury and Harrison out hunting early in the morning, but returned unsuccessful. Holmes somewhat better, and hopes to be able to march to-morrow.

"Sunday, February 26. Holmes pronouncing himself better, the party moved on about half a mile, which was as far as he could walk. Although the distance attained was small, an object was gained in removing the party from a camp which had been so long occupied. During the march we cut some nut and palmetto trees. Our new camp, which was in the wood near the river, was named Hospital Camp, No. 2, owing to continued sickness and debility in the party, and we were now below the rapid, the noise of which would have intercepted the sound of guns, which we still hoped to hear from Darien Harbor." The effort of Holmes to walk was so painful and difficult, that when Truxton had made the half mile the former had moved but a few rods, while the debilitated party was strung along the whole distance. Holmes soon gave out, and the report of his condition passed along the line. Truxton lay down, declaring he would not go back, and so Holmes hobbled and was lifted along, and the new camp cleared away. The day was a sad one—no meat, and but a few nuts.

The next day Holmes was very ill. At nine in the evening they again fancied they heard a sharp gun-report, not the booming sound of a heavy cannon, and they were cheered with the hope that the Captain fired on his way up the river. They talked it over a long time by the flickering fires, but at last lay down in gloomy disappointment.

When Mr. Kettlewell went to the men's camp on this morning to see Holmes, he was informed that the Granadian commissioners had been attempting to induce some of the party to leave the officers and return with them to the Cyane. The men generally appeared to be discouraged; some doubtful of Captain Strain's return, others whether this river entered at all into Darien Harbor. Mr. Truxton remonstrated strongly with Mr. Castilla for tampering with the men. The latter denied the accusation, but promised Mr. Truxton any amount of money if he would only return.

Mr. Maury shot a hawk, which was given to Holmes, who, without more animal food, it was apparent could not long survive, as he was totally prostrated, and continued so all the day. Taciturn, and apparently resigned, he said but little, but lay stretched, a mere skeleton, on the ground, from which it was evident he would never arise. Says the journal:

"Thursday, March 2. Mr. Maury, and a party who went out to hunt this morning, returned with some palmetto and a turkey, which, though when divided it gave each one but a small portion, somewhat revived them. Some small, round black berries, resembling chincapins, were found and eaten. They were few in number, and proved to be a purgative, for which some of the party afterward used them, to counteract the effects of the acid nuts.

"A singular species of worms, called by the natives 'Gusano del Monte'—Worm of the Woods, was found under the surface of the skin, and covered over like a blind boil. As to the manner in which it was deposited no information could ever be obtained; but it appeared to grow rapidly, in some subsequent cases attaining the length of one inch, and was extremely painful, especially when in motion.

"The party subsequently suffered very much from these worms, and, in some cases, were obliged to have them cut out by the surgeon after the journey had terminated."

"Friday, March 3. Early this morning Lombard, Parks, and Johnson left the camp without permission; and it being discovered that they had taken their blankets and cooking-utensils, it was supposed that they intended to desert, and attempt, by following up the river, to regain the Cyane. Previous to this Lombard and Parks would, every day, go a short distance into the woods and pray—the burden of their prayer being the return of Strain. After prayer they remained to talk matters over, and finally matured a plan to hide away till Holmes died and the party left, and then return and dig up the corpse, and filling their haversacks with the flesh, start for the Atlantic coast. But after an absence of some two or three hours, and losing their way, and getting frightened, they commenced firing signals. Truxton, however, forbade his men to return the fire, and for a long time left them to wander about. Sometimes they would come close to the camp, and he could hear them talk, but the thick brushwood concealed the party. At last he ordered the signals to be returned, and they came into camp alarmed beyond measure, and most penitent. Parks confessed that Lombard, who at various times during their distressed condition had shown symptoms of alienation of mind, and himself had formed the diabolical plan mentioned above.

"Nothing can give a more vivid conception of the forlorn condition of the party than this horrible proposition; and both of those who entertained it afterward expiated most fearfully their intended outrage against military discipline and against human nature." But it must be remembered that men grow mad with famine. During the day they found a dead iguana half eaten up by flies and worms; on this they fell like wolves, and devoured it raw. Three eggs were found inside, over which some of the men quarreled.

Holmes was very low to-day, and scarcely able to articulate. Mr. Maury went out to hunt, and returned with some of the best nuts which had been for a long time seen in camp. The journal adds: "We can not surmise what has become of Captain Strain, now absent nineteen days. Nuts, palmetto, and game become daily more scarce."

On Saturday, Holmes sent for Mr. Truxton at an early hour, and, though his speech was already indistinct, he expressed hopes that he might recover. He confessed that his name was fictitious, and that he formerly belonged to the marine corps. He was the one who had made a fife out of bamboo, and in the early part of the expedition used to make the company merry with its music.

About eleven o'clock a loud call from the men's camp of "Mr. Truxton! Mr. Truxton!" carried all over to see Holmes breathing his last. It is inserted in the journal: "After death he presented, even to our debilitated party, a most emaciated appearance; while his left foot, which had been pierced by a thorn many weeks before, was in a condition which threatened decomposition, if it had not already taken place." Allusion has been made, in a previous part of this narrative, to his having lost his boot while attempting to obtain an iguana, which had been shot on the opposite side of the river. Through the moccasin with which his boot had been replaced he was pierced by a thorn, and being in a high degree of a scrofulous habit, the puncture never healed, and the disease which it produced, added to bad diet, no doubt produced his death.

It was thought best to bury him immediately; but they had great difficulty in digging the grave, as they had no implements but an ax, hatchet, and their knives. Mr. Maury, assisted by Corporal O'Kelly, succeeded at length in scooping out with a knife a grave about twelve inches deep, and, at sunset, all who were in camp attended the body to its last resting-place.

Truxton, deeply moved, offered up an extemporaneous prayer, and then the attenuated corpse, with the musket which he had carried so long placed beside it, was deposited in the shallow opening, and the dirt flung back with the hand. The whole party were seriously and deeply impressed with the solemn scene, and turned from the grave to talk of Captain Strain, and to wonder at his long absence. The journal adds:

"Sunday, March 5. We have now been waiting twenty-one days for Lieutenant Strain's return, and the party seems generally impressed with the idea that something has happened to prevent it, as he expected to be back in four or five days. The conclusion forces itself upon us, that if he, with three strong men, could not reach the settlements in twenty-one days, that our dispirited, debilitated, and suffering party of sixteen could never get through. A council of the officers was therefore held, and it was determined to return to the ship."

This was a painful determination to take, for Truxton's express orders were to keep down the stream till met by Strain with boats and relief. But that order was based on the certainty of the latter reaching the Pacific. His return with boats would occupy but a few days, and it did not seem possible, if he were alive, that so long a time could have elapsed without relief being sent, even if he himself were not able to accompany it. For twenty-one days those seventeen men had lain there in the wilderness, gradually wasting away with famine and now death had come to claim the first victim. Day after day, and night after night they had waited, and watched, and listened, now cheered by the apparent report of a distant gun, which they believed their commander had fired in Darien Harbor, to tell them he was through, and to bid them be of good courage, for help was at hand, and again quickened into sudden joy as they thought they heard the nearer sound of his carbine, till hope had given way to settled gloom. The silent forest still shut them in, the sullen echo of its falling trees only making them more desolate, by reminding them of the cannon of their own ship, whose roar for so long a time had made the sunset welcome. To the oft repeated question, "Where is Captain Strain?" had now succeeded the melancholy response—"He is dead!" To push on was madness, for all said if Strain with three strong men could not get through in twenty-one days, they, encumbered with the sick and feeble, could never get through. It had taken them, when much stronger, three days to reach his first encampment after he left them. Whether he had perished with famine, or been devoured by wild beasts, or slain by Indians, could only be conjectured. It was simply evident that no safety lay in that direction. To stay where they were, around the grave of their partially covered comrade, was also certain death, for game could no longer be found, while the nuts and palmetto were every day becoming more scarce. Besides, the long rainy season was fast approaching, when marching in any direction would be impossible. The return seemed equally hopeless, for if when starting fresh with ten days' provisions on hand they had encountered such suffering and want in reaching the spot they then occupied, how could it be possible to retrace their steps in their present enfeebled condition? The only gleam of hope remaining to them was that they might reach the plantain and banana fields they had left far up the river, and there recruit. Still, Strain had left no conditions with his orders, so certain did he feel of getting through; and if he should yet return and find his command gone, and trace them up by their dead bodies scattered along through the forest, Truxton felt that heavy blame might attach to him. On the other hand, should Strain never return, he might be blamed for not assuming more responsibility. It was a most trying position in which the young commander found himself, and long and painfully he revolved it. "Oh, for light to direct me!" was his constant prayer. Of himself he scarcely thought. If his death could purchase the safety of those intrusted to his care, the sacrifice would be cheerfully made. Could he only see clearly what was duty, his chief anxiety would be over. But turn which way he might, not a ray of light visited him. Thrown back upon himself, he was compelled to rely on his own judgment and that of his brother officers. Lieutenant Maury, who looked at all these grim dangers with a cool and steady gaze, and met them with an iron will and unshaken courage, also felt that sound reason counseled the attempt to return. Besides, the other officers and the men, and Granadian commissioners, pleaded earnestly for it. He therefore determined, now Holmes was dead, to commence his backward march immediately. Before leaving, however, he wrote the following letter, in case Strain returned, and placed it in a detonating cap-pouch, which he hung on a cross erected over Holme's grave:

"March 5, 1864, No. 3 Hospital Camp.

"DEAR STRAIN—This is Holmes's grave. He died yesterday, March 4, partly from disease and partly from starvation. The rapidly failing strength of my party, combined with the earnest solicitation of the officers and men, and your long-continued absence, have induced me to turn back to the ship. If you can come up with provisions soon, for God's sake try to overtake us, for we are nearly starving. I have, however, no doubt of reaching the plantain patches if the party be able to hold out on slow marches, and reaching them, I intend to recruit. Since you left I have been detained in camp eighteen days by the sickness of Holmes and the Spaniards.

"I trust I am right in going back, and that when you know all more fully, you will approve of my conduct in the course, the more particularly as even the palm-nuts and palmetto are no longer sufficiently abundant as we advance for our sustenance, and as I am now convinced that something most serious has happened to yourself and party to prevent your return to us.

After long and serious deliberation with the officers, I have come to the conclusion that the only means of securing the safety of the party, of saving the lives of several, if not all, is at once to return in the way and to the place of provisions.

"With the kindest remembrances and best wishes of the party for your safe return to the Cyane, and a happy meeting aboard, I am, yours truly,
W. T. TRUXTON.

"To Captain I. C. Strain, U.S.N.,

"In Charge of the Isthmus Darien Party, etc."

HOLMES'S GRAVE.

Harrison, Harwood, and Vermilyea, who had been out all day hunting, returned in the afternoon, and reported that Parks had left them at daybreak with a supply of palmetto for the party. He had, however, not arrived in camp, and from his continued absence they concluded that he had lost his way or deserted. Many signals were made from camp for him, and a council held to consider whether to remain longer or proceed the next day. The latter course was determined upon in consideration of the dearth of provisions and general and increasing weakness of the party.

The next morning, March 6, Lombard's whistle piped the exciting strain, "Up anchor for home!" the one always used when the order to return is given by the commander of a ship. To its stirring notes the seamen tread round the capstan with a will; and on no other occasion does the heavy anchor lift from its muddy bed with such a swift and steady pull as then. So now, gathering up their empty haversacks and rolling up their blankets, and flinging aside useless pistols and muskets, they soon stood ready to march. This was the last time poor Lombard's whistle roused up the famished wanderers, or woke the echoes of the forest with its music. They felt sad on leaving Parks wandering about alone in the forest; but the prospect of return quickened every heart, and in two hours they made a distance which it had taken them three days to accomplish in their downward march. Here, at "Indian Camp," as they had previously named it, they halted, and breakfasted on some nuts. They remained here for three hours and a half, firing signals for Parks. A council was then called, to determine what course to pursue, when it was unanimously decided that the welfare of the whole required them to leave him to his fate; and about mid-day they recommenced their march. Mr. Maury, a little after, shot a marmoset, which being divided into four parts, was given to the weakest, and soon after some large red nuts were discovered; "Providence," says the journal at this point, "smiling graciously on our return."

Mr. Polanco was all day very feeble, and delayed the party very much, which, though weak, was enlivened by the idea of progress, after lying so long idle in camp. Formerly the order "Halt," passed down the line, was heard with pleasure; but it now seemed to take so many hours from the time that should intervene between them and a bountiful supply of food. Having accomplished some seven or eight miles, they encamped on the river, a short distance above the twenty-seventh camp of their downward progress. This was No. 1 Return Camp, and marked the longest march that was made while ascending the river.

The next morning, at a little after six, breakfastless, and with no food in prospect, they started cheerfully off, cutting their way as they went. Mr. Maury, the chief hunter of the party, shot a hawk during the forenoon, and cut down some nut trees, which afforded a slight breakfast. At two o'clock Mr. Polanco was suddenly seized with fainting and cold extremities, while his eyes became glassy and fixed. His illness from this time continued to delay the return very much. His prostration increasing hourly, he was assisted along by the sailors during the afternoon, and with much difficulty the party reached the second return camp, which was about one mile below the twenty-sixth on the downward march.

It is entered in the journal: "Wednesday, March 8. Left camp at 6.30 A.M., proceeding slowly, in consequence of Mr. Polanco's continued illness. During the morning march some acid nuts were obtained; and, after many delays, the camp was reached at which the advance party had separated from the main body."

"At 1.30, with gloomy anticipations, we left the parting camp. Miller was permitted to throw away his carbine, owing to his inability to carry it. Mr. Polanco again failed after leaving this camp, and delayed the party a long time. A tree was finally met with which produced a species of the palm-nut, the covering of which resembled mangoes. As it was too large to cut down, as many as possible were obtained by firing into the clusters. Revived somewhat by this food, the party reached No. 3 Return Camp at 4.50 P.M."

It was sad to see the eagerness with which the men watched each discharge of the carbine into the tree-tops.

After suffering much annoyance from mosquitoes during the night, the party commenced their painful march at eight in the morning, but owing to the illness of the Granadians, little progress was made. "Halt, halt!" rang continually along the line, and the men lay down to wait for the commissioners. Two turkeys were seen, but neither could be obtained. Mr. Castilla being unable to proceed, a woodpecker which had been shot was given to him, which he ate raw, before the feathers were half plucked away. James (landsman) was permitted to abandon his carbine, in order to assist the two Granadians, who hourly grew worse. Overcome with fatigue, they would throw themselves on the ground and weep, bitterly mourning, in their native language, for the friends at home they were destined never to see. Their frequent fainting fits obliged the party to encamp, after repeated stoppings, at half past three.

Nearly all were very weak, and the distance marched could not be very accurately estimated, owing to the frequent halts, but was probably about three miles and a half.

The next morning the Granadians appeared very feeble, while Lombard and Harrison also suffered exceedingly; but at eight o'clock they left camp, and staggered on. Little progress, however, was made, owing to the increasing illness of Messrs. Castilla and Polanco. The traveling, too, in the early part of the day was very trying, being for the most part through a thick jungle, that flogged and tore the men as they floundered on. During the day a few acid nuts were found. Mr. Truxton used every means—persuasion, promises, fear—to induce the Granadians to move on, but Mr. Castilla still grew worse, and would not get up. A lofty tree, filled with a multitude of cranes, was discovered, and several shots were fired into it. Mr. Maury killed one and wounded another, which escaped. Encamping at four o'clock, the party feasted upon the crane (the largest bird yet killed) and some "pulsely" which was gathered near the camp. During the night there was a heavy dew, and the party were much annoyed by mosquitoes.

The next morning the men seemed somewhat improved by the animal food of the night previous, although Lombard, being rather aged, appeared to derive but little benefit from it. Harwood was permitted to throw away his injured carbine, to enable him to carry his blanket and hammock. Since the debility of the party, especially that of the Granadians, had become so great, all hands were called early every morning to prepare some "pulsely" water, acid-nut tea, or other warm beverage, with which to sustain the stomach while marching. The delays were solely attributable to the weakness or want of energy of the Granadians, though every assistance was given them that the men could bestow. Corporal O'Kelly and M'Ginness were allowed to throw away their carbines, to assist them. Leaning heavily on the shoulders of these two men, who were scarcely able to take care of themselves, these commissioners limped slowly along. As one skeleton, with its arm thus thrown around another for support, begged for delay and still more aid, a most striking illustration was furnished of the difference in endurance and courage between the two races. But even this assistance soon ceased to be of avail; and shortly after leaving camp, Mr. Castilla fell down, apparently insensible, and remained in that state for two hours. Cold water was thrown over him, and every means used to revive him; and at length he opened his eyes. Mr. Maury, in the mean time, having shot a dove, the half of it was given to him, and eaten raw, which enabled him, after much difficulty, to reach the river, where they halted.

Just before dark, while the men lay stretched around their fires and all was quiet in camp, Truxton strolled out into the woods to see if he could obtain any nuts. He had not proceeded far when he observed something breathing in the grass. At first it looked like a negro baby lying there; then he thought it must be a wild cat. He had nothing but his knife with him, and drawing that, he crept stealthily toward the mysterious object. But before he got near enough to strike it, the animal arose, and stretching its wings flew with a heavy swinging motion across the river. It was the crane that Maury had previously wounded. Cursing his stupidity in not making a rush for the bird at once, and thus secure food for his starving men, he saw it slowly fly away, and gazed after it as a wrecked mariner strains his eye after the vanishing sails of a ship. Heretofore the officers had given all the meat to the men to enable them to march, but being compelled to do all the cutting through the jungles themselves, and soon after prepare all the camp fires, they began to feel the necessity of something more nourishing than nuts, or they too would speedily give out. So after this, when a buzzard, or lizard, or any form of animal life was obtained, they first sucked the blood themselves, and then distributed the food to the men. At this time Truxton and Maury would often go forward together to clear a path, or one to cut and the other to shoot. Lieutenant Garland then took charge of the rear-guard, and it required all the arguments of persuasion, and all the power of his authority, to keep the stragglers moving. The distant prospect of food ahead could not overcome the desire of present rest. The prospect now looked gloomy enough. Castilla was getting deranged, and had become fearfully changed. His eyes were glassy, and glared like those of a wild beast from their sunken sockets. He said but little, and when he spoke his sepulchral cry was, "Meat! meat! give me some meat!" A small bird being divided between him and the junior commissioner, he devoured his portion voraciously, and then, as senior in rank, fiercely demanded of the latter his half. Among officers and men there was now but one object—food. One thought filled every breast, one desire animated every heart. There seemed but one object in the universe worth seeking after—food. The eye was open to only one class of objects, the ear to one class of sounds, some article of food and some cry of animal or bird. Wan and haggard, they looked like spectres wandering through the woods, yet no rapacity marked their conduct—at least that of the Americans. None hid their food. One sentiment of honor actuated every heart, and each divided cheerfully with the other, furnishing a striking illustration of the power of example in officers over their subordinates. Had the former claimed a larger share, or allowed suffering and famine to render them selfish, those men would have become wild beasts. Lieutenant Maury especially exhibited the noblest traits that adorn human nature; I say especially, because he was the chief hunter, and could at any time, unknown to the rest, have appropriated to himself at least some of the nuts he obtained. But that most demoralizing of all things, famine, had no power over him. Forgetting his own destitution, he hunted only for others, and his joy at success, sprung from the consciousness that he could relieve the suffering men who looked to him for food. Undismayed, composed, and resolute, he, with the other officers, moved quietly on in the path of duty, and all by their example effected more than any mere authority could ever have accomplished. When men see officers toiling for their welfare, refusing even to share equally with them, forcing on them the larger and better portion, and then each, with his meagre allowance, turn away to get more food, they will die rather than be untrue or disobedient. Such example ennoble them by keeping alive within their bosoms the sentiment of honor, and enables the soul, even amidst the extremities of human suffering, to assert its superiority to mere animal desires and physical pain.

Says the journal here: "Providentially, as we had no other means of subsistence, Mr. Truxton found the body of the crane which Mr. Maury had wounded yesterday. It had fallen on the opposite bank of the river, and ate all the better for being a little gamy." The colored man, Johnson, swam the river for it, and it was soon devoured, entrails and all. Owing to the mosquitoes and sand-flies none could sleep, and the camp resounded with the moans of the men.

The next morning was Sunday, and at seven o'clock the order to march was given, but in a quarter of an hour Mr. Castilla fainted again, and it soon became evident that his suffering journey had ended. Every effort to revive him proved abortive, and a little after noon, without making a sign, he died. A ring taken from his finger, a lock of hair, together with all the property found on his person, were given to the junior commissioner, Mr. Polanco. He had for a long time complained of his knee, which he kept bandaged with his handkerchief. This was unbound to examine the cause of his suffering, but though dwindled away to a skeleton, neither limb showed any symptoms of disease. Maury and Corporal O'Kelly, with their sheath knives, dug a shelf in the bank and stretched the Granadian commissioner upon it. The attenuated forms of the men, but half covered with rags, then gathered round the grave, and gazed with haggard features on their dead comrade, while Truxton offered up a short prayer to Him who alone seemed able to save them. Polanco would not go near, but stood a little way off, weeping bitterly, and declaring he could not leave his friend. The dirt was flung back over the form scarcely yet cold, and with sad, melancholy forebodings the party turned away, and the order to march passed down the line. Death had begun to claim its victims, and it was evident, from the appearance of the men, that it would now traverse their file with a more rapid footstep than it had hitherto done. The sudden energy inspired by the thought that they were returning to the ship had given way before present famine and weakness, and as one after another yielded to his fate, the moral and physical force which hope imparts, also left them. This was the case especially with Mr. Polanco, the junior commissioner. Grief at the loss of his friend and companion, added to the increased desolation of his position, was evidently fast sapping his remaining strength.

Whether because absorbed in the calamity that had overtaken them, or from some casualty, does not appear, but they had not proceeded more than three quarters of a mile when they lost the river and became completely entangled in the jungle.

At this juncture, a return of Mr. Polanco's illness obliged them to encamp for the night, nearly destitute of provisions and utterly without water. This was the only night during the whole Expedition that the party encamped without water; and, independent of the physical suffering, the circumstance spread a gloom over the minds of all. They had kept marching until very late, in hopes of reaching again the river; and when the word was passed from the rear to van that Mr. Polanco had fainted, and the order to halt was given by Mr. Truxton, he, Mr. Maury, and some of the men were a quarter of a mile in advance. As they halted, the weak and debilitated party laid down where they found themselves in the matted forest, and for the first and only time it displayed the characteristics of a rout. This was the blackest night yet experienced, not only from the death-scene they had just witnessed, and the absence of water and provisions, and loss of the river, but from the fact that the men were too far apart to converse with each other. The officers, however, moved backward and forward to cheer them, and by great effort succeeded in kindling two fires, about a quarter of a mile apart, which somewhat relieved the gloom of the night, and served as beacons to the stragglers along the path. This was Sunday; and next morning, after a night of torture, owing to the myriads of mosquitoes which infested the forest, the party, without breakfast or water, started from camp at half past six. Mr. Polanco was scarcely able to move at all; and, after having proceeded about half a mile, fainted, and only returned to consciousness to give himself up to complete despair. He requested that a paper might be drawn up, giving to Corporal O'Kelly and James Mc'Ginness, who had assisted him during the march, all the money which he had left on board the Cyane. He also stated that Mr. Castilla had expressed a similar wish prior to his death. This paper being drawn up, was signed by Mr. Polanco, and witnessed by Midshipman Garland and Mr. Kettlewell, after which it was placed in the hands of Mr. Truxton.*

The party halted a long time to satisfy every one as to the possibility of Mr. Polanco's recovery. If they had been by the river, or known of its whereabouts, they might have delayed longer; but they were without water or provisions, for both of which the men were suffering exceedingly, and knew not how long a time might elapse before they could be obtained. One thing was certain, these must be reached soon or not one but many would be left in the forest to die. Under these painful circumstances, a council of war was called, and it was submitted, "Whether the life of one man who could not survive many hours should be regarded before the lives of the fourteen now remaining?" The opinions of all being taken, it was unanimously resolved to leave him to his fate and proceed. Poor Polanco then rose and tried to march; but after staggering a few steps he sunk heavily to the earth. Each one in succession of those nearest him then went up and bade him good-by. As Truxton turned away, Polanco shrieked after him, begging most piteously not to be abandoned there in the forest. Three times Truxton, at his beseeching cries, which thrilled every heart with agony, went back to bid him farewell; and at last, with streaming eyes, gave the order, "Forward." Poor Polanco lay doubled up on the ground, moaning piteously; but soon the last sounds of the retiring footsteps of his comrades faded away in the forest, and he was left alone to die. How long he lay there was never known; but it was afterward discovered that he succeeded in crawling back to the grave of his friend, and stretching himself upon it, died; for his skeleton was found lying across it by Strain. Even a grave was a better companion than solitude.

The party, after floundering for a long time

* This order upon Commander Hollins, of the Cyane, was never presented, their property on board having been previously turned over to their relatives at Carthagena, when the fate of the party was uncertain. The amount of money was small.

through the thick brushwood, at length struck the river again, but below Castilla's grave. Refreshed by the water of the stream, they began once more slowly to climb its banks. Suddenly Truxton caught sight of Castilla's grave, and became deeply affected. Maury, who was in advance with him, noticed it, and said, "Truxton, you are strangely moved—what is the matter?" The latter replied, that he feared the effect of that grave on his men. He therefore halted and addressed them, bidding them be of good cheer, and saying that their prospects now were brighter, for all their past delays had been occasioned by the Granadian commissioners, and they could now proceed more rapidly. It was evident, however, from the furtive glances which the men cast at that rude grave, and the melancholy expression of their countenances, that each one was thinking of the probable doom that awaited himself. Many could hardly stagger along, and the pain which the effort to march caused them was written in legible lines on their features. Five carbines were flung away to-day, with the permission of Mr. Truxton. Nothing can show the perfection of our naval discipline more than the conduct of these men under their accumulated sufferings. Scarcely able to drag along their own weight, each attenuated form continued to toil under the burden of its carbine until his commander permitted him to abandon it. Obedient under all—obedient and submissive even to death.

Several men now suffered severely from the "Guzanos de Monte"—wood worms, heretofore alluded to, which were extracted with much pain from different parts of the body. During this day's march a soft vegetable, full of seeds, was found, which, when boiled, tasted like a potato. Toward evening, five who had eaten the seeds were seized with violent pains and vomiting, which lasted several hours, and in some cases all night. Harrison here made his will, under the expectation of being left in the morning.

The journal of next day says: "Tuesday, March 14. Left camp at 7.30 A.M. After marching about half an hour, Edward Lombard (seaman), who had delayed the party very much yesterday, threw himself on the ground, declared his utter inability to proceed, and begged to be left to his fate. He had made the same request every day for several days previous.

"After much persuasion, Mr. Truxton led him along, allowing him to throw away his blanket and other effects. Among other reasons for refusing his request was the fear that he would go back and dig up and eat the Granadian commissioner.

"Miller, a landsman belonging to the Cyane, who suffered intensely from a bad ulcer, wept bitterly during this day's march. He uttered no complaint, but the scalding tears trickled incessantly down his face. He showed a brave and noble spirit, but his terrible sufferings would have some outlet. He declared it to be his belief that he would not march on the morrow."

VOL. X.—No. 59.—Q q

Mr. Boggs was also very much debilitated, owing to frequent vomiting. The progress of the party was painful and slow on this day, by the illness of so many of its members, and the advance very tedious; but fortunately some three or four dozen of yellow, richly-flavored nuts were procured on the way, by which all were much revived. Three nuts to a man had at last become a refreshing meal. These nuts were the more prized, as all hands had been affected by the late constant use of acid palm-nuts. Mr. Truxton's carbine burst upon being fired on the march, leaving but one carbine and a double-barreled fowling-piece among the fourteen men now remaining. A little after four, they arrived at Return Camp No. 9, an old Indian hunting-lodge, which was not seen on their march down the river. Midshipman Garland had suffered exceedingly all day from the effects of the "Guzanos de Monte," or wood worms.

It is one of the striking peculiarities of the journal before me that all these revolting, painful visitations, so dreaded by man, are chronicled like the common events of every-day life. To me, nothing can show more vividly how fearfully familiar they had become with human suffering.

Lombard became very desponding in camp this evening, and it was exceedingly mournful to look upon the old man, evidently so near his end. Mr. Maury was also very sick, owing to the seeds above alluded to, of which he had partaken freely. Says the journal:

"Wednesday, March 15. The party were called this morning at an early hour, but Edward Lombard immediately and despondingly declared his utter inability to proceed, and desired the party should be assembled in order that he might make a statement of his position to them, and abide the result of their determination.

"All having assembled, he set forth clearly and distinctly his utter and entire inability to march any further.

"He also gave his opinion upon the importance of speedily reaching some place where provisions might be obtained; and remarked that as Mr. Polanco had been left to perish to insure the safety of the greater number, he had no right to expect any more consideration. Having finished his remarks, Mr. Truxton addressed himself to the men and officers, stating clearly the case which Lombard had set forth, and then asked that each one, in the presence of Lombard, should give his vote.

"He was earnestly persuaded to try and move a little further, in hopes of reaching some nuts or something of the kind that might revive his drooping strength; but he was utterly prostrated."

Nothing can more clearly illustrate the difference between the Spanish and Anglo-Saxon races than the conduct of the Granadian commissioner and that of Lombard, an American. The one clinging to life with a selfishness and tenacity painful to behold—not a thought for the welfare of the others; not a moment's manly consideration of the trying duties and exigencies of the case. Lombard, on the other hand, begging day after day to be left, and finally demanding that a council should be called to listen to the sound reasons he could give why his request should be granted.

As he peremptorily refused to make another effort, it was unanimously resolved to leave him. Each one, as he gave his vote aloud, advanced, weeping, and divided with him the few nuts he might have on his person. Lombard received them thankfully, and asked them to kindle a fire beside him, which was done; and that a pot and knife and hatchet might be left. These requests were all silently fulfilled. As he sat, leaning against a tree, with these few articles beside him, so calmly, so methodically preparing for his abandonment, every heart was moved with the deepest pity, and his was the only dry eye there. Each one then bade him an affectionate farewell, with streaming eyes, and took his place in the file in marching order. He then requested that Mr. Kettlewell might write down his last wishes and pray with him. Kettlewell took down his few requests, and then kneeling, offered up a short prayer. Lombard, to whom the parting, now that it was to be taken forever, grew more agonizing, requested him to ask Truxton to come back once more, and bid him good-by. The latter slowly traversed the silent, motionless file, to the head, till he came to Truxton. Emaciated and wan, his clothes patched with bark, and hanging in tatters about him, this noble young commander stood leaning on his carbine, the tears one by one trickling down his haggard face. All his sympathies were aroused, and every pulse quickened into momentary action under the excitement of sorrow, but he refused to go back. He dared not trust himself again. Besides, the scene was too painful to continue—the sooner it terminated the better. The order to march was therefore passed down the file, and the party—dwindled to thirteen—mournfully moved away, and left Lombard alone in the wilds of Darien. That was the last ever seen of him. How long he lived—whether he ever struggled again for life, or whether he flung himself into the river, on the very verge of which he insisted on being placed, was never known. His boatswain's silver whistle, worth some four or five dollars, was government property, and when some one advanced to take it from him, he begged earnestly that it might remain, saying he had carried it the whole route, and could not bear to part with it now. It was the last companion that remained to him, and it was left in his possession. It had sounded its last call, and rests by the bones of its owner in those rarely-trod solitudes.

He had come on from Norfolk, for the express purpose of accompanying Strain in this expedition. The latter told him he was too old to attempt it, and offered to get him some petty office on board ship, but he would not take a refusal, and now sleeps where the sound of civilization will probably never be heard.

That day's march was a silent and sad one; but the feelings of the depressed and debilitated party were much relieved in the after part of the day by coming on the "CAMP BEAUTIFUL" of their downward march. Shout after shout went up as they entered it, and the bright green bank and scarlet blossoms that enlivened the forest presented such a contrast to the gloomy wilderness they had so long traversed, that they seemed to be entering once more the borders of civilization. Besides, this was the first downward camp they had met for several days, and it seemed like the face of an old friend.

Miller, Boggs, and Garland were the last to straggle in; and being prostrated, and scarcely able to move, it was resolved to rest here for an hour and recruit. A fire was kindled on the old spot, and many reminiscences recalled of the time they last encamped there. Strain and his party naturally became again the topic of conversation, and many regrets uttered over his probable doom. A few unripe acid nuts had been gathered on the way, which were divided; while a terrapin, caught by Corporal O'Kelly, was made into soup, and given to the three sick men. Revived by this, the latter announced themselves ready to march, and slowly struggling to their feet, fell into order. From this time on it was with great difficulty the officers could induce the men to rouse in the morning. Threats, and kicks even, were resorted to, to induce them to stir; and but for the tea which the officers made for them, it would have been almost impossible to have succeeded with any efforts.

Continuing the march about sunset, some palmetto was obtained, which being the first which had been met since the 6th instant, was thankfully welcomed. Soon after, the party encamped near the river, though access to it was difficult. "Mr. Garland still suffering severely, and applying cold water. Mr. Boggs very sick; and Miller's thigh much excoriated"—is the remark noted on the journal of the condition of things in this camp. The party supped on palmetto and roasted nuts. The time had now nearly arrived when rain might be anticipated; and the journal kept by the main body remarks in this place—"We have remarked for some days the cloudy state of the atmosphere, and rain has fallen at intervals, but not in such quantities as to excite uneasiness in regard to the approach of the rainy season: if that catches us on the Isthmus our knell is knolled. The weather now reminds us of Indian summer at home."

"Thursday, March 16. At daylight, all who were able went to work to cut down some palmettoes which were found in the vicinity of the camp. The trees were small, and the scanty supply which they yielded was carried until breakfast time." During the march Mr. Truxton lost his revolver from the holster, while cutting a path for the party through the jungle. The journal states, during the first portion of this day's journey, "Mr. Garland still suffering, and extremely distressed marching; Miller a little better; and Boggs very weak, and unable, as he has been for some days, to carry any thing." Between 11 A.M. and 3 P.M. the party halted for rest and breakfast. Resuming its march, five Indian hunting-lodges were passed, in one of which was found the head of a catfish, nearly fresh. "Saw," says the journal "a large dark snake, about six feet long, but could not catch him!" Indians appeared to have visited this vicinity since the downward march; and on this day some baskets were seen made of twigs recently cut.

Mr. Maury shot a bird of the toucan tribe—bill about three and a half inches long, one and three quarters thick, dark green, yellow tipped, and slightly curved; color of plumage golden yellow, shaded by blue, blue and gray, speckled white, grayish, and grayish tinted from head along the back. The principal part of this bird was eaten by Messrs. Boggs and Maury, who were quite unwell—the latter from the effect of the seed before alluded to; and it should be mentioned, for the credit of the men composing the expedition, that they insisted upon Mr. Maury taking a large share of the bird himself.

As remarked before, the officers hunted game for the party, rarely reserving any thing for themselves. It was for this reason, and fully appreciating the generous devotion of these officers, that when Mr. Maury became ill, the men insisted on his eating a sufficiency of the bird which he had killed, to restore the tone of his stomach. When such a feeling exists between officers and men, and when it is displayed under such trying circumstances, it affords the strongest evidence of the perfect discipline which generally prevails among organized bands of our countrymen, who are the most subordinate and amenable to law of any people whom it becomes the duty of a naval officer to control.

During the progress of the party the remainder of this day some palmetto was obtained, and a fruit resembling the May apple in form and color, but with a pulp something less pungent than the monkey pepper-pod.

At five o'clock they went into camp on a high bank near the river. The journal states that in this camp "the mosquitoes were not so ravenous as usual." The next day they started at half past six. The weather was cloudy, and apparently threatening rain. Mr. Garland suffered very much from inflammation, attributable to the worms which could not be extracted, in addition to his debility from starvation and fatigue. Miller, owing to his ulcer, which had assumed a malignant aspect, also suffered exceedingly, and walked with great difficulty. Mr. Boggs was weak, but better than the day before, and marched until nine o'clock, when they boiled some palmetto for breakfast. Mr. Maury shot a thrush, which was cooked for Mr. Boggs. Resting till one o'clock, they again started forward, although Miller was suffering acutely from increasing inflammation. The day, on the whole, did not prove so overcast as they expected, which encouraged them. They followed the river bank closely during all the return march, thinking it safer than to attempt to cut off the bends. Besides, it was utterly impossible, with men who so frequently fainted on the route, to go far from the water, for this was their only restorative. At half past two a good camping ground was found, where it was deemed best to halt for the night, especially as some palmetto trees were found in the vicinity. The whole party were revived in spirits by the food which the palmetto afforded, and with the idea that they were approaching the banana plantations. The two palmetto trees which were cut down gave a supper to the whole band, while enough was left for breakfast in the morning. The mosquitoes made this night a sleepless one, even to the fatigued and nearly starved men.

"March 18. Left No. 11 Return Camp at 6 A.M.; the marching was found very difficult, owing to the density of the jungle. Harwood's continued illness compelled a halt at 9.15, when a scanty breakfast was made upon nuts. Mr. Boggs better; Mr. Garland barely able to walk. The sky much overcast, and evident signs of an approaching change of weather, which will probably ensue about the 21st of March. Left breakfast camp at 12 M. Stopped at 1.30 P.M. to cut down some palmetto, and moved on at 3.15. Halted again at 4 to cut down some more palmetto, the first supply having proved insufficient. Toward sunset the atmosphere more clear and pleasant. Harwood still very weak. Miller suffering less, but his ulcer shows symptoms of spreading. The men who were employed in cutting down palmetto suffering very much from their exertions.

"There is no small difficulty, in the present exhausted state of the party, in procuring voluntary laborers; nor can the responsibility and energies of Mr. Truxton and Mr. Maury, so incessantly are they called into play, ever be sufficiently felt by the party, or remunerated by the service to which they belong. Mr. Truxton had three wood worms extracted to-day—one from his throat, and two from his shoulders."

Mr. Kettlewell also had a very large one taken from his leg.

The next day was Sunday, and it was thought best to breakfast before traveling, as the men were completely worn out from gutting down the palmetto the day before. Besides, several other trees were seen near at hand, from which Truxton determined to obtain provisions for the future, as they were not certain of meeting any more during the day.

Harwood appeared now to be the weakest of the party, though all were evidently gradually but surely sinking. Miller kept constantly calling out to halt, and appeared wild and delirious. It was stated by some of the men that he had been previously subject to epileptic attacks, which the officers thought very probable. At this point the journal remarks, in a spirit of thankfulness: "This is the most cheerful day we have had for some time; weather clearer, and fine, pleasant breezes. Not so much worried by sand-flies and mosquitoes. God's providence, it would seem, ought to operate feelingly on the heart of each. Clouds drifting from northwest."

The five—all that were left able to cut down trees—procured five palmettoes; but the yield was very small. "It is now evident," says the journal, "that so exhausted are the members of the party that provisions can not be obtained except with much delay. At 5 P. M. heard a sound strikingly like a report of a carbine; but we may have been deceived, as we frequently have been before, by the sound of falling timber. Supped on palmetto and a few roasted nuts. Mosquitoes as usual very troublesome at night, and relieved at daylight by myriads of sand-flies."

This was Sunday, and the next day they started at a little past six; the weather clearer than usual, and more breeze stirring. Mr. Boggs was still very weak; Harwood also nearly gone, and both suffering very much for want of animal food; but Miller continued to bear up wonderfully against disease and debility. At ten they halted to breakfast, and rested until half past one, when the march was resumed. A very deep dry ravine and two smaller ones crossed their path this afternoon, down and up the banks of which they were compelled to struggle. "Still," says the journal, "much general complaint and debility; and it is no easy matter to muster strength and energy enough to provide the amount of subsistence absolutely necessary to enable the men to march." The weather—which was now narrowly watched—grew more unsettled and threatening. At 5 P. M. the party reached an Indian fishing-station, where abundance of wood was found; but the water was difficult of access, owing to the steepness of the river banks.

The morning of the 21st of March broke beautiful beyond conception after the dull, heavy, and depressing weather of the day before. The breeze, strong and refreshing, proved most grateful to the weary party; the more so, from the fact that the forest was generally close and stifling, owing to the density of the undergrowth. During the night all were aroused by a sound like the report of a heavy gun from the northward and eastward, and anxious looks and inquiries were exchanged; for they supposed it to be the nine o'clock gun of the Cyane. "This may be," says the journal; "but we now distrust our ears, having been so often deceived by the falling timber."

There is something inexpressibly mournful in these detached sentences, entered by a weak and half-starved man in his journal. The absence of all attempt at description; the resigned, almost humble, way of recording their sufferings and their steadily-increasing prostration, are more touching than the most elaborate narrative. It is like quietly counting our own failing pulses as they beat slower and slower to the end. No mention is made of the cries and moans that made the whole atmosphere melancholy; no description of the long sleepless night under the stars, even the refreshment of sleep denied to the famished sufferers. Every day was a picture of woe and sadness indescribable. The piteous aspect of the wan face as it leaned against a tree for temporary support; the beseeching call to halt for a moment as the stronger disappeared in the forest; the hopeless prayer for food, and sometimes for death itself, made each day's journey more sad than a funeral procession. Unmanned by debility and protracted suffering and destitution, these strong men would, one after another, fling themselves on the ground and burst into a paroxysm of tears. But these sudden exhibitions of feeling did not seem to be the result of failing hope or despair, but the mere relief demanded by overtaken nature. Wound up to the last pitch of endurance it dissolved in tears. Truxton and Maury seemed to view them in this light; for when the paroxysm came on the men they would halt, and, leaning on their carbines, let it pass, and then order the march to be resumed. It was not death they feared; it was the desolate fate of being left alone in the woods that made those more suffering and feeble attempt to march. Again and again a poor wretch would sit down, declaring he could go no further; but as the forms of his comrades vanished in the forest, he would struggle up and stagger on after them. The weaker they grew, of course the less able they were to get food, and thus hunger and weakness acted on each other. Some of them wished they might get an Indian to eat him; and though the horrible thought may have occurred to some of devouring each other, it had as yet found no outward expression; nor could it, for still true to their high obligations, those officers retained their lofty character, and through it their supreme authority. Maury and Truxton especially, though but the wrecks of men, still cheered up the sufferers by words of hope; still hewed away at the undergrowth to clear a passage; still gathered nuts, wherever they could be found, to revive their sinking natures; and still kindled fires for them by night to enliven the gloom. Nothing more vividly displays the terrible straits to which they were reduced than the following incident. Truxton, one day, in casting his eye on the ground, saw a toad. Instantly snatching it up he bit off the head and spit it away, and then devoured the body. Maury looked at him a moment, and then picked up the rejected head, saying, "Well, Truxton, you are getting quite particular; something of an epicure, eh? to throw away the head;" and quietly devoured that himself. After his return, one, in questioning him about it, remarked, "Why, Maury, I thought that the head of a toad was poisonous?" "Oh," he replied, "that is a popular fallacy; but it is d—sh bitter!" It doubtless strikes every one as strange that gentlemen, brought up in luxury, with refined tastes and fastidious as any of us, could be reduced to a state that would make such repulsive, loathsome food acceptable. But there is something stranger than all this to me; it is the extraordinary self-denial, and high sense of duty and honor, which, under circumstances so distressing, made them rob themselves to feed the men, and work on when all else had given out. To eat such disgusting food was strange, but to refuse to eat palatable food when in their possession, and bestow it on others, was far more strange and surprising.

Starvation reveals many curious psychological facts. As a rule, I think, it develops in an unnatural degree the strongest qualities that a man possesses; but circumstances modify this rule much. Among undisciplined masses ferocity and demoralization are certain results; but when its approaches are gradual, and directed and governed by noble example and the strong hand of authority, its effects are quite different. One phenomenon in this expedition, especially as it was not confined to one, but was exhibited by all the officers, not excepting even Strain at the last, deserves especial notice. From the time that food became scarce to the close, and just in proportion as famine increased, they did not gloat over visions of homely fare, but reveled in gorgeous dinners. So strangely and strongly did this whim get possession of their minds, that the hour of halting, when they could indulge undisturbed in these rich reveries, became an object of the deepest interest. While, hewing their way through the jungles, and wearied and overcome, they were ready to sink, they would cheer each other up by saying—"Never mind, when we go into camp we'll have a splendid supper," meaning, of course, the imaginary one they designed to enjoy. Truxton and Maury would pass hours in spreading tables loaded with every luxury they had ever seen or heard of. Over this imaginary feast they would gloat with the pleasure of a gourmand, apparently never perceiving the incongruity of the thing. They would talk this over while within hearing of the moans of the men, and on one occasion discussed the propriety of giving up, in future, all stimulating drinks, as they had been informed it weakened the appetite. As hereafter they designed if they ever got out to devote themselves entirely and exclusively for the rest of their lives to eating, they soberly concluded that it would be wrong to do any thing to lessen its pleasures or amount.

The journal continues: "Left No. 13 Return Camp at 6.30 A.M., after suffering less than usual from mosquitoes. Vermilyea very poorly; lay down frequently, wandering in mind. After giving way to despair, threw away his blanket, and could not assist to carry a macheta.

"Stopped at 9.15 to breakfast on palmetto, and started again at 1.30 P.M. Soon after starting Mr. Boggs was seized with a violent sickness at the stomach, and his frequent vomiting delayed the march very much, and little more than a mile has been made. Near camp crossed a very deep ravine. Neither on the march or in camp is there any disposition on the part of the men to assist in any thing requiring exertion, and but for the untiring efforts of the principal officers, neither provisions, fuel, or fire, could be had. Their strength is overtaxed, and stand it much longer they can not.

"They now light every fire, procure water, and collect fuel to cook either palmetto or nuts. Owing to the very debilitated condition of officers and men, no watches have been kept during the return march. About 10.30 P.M. a light sprinkling of rain, which lasted, with intervals, about three quarters of an hour. The remainder of the night clear, and passed with less annoyance from mosquitoes than usual."

"Wednesday, March 22. Clear beautiful morning. Left 14 Return Camp at 6.30 A.M. After marching a few yards Mr. Boggs became excessively ill, and was unable to move. Soon after Mr. Maury shot a bird, which was cooked for him." Only 600 yards had been made from camp, and even this distance he had with great difficulty and suffering accomplished. Having rested until mid-day he again attempted to move on, but immediately broke down. The principal officers then held a council on the course to be pursued in the event of the continued feebleness and helplessness of Mr. Boggs. It was apparent to all that he never would rally. The tone of his stomach and his physical strength were both entirely gone. As other members of the party were necessarily reduced while rendering him assistance in marching, it was deemed prudent to advise with Mr. Boggs on the resolution of the party to leave him, which had been unanimously carried. This course was the more imperative, as the taste for palmetto was fast declining with most of the men, some of whom with difficulty swallowed the tea made from it, while palm-nuts were getting scarcer every day. "It is now," says the journal, "becoming a point involving life and death to reach the banana plantation, and, indeed, some Indian village from whence to communicate the wants, suffering, and broken down condition of the party to the Cyane, if, as we fondly hope, she is still at Caledonia Bay. Mr. Kettlewell was deputed to speak seriously to Mr. Boggs without delay, and prepare him for being left behind should he not be able to proceed without further delaying the party. Mr. Boggs seemed somewhat prepared for this warning, and though he imparted to Mr. Kettlewell his last wishes in such case, yet with a remarkably strong tenacity for life, he did not despair entirely of future deliverance from consequences of abandonment." How touching this simple announcement. The day of grace, however, was lengthened, for just as they were about to leave him, Mr. Truxton, who had borne up against disease for some weeks, and avoided causing any delay of consequence, was suddenly attacked, and the party compelled to halt.

The journalist adds: "Mr. Boggs is respired until to-morrow, when, if he can not advance more steadily, he is to share the fate of former sufferers. He is the first officer we have been called upon to abandon. After frequent delays we reached camp about one mile ahead, where Messrs. Boggs and Truxton were attended to. Here we cut down some sour nut-trees, with great fatigue to the few who were able to assist. The fires enlivened the gloom of the forest until a late hour.

"Thursday, March 23. Left 15 Return Camp at 6.30 A.M. Mr. Truxton better, but dreading the effects of the march. Mr. Boggs hopeful of his ability to proceed. Mr. Garland suffering acutely, and Harwood fearful of not being able to accomplish the day's march.

"Philip Vermilyea requested Mr. Kettlewell to note down his last requests, and then laid himself down in despair; and at another time requested that a tin pot, some nuts, and a blanket and a hatchet might be given him. All of these requests were complied with, though the different articles were so necessary to the party, and with the most melancholy sentiments leave was taken of the dying man, when the march was continued.

"Nearly half a mile from camp, two bunches of ripe nuts were found, which the party with few exceptions greedily devoured, reserving for the future those which were not absolutely necessary to appease their immediate hunger."

While plucking these nuts Vermilyea came staggering up. The gloom and desolation of the forest as he found himself alone and abandoned, were more than he could bear, and rousing himself by a desperate effort, he had pushed on in the track of the party. As he joined them they gave him a part of the nuts they had gathered, which revived him much, and he declared he was able to go on. Further on some acid nut-trees were found, but as it would take a long time in their feeble state to cut them down, and as the entire party, with the exception of Maury and Kettlewell, were exceedingly prostrated, it was determined to encamp at this point, solacing themselves for the little distance they had made by the strange delusive promise that on the morrow they would proceed by longer marches to the plantations, but seven camps distant. Cherishing this delusive dream they stretched themselves on the ground, while Maury and Kettlewell built the fire in which to roast the few acid nuts which had been obtained. These two officers, with two or three more not so much prostrated, then went down the bank to cool the fever of their sores, and refresh themselves with a bath. To a mere looker on, the camp this night would have presented a most heart-rending spectacle. It was plain that not more than two or three could ever reach the banana plantations, while four or five must be left in the morning to starve and to die. Three knew that their fate was sealed, and looked forward to their abandonment the next day with the calm, stern eye of despair. Their young commander, Truxton, would in all human probability never lead them again. Weighed down with the terrible responsibility of so many lives resting on his exertions—taking on himself the toil which properly belonged to the men, and at the same time denying himself food for their sustenance, he had borne nobly up till the sudden attack produced by eating some unknown berries. His gallant spirit and courage would naturally keep him up to the last moment, and when he broke down the prostration would be sudden and complete. That catastrophe had now arrived, and no one was so much aware of it as himself. As he lay with his head resting against the root of a tree—his clothes in rags, his face wan, his dark eye sunken and sad, while the blood streamed from his hands, which the thorns had pierced as he cut a path through them with his knife—he presented a spectacle that would draw tears from stones. He felt that the sands of life were almost run, and that those whom he had struggled so hard to feed must leave him to starve and to die. Boggs, a young man of fortune, and who had joined the expedition as an amateur, lay near him. It was plain that he had made his last march. He was engaged to be married to a young lady in Illinois, and visions of her, together with the thronging memories of the past and gloomy forebodings of the future, swept over his spirit as he pondered the morrow. Tall and well formed, he lay a wasted skeleton along the ground. His doom was sealed. A few steps off, in the men's camp, the spectacle was still more harrowing. Some were sitting on the ground with their heads doubled to their knees, so as to press the stomach together, and lessen the gnawings of hunger; while others lay upon their backs, gazing sadly on the sky. The smoke of their fire curled peacefully up amidst the trees, whose tops glittered in the golden light of the tropical sun, as he sunk away toward the Pacific, which had been so long the goal of their efforts, and the only hope of their salvation. Harwood, a young man, twenty-two years of age, was also sitting up, and doubled together—a mere bundle of rags. His eye, which was black and piercing, had sunk far away into his head, and, with his long-neglected hair hanging down over his shoulders, gave an unearthly aspect to his whole appearance. He knew that his marching was over. Beside him, in the same posture, and almost naked, sat another young man, named Miller, who was also to be left in the morning. But little was said between them, but that little related to the dreadful fate before them. A short distance from these sat Harrison, leaning against a tree. He was about thirty-two years of age, a tall, powerful man, but now wasted to a skeleton, and but half covered with rags. His features, originally, were strongly marked, and now the shriveled skin, drawn tightly over the large lines of his face, gave to his countenance the expression of intense anguish. He had been one of the best men of the party, but starvation had done its work, and he too had taken his last step toward the banana plantations. A little farther off lay Vermilyea, also a tall man, with light hair, and, when in health, possessed of handsome features. He had been a true and faithful man to the last, and borne up with a spirit and resolution that astonished every one. He lay with his skeleton arms flung out upon the ground, from which he could not rise even to a sitting posture. The last vestige of strength had been exhausted in the effort to rejoin the party, after he had been left an hour before to die. Thus they sat and lay around—a skeleton group—watching the declining day, and thinking of the dread to-morrow. To them, and to the stronger, the thought of separation was bitter in the extreme. A common suffering had bound them together, but stern necessity must now divide them.

All was silent and sad as the setting sun sent long shadows through the forest, save an occasional moan, or a half-stifled sob, or a low prayer for food or for death. There was no keenness to their anguish, for the energies of nature were so wholly exhausted that the heart and soul had become benumbed, and almost stupefied. A settled gloom, a still despair, an appalling resignation, characterized each man, as he sat and brooded over his fate. But in this darkest hour of their trials, and just as night was descending on the forest, a report like that of a musket was heard down the river. Maury, who was standing on the shore, shouted, "Truxton, I hear a gun; shall I fire?" "Yes," replied Truxton, but never stirred. "But I am loaded with slugs" (the ammunition was getting low). "Never mind—fire away," said Truxton; and the sharp report rung through the forest. In a few moments Maury exclaimed again, "I see boats and Indians!" "Do you see Strain!?" eagerly inquired Truxton, still refusing to rise. "I see white men!" shouted Maury, the exclamation piercing like lightning every wasted frame. "Do you see STRAIN?" was still the agonized question of the young commander, as he lay stretched on the ground. There was a moment's pause, when the bewildering cry—"I see Strain! I see Strain!" brought Truxton, like an electric touch, to his feet, and he staggered toward the shore. Oh, who can describe the delirious excitement of that moment, as poor human nature attempted to struggle up the steep of despair to hope and life once more!

TO BE CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT NUMBER.

THE DOG, DESCRIBED AND ILLUSTRATED.

IT would seem to be the beneficent order of Providence, that man should be surrounded with inferior animals under his control, which, by their capacities, make up for the defects of his physical power. He has the horse, and can command his strength; and, more than all, he has the dog—the most intelligent of animals—to become his servant and friend. In order that the dog should belong wholly to man, he has been formed eminently for friendship and devotion, even at the sacrifice of much of the instinctive passions all animals have for their own kind; for the dog cares more for the society of his human friends than he does for that of his own species.

Abel, the second son of Adam, is mentioned as a keeper of sheep; the dog, therefore, was probably the second animal tamed by man, for, as the companion of the shepherd, he has been known in all time. The race undoubtedly originated in the family of the wolf and the jackal; and even now, when circumstances have occurred to cause the dog to live in a wild state, he assumes more or less the wolfish form and expression. In fact, dogs belonging to our Indian tribes and those which so infest the suburbs of Oriental cities, appear to be but little removed in physical form from the supposed original type. It has been suggested, with apparent truth, that the dog being coeval with man in the East, must have aided in a very great degree in the superior early civilization of Asia. Having the dog, the indigenous races had time to spare from the painful labors of the chase to create the blessings of industry. Hence the origin of the arts and trades, and a key to the difference in the civilization between the old and new continents; for the dog was unknown to America before it was introduced by European discoverers.

THE WOLF.

Although there exists a strange animosity between the dog and wolf, yet their habits are not dissimilar, and circumstances occur in which they form friendly relations and live in brotherhood. The wild dog—or, rather, the dog by accident returned to a wild state—will unite with the wolf to attack a beast, when the combination is necessary to insure victory. The dog and the wolf pursue the same system in hunting; while some are in ambuscade, others lead and give voice on the trail, to indicate to their accomplices the direction of the animal pursued. The half-savage hunters of the wilds of the Cape of Good Hope and of the forests of America, hold in high estimation the dogs which are runaways from civilization, and try by every art in their power to get possession of their leaders. The wolf cub can be trained to the service of man, and evidence exists that they are capable of the strongest attachment, and highly susceptible of cultivation.

The first dog that hunted in company with man, following the mighty Nimrod, was unquestionably a species of tawny greyhound, still to be seen in Syria and Egypt, and powerful enough to seize and strangle the wild boar. All nations of classic antiquity have in turn claimed the honor of the birth-place of the hunting-dog. The Greek mythology has many legends, the most striking of which is, that the twins of Leda first followed game, and we have Castor and Pollux among the stars still engaged in their favorite pursuits.

The type of the primitive animal is best preserved, among those familiar to us, in the European shepherd dog. It is a light animal, cut for the course, with eyes piercing, ears fine and straight, air alert and spiritual. Its coat of hair is rough, and its tail sweeps the ground. All hunting-dogs that we now possess proceed from this breed. In the ear of the dog we most discover the effects of domestication. The finer, more hanging and tremulous is this organ, the more the animal departs from the original type. (See how truly artificial are the dogs given in the illustration on the preceding page, copied from Landseer.) In the jackal, the wolf, and the purest shepherd dog, the ears are erect and pointed as a cat's; in fact, no wild animal of prey has pendent ears. The butcher-boy, with the instinct of a savage nature, trims up the ears of his bull-dog, and destroys with the knife the evidences of long slavery and civilization, thus restoring the head of his favorite to the truly ferocious expression, originally impressed by the Creator himself.

The dog is nowhere spoken of with kindness in the Old Testament or the New; and the Jews in the Eastern countries retain their dislike to the animal even to this day. Their example has not been lost upon the Turks; for with them the dog has no owner, and is simply permitted to exist as the scavenger of the streets. The consequence is, that the dog of the East has degenerated below the standard of the true savage; for, in his questionable position, like the half-civilized Indian, he retains none of the virtues of his original state, and acquires all the vices of artificial society. "In the East," says a distinguished traveler, "the dog loses all his good qualities; he is no longer the faithful animal, attached to his master, and ready to defend him even at the expense of his life; on the contrary, he is cruel and blood-thirsty—a gloomy egotist, cut off from all human intercourse, but not the less a slave."

Homer has used the faithfulness of the dog to give point to one of his most beautiful episodes. Ulysses, for many years a wanderer, returns to his home so altered in his appearance that the most beloved of human friends did not recognize him.

"The faithful dog alone his rightful master knew;
Him when he saw, he rose and crawl'd to meet—
'Twas all he could—and fawn'd, and kissed his feet."

In the great church at Delft, in Holland, is a magnificent mausoleum, erected in 1609, to William, first Prince of Orange; at the feet of the statue reclines a dog, which, tradition says, received such honor because he died of grief at the murder of his master.

Lord Byron had the rare experience, he writes, of having a once faithful dog forget him after a long separation. We doubt the fact, and ascribe the incident to that morbid misanthropy that discolored every thing in the poet's mind. It is probable, that returning to Newstead Abbey, his face darkened by passion and his disposition soured, he, unconsciously to himself, repulsed the first advances of his canine friend, and afterward magnified the incident, and used it to close a couplet written in the darklings of his saddest muse. We are confirmed in this opinion, because later in life he says:

"The poor dog! in life the firmest friend,
The first to welcome, foremost to defend:
Whose honest heart is still his master's own;
Who labors, fights, lives, breathes for him alone."

In treating of dogs, and in giving anecdotes of their sagacity, the question is powerfully forced upon the mind of the most casual thinker as to where instinct ends and reason begins. The great difference between animals and plants is the presence of the mental system; for we think that whenever a dog, or any other animated creature, sees, hears, or remembers, he evinces the possession of mind, which is another term for the action of the brain and nervous system. The term instinct is vague and unsatisfactory; it is the dark hiding-place of all who do not, or care not to think; for it is almost as difficult to separate the acts of instinct from the acts of the mind in human beings as it is in the lower orders of animals.

Every created thing that has a brain, has a memory, has a past, and applies its experience for the benefit of its future happiness. An old dog in a bear-hunt is as cautious of Bruin's teeth as an old broker is of suspicious stocks; and both act on the same principle—the recollection of being bitten "in a previous transaction." Insects, even, show memory and force of habit. Destroy a hive and its inhabitants—obliterate every vestige of its having been, and the few straggling bees that escape the general destruction, will for days hover over the very spot in which they were accustomed to deposit their honey, and be indefatigable in trying to hunt up their old home. Ants have friendships and antipathies; and is it therefore strange that the dog, formed for the companion of man, should have a correspondingly high development of mind? He is therefore indeed intelligent, and appears only to lack voice to give evidence of having a soul.

The dog is grateful, chivalrous, patient under adversity, and the truest of friends. He is subject to seasons of joyous exhilaration and fits of despondency. He appreciates refined society, and will often die rather than accept the company inferior to his caste. Upon comprehending the value of having a broken limb set by a surgeon, he can impart his knowledge to his fellow dogs, and bring the unfortunate of his race limping to the doctor's door. He can distinguish the intention of the knife cutting into his flesh to remove a tumor, and, amidst his pain, give forth the most affecting signs of gratitude. He does a thousand things which often display even more capacity than is manifested by some of the unfortunate sons of the human race. Where, therefore, we repeat, does reason begin and instinct end? What is the intrinsic difference between Carlo and Newton?

Man, and man alone, understands the properties of matter, and from induction as well as experience, provides for the necessities of life. In all things which most display the sagacity of animals, man is his superior. In endurance, he can tire down and kill the horse; on the trail he is more sagacious than the hound; by knowing all the laws of nature, he swims with the fish, flies with the bird; by delicate instruments, he rivals the insects in the knowledge of the changes in the atmosphere; and by arms, he overcomes the fiercest beasts of prey. The reason of animals, it is said, is limited to memory enlightened by experience—yet we may well repeat—

"Remembrance and reflection how allied,
What thin partitions sense from thought divide."

The intelligence of man, on the contrary, has no limits—the past and the present conduct him into the future; and herein he so immeasurably surpasses the brute creation. The quality of mind is the same, it differs only in the extent.

John Randolph, who was the acutest of metaphysicians, said he knew a dog once that, in pursuit of his master, came to a place where three roads branched off—the dog ran down one road and carefully scented the earth, then ran down the second road and carefully scented it, without further hesitation he rapidly took the third road and accomplished his purpose. Randolph said the argument in the dog's mind was as follows: "My master, I perceive, when he came to these forks, did not take either of the two roads I examined; therefore he must have taken the third"—thus affording an example of absolute induction, the highest effort of the reasoning power.

In giving portraits and histories of dogs, we shall commence with the lowest grade of the race, and proceed to those justly remarkable for their reasoning powers.

THE BULL DOG.

The Bull Dog is the most brutal and the least intelligent of its species; its depressed forehead, its underhanging jaw, and bloodshot eyes, unite in forming the very personification of the savage. Although capable of some attachment, it can not be relied upon as a friend. So utterly without intellect is the courage of the bull dog, that it will attack any thing that gives offense. This dog has never been a pet in the United States; but in England, among a large class of citizens, it is carefully raised, and employed in bull-baits—exhibitions that find no parallel for brutality in any other country, savage or refined. In these bull-baits the dog, while fastened to the nose of some unfortunate bull, has had one leg after another cut off with a knife, to test its courage; and this display has been hailed by the plaudits of the "rural population," and by the encouragement of the scions of the nobility! History relates that Alexander once witnessed a bull dog attack a tamed lion, and being willing to save the lion's life, ordered the dog to be taken off, "but the labor of men and all their strength was too little to loosen those ireful and deep-biting teeth." The dog was then mutilated by its keeper after the English fashion, and not only its limbs, but its body were severed from the head; "whereat the king was wonderfully moved, and sorrowfully repented his rashness in destroying a beast of so noble a spirit"—a very natural feeling, one would suppose, to every generous mind.

Many years ago an English ship was at one of our docks, on board of which was a bull dog. The animal was so ferocious that he gained an extensive reputation. Chained at the gangway of the ship, he spent the livelong day in the hopeless task of springing at every person who passed along, either on pleasure or business. The owner, first mate of the vessel, would sit for hours and detail the wonderful deeds of this mighty dog. Crowds of idlers daily collected, and there stood the hero, or rather, there raved the insane creature at the multitude, each individual indulging the vague hope, that he would presently break loose and pitch into somebody, and thus show his prowess.

Among the idlers was an Indian who occasionally visited the city, and made a few pence by shooting an arrow at pennies stuck in the end of a stick. Upon the very appearance of the Indian, the bull dog was particularly violent, greatly to the amusement of the fellow, who took a malicious pleasure in irritating the animal. The mate finally interfered, and told the Indian to go away, lest the dog might break loose and eat him up. The Indian, not the least alarmed, in broken English announced to the crowd that if the dog was brought down to the ground, and chained to a post, he would, for five dollars, fight the dog with nothing but his hands and teeth. The money was raised, and the mate, after expressing much reluctance at the idea of having the Indian killed, brought the dog down from the ship, and fastened him to a post. The Indian put away his bow and arrow, his knife, laid his neck bare, and rolled up his shirt sleeves. A ring was formed, and the battle commenced.

The Indian approached the dog crawling on all fours, barking and growling, as if he was one himself. The bull dog meanwhile jumped and fumed at the end of his chain, gnashed his teeth, foamed at the mouth, while his eyes beamed living fire with irritation. The Indian, however, kept up his pantomime, and gradually brought his face in fearful proximity to the dog's teeth. The mate now interfered, for he felt confident the Indian would get killed; but the crowd had become excited, and insisted upon "seeing the thing out." A mutual silence ensued between the combatants, the dog straining his chain in his anxiety to reach the Indian, until it was as straight and solid as a bar of iron. Suddenly the Indian seized the bull dog's under-lip between his teeth, and in an instant whirled himself with the dog, over on his back. So unexpected was the attack, and so perfectly helpless was the dog, with his feet in the air and his jaw imprisoned, that he recovered his astonishment only to give forth yells of pain; whereupon the Indian shook him a moment as a cat does a mouse, and then let go his hold. The dog, once so savage, putting his tail between his legs, retreated from his enemy, and screamed with terror to get beyond the reach of the chain.

The Mastiff is familiar and widely celebrated as the popular watch-dog. He was known in England in the earliest times, and attracted the attention of her Roman conquerors, who selected the most powerful, and sent them to the "Eternal City," where they enacted prominent and bloody parts in the Amphitheatre, in tearing down wild beasts, and human victims sacrificed for the amusement of the population. The mastiff is deeply attached to his master, but implacable to strangers. His hearing must be very fine, for he instantly distinguishes between the tread of the inmates of the household which he guards and intruders, and will announce by his sharp bark the arrival of the burglar or thief, the instant they touch the premises, however cautious they may be. The mastiff, when treated with kindness, becomes affectionate and intelligent, without losing any of its qualities as a valuable guardian of property.

The Terrier is a small, delicate dog, some of them being of exquisite symmetry. They are famous for their courage, and also for their intelligence. Almost equal to the spaniel in attachment, they are great pets with young people, and join in the sports of the juveniles with a glee that is quite inspiring. Terriers seem to have been designed especially to kill rats, for they are indefatigable in their pursuit, and will do an incredible amount of hard labor to unearth the vermin. Their courage is wonderful; they attack the fox and the otter in their holes, and generally come off victors. On one occasion we were engaged in a bear hunt, and among the pack of stout hounds was a little terrier, that ran off from the plantation, and, apparently out of pure mischief, kept up with the running dogs. Bruin was finally brought to bay, and when the hunters came up they found him on his hind-legs, the hounds forming a circle at a respectful distance from him, while the ridiculous little terrier was inside of the ring, snarling and growling, and occasionally rendering the bear perfectly insane with fury, by attempting to seize his legs.

The dexterity of the terrier in destroying rats is illustrated by exhibitions, where a dog is matched to kill a certain number of rats in a given time. A ring is prepared, the vermin are brought in bags, and, to the amount of a hundred, put into it. The dog is then set over the railing. The rats—most ferocious animals when cornered—finding escape impossible, will turn en masse on the dog, and seize hold of him, and hang on, until the terrier's head and shoulders are absolutely concealed from view. Meanwhile the courageous little creature, with immense rapidity and certainty, selects his victims, and, giving them a single bite in the loins, continues his work until all the rats are dead, finishing the hundred in seven or eight minutes.

The Scotch Terrier is similar in habits to the one already noticed, but very different in personal appearance. His hair is long and wiry, concealing his eyes and symmetry of form. The principal beauty of some of these coarse-haired terriers consists in their ugliness. They are all faithful and useful, and can appeal to every one for sympathy, on the poetical principle, that "handsome is who handsome does."

The Greyhound is the fleetest of all dogs; his form indicates his power of speed, being more light and airy than even the deer. He is principally used in "coursing," when he chases, by sight, the hare over the open country. The speed of the greyhound is very little inferior to the best horses, and in a broken country would probably outstrip the fleetest of them. Although this graceful animal hunts by sight only, his scent is very exquisite, as will be seen in the following anecdote: A hound, quite celebrated, was brought from Glasgow to Edinburgh in the boot of a coach, a distance of forty-two miles. A few days afterward she made her escape, and returned to her kennel. This hound must have followed the track she scented in the air in her journey to Edinburgh. The greyhound was the favorite of the ancient Greeks; his form frequently appears upon their best sculptures; he was the inmate of their houses, and fed from the family table. The beauty of the form of the greyhound is wonderfully harmonious with the delicate sentiment so peculiar to all Grecian art, and under the training of that wonderful people their qualities were more fully developed than in modern times.

The group of dogs claiming the most attention is the one known as Spaniels, including specimens of the race most remarkable for their docility and affectionate disposition. These good qualities are eminently combined with such unexceptionable beauty, that they are always favorites. Their fur is long and silky, sometimes curled or crisp; the ears are large and pendent, and the expression of the countenance pleasing and intelligent.

THE WATER SPANIEL.

The Water Spaniel belongs to this group, and is remarkable for his fondness for water. He is the able assistant of sportsmen in hunting the wild duck. It is supposed he was originally from Spain, and is probably descended from the large water-dog and English setter. From the moment he attaches himself to his owner, the intensity of his affection is scarcely conceivable; and he is apparently never happy unless near his master's person, resting his head upon his foot, lying upon some portion of his apparel, with his eye intently fixed upon his master, and even studying the slightest expression of his countenance.

The Setter is supposed to be the spaniel, improved in size and beauty, and by many is preferred to the pointer, in pursuit of small game. He is one of the most artificial of dogs, not enthusiastic in his disposition, and is somewhat forgetful of his training. Toussanel, who is very meritorious and very French, speaking of the setter, has the following rhapsody, in which is concealed a great deal of truth: "The setter is a product of art, as much as the Queen Claude plum or double rose; he is a dumb dog, grafted on the running dog, and which returns to the wild stock, like the double rose, when the graft fails to take effect." The setter has in his favor elegance of form, vigor of muscles, and power of thought; but he is not faithful, as has been too often asserted. The setter allows himself to be beloved by greenhorns, but he never loves any other than the accomplished hunter. We remember in our youth of having often suffered from the contempt of a setter named Ajax, whom we courted every day with wings of fowls and other delicate attentions, and who flattered us in return by every expression of his good-will while at the table, but in the field he no longer knew us.

The Pointer is used by field sportsmen to find out the spot where the game lies. He ranges the fields ahead of his master, scents the partridge and quail, and then remains with his head pointing to the spot where the game may happen to be, with an inflexible purpose, that makes him appear for the time as if carved in stone. In this attitude he continues until the gun is discharged, reloaded, and the sportsman has reached the place whence the bird "sprung." It is related that a pointer accompanying a shooting party proceeded to a wall, leaped on it, but apparently got her leg fastened among the stones, and thus remained until the gentlemen came up. Upon examination, it was found that the intelligent creature had got the scent of some partridges on the opposite side of the wall, and fearing lest her rude appearance in the adjoining field should flush them before the sportsmen were within shooting distance, she suspended herself by her fore-paws until they came up. The moment, however, she was satisfied that the sportsmen understood her ruse, she leaped into the field, and the game was thus secured.

THE POINTER.

The Fox Hound and Beagle are not very dissimilar in form and habits. They both follow their game by the scent. The fox hound, as its name implies, is used for hunting Reynard, and in every country where this exciting sport is followed, is raised with the greatest care, and immense sums of money are lavished to keep up "packs." The speed of the fox-hound is quite equal to that of the best horses, which shows how perfectly it is adapted to the chase. In England the fox-hound is so much a favorite, that it is no figurative expression to say that more books have been written upon its training, and more attention has been paid to its proper development, than ever was lavished upon the poor people of the same country. The man who has charge of a gentleman's dogs, is of more importance than the teacher of the gentleman's sons; the poor curate may be a very brute, if he only knows Latin and Greek; but the gentleman who has charge of the dogs, Mr. Beckford says, "must be young, strong, active, bold, and enterprising. He should be sensible, good-tempered, sober, exact, and cleanly—a good groom, and an excellent horseman. His voice should be clear and strong, with an eye so quick as to perceive which of his hounds carries the scent when all are running, and an ear so excellent as to distinguish the leading hounds when he does not see them. He should be quiet, patient, and without conceit. Such are the qualities which constitute perfection in the man who takes care of the dogs. He should not," continues Mr. Beckford, "be too fond of displaying them until called forth by necessity, it being a peculiar and distinguishing trait in his character, to let his hounds alone while they hunt, and have genius to assist them when they can not." Here are qualities that sum up all human perfection, requisites demanded that have never been deemed necessary to train the heir to a throne, but which are positively essential, to get a fox-hound fairly up to its Cambridge and Eton degree.

Our space will not permit us to particularize the residences of the English fox hound. They are really as splendid as art and human ingenuity, brought down to the level of a dog's wants, can make them—even the most ordinary specimens having the corners of the doorways rounded, lest they should injure the dog as he passes in and out. We have seen plans and directions for building kennels that provide for palaces, lawns, and all the "modern improvements" in house warming and ventilation, and which sink into sublime nothingness the much-cherished American work dedicated to the protection of human beings, and known as "Downing's Landscape Gardening."

The Beagle, although (as we have already observed) similar in its habits to the fox hound, yet is very diminutive, being scarcely ten inches high, and a running pack is much admired, because they keep close together—a trait of beauty and utility combined. The beagle is slow, and is sometimes followed by hunters on foot, and its principal game is the hare. The animated manners of the little beagle, flourishing among the hedges and out-of-the-way places in search of game, is exceedingly interesting, and affords juveniles, as well as older hunters, never-ending amusement. The custom in England has been to carry the beagle pack to "the ground" in bags borne by a horse; this was to keep them from forming any attachments, or from being attracted with things "met by the way."

THE KING CHARLES.

This diminutive little creature has received much of its celebrity from the fact that it was a great favorite with the merry monarch, Charles II., and frequently appears upon the pictures of the court beauties painted by Kneller and Lely. The King Charles dog is nothing but a pet, and beyond its silken ears, lustrous eyes, and soft covering, has nothing to recommend it, as it possesses none of the intelligent traits so peculiar to the larger representatives of its species.

THE BLOOD-HOUND.

The fearful Blood-hound has a scent keener than any other dog; for it is less particular than any other of its species what it pursues, and seems to readily acquire a passion for hunting human beings. These dogs have obtained an infamous reputation, by the abuse made of them in early times by the Spaniards, who, by their assistance, hunted down and killed the unoffending natives of their American possessions. Two or three centuries ago, it was much used in England and Scotland, not only to track felons, but to pursue the victims of political offenses. They were kept at one time in great numbers on the borders of Scotland, and not only set on the trail of moss-troopers, but upon fugitive royalty. Bruce was repeatedly tracked by these dogs, and, on one occasion, only escaped death from their jaws by wading a considerable distance up a brook, and thus baffling their scent. A sure way of stopping the dog was to spill blood, and thus destroy its discriminating powers: a captive was sometimes sacrificed on such occasions. A story of William Wallace is related as follows: The hero's little band had been joined by an ally, a dark, savage, suspicious character. After a sharp skirmish at Black-Edneside, Wallace was forced to retreat with only sixteen followers. The English pursued with a Border blood-hound. In the retreat the ally tired, or affected to do so, and would go no further. Wallace having in vain argued with him, in hasty anger struck off his head, and continued his retreat; the English came up, but the hound refused to leave the dead body, and thus the fugitive escaped.

DOG OF ST. BERNARD.

This magnificent breed is peculiar to the Alps, and to the country between Switzerland and Savoy. The passes over these mountains are exceedingly dangerous; a precipice of many hundred feet is often on one side, and perpendicular rocks on the other, while the path is glazed with, or hidden by, snow and ice. Often, indeed, the overhanging rocks are suddenly relieved of their superabundant snow, and it comes down in huge avalanches on the traveler beneath. Should he escape these dangers, his pathway is obliterated, and he wanders amidst the dreary solitudes until night overtakes him.

The hand of death approaches under the insidious guise of desiring to sleep, and if he indulges in the boon he will wake no more. On the top of Mont St. Bernard, and near one of the most dangerous passes, was a convent in which was preserved a breed of large dogs, trained to search for and relieve the benighted wanderer. On any threatening and stormy night these faithful guardians were sent out, and by their exquisite scent they could discover the hapless and perhaps already snow-covered traveler. Having thus succeeded, they would fall to work with their huge paws and soon clear away the snow; and by continually uttering a deep bark, that would echo among the mountains, the monks would soon learn that some wretch was in peril, and hastening toward the sound, often succeed in rekindling the vital spark ere it had gone out forever. One of these noble dogs obtained a European reputation, and always wore a medal round his neck, as a sign of honorable distinction; for he had saved the lives of forty persons. Some of the most effective pictures of Swiss artists are scenes in their native mountain-passes of groups of peasantry lost in the snow, and hailing the appearance of the Bernardine dog. Most of our readers will remember the popular engraving representing the animal, with a flask about his neck, solicitously licking the face of a dead man he has just dug from the shroud of the avalanche.

Recently, the Mont St. Bernard has been "turned" by a railroad; the ancient pass, so celebrated by tourists, and so wrought into the history of Napoleon, need no longer be pursued to take the wayfarer from the north to the sunny plains of Italy. The deserted monks have moved their hostelry down the side of the mountains, to administer to the luxurious tastes rather than to the terrible necessities of travelers. We very much fear that they will degenerate from the stern virtues so long their heritage in the inhospitable regions of the upper air, and that their noble race of dogs, now no longer necessary to save life, will also be conquered by effeminate habits; and, losing the admirable qualities of their ancestors, sink into ignominious obscurity.

The favorite dog—the Newfoundland—is one of the largest of his race. He is said to have originated (though we can see no reason for the supposition) in the country bearing his name, where he is used and abused by the humbler classes of the inhabitants, in hauling carts filled with fish in the summer, and drawing sleds loaded with wood in the winter. They are ever faithful and good-natured; in fact, the pleasantest, and one of the most useful animals to be met with in seaport towns. In England he is highly appreciated, and individuals have become quite celebrated for saving people from drowning in the Thames, or from ships wrecked at sea. A large portrait of a Newfoundland dog is quite popular even in this country. The dog is represented with a medal round his neck, upon which is inscribed "A distinguished member of the humane society." Illustrative of his usefulness in saving life, is the well-authenticated anecdote of a vessel that was driven on the beach of Lydd, in Kent. The surf was rolling furiously. Eight poor fellows were crying for help, but no boat could live in endeavoring to go to their assistance. At length a gentleman came on the beach accompanied by a Newfoundland dog. He directed the attention of the animal to the vessel, and put a short stick in his mouth. The intelligent and courageous fellow at once understood his meaning; springing into the sea, he fought his way through the waves. He could not, however, get close enough to the vessel to deliver that with which he was charged; but the crew understood what was meant, and they made fast a rope to another piece of wood, and threw it toward him. The noble creature dropped the one in his mouth, and seized that which had been cast to him, and then, with a degree of strength and determination scarcely credible—for he was again and again lost under the waves—he dragged it through the surge, and delivered it to his master; a line of communication was thus formed with the boat, and all on board were saved.

But the most interesting and useful of all the class of dogs we have been describing, and of all dogs whatever, is the companion of the shepherd. As a guardian of sheep he is more perfect than in any other pursuit, for the shepherd dog frequently acts independently of his master, and takes at times entire control of his helpless charge. Sheep are the favorite food of all wild dogs and of wolves; and it is also a fact, that the shepherd dog is nearer the original type of his race than any other. With this knowledge we can form some idea of the immense power the shepherd dog's education has over his original nature, to make him not only forego destroying the tender lamb, but also sacrifice his entire life to its protection. In Scotland and Spain, the shepherd dog forms a prominent object of rural life, and is appreciated as one of the greatest blessings of a beneficent Providence. In Scotia, Hogg and Burns both commenced life upon their native bleak hills, watching their flocks, with no other constant companion than the faithful dog; it is not only truly interesting, but really affecting to read the passionate outpourings of these two sons of song in his praise. With all their imagination and heartiness, they never found language sufficiently strong to do justice to their feelings of admiration. Hogg acknowledges that he "never felt so grateful to any creature under the sun as he did to his honest Sirrah!"

Burns, in equally passionate language, writes, "that the master is the soul of the dog; all the powers and faculties of its nature are devoted to his master's service; and these powers and faculties are ennobled by the intercourse." He concludes, "Divines tell us that it ought just to be so with the Christian; but the dog puts the Christian to shame."

That the shepherd dog was specially designed for the purposes to which it is devoted, is powerfully suggested in the singular trait of its history; that more than any other of its species it retains, in spite of every circumstance, its peculiar character. While other dogs degenerate or improve, or have their radical qualities obliterated, the shepherd dog seems to have innate energy enough to overcome every other blood, and ever remain the same, confirming the opinion, that the shepherd dog stock is the most perfect of the whole species.

THE SHEPHERD DOG.

It is safe to say that commerce is indebted for the wool which appears in so many costly fabrics to the watchful care of the shepherd dog, for the master could not raise the staple, so as to supply it at reasonable prices, without the animal's assistance. A single shepherd and one dog will do the work of twenty men; and yet, while thus occupying a position so important, absolutely feeding and clothing his protectors, the dog is satisfied with the hardest fare and most meagre food, living and rejoicing alone in the approving smiles of his master's eye.

The shepherd dogs of Spain and Mexico are the finest in the world, and, armed with an iron collar covered with points, are a match for the most savage wolf. One thousand sheep require the attention of two men and two dogs. The manner of training them in the countries alluded to is interesting: the puppies, at their birth, are taken from their mother and suckled by a ewe previously deprived of her lambs. The consequence is, that the dogs associate at once with the sheep, become attached to particular flocks, and seem to feel a degree of affection that would naturally spring up in generous minds toward those to whose fostering care they were so much indebted.

Landseer—who devotes his great genius to painting the few domestic animals of England—has produced portraits of hounds, pointers, and shepherd dogs that vie favorably, in good looks and intelligence, with many of the representatives of another class of “the English nobility.” His great triumph has been a picture of two shepherd dogs, lying on a rock, just beneath which is sheltered an ewe and twin lambs. These dogs are, indeed, the protectors of the flocks—one is gazing in the distance for his master, the other looks down, with silken eyelash and beaming eye, upon the helpless charge beneath, expressing a tenderness and concern that has rarely been surpassed in the thousand Madonnas which have been the pride of art, and considered the acme of human maternity.

Having completed our list of dogs, illustrative of the best known varieties, we add two by way of ornament: one, the envy of certain beaux; the other, famous for its intelligence. “The ladies’ pet” is the modern King Charles spaniel; but so degenerate from the original breed as to retain little else of its excellences than the soft coating of fur and silken ears. The short muzzle and round vulgar forehead of the bull-dog makes it decidedly repulsive. The eye has increased in size until it has become a deformity, and its stupid expression corresponds with the mental development of this happy creature. Such are the dogs that noble dukes and duchesses make companions of, and humble people imitate the example. They can be seen in England, and occasionally in our own country, lolling their unmeaning heads out of a carriage-window, and casting looks of apparent contempt upon the poor passers-by. What is the charm about them to ladies is past our comprehension. The example attending the devotion of the sex to such pets injures society; for bipeds, anxious to gain a smile from lips so often buried in the lap-dog’s fur, descend themselves into imitations of the veriest puppies, making it questionable which is most degraded—the ambition, or the taste that demands such qualities in the conventional lords of the creation. We can not admire too much the lady, who congratulated herself that her lap-dog escaped any serious injury from biting the extremities of her accepted lover.

JUNO.

Juno was a dog in which were mingled the blood of the spaniel and Newfoundland, and descended from a family remarkable for intelligence; for with dogs, even more than with men, talents are hereditary. This playful, intelligent creature, without any instruction, performed so many feats that she won a wide celebrity. So fond was she of her reasoning playmates, that she would at any time abandon her puppies to have a romp with the children. As a nurse, she took care of “the baby,” and would follow it about, pick up its playthings, rock its cradle, and carefully restore to its hands the “chicken bone,” for the moment dropped on the floor. Having once accompanied her master on a fishing excursion, she afterward would dig angle-worms, draw the fishing-rod from its hooks, and insist in the stable that the horse should be saddled, and then lead the animal by the bridle up to the door. Her kind care extended to the chickens and ducks, and if any of the little ones were lamed or died, she at nightfall took them to their respective owners, and thrust them under the maternal wings. When the garden was made Juno seemed to admire the nicely-arranged beds, and throughout the whole summer, looked through the palings with indignation at what she supposed to be the intruding plants in the nicely-prepared ground.

Juno never would allow the servants to possess in peace any property once belonging to her master, mistress, or their children, which was not formally given away in her presence; in that case, she never noticed the articles at all. In New Orleans this dog attracted a great deal of attention, because she would not touch the poisoned sausages thrown into the streets. She did not confine her useful labors exclusively to those who owned her, but would restore lost property, when she met with it, that belonged to any of the neighbors. She appeared to understand the meaning of words, and would instantly show by her manner how perfectly she comprehended the passing conversation. If any subject was alluded to in which she took an interest, she would bark and caper about, and designate as far as possible the different things alluded to. She would remain perfectly quiet, with an affectionate eye alone upon her master, through long discussions on politics or philosophy; but let any thing be said about angling or hunting, about the poultry in the yard, or kindred subjects, and she would go almost crazy with delight. This dog, combining within herself the qualities of the two most intelligent breeds of her kind, seemed but little removed from a reasoning, intelligent being; there were, at times, expressions in her eye, of affection, of thought, of sorrow, of joy, so very human that it was painful, and startled the imagination for the moment with the idea that Pythagoras was indeed correct, and that the souls of former men were imprisoned in the bodies of animals; for it was easy, in contemplating this remarkable dog, to suppose that she was possessed of a hidden intelligence not properly belonging to brute life. And yet Juno was only one of the many intelligent beings so frequently to be met with among the dogs, who, in their humble sphere, teach us lessons of devotion, disinterestedness, and friendship.

India is remarkable for wild dogs, among which is the poor Pariah, an inhabitant of the confines of civilization, and yet is never fairly adopted into human society. This dog, naturally gentle, a British officer relates, was caught by the natives in great numbers, and used to feed a tiger, kept in the garrison for the amusement of visitors. On one occasion, a pariah, instead of yielding to fear, stood on the defensive, and as the tiger approached he seized him by the upper lip. This continued to be done several days, when the tiger not only ceased his attacks but divided his food with the poor dog, and became his friend, and the two animals occupied the same cage for many years. An old lion, in the Tower of London, conceived a liking for a little dog that accidentally got into his cage, and the two animals became inseparable. It was a source of great amusement to observe the impudence of the little puppy, who would bark at visitors while the old lion would look dignifiedly on, seemingly determined to assist his little friend out of any difficulties his presumption might lead to.

At the battle of Palo Alto there were two dogs belonging to the officers of Ringold's battery, which amused themselves in the battle by watching at the mouths of the pieces for the discharge of the balls, and then chased them across the plain as long as they were in sight. Things got a little too hot finally for one of them, and he retreated back to Point Isabel. The soldiers in that intrenchment saw Carlo coming across the prairie, and indulged the idea that he had brought a letter of "how fared the day." A French officer, engaged in the war of Algiers, owned a dog who conceived a great taste for the carnage of battle, and watched his master's gun, and ran among the enemy to find "the victim," the same as if the wounded man had been a bird. This habit, together with another of holding on the "game" with a determined tooth when found, cost the dog his life. An Arab chief happened only to be "winged" by his master's weapon, and when the dog seized the son of the desert, he was instantly stabbed to the heart.

Some years ago, it was not uncommon in Connecticut to employ dogs as motive-power to light machinery. A Mr. Brill had a pair of dogs which he employed together on a sort of tread-mill. After a while the motion of the machinery was noticed from time to time to be considerably retarded, when the tender would go to the mill to see if the dogs were doing their duty, and every thing appeared to be right. Another and another interruption would occur, and so continued, until the owner began to suspect that his dogs were playing some trick upon him. Accordingly he placed an observer where all the movements of the animals could be seen, and the mystery was thus explained. After the two dogs had wrought together for some time, one of them was seen to step off the tread-mill and seat himself where he could catch the first warning of any approaching foot-step. After he had rested awhile he took his place at the wheel again, and allowed his associate to rest: thus these sagacious creatures continued to bear each other's burdens.

A Miss Childs, a keeper of a tavern in London, quite recently possessed a black and white spaniel which performed tricks almost surpassing belief. This dog could play at games of whist, cribbage, and dominoes. In playing these games the dog was placed behind a screen, and had the cards all arranged before him; over this screen he watched his antagonist, and reached with his mouth the suite required. Out of a pack of cards he would instantly select the best cribbage and whist. On the names of any city, county, or town being placed by printed cards before him, the dog would, without hesitation, fetch the one requested, and at the bidding of any one present, and in the absence of his mistress. He could, by the aid of printed cards, tell how many persons might be in the room, how many hats, or the number of coins any one might throw on the floor. After being taken out of the room, if any one present touched a card, the dog on his return would designate it. So numerous, indeed, were the evidences of intelligence exhibited by this dog, that it was impossible to resist the impression that he was possessed of reason.

An unfortunate dog, in order to make sport for some fools, had a pan tied to his tail, and was sent off on his travels to a neighboring town. He reached his place of destination perfectly exhausted, and lay down before the steps of a tavern, eying most anxiously the horrid annoyance fastened behind him, but unable to move a step farther to rid himself of the torment. Another dog, a Scotch shepherd, laid himself down beside him, and, by a few caresses, gaining the confidence of the afflicted cur, proceeded to gnaw the string by which the noisy appendage was attached to his friend's tail, and with about a quarter of an hour's exertion, severed the cord, and started to his legs, with the pan hanging from the string in his mouth, and after a few joyful capers, departed on his travels in the highest glee at his success.

Dogs are superstitious, and easily alarmed by any thing that is strange or wonderfully incomprehensible to their experience. We knew a very fine mastiff once to issue out upon a little negro. The child, in its alarm, stepped back and fell into a hole at the root of a tree. The dog perceiving the sudden disappearance of its object of hatred, became alarmed, and finally, with the utmost terror depicted in its actions, retreated back to its hiding-place.

Some years ago, while traveling up the Mississippi river, in common with other passengers on the steamer we were attracted by the docility and intelligence of a pointer dog. This excellent animal would voluntarily return mislaid books, hats, or other trifles to their owners, and seemed to desire to render himself popular by doing such kindly offices. The trick he performed, however, which created most surprise, was taking notes from gentlemen to their wives in the ladies' cabin. This he would do whenever called upon. The person sending the note, would simply call the dog, and his master would give him the directions what to do, and we believe he never made a mistake. The dog would take the paper in his mouth, go among the lady passengers and hunt around, and finally put the note in the lap of the person for whom it was intended. This apparently extraordinary mark of intelligence, created a great deal of amusement, yet it was the most simple exhibition of the dog's power that could be given, for it will be found on examination that it is still more strange that a pointer should perceive the vicinity of partridges at many yards distance, than that he should discover a gentleman's wife sitting within touching distance of his nose.

"One of the most interesting exhibitions of the half-civilized dog is witnessed in polar countries, where he performs the office of the horse, and draws heavy sledges over the wastes of snow. The faithful pack flees over the hard ribbed ice, and, by their speed, make the cutting wind of the north sting as if broken glass were entering the eyes. The storm sighs along the expansive waste, and the snow-clouds, like wind-ing-sheets, seem closing in on the weary travelers. No star is seen aloft to give a ray of hope—man, immortal, powerful man, is at the mercy of his canine friends. 'God save us!' exclaim the alarmed voyagers. The prayer had been answered 'in the beginning,' for they were in the charge of the faithful dog, who could find his way where there were no roads, no trace of vegetation to mark the path. Suddenly the pack appears at fault—the leader questions the air, asserts his full voice, and dashes on. Urged by his encouraging example, his comrades joyfully resume their work—space flies, and the hours wear away. At last, as the night is closing in, a thin pennon of dark smoke detaches itself upon the distant horizon: the sign betrays the dwelling of man, the journey is accomplished. The four-footed guides ask for no wages—an oral expression of satisfaction, and they are content; yet human guides over the less dangerous passes of the Alps and Pyrenees would have, for similar services, demanded exaggerated sums."

An artist who had had a great deal of trouble to please a rather capricious duchess, finally consented that the truthfulness of the picture should be left to the decision of the lady's pet spaniel. The picture was sent home, the aristocratic lady hid herself away behind the window curtains, and the little dog-critic was ushered into the room. Without much hesitation the animal approached the picture, wagged its tail as if in joy, and fell to licking the face. The duchess was delighted, complimented the artist on his skill, and paid him a high price for his labor. It was afterward discovered that the face of the portrait had been covered over with lard, and that the dog's nose was sharper than the critic's eyes.

When some of our troops, taken prisoners by Santa Anna, were passing from Buena Vista to the city of Mexico, they were, in common with all travelers in Mexico, astonished at the number of dogs they met in the streets of the villages. At Saltillo, on one occasion, the American prisoners were detained in the highway by their guards stopping to look at a dog fight. The spectators were very numerous, brought together by the rare show of the "captured North Americans" and the canine battle. The dogs seemed to be unequally matched; one was a large brindle, of ferocious aspect and braggadocio appearance; the other was a little compact animal, of undistinguished personality, but which attended to his fighting with steady pertinacity. The "greasers" named the big dog "Santa Anna;" and the Americans the little one "Old Zack." After a severe struggle, in which "Old Zack" was rolled in the mud, and pretty severely handled, he got his competitor down, and seizing him by the throat, held on until "Santa Anna" roared with pain. A general shout of exultation ensued among the Mexicans. The chivalrous conduct of the little dog even won upon their sympathies, and they joined, much to the mortification of the "regular troops," in giving three cheers for General Zachariah Taylor.

Innumerable anecdotes might be given of dogs which not only saved human beings from death, but have anticipated approaching evil, and thus guarded their master in advance. Travelers, dreaming of no evil, have gone to bed at night at hotels, when their dogs have discovered among the people of the inn suspicious circumstances, and given the alarm. The son of Dr. Dwight relates, that his father, the greatest theological writer our country has ever produced, was indebted to a dog for his life, the faithful animal obtruding in his pathway, and compelling his horse to turn out of the road he was traveling. In the morning the Doctor discovered that if he had pursued his journey according to his intent, he would have been dashed down a precipice, where to escape with his life would have been an impossibility.

It is not uncommon circumstances for certain persons to keep dogs and guns for hire. So intelligent are some pointers, that they will go with any stranger who has a fowling-piece they are familiar with. It is not uncommon for persons to hire these necessities of hunting, who know nothing of the use of either. In such cases the dog will often flush the game, and discovering that "the gentleman" does not know how to shoot, will abandon the hunt altogether, and go home in disgust.

In man, the brain forms one-thirtieth part of his whole body—in the Newfoundland dog one seventieth—in the bull-dog one three-hundredth part.

An English gentleman discovered, one morning, that some miscreant had cut off the ears and tail of a favorite horse. A blood-hound was brought to the stable, which at once detected the scent of the villain, and traced it more than twenty miles. The hound then stopped at a door, whence no power could move him. Being at length admitted, he ran to the top of the house, and, bursting open the door of a garret room, found the object he sought in bed, and would have torn him to pieces, had not the huntsman, who had followed the dog on a fleet horse, rushed to the rescue.

Some extraordinary data exist of the fleetness of fox-hounds. A match race was once run over the Beacon Course, Newmarket, England—a distance of four miles, one furlong, and one hundred and thirty-two yards. The winning dog performed the distance in eight minutes and a few seconds; but of the sixty horses that started with the hounds, only twelve were able to run in with them.

A gentleman was missed in London, and it was supposed he had met with some foul play. No clew could be obtained to the mystery, when his dog was discovered sitting before an attractive shop. No inducement could be held out that would cause the animal to leave the place. It was finally suggested that he might be waiting for his master. The house, always above suspicion of wrong, was searched, and there was not only discovered the body of the missing gentleman, but also other bodies of people who had been murdered in the same house. The guilty parties were arrested, and acknowledged their crimes—and one of the most terrible of all the dens of London was broken up by the "police knowledge" of the dog.

Dogs are extensively used on the Belgian frontiers for smuggling. The animals trained to these "dishonest habits," are conducted in packs to the foreign frontier, where they are kept without food for many hours; they are then beaten and laden, and at the beginning of the night started on their travels. They reach the abode of their masters, which is generally two or three leagues from the frontiers, as speedily as they can, where they are sure to be well treated and provided with a quantity of food. These dogs are represented to be of large size, and do much mischief to property, inasmuch as, in going to their place of destination, they take the most direct course across the country.

A Western gentleman being very much annoyed all night on a steamer by a barking dog, in the morning hunted up its owner, and proposed to purchase a half or quarter interest in the animal. The owner seemed surprised, and asked the gentleman "what he would do with a partnership of that kind." "I think," said the "hoosier," with great solemnity, "that if I did own an interest in that dog, I should kill my share immediately."

Dogs sometimes join a fire-company, and run regularly with the engines. Several of this kind have been known in New York. There was a famous fire-dog in London, which lived indiscriminately with the firemen—sometimes choosing to live with one, sometimes with another. He was a regular attendant at every fire; and was always seen in the thickest crowd and where the press was the greatest. One day a magistrate happened to hear of the dog, and expressed a wish to see him. A messenger was accordingly dispatched, and Tyke made his appearance borne in the arms of a policeman. He was not easily persuaded to leave his house, and the only way was to make a fireman run in a hurry up the street. Tyke immediately set out after him; but on seeing the man slacken his pace, he knew there was no fire, and turned indignantly back. The messenger found that he could be induced to go no farther; so he was obliged to pick him up and carry him. Tyke lived for many years, following the engines to the fires, and was always fed and kindly cared for by the firemen. He was of the terrier breed, of rather a grim, tattered appearance, no doubt resulting from his manner of life.

A French merchant having some money due him, set out on horseback, accompanied by his dog, to receive it. Having accomplished his business, he tied the money-bag before him and began his journey home. The merchant, after riding some miles, alighted to repose himself, and taking the bag of money in his hand, laid it down by his side under a hedge, and, on remounting, forgot it. The dog perceived this error, and, wishing to rectify it, ran to fetch the bag; but it was too heavy for him to drag along. He then ran to his master, and by crying, barking, and howling, seemed to be determined to remind his master of his loss. The merchant, absorbed in some reverie, wholly overlooked the real object of his affectionate attendant's importunity, and conceived the alarming apprehension that the dog had gone mad. Deeply lamenting the necessity of parting with his dog, and constantly more and more impressed that he was really rabid, he drew a pistol from his pocket, and, turning his head away, fired. The aim was but too true—the faithful animal fell wounded to the earth, and the merchant rode on. Some time after, involuntarily reaching out his hand, he discovered his loss. In an instant he comprehended his rashness and folly, and turning his horse, galloped back to the place where he stopped. He discovered the traces of blood, but he looked in vain for the dog—he had crawled, wounded as he was, to the forgotten bag, and lay down beside it as a guard. When he saw his master, he testified his joy by wagging his tail; and in attempting to caress his master, he cast his last look of affection in his face, and fell back, and died.

A writer in a London paper mentions that he saw a blind man look with much apparent interest at the prints in Dolnaghi's window. "Why, my friend," said he, "it seems you are not blind?" "Blind! no, thank God, your honor," replied the man; "I have my blessed sight as well as another." "Then, why do you go about led by a dog with a string?" asked the gentleman. "Why, because I dedicate dogs for the blind," was the satisfactory reply.

To show that this education is effective, mention is made by a traveler in Europe, who saw a good-looking poodle-dog, which came to the coach-door and sat upon his hind legs with the air of one begging for something. "Give him a cent," said the carriage-driver, "and you will see what he will do with it." The money was thrown; the dog picked it up, ran to a baker's and brought back a piece of bread, which he ate. The dog had belonged to a blind man lately dead, and having no master, begged alms on his own account. There are dogs in Rome who can distinguish between charitably-disposed persons and others not so inclined, and who will lead their masters up to houses where they feel assured something will be given, and avoid those at which the rude repulse will be met with. An English officer mentions a case of a beggar's dog that belonged to a shoe-black in Paris. The animal, in his desire to serve his master, would roll in the gutters, and then manage to throw some mud on the shoes of the passers-by. A gentleman having had his feet soiled two or three times the same morning, taxed the shoe-black with the imposition. The man acknowledged that he had taught the dog the trick, and that it was the chief means of obtaining him a livelihood.

Hammond, of the Albany Register, describes a dog who might be termed one of the bhoy's. He was a shaggy, crop-eared, wiry, keen-eyed cur; an animal that might be bet on, as being ever ready for a fight, or for any sort of canine devilment, at the shortest possible notice, and probably did run "wid de machine," and cultivate a "soap-lock" over the left "blinker." The owner of this dog wore a jaunty cap that one might safely swear had been acquainted with the weight of a butcher's tray. His outer garment was a sort of shaggy cross between a monkey-jacket and a frock-coat, in making up of which a large allowance had been made for at least two years' growth. His pants were of the same material, and at the bottom were rolled half-way up to his knees, through which his lean shanks protruded, the extremities of which were incased in a pair of stogy shoes, that seemed to have been made with special reference to the creation of corns.

The dog and his owner, having quietly ensconced themselves on top of a pier-post, the two took a dignified survey of the people round.

"Speak to the gentlemen," ordered the master; whereupon Pomp opened his mouth and gave forth three or four distinct bow-wows.

"Gentlemen," said the occupant of the post, "this is one of the dogs you've hearn tell of. He's a great dog, wonderful dog, a dog that shouldn't belong all to one individual. He's too valuable a property for a single man to own. He ort to be made a stock-dog of—to be divided into shares, and owned by a company—he should. A corporation as owned that dog would make a noise in the world. There would be a big dividend on the stock, you may bet high on that. There'd be no bust up about it. 'Twould be a safe investment, and sure pay."

The dog seemed to understand the compliment of his master; and the two, at the conclusion of the speech, formed a couple of as independent and impudent specimens of "city life" as could be found this side of any where.

SOME ACCOUNT OF A CONSULATE.

JULIUS CÆSAR was a Consul, and the first Bonaparte, and so was I.

I do not think that I am possessed of any extraordinary ambition. I like comfort, I like mushrooms (truffles I do not like). I think Lafitte is a good wine, and wholesome. Gin is not to my taste, and I never attended caucuses. Therefore, I had never entertained great expectations of political preferment, and lived for a considerable period of years without any hopes in that way, and with a very honest indifference.

And yet, when my name actually appeared in the newspapers, as named by appointment of the President Consul to Blank, I felt, I will confess (if I may use such an expression), an unusual expansion. I felt confident that I had become on a sudden the subject of a good deal of not unnatural envy. I excused people for it, and never thought of blaming or of resenting it. My companions in the every-day walks of life, I treated, I am satisfied, with the same consideration as before.

In short, I concealed my elation of spirits as much as possible, and only indulged the playful elasticity of my spirits in a frequent private perusal of that column of the New York Times which made the announcement of my appointment, and where my name appeared in print, associated with those of the distinguished Mr. Soule, Mr. Greaves (I believe), Mr. Daniels, Mr. Brown, Mr. Mekeo, and a great many others.

I can not accurately describe my feelings when the postmaster of our town (a smart gentleman of great tact, but now turned out) handed me a huge packet from the Department of State, franked by Mr. Marcy (evidently his own hand had traced the lines), sealed with the large seal of the Department, and addressed to me, Mr. Blank, Consul of the United States for Blank.

I took the postmaster by the hand and endeavored to appear cool. I think I made some casual remark about the weather. Good Heavens, what a hypocrite!

I broke open the packet with emotion. It contained a notice (I think it was in the Secretary's hand) of my appointment to Blank. It contained a printed list of foreign ministers and consuls, in which my name was entered in writing. In the next issue I was sure it would be in print. It contained a published pamphlet (quite thin) of instructions. It contained a circular, on paper of a blue tinge, recommending modest dress. I liked the friendly way in which the recommendation was conveyed; not absolutely compelling, but advising a black coat, black pantaloons. In the warmth of my grateful feelings at that time, I think I should have vowed compliance if the Secretary had advised saffron shorts and a sky-blue tail-coat!

There was, beside, in the packet a blank of a bond, to be filled up in the sum of two thousand dollars, as a kind of guarantee for the safe return of such consular property as I might find at Blank.

I was gratified at being able to return such a substantial evidence of my willingness to incur risks for the sake of my country and of the Administration. It was necessary, however, that two good bondsmen should sign the instrument with me. I knew I should have no difficulty in finding them. I asked two of my friends to come forward in the matter. They came forward promptly; and without an arrêre-pensée (to make use of an apt foreign expression) they put their names to the bond. I should be tempted to give their names here, did I not know their modesty would be offended by public notice.

I sent the instrument to Washington in a large envelope, with a mention in one corner, in my own handwriting, "Official Business."

I did not drop it into the outside box of the office, but presented it with my own hands through the trap to the clerk. The clerk read the address, and turned toward me with a look of consideration that I never saw upon his face before. And yet (so deceitful is human pride), I blew my nose as if nothing of importance had happened! I knew that the clerk would mention the circumstance of the "Official" letter to the second clerk, and that both would look at me with wonder when they next met me in the street, or gazed on me in my pew at the church. In short, I can not describe my feelings.

A few days after I received one or two letters in handwriting unknown to me; they proved to be applications for clerkships in my consular bureau. I replied to them in a civil, but perhaps rather stately manner, informing the parties that I was not yet aware of the actual income of the office, but if appearances were favorable I promised to communicate farther.

A friend suggested to me that perhaps, before assuming so important a trust, it would be well to make a short trip to the seat of government, and confer personally with the members of the Cabinet.

The suggestion seemed to me judicious. I should in this way be put in possession of the special views of the Administration, and be better able to conduct the business of my office, in agreement with the Government views of international policy, and the interests of the world generally.

It is true, the cost of the journey would be something, but it was not a matter to be thought of in an affair of so grave importance. I therefore went to Washington.

In a city where so many consuls are (I might say) annually appointed, it was not to be expected that my arrival would create any unusual stir. Indeed it did not. If I might be allowed the expression of opinion on such a point, I think that the inn-keeper gave me a room very near the roof—for a consul.

I called almost immediately on my arrival at the office of the Secretary of State. I was told that the Secretary of State was engaged, but was recommended by his door-keeper to enter my name at the bottom of a long list in his possession, in order that I might secure my turn of admittance.

I represented my official character to the door-keeper. I could not discover that his countenance altered in the least; he, however, kindly offered to present me at the door of the consular bureau.

The gentlemen of that department received me graciously, and congratulated me, I thought, in a somewhat gleeful manner, considering their responsible positions, upon my appointment. At my request they showed me some communications which were on file from the consular office I was destined to fill. There were a few letters on foolscap, and a few on note paper. They did not seem to me to come up altogether to the "Instructions." I made a remark to that effect, which appeared to be unobserved.

Among other papers was a list of the effects belonging to the consular office at Blank. It read, if I remember rightly:

- "One Small Flag.
- "One Brass Stamp.
- "One Pewter do.
- "Two Books of Record.
- "Nine Blank Passports.
- "One broken-legged Table.
- "Two Office Stools (old).
- "One 'Arms' (good condition)."

I must say I was surprised at this list. It seemed to me there was some discrepancy between the two thousand dollar bond I had signed and the value of the effects of which I was to come into possession. It seemed to me, however, that furniture and things of that sort might be dear in so distant a country. I had no doubt they were. I hinted as much to the clerk in attendance.

He said he thought they might be.

"Nous verrons," said I, at which he smiled and said, "Oh, you know the language, then?"

I said I should know it; only the place was Italian, and the remark I had just made was in the French language.

"Oh dear; well," said he, "I don't think it makes any difference."

I told him "I hoped it wouldn't."

"It's rare they know the language," said he, picking a bit of lint off from his coat-sleeve.

I felt encouraged at this.

"Only take a small dictionary along," continued he.

I asked if there was one belonging to the office?

He thought not.

I asked him, then, how much he thought the place was worth?

At this he politely showed me an old account of "returns." It seemed to be a half-yearly account, though some of the half-years were skipped apparently, and the others, I really thought, might as well have been skipped. Indeed, I was not a little taken aback at the smallness of the sums indicated.

I daresay I showed as much in my face, for the clerk told me, in a confidential way, that he doubted if the returns were full. He thought they might be safely doubled. I thought, for my own part, that there would not be much safety in doubling them even.

The clerk further hinted, that within a short time such positions would be of more value; there was to be a revival of the consular system.

I told him I had heard so; as, indeed, I had, any time and many times within the last ten or fifteen years.

Beside which—there was my country!

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead"

(to quote a popular piece of poetry), who would not serve his country, even if the fees are small?

And again, the returns were doubtless misrepresented: indeed, I had heard of a private boast from a late incumbent of the post, to the effect that "he had lived in clover." I had no doubt, in my own mind, that the Government had, in some way, paid for the clover.

I was disappointed, finally, in respect to an interview with the Secretary of State. I had the honor, however, while at Washington, of a presentation to the Under-Secretary. I do not think that he was aware of my appointment, or, indeed, that he had ever heard of me before; though he made a kind effort to recall me to remembrance; and, in any event, was pleased (he said) to make my acquaintance. He expressed himself to the effect that men of character were needed for Government offices.

I told him I thought they were.

The instructions ordered that I should give information to the Department of the time of my sailing for my foreign destination, with the name of the port at which I was to embark, and of the ship.

This I did—as the instructions enjoined—upon foolscap. I must not omit to mention, that I was provided with a special passport—not, indeed, bearing the usual insignia of the eagle and darts, but an autograph passport, designating in good English my rank and destination, and inviting foreign Governments generally to show me that attention due to my official capacity.

I put this in my portmanteau, together with a pocket edition of VATTTEL On the Law of Nations, for private reference, and also a small dictionary.

With these, I bade my friends adieu, shaking them cheerfully by the hand, and from the poop of the ship waved a farewell to my country.

The professed travel-writers—such as Bayard Taylor—describe these things a great deal better. I can only say that, with a very bitter feeling in my chest, I went below, where I remained the most of the time until we reached the other side.

When I arrived in France—where I was not personally known—I trusted very much to the extraordinary passport which I carried, and which I had no doubt would make considerable impression upon the officials. Indeed, a timid man who had made the voyage with me, and who was in some way made aware of my consular capacity (though I never hinted it myself), ventured to hope that I would give him my assistance in case his papers were not all right. I promised I would do so. I may say that I felt proud of the application.

I walked with great confidence into the little receiving-room of the police, guided by two soldiers who wore caps very much like a reversed tin-kettle, and presented my special passport.

The chief of the office looked at it in a very hard manner, and then passed it to his neighbor. I was certainly prepared for a look of consideration on their part. On the contrary, I thought they examined me with a good deal of impertinent scrutiny.

At length one of them said, with an air of confidence, "Vous être Anglais ?"—You are English?

I could not help saying—using the French form of expression—" Mon Dieu !—no !"

And I proceeded to tell him what I really was, and that the passport was an American passport, and of an official character.

The officers looked at it again, and seemed to consult for a while together; at length one said, "C'est égal"—"It's all the same"—asked me my name, and, with some hesitation, placed his seal upon the instrument.

In this way I was let into France. The timid man who had voyaged with me had, meantime, sidled away. I suspect he must have gone up to Paris by an early train, for I did not meet with him again. I hope he had no trouble.

There was not very much made of my dignity in any part of France; but not being accredited to that country, I felt no resentment, and enjoyed Paris perhaps as much as any merely private citizen could do. To prevent, however, any mistake in future about my passport, I printed, in large characters and in the French language, upon the envelope, "Passport of Blank, Consul of the United States of America for Blank."

This was a good hit, and was, I found, readily understood. The landlord with whom I staid while in Paris (an obliging man) made up his bill against the tide in full. It was pleasant to have recognition.

I continued my journey in excellent spirits. I think it was on the road through Switzerland that I fell in with a chatty personage in the coupé of the diligence; and having at one time to hand my passport to a soldier at a frontier station, the paper came under the eye of my companion of the coupé. He was charmed to have the honor of my acquaintance. He expressed an excessive admiration for my country and my fellow-members of the Government.

I asked him if he had ever been in the United States. He said he had not; but he had a friend, he told me, who once touched at Guadaloupe, and found the climate delightful.

I told him, in all kindness, that the United States did not reach as far as that.

"Comment ?" said he.

I repeated, that at the time I left, the West Indies were not included in the United States.

"Oh, ça arrivera !" said he; and he made a progressive gesture with his two hands, as if he would embrace the flank of the diligence horses.

He asked me if the country was generally flat.

I told him it was a good deal so.

"But, mon Dieu !" said he, "what fevers and steamboats you have!—vous avez là bas !"

In short, he proved a very entertaining companion; and upon our arrival at the station of the Customs, he presented me, with a good deal of ceremony, to the presiding officer as the Consul of the United States.

It was the first time (indeed, one of the few times) upon which I had received official recognition. The Customsman bowed twice, and I bowed twice in return.

The presentation proved very serviceable to me, as it was the means of relieving me from a very serious difficulty shortly after.

My passport, as I have already remarked, was wholly in manuscript; and the only characters at all conspicuous in it were those which made up the name of "WM. L. MARCY." I do not mean to attribute to that gentleman the vanity of wishing to appear more important than the Consul, even in the instrument with which I was fortified. But the truth was, that the Secretary of State's signature, being in his stont autograph, was quite noticeable in contrast with the light, clerkly flourishes by which it was surrounded.

In short, it was presumed at the guard-house that my papers gave protection—if they gave protection to any body (which seems to have been doubted)—to Mr. Wm. L. Marcy. I was entered, therefore, upon the police record under that name. But on discovery of the fact that my baggage bore a different address, it was farther presumed that Mr. Marcy had purloined the baggage of another party; and, under this apprehension, I came very near being placed in confinement.

I explained the matter eagerly, but had considerable difficulty in making the officials understand that I was really not Mr. Marcy; and not being Mr. Marcy, could not be accused of any misdeeds attributable to that gentleman. I furthermore explained, as well as I was able, that Mr. Marcy was a grand homme (and here the French came gracefully to my aid)—that he was, in short, a man of great distinction—highly esteemed in the country from which I came, and absolutely retained there by his official duties, making it utterly impossible for him to be traveling just now upon the Continent of Europe, even with his now luggage—setting aside the calumny of his having taken possession of another man's.

I fear, however, that all would have been of no avail, if the Customsman had not been sent for, and came gallantly to my relief. I was indebted to him—under Providence—for my escape.

Upon arrival at my port of destination, I was evidently regarded with considerable suspicion. In common with some fifty others, I was packed in a small barrack-room until decision should be made upon our papers of admission. After very much earnest study of my passport, both within and without, the chief of the examining department (who was a scholarly man, deputed for that employment) seemed to understand that I had come in the professed quality of Consul.

He asked me, in a solemn tone, if the fact was as he had surmised.

I told him, eagerly, that he was quite correct.

Upon this he gave me a ticket of admission, authorizing me to enter the town, and advising me to apply in two days' time at the bureau of police for my passport or a permit of residence.

I took lodgings at a respectable hotel, and was presently found out by a shrewd fellow (a Swiss, I think), who executed the languages for the house. He wished to know if I would like to engage him for "the sights."

I replied in a playful way—disguising as much as possible my dignity—that I was to stop some time—that I was, in short, Consul for the United States, and should probably have many leisure opportunities.

He felt sure I would. He took off his hat, and showed tokens of respect for the office which I never met with before—nor since.

I beg to recommend him to any party traveling in that direction: his name is, I think, Giacomo Guarini; aged forty-five, and broad in the shoulders, with a slight lisp in his English.

By his advice I called at the bureau of the police, where I made known my quality of Consul. They were sorry, they said (the officials), that they had no information of that kind. I expressed some surprise, and stated that I had the honor to bring the information myself—alluding to the passport.

They observed that, though this information was very good for me, as coming from my Government, it was hardly so good for them, who awaited all such information from their Government. Not having yet consulted Vattel very thoroughly, I did not deem it prudent to reply hastily to this first diplomatic proposition. If, indeed, there had been an eagle on the passport—!

The officials informed me that, if I wished to stay in the town, I could do so by paying ten swanzigers (about a dollar and a half our money) for a permit.

I asked how it would be if I purchased no such permit.

In that case I must leave (though it was very kindly expressed).

I reflected that, all things considered, it would be better to stay. My experience with my passport, thus far, had not been such as to warrant any great reliance on that instrument. Indeed, I think I should advise a friend anticipating travel (for pleasure), to provide himself with a private passport.

This point being settled, I looked over my official papers and found a letter addressed by the Secretary of State to the "Present Incumbent" of the office, requesting him to deliver into my keeping the seals, flag, stools, and arms of the office.

I made inquiries regarding him. No body about the hotel seemed to know him, or, indeed, ever to have heard of him. I had fortunately a private letter to a banker of the town (exceedingly useful to me afterward). I called upon him, and renewed my inquiries.

He regretted, he said, to inform me that Mr. —, the late acting Consul, had only the last week committed suicide by jumping out of his office-window into the dock.

I must confess that I was shocked by this announcement. I hoped it was not owing to any embarrassments arising out of his official position.

The banker, who was a polite man, regretted that he could not inform me.

I must not omit to mention that the letter of the Secretary of State, requesting the supposed incumbent to deliver up the papers, the seals, the stools, etc., contained (through some error of the clerk) the name of some other person than myself as the proper recipient; so that I had, from the time of my landing in Europe, entertained considerable doubt about the success of my application. It was then with a feeling of some relief—tempered by humane regrets—that I learned of the untimely fate of the individual to whom the official demand was addressed. I at once destroyed the letter which might have invalidated my claim, and pursued my inquiries in regard to the papers, the flag, the stamps, and the stools.

Through the kindness of my banker I succeeded in tracing them to the office of a Jewish ship-broker, whom I found wrapped in a bear-skin coat, and smoking a very yellow meer-schaam.

He spoke English charmingly. He said he had succeeded (I could scarce tell how) to the late incumbent.

I asked about the suicide.

The Israelite tapped his forehead with his skinny fore-finger, waved it back and forth for a moment, and left me in a very distressing state of perplexity.

I asked after the flag, the sign-board, the table, etc. He said they were deposited in his garret, and should be delivered up whenever I desired. He informed me further that he knew of my appointment through a paragraph in Galignani's Messenger. It seemed an odd way of establishing my claim, to be sure; but from the experience I had already found with my passport, I thought it was not worth while to shake the Jewish gentleman's belief by referring him to that instrument.

I borrowed the ship-broker's seal—the consular seal—and addressed a note to the chief authority of the port (in obedience to home instructions), informing him of my appointment. I furthermore addressed a large letter to the Department, acquainting them with my safe arrival, and with the sad bereavement of the State in the loss of the late acting Consul. (I learned afterward that he had been a small ship-broker, of Hebrew extraction, and suspected of insanity.)

The governor of the port replied to me after a few days, informing me, courteously, that whenever the Central Government should be pleased to recognize my appointment, he would acquaint me with that fact.

My next object was to find lodgings; and as the instructions enjoined attendance from ten until four, it was desirable that the office should be an agreeable one, and, if possible, contiguous to sleeping quarters.

The old Jewish gentleman, indeed, kindly offered to relieve me of all the embarrassments of the business; but I showed him a copy of the new instructions, which would not admit of my taking into employ any other than a naturalized citizen.

I thought he seemed amused at this; he certainly twisted his tongue in his left cheek in a very peculiar manner. Still he was courteous.

I succeeded at length in finding very airy quarters, with a large office connected with the sleeping apartment by a garden. A bell-rope was attached to the office-door, and the bell being upon the exterior wall, within the garden, could be distinctly heard throughout the apartment. This arrangement proved a very convenient one. As only three or four American ships were understood to arrive in the course of the year, and as the office was somewhat damp and mouldy—being just upon the water's side—I did not think it necessary (viewing the bell) to remain there constantly from ten until four. I sincerely hope that the latitude which I took in this respect will be looked on favorably by the Home Government. Indeed, considering the frequent travel of my fellow-diplomats the past season, I think I may without exaggeration presume upon indulgence.

I remained quietly one or two weeks waiting for recognition. Occasionally I walked down by the outer harbor to enjoy the sight of an American bark which just then happened to be in port, and whose commander I had the honor of meeting at the office of the Jewish shipbroker.

After six weeks of comparative quietude—broken only by mailing an occasional large letter* to the Department—I assumed, under official sanction, the bold step of taking possession of the seals, the papers, the stools, the flag, and the arms.

They were conveyed to me, on the twelfth of the month, in a boat. I shall not soon forget the occasion. The sun shone brightly. The "arms" filled up the bow of the boat; the papers, the stools, and the flag were lying in the stern-sheets. I felt a glow at sight of the flag, though it was small and somewhat torn. If the office should prove lucrative, I determined to buy another at my own cost. The sign-board, or "arms," was large—larger than any I had yet seen in the place; much larger than the Imperial arms over the Governor's doors.

* It should be mentioned that Government now generously assumes the cost of all paper, wax, ink, and steel pens consumed in the consular service. I believe the consular system is indebted for this to the liberal administrative capacity of Mr. Edward Everett, late of the State Department.

I should say it must have been six feet long by four broad. The eagle was grand, and soared upon a blue sky; the olive branch, in imitation of nature, was green; the darts of a lively red.

And yet, I must admit, it seemed to me out of all proportion to the flag and to the shipping. I thought it must have been ordered by a sanguine man. It reminded me of what I had heard of the United States arms, erected in the Crystal Palace of London. I feared it was too large for the business. I never liked, I must confess, that sort of disproportion. If I might use a figurative expression, I should say that I had always fancied those sorts of nuts which have a kernel bigger than the shell.

If the "arms" had been of ordinary size, I should have raised it upon my roof. My serving-man was anxious to do so. But I reflected that only one American ship was then in port; that it was quite uncertain when another would arrive. I reflected that the office-furniture was inconsiderable; even one of the stools alluded to in the official list brought to my notice at Washington, had disappeared; and instead of nine blank passports there were now only seven. I therefore retained the sign in my office, though it filled up valuable space there. I gave a formal receipt for the flag, the stamps, the arms, the stool, the table, the record books, and for a considerable budget of old papers in a very tattered condition.

Two days after I received a bill from the late Jewish incumbent to the amount of twenty-five dollars for repairs on flag and "arms." Having already given a receipt for the same, and communicated intelligence thereof to the seat of government, I felt reluctantly compelled to decline payment; I proposed, however, to forward the bill to the Department with all the necessary vouchers.

The Jewish broker finding the matter was assuming this serious aspect, told me that the fee was a usual one on a change of consulate; and assured me jocularly, that as the consulate was changed on an average every eighteen months, the sign-board was the most profitable part of the business.

I observed, indeed, that the paint was very thick upon it; and it appeared to have been spliced on one or two occasions.

There arrived, not long after, to my address, by the way of the Marseilles steamer, a somewhat bulky package. I conjectured that it contained a few knick-knacks, which I had requested a friend to forward to me from a home port. By dint of a heavy bribe to the customs men, added to the usual port charges, I succeeded in securing its delivery without delay. It proved to be a set of the United States Statutes at Large, heavily bound in law calf. A United States eagle was deeply branded upon the backs of the volumes. There was evidently a distrust of the consular character. The thought of this, in connection with the late suicide, affected me painfully. I thought—looking upon the effects around me—that I should not like to be reduced so far as to rob my consulate!

I found many hours of amusement in looking over the records of the office; they were very brief, especially in the letter department. And on comparing the condition of the records with my consular instructions, I was struck with an extraordinary discrepancy. The law, for instance, enjoined copies to be made of all letters dispatched from the office; but with the exception of three or four, dated some fifteen years back, I could not find that any had been entered. Indeed, one of my predecessors had taken a very short, and, as it seemed to me, a very ingenious method of recording correspondence—in this way:

"April 1. Wrote Department informing them of arrival.

"June 5. Wrote the Governor.

"June 7. Received reply from the Governor, saying he had got my letter.

"June 9. Wrote the Governor, blowing up the post-office people for breaking open my letters.

"July. Wrote home for leave of absence, and quit the office."

I think it was about a week after the installment of the flag and arms in my office, that I received a very voluminous packet from a native of the port, who gave me a great many titles, and informed me in the language of the country (in exceedingly fine writing), that he was the discoverer of a tremendous explosive machine, calculated to destroy fleets at a great distance, and to put an end to all marine warfare. He intimated that he was possessed of republican feelings, and would dispose of his discovery to the United States for a consideration.

After a few days—during which I had accomplished the perusal—he called for my reply.

I asked, perhaps from impertinent curiosity, if he had made any overtures to his own government?

He said he had.

I asked, with what success?

He said they had treated him with indignity; and from the explanatory gestures he made use of to confirm this statement, I have no doubt they did.

He said that genius must look for lucrative patronage beyond the ocean, and glanced wistfully at the "arms."

I told him—turning my own regard in the same direction—that the United States Government was certainly a rich and powerful government. But, I added, they were not in the habit of paying away large sums of money even to native genius; not even, I continued sportively, to consular genius. I told him, if he would draw up a plan and model of his machine, I should be happy to inclose it in my budget of dispatches, for the consideration of the distinguished gentleman at the head of the Navy Department.

He asked me if I would add a strong opinion in its favor?

I told him that I had not long been connected with the shipping interests of my country, and was hardly capable of forming an opinion about the merits of the marine machine he was good enough to bring under my notice. I was compelled further to observe, that I did not think a very high estimate was placed by government upon consular opinions of any sort.

The poor man seemed satisfied—looked wistfully again at the "arms," as if they implied very extensive protection—bade me good morning, and withdrew.

The weeks wore on, and there was no American arrival; nor did I hear any thing of my recognition by the Central Government. I drew up in a careful manner, two new record books in obedience to law, and transcribed therein my various notes to the Department and foreign personages, in a manner that I am sure was utterly unprecedented in the annals of the office. I prepared the blank of a passport for signature—in case one should be needed—thus reducing the effective number of those instruments to six. I even drew up the blank of a bill against Captain Blank (to be filled up on arrival) for blank charges. Most of my charges, indeed, may be said to have been blank charges.

On one occasion, about three weeks after full possession of the "effects," there was a violent ring at the office bell. I hurried down with my record books and inkstand, which I had transferred for security to my sleeping quarters. It proved, however, to be a false alarm: it was a servant who had rung at the wrong door. He asked my pardon in a courteous manner, and went away. I replaced the record books in the office drawer, and retired to my apartment.

I think it was some two or three days after this, when I heard of a large ship standing "off and on" at the mouth of the harbor. I was encouraged to think, by a friendly party, that she might be an American vessel. I even went upon the tower of the town to have a look at her with my spy-glass (a private spy-glass). There was no flag flying; and she was too far off to make her out by the rig. She came up, however, the next day, and proved to be a British bark from Newcastle.

Matters were in this condition, the office wearing its usual quiet air, when I was waited on one morning by a weazen-faced little gentleman, who spoke English with pertinacity, and a slight accent. He informed me that he had been at one period incumbent of the office which I now held. He asked, in a kind manner, after the Government.

I thanked him, and told him that by last advices they were all very well.

He said that he was familiar with the details of the consular business, and would be happy to be of service to me.

I thanked him in the kindest manner; but assured him that the business was not yet of so pressing a character as to demand an assistant. (Indeed, with the exception of four or five letters dispatched in various directions, and the preparation of the blanks already alluded to, I had, in the course of two or three months, performed no important consular act whatever.)

My visitor diverted consideration as gracefully as his English would allow, to the climate, and the society of the port. He said he should be happy to be of service to me in a social way; and alluded to one or two government balls which, on different occasions, he had the honor of attending in a consular capacity.

I thanked him again, without, however, preferring any very special request.

After musing a moment, he resumed conversation by asking me "if I had a coat?"

I did not fully understand him at first; and replied at a venture, that I had several.

Very true, said he, but have you the buttons?

I saw that he alluded to the official costume, and told him I had not.

Whereupon, he said that he had only worn his coat upon one or two occasions; and he thought that, with a slight alteration, it would suit admirably my figure.

I thanked him again; but taking from the drawer the thin copy of consular instructions, I read to him those portions which regarded the new order respecting plain clothes. I told him, in short, that the blue and the gilt (for I had not then heard of the re-introduction of the dress system in various European capitals) had utterly gone by.

He seemed disappointed; but presently recovered animation, and remarked, that he had in his possession a large American flag, which he had purchased while holding the consular office, and which (as the Government had declined paying for the same), he would be happy to sell to me at a great reduction on the original cost.

I told him that the affairs of the consulate were still in an unsettled state; but in the event of business turning out well, I thought that the Government might be induced to enter into negotiations for the purchase. (I had my private doubts of this, however.)

At my mention of the Government again, he seemed disheartened. He soon asked me, in his broken manner (I think he was of Dutch origin), "If the Gouvernman vass not a little mean about those tings?"

I coughed at this; very much as the stationer, Mr. Snagsby, used to cough, when he made an observation in Mrs. Snagsby's presence. But collecting myself, I said that the Government had shown great liberality in the sign-board, and doubted if a larger one was to be found in Europe.

He surprised me, however, by informing me in a prompt manner, that he had expended a pound sterling upon it, out of his own pocket!

I hoped, mildly, that he had been reimbursed. He replied, smartly, that he had not been. He continued courteous, however; and would, I think, upon proper representations on the part of the Government, be willing to resume negotiations.

A fortnight more succeeded, during which several bills came in—for the record books, post-ages, hire of an office boat, rent of office, beside some repairs I had ordered to the office table. I had even gone so far as to buy a few bottles of old wine and a packet of Havana cigars, for the entertainment of any friendly captains who might arrive.

Affairs were in this condition when I heard, one morning, upon the public square of the town, that an American vessel had been seen some miles down the gulf, and it was thought that she might bear up for this harbor.

I went home to my rooms in a state of excitement it is quite impossible to describe. I dusted the record books, and rubbed up the backs of the United States Statutes at Large. (I should have mentioned that I had added my private copy of Vattel to the consular library; together, they really made an imposing appearance.)

I took the precaution of oiling the pulley to the office bell. My servant-man had hinted that it had sometimes failed to ring. I ordered him to give it repeated trials, while I took up a position in my apartment. It rang distinctly, and so vigorously that I feared the occupants of the adjoining house might be disturbed. I therefore approached the window, and, giving a concerted signal, ordered my serving-man to abstain.

He was evidently in high spirits at the good order in which matters stood. He renewed his proposal to place the sign-board upon the roof of the house. I found, however, upon inquiry, that it would involve the labor of three men for half a day; I therefore abandoned the idea. I authorized him, however, to apply a fresh coating of varnish, and to place it in a conspicuous position upon the side of the office fronting the door.

He wiped his forehead, and said it was a "disegnetto meraviglioso"—a wonderful little design!

The wind continued for some days northerly, and no vessel came into port. On the fourth day, however, I received a note from a friendly party, stating that an American bark had arrived. I gave a dollar to the messenger who brought the news. I saw the intelligence confirmed in the evening journal. I was in a great trepidation all the following day.

At length, a little after the town clock had struck twelve, the captain came. I hurried into the office to meet him. He was a tall, bleary-eyed man, in a damaged black beaver with a narrow rim, tight-sleeved black dress-coat, and cowhide boots.

I greeted him warmly, and asked him how he was?

He thanked me, and said he was "pretty smart." I regretted that I had not some rum-and-water. The old wine I did not think he would appreciate. In short, I was disappointed in my countryman. I should not like to have sailed with him, much less to have served under him.

Before leaving the office, he cautioned me against a sailor who might possibly come to me with his "cussed" complaints: he said he was an "ugly devil," and I had best have nothing to do with him.

True enough, the next morning a poor fellow presented himself, speaking very broken English, and complaining that he was sadly abused—showing, indeed, a black eye, and a lip frightfully bloated.

I ordered my serving-man to prepare him a little breakfast. This was not, perhaps, a legitimate consular attention, but it proved a grateful one; and the man consumed two or three slices of broiled ham with extraordinary relish. After this he told me a long story of the abuses he had undergone, and of his desire to get a discharge.

I asked him if he had an American protection? He said he had bought one upon the dock in New York, shortly before sailing, and had paid a half-eagle for it, but it was lost.

This was unfortunate; and upon referring to the ship's crew-list, I found that the customs' clerk had dispatched the whole subject of nationalities in a very summary manner. He had written the words "U. States" up and down the sheet in such an affluent style as to cover two thirds, or three quarters, or (reckoning the flourishes of his capitals) even the whole body of the crew. Now, as some four or five of them were notoriously, and avowedly, as foreign as foreign birth, language, and residence could make them, I was compelled to think lightly of the authority of the customs' clerk.

The Consular Instructions, moreover, I found were not very definite in regard to the circumstances under which a discharge might be granted. But the most trying difficulty of all was the fact that I was not as yet—in the eyes of the authorities—a Consul at all. Although I might discharge the poor fellow, I could neither procure him admittance to the hospital, or furnish him with such papers as would be counted valid. I could, indeed, protect him under the shadow of the arms and the flag; but should he tire of the broiled ham, and venture an escapade, he might, for aught that I knew, be clapped into prison as a vagabond.

I stated the matter to him cautiously; alluding, with some embarrassment, to my own present lack of authority; advising him of the comparative infrequency of American vessels at that port; and counseling him, in sober earnest, to stick by the ship, if possible, until he reached an adjoining port, where he would find a recognized consul and more abundant shipping.

The consequence was, the poor fellow slunk back to his ship, and the captain assured me, in a gay humor (I fear it was his habit to joke on such matters with brother Consuls), that "he got a good lamming for his pains."

When the vessel was ready to leave, I made out her papers. I doubt very much if any ship's papers were ever made out with nicer attention to formalities. I warmed up the stamp and printer's ink for some hours by a low fire, in order to secure a good impression of the consular seal. Without vanity, I may say that I succeeded. I doubt if such distinct impressions were ever before issued from that office. The bill was, I think, a model in its way; it certainly was so for its amount; for though I strained it to the full limit of the Instructions, it fell at least one-third short of the usual bills upon the record.

Upon the day of sailing (and I furnished my serving-man with an extra bottle of wine on the occasion), I presented myself at the office of the Port Captain, with the usual vouchers respecting the ship and crew under my charge. To my great vexation, however, that gentleman politely informed me that he was not yet advised officially of my appointment—that my seal and signature in short (so elaborately done) were of no possible service.

The skipper who attended me, rubbed his hat with his elbow in a disturbed manner.

What was to be done?

The Captain of the Port suggested that he was himself empowered to act as Consul for such powers as were unrepresented; and he instanced, if I remember rightly, some of the Barbary States.

I withdrew my papers, and my charges for services which had proved so unavailing. I am afraid I was petulant to the serving-man. Thus far the Consulate had not come up to expectations. I began to distrust the value of the place.

I wrote off a sheet full of expostulations to the Governor; another to the authorities at home; and a third to our representative at the Court.

This last promised very strenuous exertion in my behalf; and he was as good as his word; for a week after, I was gratified with the sight of my name, regularly gazetted under the official head of the daily journal of the place.

The same evening the Governor of the Port addressed to me an official note, upon an immense sheet of foolscap, giving me the information already conveyed to me in the Gazette.

Nor was this the end of my triumph; for the next day, or shortly afterward, a band of street performers on various instruments (chiefly, however, their lungs), came under my windows in a body, and played several gratulatory airs to my success in securing recognition. They even followed up the music by shouting in a most exhilarating manner. It showed kind-feeling; and I was just observing to myself the hospitable interest of these people, when my serving-man entered in great glee, and informed me that it was usual on these occasions to pay a small fee to the performers.

I can hardly say I was surprised at this; I asked how much; he said he would count them, and thought about three shillings apiece (our money*) would be sufficient. As there were but fifteen, I did not think it high. I wondered if it had been the habit to charge this matter in the stationery account?

* I mean by this, of the value of our Government money; and not, literally, Government money; of which, indeed, I saw very little—very.

The day after (for now I seemed to be growing rapidly in importance), I received a very bulky package from the chief of police, inclosing the passport, unpaid bills, subscription papers, recommendations, and police description of one David Humfries, who, I was informed, was in the port prison, for various misdemeanors—chiefly for vagabondage; and who, being an American citizen, was at my disposal. The chief of police expressed a wish that I would take charge of the same, and put him out of the country.

I examined the papers. They were curious. He appeared to have figured in a variety of characters. An Italian subscription list represented him as the father of a needy family. A German one of about the same date, expressed a desire that charitable people would assist a stranger in returning to his home and friends at the Cape of Good Hope. Among the bills was a rather long one for beer and brandy.

I thought it would be patriotic to call upon my countryman. I therefore left a note "absent on business," in the office window, and called at the prison. I was ushered, under the charge of an official, into a dingy, grated room upon the second floor, and was presented to a stout negro-man, who met me with great self-possession, apologized for his dress (which indeed was somewhat scanty), and assured me that he was not the man he seemed.

I found him indeed possessed of somewhat rare accomplishments, speaking German and French with very much the same facility as English. He informed me that he was a native of the Cape of Good Hope, though a naturalized citizen of the country I represented. His passport was certainly perfectly in order, and signed by a late Chargé, Mr. Foot of Vienna. He assured me farther, that he was of excellent family; and that his father was a respectable man, well known in New York, and the head of a large school in that city. I told him of the application of the police, and of their wish to be rid of him.

He did not appear to manifest resentment; but said he would consent to any reasonable arrangement. He had no objection to go to New York, provided his wardrobe was put in a proper condition. He should be sorry, he said, to meet the old gentleman (meaning the school-master), in his present guise.

I told him I was sorry that the law did not warrant me in finding him a wardrobe, and that only by a fiction could I class him among seamen, and provide him with a passage home.

Upon this, he avowed himself (in calm weather) a capital sailor, and said he had once served as cook.

I accordingly wrote to the authorities, engaging to ship him by the first American vessel which should touch the port. By rare accident this happened a fortnight after; and having given a receipt for the black man, beside supplying him with a few flannel shirts at my own cost, I succeeded in placing him on board a home-bound ship, by giving the captain an order on the Treasury for ten dollars; the captain intimating meantime, that he would get thirty dollars worth of work out of him, or take off his black skin.

I did not envy the black man his voyage: I have not had the pleasure of hearing from Mr. Humfries since that date.

I have spoken of the arrival of a second American ship; such was the fact. I need not say that the papers were made out in the same style as the previous ones; I had now gained considerable facility in the use of the seal. Upon the payment of the fees I ventured to attach the seal to my receipt for the same. It was not necessary—it was not usual even; still I did it. If the occasion were to be renewed, I think I should do it again.

Not long after this accession of business, which gave me considerable hopes of—in time—replacing the flag, I received a visit from an Italian gentleman just arrived from New York, where he had been an attaché to an opera troupe. He informed me with some trepidation that the authorities were not satisfied with his papers, and had given him notice to return by sea.

I asked him if he was an American: whereupon he showed me a court certificate of his intentions to become a citizen, dated a couple of days before his leave, and with it an imposing-looking paper, illustrated by a stupendous eagle. This last, however, I found upon examination, was only the instrument of an ambitious Notary Public, who testified, thereby, to the genuine character of the court certificate, and at the same time invited all foreign powers to treat the man becomingly. The paper, indeed, had very much the air of a passport, and, by the Italian's account, had cost a good deal more.

I told him I should be happy to do what I could for him, and would cheerfully add my testimony to the bona fide character of the court certificate.

The man, however, wished a passport.

I told him that the only form of passport of which I knew (and I showed the six blanks), involved a solemn declaration on my part, that the party named was an American citizen.

The Italian gentleman alluded to M. Koszta.

I expressed an interest in both; but told him that I had as yet no knowledge of the correspondence in the Koszta affair; that there had been no change in the consular instructions (and I showed him the little pamphlet).

I promised, however, to communicate with the Chargé, who might be in possession of later advices; and, in addition, offered to intercede with the authorities to grant permission to an unoffending gentleman to visit his friends in the country.

Upon this I undertook a considerable series of notes and letters, by far the most elaborate and numerous which had yet issued from my consular bureau. I will not presume to say how many there were, or how many visits I paid to the lodging-quarters of the suspected gentleman. I found it requisite, to secure him any freedom of action, to become sponsor for his good conduct. I need not say (after this) that I felt great solicitude about him.

The notice of "absent on business" became almost a fixture in the office window. I had written previously to the Department for instructions in the event of such application; I had never received them; indeed, I never did. The Chargé flatteringly confirmed my action, and "relied on my discretion." I was sorry to find he relied so much upon it.

It seemed to me that an office involving so much should, at the least, have better furniture. The stool, though now repaired, was a small stool. I sat upon it nervously. The "Statutes at Large" I looked on with pride and satisfaction. I had inaugurated them, so to speak, in the office. I placed my little Vattel by the side of them; I hope it is there now—though there was no eagle on the back.

To return to the Italian gentleman, I at length succeeded in giving him a safe clearance. I think he was grateful: he certainly wore a grateful air when he left my office for the last time; and I felt rewarded for my labor.

It was the only reward, indeed, I received: if he had offered a fee, I think I should have declined. Was I not there, indeed, for the service of my countrymen, and of my intended countrymen? Of course I was.

The day after the Italian gentleman left I paid my office rent for the current month, besides a small bill the serving-man brought me for the caulking of the office boat. It appeared that it had grounded with the tide, and without our knowledge (there being no American ships in port), had remained exposed for several days to the sun.

I should have mentioned before this that the Consulate was not very profitable. And this reminds me that, when I was at Washington, there was a tight little Irishman, who had come up from Tennessee with a budget of testimonials, and was very elated, when I saw him, with the hope of getting the consulate at Cork. The fees of Cork are, I understood, very much the same with those of my own port. I have not heard if the little Irishman succeeded; but I honestly hope that he did not, and that he went back to his work (which I understood was cooperating). I am sure it must be more profitable than the Cork consulate.

Keeping the office in business trim, and sitting upon the office stool (there being no American ships in port), I received, one day, a very large packet, under the seal of the Department. I had not heard from Washington in a long time, and it was a pleasant surprise to me. Possibly, it might be some new and valuable commission; possibly, it might bring the details of the proposed change in the Consular system. Who knew?

In such an event I wondered what the probable salary would be at my post; something handsome, no doubt. I glanced at the "arms" of my country with pride, and broke open the packet.

It contained two circulars, embracing a series of questions, ninety in number, in regard to ship-building, ship-timber, rigging, hemp, steamships, fuel, provisioning of vessels, light-house dues, expenses of harbor, depth of ditto, good anchorages, currents, winds, cutting of channels, buoys, rates of wages, apprentices, stowage facilities, prices current, duties, protests, officers of port, manufactures, trade facilities, leakages, wear and tear, languages, pilots, book publication, etc., etc.; on all of which points the circulars requested full information, as soon as practicable, in a tabular form, with a list of such works as were published on kindred subjects, together with all Government orders in regard to any, or all of the suggested subjects, which were in pamphlet form; and if in a foreign language, the same to be accurately translated into American.

The accompanying letter stated that it was proposed to allow no remuneration for the same; but added, "faithful acquittal of the proposed task will be favorably viewed."

I reflected—(I sometimes do reflect).

A respectable reply even to the questions suggested, would, supposing every facility was thrown in my way by port officers and others, involve the labor of at least six weeks, and the writing over of at least ninety large pages of foolscap paper (upon which it was requested that the report should be made).

I reflected, farther; that the port officer, as yet affecting a large share of his old ignorance, would, upon presentation of even the first inquiries as to the depth of the harbor, send me to the guard-house as a suspicious person; or, recognizing my capacity, would report the question as a diplomatic one to the governor; who would report it to the Central Cabinet; who would report it back to the maritime commander in an adjoining city; who would communicate on the subject with the police of the port; who would communicate back with the marine intendant; who would report accordingly to the Central Government; who would in due time acquaint the Chargé at the capital with their conclusions.

I reflected—that I had already expended, on behalf of the Government, more of time and of money than I should probably ever receive again at their hands.

I reflected—that life was, so to speak, limited, and that in case I should determine to give it up to gratuitous work for my country, or, indeed, for any party whatever, I should prefer that the object of my charity should be a needy object.

I reflected—that I had given bonds in the sum of two thousand dollars (with sound bondsmen) for the stool, the blank passports, the pewter and brass seals, the small-sized flag, and the "arms;" and I examined them with attention.

I reflected—that these things being in a capital state of preservation, and my health still unimpaired, I had better withdraw from office.

I therefore sent in my resignation.

I do not think there has been any omission in the performance of my consular duties; it involved, indeed, a more expensive charity on my part than I am in the habit of extending to the indigent. I trust that the Government is grateful.

In overlooking my books I find charges against the Government for nineteen dollars and sixty-three cents for postages and stationery. To make the sum an even one I have drawn on the Government (after the form prescribed in the consular instructions) for twenty dollars, making an over-draft of thirty-seven cents, for which I hope the Government will take into consideration my office and boat rent, my time and repairs to the consular stool.

Finding the draft difficult of negotiation upon the great European exchanges, I may add that I have carried it for a long time in my pocket. Should it be eventually paid, I shall find myself in possession, by adding the thirty-seven cents to sums received in fees during the period of my consulate, of the amount of some thirty dollars more or less.

I have not yet determined how to invest this. I am hoping that Mr. Powers, who, I hear, wears the title of Consul, will find some pretty Florentine model-woman to make an "America" of. If he does so, and will sell a small plaster cast at a reasonable price, I will buy it with my consular income, and install the figure (if not too rude) in my study as a consular monument.

I shall be happy to welcome my successor; I will give him all the aid in my power; I will present him to the ten-penny reading-room, and shall be happy to inscribe his name in advance at either of the hotels. I will inform him of the usual anchorage ground of American ships, so far as my observation has gone. I shall be pleased to point out to him, through the indulgence of my serving-man, the best grocer's shop in the port, and another where are sold wines and varnish.

Should the office stool require repair, I think I could recommend with confidence a small journeyman joiner in a neighboring court.

He will have my best hopes for lucrative employment in his new position, and for happiness generally.

For myself, consular recollections are not, I regret to say, pleasant. I do not write "Ex-United States Consul" after my name. I doubt if I ever shall.

All my disturbed dreams at present take a consular form. I waked out of a horrid nightmare only a few nights since, in which I fancied that I was bobbing about fearfully in a boat—crashing against piles and door-posts—waiting vainly for an American captain.

I have no objection to serve my country; I have sometimes thought of enlisting in the dragoons. I am told they have comfortable rations, and two suits of clothes in a year. But I pray Heaven that I may never again be deluded into the acceptance of a small consulate on the Mediterranean!

The writer of the present paper begs to say a serious word at the end.

First of all, he has intended no disrespect to those members of the present Administration who kindly bestowed upon him a consular appointment, in the belief (equally indulged in by the writer), that it would facilitate his investigations in a literary task upon which he was engaged. He begs here to express his gratitude for the kind intention; and he does this all the more sincerely because, as non-combatant in the political ranks, he had no claim to consideration.

The writer begs to assure the reader, farther, that he has not drawn up this pitiful story of a consulate, which is true in all its essential particulars, merely for the sake of making a joke of his misfortune.

He wishes to draw public attention to the beggarly condition of our present consular system, which compels its lesser agents to a subsistence (if they subsist at all) by pillage on American travelers and captains. He wishes to express his mortification and shame, that the foreign agency of a State so rich and so prosperous as our own—upon which, in the hazards of Continental change, important business may devolve—should have no better support than a few paltry fees—no worthier representative, at times, than a chance broker of the wharves—and no better basis for dignity and consideration than a tattered flag and a vulgar sign-board.

He wishes to call attention to the imperfect Consular Instructions, consisting of a careless accumulation of old Congressional Acts, showing little precision, and defining powers most imperfect just upon those points where authority should be most explicit.

He wishes to direct attention specially to the looseness of Government orders, as they stand at present, with regard to what constitutes nationality, and what limits belong to those marketable papers known as sailors' "protections."

He wishes to deplore, in virtue of his own experience, that system of constant change in foreign consular appointments, by which American captains and sailors, for whose benefit the office is specially created, are left at the mercy of a man who, in nine cases out of ten, is a stranger to the customs of the port—to its laws, its business, and its language.

He wishes to suggest the propriety of making our consular appointments such, and so well supported by a sufficient salary, and by permanence of tenure, that they may do effective service to our countrymen abroad, and reflect honor upon the State. And he ventures to suggest that a national representative, who, by his firmness, his dignity, and his capacity, can command respect, will be quite as able to protect the rights of a compatriot as if he commanded "Greytown" guns.

THE LOST SON OF ICHABOD ARMSTRONG.

IN one of the wildest sections of Orange County, in the State of New York, a solitary farmhouse stands—or stood at the period of which I now write—in lonesome beauty, shaded by two magnificent oak-trees, the growth of more than a century. For miles in every direction the rugged, rocky land and abrupt hills afforded means of livelihood to only a half dozen poor and hard laboring families, who starved on their rocky possessions. No house was within a mile of the Rocky Glen farm, but around this quiet spot were evidences of the toil of many years, perhaps many generations. There was a lawn in front of the house, on which grew fruit-trees, such as are usually found nearest the house. A fine orchard was on a hillside and over the hilltop close by. Patches of smooth land here and there, from which every stone had been carefully picked, indicated the ability of the farm in the way of clover and timothy, while in the summer time many garden spots, rich with waving grain, lit up the otherwise dark and sombre aspect of the four hundred acres which were included within the farm of Ichabod Armstrong.

Some men might with plausibility maintain actions against their parents for damages sustained by reason of acts at the baptismal ceremony. Why he was called Ichabod no one could explain, nor his mother or father any more than others. His mother had a recollection of selecting a Scripture name, and that there was something about this that struck her fancy. Certainly she had no idea that the glory of his family was lessened by his birth. But those who knew him forgot his name; and at the period of which we now write he had grown to be an old man, having followed in the footsteps of his fathers, and under his culture the old farm had vastly improved, while there was much other manifest good that the world had derived from his life in it.

I say much other manifest good; and there were more good deeds of Ichabod Armstrong which were not manifest here, but which will one day be made brilliant in the eyes of those who despised him in his humility.

In his early life he was educated in a manner superior to the ordinary course, in those days, with the sons of farmers in Orange County; and after graduating, it was said that he traveled for several years. But after his parents' death he returned and took charge of the farm, and was soon married to a young lady in the neighborhood, whom, rumor said, he had loved in former years, and would have married but for her parents' objections. He had been in fact a wild boy in youth and at college, and their objections were, perhaps, well founded. However that may have been, the love of maturer years was none the less ardent or faithful, and they lived together on the farm for forty or fifty springs and autumns, alone, but not lonely, and, meanwhile, the oak trees over the house grew very old, and the house itself creaked and shook in the winter tempests.

As Ichabod grew old he grew to feeling deeply his responsibility as a man; and when he was elected an elder in the church at —, he seemed to be unable for a while to bear the load thus placed on him. But time, and a good stout soul, full of faith and hope and reverent humility, sustained him, and his heart grew more and more gentle, more and more tender of the faults of his fellow-men, more and more affectionate, earnest, and pure.

Every one loved him. Not infrequently he was called on to occupy the desk in front of the pulpit, when the old clergyman was absent or ill; and it was pleasant, beyond description, to hear the old man's quaint and simple explanations of the passages he read from Holy Writ.

His wife lived with him, fondly and faithfully, grew old with him, grew gentle with him, and was very like him in all things. They were childless. And so the name Ichabod to some appeared as if given in an ignorant prophetic moment, for with him his family seemed extinct. As age came on he had felt much the necessity of a support to his declining years, and still more to those of his wife, for whom he cared most tenderly, and who began to fail long before he felt the weakness of age. They accordingly sent to distant relatives who had many children, and asked for one of their boys; and the boy came. But he was a wild, turbulent youth, and the old man had not strength to manage him, and, after a year's trial, sent him back with a present and an apology to his parents.

The evening after the old couple were again left alone they were seated by the large hearth fire, silent as was their wont of late, and a sense of lonesomeness began to creep over them both.

"Sarah, I am some way restless, and I think not quite well this evening," said the farmer.

"You have worked too hard at the threshing, Ichabod; you are not as able to swing a flail as you used to be. We are growing old."

"Yes, that is it, I suppose. We are getting to be old folk. Do you remember that hand when we were young, Sarah?"

"It was smooth on the back then."

"It is rough, brown, and wrinkled now."

"God's sun, and winds, and work have done it all, my husband."

"Ay—so. Let us thank Him. We have lived long and happily. It is Saturday night. Let us sing."

It was curious to hear those two old people. Their voices were musical, if broken; and as they had sung together for fifty years, they sang now, without book or note, sitting in the fire-light of the Saturday night, and their voices were audible out on the lawn, and even down to the road, where a passing traveler heard them and paused.

She was a woman, young, with much of her young beauty still left about her. She led by the hand a little girl of twelve years old, who paused with her and listened to the music. A sudden impulse appeared to seize the mother, and she entered the gate and hastened up the lawn, dragging the surprised child, as if she feared her resolution might give out before she accomplished her errand. She pushed open the door of the old kitchen, and entered where the aged couple sat.

"In the name of the merciful Son of God, will you, who sing his praise, help a poor and dying woman?"

"Let that name never be pleaded in vain under this roof," was the calm answer of the old man; "but who are you that use it so freely and lightly?"

"Oh! not freely, neither lightly, for I was brought up to reverence it, though sadly have I forgotten it in these late years. I am poor, homeless, and a wanderer. My child is my all. I am dying away from her. I heard your voices as I passed along the road, and I dared enter to ask a great favor. Greater, I know now, than I dare ask or you could give."

"Speak on. What was it?"

"No. It is too much. A little food, if you please, and we will go on; a crust of bread, a cup of water."

"Where are you going?"

To—to— The good. God knows where I shall find—"

She paused, and a violent fit of trembling overcame her. By some sort of intuition the old elder knew what was the woman's wish when she entered; and when a hastily-warmed supper had been set before the mother and child, he called his wife out into the next room, and found her heart full of the same idea that was filling and gladdening his.

"She has such soft brown eyes," said the old lady.

They talked a little while, and on their return to the kitchen found the mother already gathering her thin, but clean shawl around her shoulders, and making the child ready for the road.

"Sit down a moment," said the old man, solemnly. They both obeyed.

"My good woman, my wife and I are aged and alone. The world has gone well with us, but it grows lonesome as we grow old and cold. We want company and love. Will you part with that child of yours?"

The question was abrupt, and startled the mother. "Oh, Sir!" said she, "you have divined my thoughts. It was for that I came in. I so longed to leave her in such a home."

"You consent? There is much to speak of, then. You will stay with her here to-night, and to-morrow we will talk of it. Take off your shawl and bonnet."

There was a rare elegance and symmetry of form, which, indeed, there was no one present to appreciate, when the mother appeared in her simple and poor dress. A broad forehead was marked about the temples with lines of aristocratic beauty. Her eye was like the child's, deep brown, almost to blackness, and its glance, though restless and roving, was, nevertheless, thoughtful, and indicative of a soul within. It is not every eye that shows a soul.

When the old man read the words of Holy Writ, she listened with devout attention; and when he prayed, a low, stifled sob indicated her deep emotion.

That was a solemn night at the Rocky Glen farm, and there was little sleeping done within the old house. The aged couple, resting in their own room, had much to think of the future, and many anxious and troubled thoughts. The mother knelt by her child, who alone slept peacefully, and prayed the long night through. Bitter prayers were hers, and yet hopeful; and in the morning her dark eye was as calm as if she had slept serenely all the hours.

All the preliminaries were readily arranged, and the mother's story was confided to the old elder's ear, who carefully wrote it down for preservation. It was the old story. She was the daughter of a poor scholar, and she had been educated in all his learning. Their home had been a happy one, and was so even after she had been won to love a man many years her senior, but who was of noble appearance, of refined and elegant tastes, and of strangely winning manners and voice. They lived several years in the cottage with the old man, and her husband was kind and affectionate beyond description. As time passed on he grew restless and uneasy. He was absent often for days, weeks, and at length he went and never returned. Her father died. She was poor, homeless, starving with her child. She lived in an inhospitable neighborhood, and at length, after years of poverty, she took her child by the hand and wandered away in search of some distant relatives, and perhaps her husband.

Having finished her story, she prepared to go, and embracing her child once closely, but calmly, she would have departed on her wandering journey, seeking the father of her child. But the good elder interposed. Doubtless his keen eye saw that she would not journey far before her feeble strength would fail her forever; and even while he was commanding her in his firm and gentle voice to remain with her child, the excitement of the thought produced another of those nervous fits of trembling which indicated her exceeding weakness, and she yielded and remained.

A fortnight later she was dying. The winter winds were howling around the old house when she was departing. The scene within strangely contrasted with that out of doors; for a calm, an indescribable peace was on the mother's forehead, and in her heart, and with a long look into the eyes of her child, a kiss of parting joy and agony, a smile of gratitude to the old elder, and a single glance toward heaven of the brown eyes that even then closed forever on the scenes of earth, and opened forever on other and more joyful scenes, she went from the dark wintery night that was walling around the farmhouse into light and rest.

We pass over a period of six years, during which the inhabitants of the Rocky Glen farm grew older—one to the beauty of girlhood and womanhood, and the others to the weakness and the trustfulness of older age.

Ichabod Armstrong's mind now began to give indications of a peculiarity which proved not a little painful to his wife and daughter; for such was the title given to Katharine, who also was called by the name of her adopted father, that of her mother being generally unknown. This peculiarity consisted in a fear that Kate would some day marry and leave him, and a determination on his part that this should never occur. For a year or two Kate laughed gayly enough at this; but then there was a change, and she sought to reason against it. But reason did not operate. It only exasperated the old man. He even grew angry at her, and though he repented it afterward, yet he used language so harsh as to bring tears to her eyes. She ceased to talk with him; but the visits of a young man from the village, which now grew more and more frequent, so worked on the old man's mind that he became nearly insane, and talked furiously of Kate's ingratitude. The young man was a son of Mr. Irving, the clergyman, who had been educated at one of the best colleges in the country, and was now a law-student in the city. During his frequent visits at home he found his way almost daily out to the farm.

This state of affairs continued for three years, and the old elder seemed to have become a changed man. He was harsh, morose, fretful, or abusive in his house, and the men in his fields were afraid of him. His wife watched all this with deep sadness, and frequent tears, while Kate's eyes grew dim, and her cheek pale, and her step feeble.

One winter evening (it was the anniversary of Kate's birth in the family) they were seated together by the fire, in the sorrowful stillness which now took the place of the former cheerfulness of that hearth, when Ichabod suddenly rose to his feet, and faced his wife with a look of intense emotion. "I must make an end of this, and I will do it now. I believe," said he, "that God is visiting me for the sins of former years. Sarah, listen to me. I have somewhat to say that you have never before heard. It will astonish you. Mayhap it will estrange you, and I shall then be alone as I deserve. When we were married I had loved you for long years of anxious waiting. When your father sent me off so abruptly, and you, even you, Sarah, looked coldly on me, I loved you with my whole soul, as every hour since, and as I love you now."

The wife stared curiously in her husband's countenance, and he continued slowly, and as if with pain.

"But in the interval after I left you, and before you saw me again, I had been married to another."

She started, but was calm again instantly.

"It was a strange affair that I never wholly understood myself. I determined to leave home and assume a false name. I sought my fortune in the city, where, wandering about the streets one evening, I met a man who seized me by the arm and asked me if I wished to be rich. I laughed, and said I did. 'Then come with me,' said he, and half-led, half-dragged me, through a dozen streets, to the door of a large house, which we entered. I was left alone for an hour, and then four persons entered the room where I sat. One was my former acquaintance, and another a lady leaning on his arm. The third was a clergyman, as I knew by his dress. The fourth was a young and strangely beautiful woman. I can not tell what followed. It suited my wild feelings, this strange occurrence. I was ready for any thing, and, though astounded, I was calm, and in five minutes I was the husband of the beautiful girl, whose countenance was all the time motionless and devoid of interest in the ceremony or the persons around her.

"The next morning I found a wardrobe provided for a journey, and we—a party of four—left the city for long travel. My wife was an idiot. Her parents had determined to find her a husband, and they had taken this course. A year later we were in Paris, and my wife was sane, and a child—my child—was in her arms. The mother and child were alike rarely beautiful, and the boy was named with the name I had given as mine—Richard Delavan—my mother's family-name, and the name too, by-the-way, of the mother of our Kate.

"One morning I awoke in the hotel where we were staying, and found myself alone—wife, father, mother, child, all were gone. A slip of paper in an envelope said, 'Send your address in America to A. and A., Bankers, London.' My address! I had none. I must make one now. All search was vain. I got no clew to the deserters. My life was left suddenly a black blank. I wandered about the streets for weeks, and finally determined to go back to the old farm and the waiting arms of my dear old father and mother. I sent my address as directed, and hastened home. Home! Yes, the rocks, the trees, the house were the same, but the father and mother that so loved me were in the church-yard, and I felt as if my home were there. A year passed, and I received a note bidding me hasten to New York, to a certain house. I obeyed the summons. I was admitted by a servant, who led me directly up to a cold, dark room, which, in the dim light of the retiring day, I recognized as our bridal-room, and the bed, and curtains, and costly ornaments all strangely contrasted with my cottage-home. But as my eyes became accustomed to the light, I saw on the bed the form of my wife awfully calm and still. She was dead! I never saw her so splendidly beautiful. But I had never loved her, and I wept no tear now. I felt only that the intelligence had been properly communicated to me as one interested in knowing of her death, and in seeing her dead, and I turned away. Her father was standing watching me. I spoke but a sentence to him. 'Our child?' 'Dead!' was his solemn reply. I walked down to the door, and out into the air, and I felt as a prisoner feels—escaped, freed, enfranchised. I was relieved of a load of pain, of chains. I was a boy again. I blotted those years out of my life. I felt that they were to be forgotten, and I forgot them. I met you again. Your father was dead. Your love was unchanged. I had wronged you in thinking otherwise. We were married, and have lived how happily! Can you forgive me my silence—my long-kept secret?"

"If there were ought to forgive, it was forgiven the day we were married. Those years were your own. I was cold in dismissing you. I was a dutiful child to a father I feared."

"But more, my wife. All this long time I have believed my son living. I have no confidence in the story of his death in childhood. And I have longed to see him with unutterable longing. It is over now. I am content to die. And I have to-night resolved to do, what I have long feared to do, lest I should forever cut off my son; I mean, to make my will, and give Kate all I have. Is this right?"

"She is a darling child. I think you are right."

"I begin to think I have wronged her. She seems to love me. Think you she does really love the old man?"

Kate answered the question on her knees by his side, and they knelt and prayed.

Next day the elder came to New York to consult me about his will, and brought Kate to pass a few days in the city, to endeavor to recover the bloom of her cheek which had somewhat faded.

The face of Katharine Armstrong, once seen, was not to be forgotten: not so much on account of its remarkable beauty, as of the splendid expression of her eyes, under very long lashes, and the unusual prominence of her eyebrows. The latter feature was one of those marks of countenance that often distinguish families and family connections. I heard her history from the old man with great interest, and though I dismissed it for the time, it repeatedly returned to my mind during the few days they were in town.

In the course of our conversation he related to me the particulars of his first marriage, and I was interested in this almost as much as in Miss Armstrong. On the morning after their arrival, I called, with some members of my family, on the young lady, and engaged her for the evening to go with us to a concert.

Evening came. As we entered the hall, I observed Miss Armstrong exchanging bows and smiles with a young gentleman, who, to my surprise, I saw was a clerk in my own office—a valued and promising young man, whom I immediately beckoned to approach. He joined our party very willingly, and we passed to our seats. The concert was about half over when my attention was called to a gentleman across the room, who most pertinaciously directed his gaze and his glass at our group; and I leaned over to ask Miss Armstrong if she knew him. Young Irving instantly looked at the man with a frown on his face, and the next moment the stranger rose and left the hall. There was something that I did not like about his countenance, and yet something peculiarly attractive. It haunted me till the concert was over. We entered our carriage, and Irving bowed to us on the pavement. As the horses sprang forward there was a slight confusion and delay in the crowd, so that we were backed to the spot of starting. At this moment I saw Irving meet the stranger, and it was evident that ill-tempered words were exchanged; and the next instant Irving parried a blow, and returned it so willingly that his opponent went down like a stone, while my young friend quietly strode away. The next morning he was arrested for the assault, and I attended him on a preliminary examination held by a justice.

The complainant was now sufficiently near me to be examined carefully, and I was struck with the peculiar beauty of his forehead, and the equally strange fury and fire of his eyes, which lay far back under prominent and very heavy brows. He gave his name as Richard Strong, and related his version of the circumstances which had led to the assault, all highly colored of course. I was not present as counsel, but as a witness. Irving conducted his own defense. He had, in the course of the day, learned all he could of his antagonist's history. His cross-examination was rapid and amusing to any stranger, but some points in it struck me with great force.

"What is your business?"

"I am a merchant."

"Is not that a lie? You are billiard marker in —'s rooms, are you not?"

"I was—but I have left there."

"What other names have you lately gone by?"

"I do not understand your meaning, Sir."

"Keep cool, and reply calmly. You were Richard Smith at Baltimore, were you not?"

"I am not here to reply to impertinent questions."

"You were Richard Thornton at Philadelphia last week, were you not?"

"Am I to answer this man's impudence?" said the complainant furiously to the Justice.

"The questions seem proper, to show the character of a witness. You must answer them," said the magistrate.

"You were Richard Scoresby ten years ago in New York, were you not?"

I started. Irving was going on in his tantalizing way, without waiting for answers, when I whispered, "Press him on that name Scoresby; I wish it." It was the name of Armstrong's first wife, and there was, to say the least, a curious coincidence here. The question was repeated.

"I do not know what names men may have called me."

"What is your real name? Come, let us know?"

"I have given you my name."

"Yes, you have given us your name. But what we want just now is your father's. Come, give us your father's name?"

An expression more devilish than human passed over his countenance. A friend and companion of his own approached Irving, and whispered, "Be careful! It is a touchy subject with him. He never mentions his father, and has once or twice answered that question with a pistol-ball."

We had no desire for such a reply, but proceeded with the examination, and compelled him to admit that he had gone under these different names; and on my testimony, and that of a friend of Irving's, he was discharged, to the manifest anger of his opponent, who retired muttering oaths of revenge.

The same day, when Ichabod Armstrong had left the hotel, a person called and sent up a card to his daughter, requesting to see her.

"Richard Strong," said she, musing. "There must be an error. I never heard of such a person," and she sent down a message declining to see him. The next morning Irving brought the card to me, explaining that he had called on Miss Armstrong the previous evening, and learned of this curious attempt to see her.

This pertinacity in his desire to see Miss Armstrong confirmed in my mind suspicions which had begun to arise; and, though it was none of my business, I bothered my brain not a little to imagine what connection there could be between Miss Armstrong and the son of her protector and adopted father. Sitting and pondering on this matter, I called in young Irving, and was surprised at his active interest in the subject, until his frank confession of an engagement of marriage explained his feelings. The next day, when Mr. Armstrong came to execute his will, I ventured to open the subject to him, and to ask him whether he had ever connected his ward, or adopted child, in any way with his own lost son? The idea, he replied, was not new to him, for her name was Delavan, and this had directed his mind that way. But he had gotten to consider it a fancy of his own old brain, and dismissed it. But I could see, and I rather regretted, that the old man was disturbed by what I said, and I had aroused an old train of thought. I did not mention our meeting with the opponent of Irving, but determining to keep a lookout on his course, and, if opportunity offered, to investigate the matter, I sent the old man home. Here ceased all my connection with him or his family.

Time waits not for lawyers or lawyers' investigations. Ichabod Armstrong having lived his threescore years and ten, with the usual amount of evil and good intermingled, was now close to the path that is on the other side of the dark veil, and was about to pass through, though he knew it not, to walk with men of olden times.

Within a week after his return to the Rocky Glen farm he was dying. Indistinct memories of boyhood thronged around him. Clearer visions of more mature years made themselves visible. The face and features of his dead wife—the dead wife of those years of pain and imprisonment—were constantly before him. Later, calmer, holier years would not efface that memory. Not even when his beloved wife Sarah leaned over him, and spoke gently and peacefully of their long journey side by side. It was pleasant to hear her speak of it; pleasant to see her there, so calm, so gentle, so lovely in her serene age; it was pleasant to remember that long fond love, that pure and faithful affection, and all its joys. The springs of forty years, their golden autumns, the mornings bright with joy, the evenings by the hearth fire—the hearth, whereon never more for them should blaze the round logs or glow the ruddy coals—all these were pleasant memories; but even as they came, back of them lay that dark remorseful thought of his long silence, and how he had deceived that faithful soul through all the years; and he could not bear to remember even their morning and evening prayers together, in the long succession of mornings and evenings through nearly half a century.

But at length he talked it all over with his wife, and grew calm; and then the old man regained his composure, and a higher state of happiness than he had known for years. All his moroseness and peevishness were gone. He was no longer opposed to Kate's marriage, but bade her make ready before he should die, so he might see her safe in the old house with a protector. Irving was at the first opposed to this. He had not designed marriage until he was better off in this world's goods. But this was overruled.

Another winter evening gathered around the Rocky Glen farm with a tempest. The snow was driving wildly on a northeast wind that shook the branches of the oak-trees over the house, until they wailed in anguish.

Within again was a contrast with the storm. The quiet marriage ceremony had been finished an hour previously, and now all the family were gathered around the bed of the dying elder.

His eye flashed with the light of bright hope, and bright memory; for now memory became bright. Far away in the distance now, like a faint star in the deep recesses of a blue and glorious sky, there was a face shining dimly on his memory. It was the face of his dead wife. But that was a momentary vision; flashing out but an instant, and then disappearing, as other and more magnificent memories swept over his soul.

There was one of rare and matchless glory. It was of a dark shadow under the pine-trees, where a spring gushed out and went leaping with musical voice down the rocks. The moon stole in on the water-drops and transformed them into diamonds. One star, brilliant and beautiful, peered through the branches of the trees, and lost its radiance in the dark gloom beneath, or found a fitting place in which a starbeam could love to die, in a dark and tear-brightened eye. "Tear-brightened" I wrote, for tears oftentimes are diamonds before they fall and seem to be lost; and such tears are not really lost, but are to be regathered one day when the soul, out of a dark and dreary past, full of hideous wrong, and sin, and deformity, gathers its few jewels. Among the pine-trees was lingering a summer breeze, entangled there and piteously seeking release. Sometimes there was a moan of pain; and then, as if knowing what was occurring beneath, the wind forgot its quarrel with the pines, and shouted a gay exulting song. Moon, stars, and spring, and wind, heard alike their vows of love, and moon, stars, and spring, after a lapse of fifty years, bore witness to the faith of both the lovers. And like the wind, the vision swept from the mind of the dying old man, and another took its place. He saw the babe that lay on its mother's knee, and something seemed to whisper, to thunder in his ear, that his boy, his son, the last of his name, was living on the face of the inhospitable earth from which he was departing. And as the thought took possession of him, a heavy step was heard in the front of the house, and a man entered, whom no one but Irving recognized. The old man lay in the large room, into which the front door opened directly, so that the stranger advanced at once toward the group around the bed.

His harsh face seemed in ill-keeping with the faces by which he was surrounded, and as he recognized Irving, a gleam of anger made it appear ten-fold worse. The latter was the first to break the silence, and advancing a step, demanded the business of the intruder.

"I have come for one of my family," was the cool and quiet reply.

"None of your family are here."

"Are you quite certain?"

There was a sneer in the tone of the question that was provoking beyond endurance.

"There is no one here who would admit the possibility of a connection with you."

"Possibly I may convince you otherwise. Whose family does that young lady belong to?"

"To mine." It was the deep voice of the old man that replied. Irving for the moment seemed inclined to dispute this, but paused as the stranger (who, it is of course understood, was his former antagonist) again spoke.

"Whose daughter is she? Not yours, old man, certainly."

"By what right do you come here to question thus?" demanded Irving, now growing excited.

"By what right do you question me?" was the reply, again with a sneer.

"By the right of the stronger over the weaker," said Irving, seizing him by the throat, and shaking him furiously as he dragged him toward the door. "Out of this house," and he dashed the door open and sent him flying into the darkness. But with the fierceness of a tiger he sprang back, before the door was closed, and spoke, or rather shouted,

"I will go, but not without my daughter."

All were startled; but the old man most of all. He raised himself with difficulty, but with unusual strength, and gazed into the face of the visitor.

"That face, those eyes, that brow, that strangely-marked forehead—all were hers and her father's—all alike. And Kate. Strange that I never saw it before. It must be so!"

He was muttering all this to himself, and then spoke aloud:

"Who are you, that have so little respect for an old man's death-bed?"

"Ask that boy yonder. He keeps track of me better than I of myself. What was my last name, young man?"

"Who is he, George?"

"Richard Strong, alias Smith, alias Thompson, alias Scoresby. The Scoresby is his oldest name."

The old man trembled as if in an ague, but at length resumed his questioning.

"By what right do you claim my child?"

"As her father."

"And how?"

"Much the usual way. I was her mother's husband."

"Who was her mother?"

"The daughter of the school-teacher in M——, old Jonathan Strong."

"Right," said the old man; "and where did you leave her?"

"I saw her last in A——."

"Right again. What led you to desert her?"

"Desert is a harsh word. I was poor, out of money. I went to look for some. When I returned she was gone."

"Your search was long. Four years' absence might well excuse her for believing you had abandoned her. What became of her?"

"I know not."

"Did you make no inquiries?"

"Yes; but in vain."

"How know you that this is her child?"

"By her perfect likeness to her mother. I saw her in a concert-room in New York last week. I knew her then as my child. I found your address on the hotel books. I came here. On my way I learned that she was your adopted child. Then I knew of a certainty that she was mine. I can not mistake that face."

"Her mother was very beautiful. You must have loved her once?"

The dark features of the visitor had relaxed into an expression of interest during this conversation, and at this question he was visibly startled, and his hand sought a chair, whereon he leaned as he replied somewhat musingly, and in a more gentle voice,

"Yes, I loved her. God knows I loved her.

Once—yes, always. I know not under what strange delusion I left her. She loved me too well; better far than I deserved. Her whole soul was mine. For me she forgot father, mother, God. And I forgot her. Yes, I loved her. Can any of you tell me her fate?"

There was a pitiable beseeching in his face and voice as he looked now around him. He was changed wholly for the time.

"She died in this house, in yonder room."

He staggered as if he had received a blow, and then for a minute looked wildly around as if he saw a ghostly presence.

"May I go in there?"

Mrs. Armstrong silently led the way, without thinking of a light. He followed, and she left him alone. For a few minutes there was deep silence in the room. The elder did not sink back on his pillow, but remained watching the door, from which at length the visitor issued, walking as if unaware of where he was, or whither he was going. As his roving eye beheld Katharine, who stood trembling with painful horror at the discovery of such a father, he started suddenly, looked wildly at her, and fell into a chair, sobbing violently. The strong man was apparently heart-broken. The elder's voice interrupted the silence.

"You are moved strangely."

"Not strangely. For I have found the grave of all my early hopes; I have found a dead wife and a living child."

"Richard Delavan—" He started at the name, and the old man, now convinced of his correct surmises, and trembling anxiously at the strange position in which he found himself, continued: "You have found more. Look in my face. I am old—very old. More than eighty years are weighing on me here, but my memory is clear and bright. It is now sixty years since I held an infant in my arms, but for one instant, and then it was stolen from me, and I never saw my child again. For the mother of that child I had no affection. She had no intellect to win love. But the child I loved in memory. For sixty years I have loved that child with growing affection. They told me he was dead, and for awhile I believed it. But instinctive love denied the story, and I sought him long and with tears. I married my first love, my only love, my good and faithful wife yonder, who has been to me an angel of comfort all these long sad years. I concealed this story from her. I concealed from her that I had ever held another in my arms; that I had a son somewhere on earth. She has forgiven me my sin. But God has punished me. Even as the light of heaven is bursting on me, I have found that son, and I leave him, a deserter of his wife and child, a traitor to his family, an enemy to his God."

"Who—where—what does he mean?" exclaimed the stranger, springing to his side, as the old man sank on his pillow. No one else understood, but in a low whisper, husky, and inaudible to others, he told the story to Delavan, or Richard Armstrong, as he seemed now entitled to be called, and who recognized his father in the dying old man.

It was now painfully evident that the excitement of this scene was too great for the elder, and that the hour of departure had arrived.

The wife was seated on the bedside, with her white, thin hand on her husband's forehead, while large tears were fast dropping from her eyes. The old man smiled on her a glorious smile, and whispered, while she leaned forward to hear:

"Sarah, before God and his angels, in whose presence I now stand, though you see them not, I never loved, but you, and I have loved you with faithful love."

She leaned forward and kissed his forehead, and said some words inaudible to any but his ears, whereat he smiled again.

"Kate, my darling child, may God keep you safe forever!" and he looked at her, and she understood all that he would have said more.

"Richard!"

He knelt at the bedside.

"My son"—and the old man paused as he uttered those words, which he might have used for sixty years, but now spoke for the first time in all his life, and they sounded so pleasantly that he repeated them again and again. "My son—my son—my son—I—God—Richard—Our Father—which—art—in—heaven—" And a smile now took rapturous possession of his countenance, and he looked at his wife, his dear old wife, and went away with her face last in his memory; last of the years of his waiting, laboring, sorrowing; last of his earthly vision—sole earthly possession that he took with him to heaven.

The remainder of this history is brief. The farm passed by the will to the possession of Kate, who, with her husband, took up her residence on it. The widow, amply provided for, lived peacefully with her child for a few months, and then departed to the company she loved better. Richard Delavan, humbled and subdued, broke down in health and intellect. Already advanced in years, he entered prematurely into a second childhood, and, after a few years of imbecility, died in his daughter's house, and was buried at the side of his wife.

LADY BLESSINGTON AND COUNT D'ORSAY.*

FOR a period of some twenty years, ending in 1849, the most coveted entrée in London was that of the brilliant and fashionable circle over which Lady Blessington presided at Seasmore Place and Gore House. Though Holland House still opened its hospitable doors to all whom fame or talent raised above the crowd, and the splendid gifts so beautifully commemorated by Macaulay still graced the host and hostess of that noble mansion; though Lady Charleville had her set of lions and celebrities, chosen from every party in politics and every walk in art; both were for a time eclipsed by the attractions of Seamore Place. Laboring under the heavy disadvantage of exclusion from female society, and unable to cope with her rivals in expenditure, Lady Blessington had contrived from the start to rob them of the brightest stars of their firmament, and to fill her own rooms with all that was best worth knowing in the London world. There, in salons overflowing with art and luxury, were to be seen the poets whose books lay on every table; there travelers who had explored the farthest recesses of the earth; there statesmen at whose nod armies were ready to march, fleets to sail; there were Dickens, Bulwer, Thackeray, good-humoredly bantering each other, or chatting over a plot for a new novel. That tall handsome man, conversing in so empressé a manner with Henry Bulwer, the brother of the novelist, is the great Russian, Demidoff, as distinguished by his talents as by his wealth. Beside him sits alone, staring gloomily from under thick eyebrows at the guests, the French exile, Louis Napoleon, the friend and protégé of the Countess; and not far distant may be seen the elegant figure of Count D'Orsay, like George IV., "the most perfect gentleman of his time." Asia is represented by a genuine Indian prince, the Baboo Dwarakanauth Tajore, the descendant of one of the five Brahmins of Bengal; cheerfully promising, as usual, to head a subscription to rebuild a church or relieve distress; soon to die, and to be buried in orthodox England like a dog, without funeral service, or even a mourner save his son: Lolling on a sofa, playing with his crutch, "Rejected Addresses" Smith lets off puns and jokes by the score; while, at the opposite side of the room, Monsieur Julien le jeune, once Robespierre's secretary, now a poor old exile, and a favorite butt of D'Orsay's, reads, for the twentieth time, his "Chagrins Politiques" with tearful eye and broken voice, to a knot of listeners choking with internal mirth. Strangers are there too, Americans, Italians, Germans, every one who has soared above the common herd of mankind, and has come to London to lionize and see the lions. Surrounded by a group of eager listeners, in a deep arm-chair sits the Countess herself, with a footstool at her feet, on which Tom Moore is privileged to perch himself. Her beauty is not dazzling; winning is the better word. A smile plays on her features, and her rich Irish lips part constantly in merry laughter. Her figure inclines to embonpoint; but such is its faultless symmetry, that even a Greek sculptor would have found it hard to criticise. Her dress is, of course, perfect; with Count D'Orsay as an adviser, how could it be otherwise?

Such was Marguerite, Countess of Blessington, in the hour of her glory, and as she appeared to those who visited her between 1831 and 1848. If her position was enviable, not so were the years which preceded or followed it. Her life had three phases; it is doubtful whether the happiness and fame of the second atoned for the misery of the first or the anguish of the last.

She was born at a place called Knockbrit, in Tipperary County, Ireland, and was the daughter of a "country gentleman" named Power, who was as unlike a gentleman as possible. Her mother's family, who had been stanch Roman Catholics, and foes to the union of Ireland and England, had paid the usual penalty of their opinions by being hunted, or shot, or hanged, when the Protestants had nothing better to do. On the other hand, her father was a fierce partisan of the union, and carried his prejudice so far as to taunt his wife with being "the daughter of a convicted rebel." He was, we are told, "a fair sample of the Irish country gentleman of some sixty years ago;" loved horses, dogs, claret, and poteen; was "much given to white cravats and top-boots;" never paid his debts, or spent an evening at home when he could help it; and was known throughout the country by the expressive nickname of "Shiver-the-frills Power." He had been a Catholic, but became a Protestant to please the English party, and again reverted to his early faith when he had nothing more to expect from his patrons. In his youth he had sold butter and flour; afterward he set up a newspaper; failed in that, and got an appointment as magistrate; was removed for brutality; finally relapsed into a mere drunken sot, dependent on his daughter for support, and died boasting that he had drunk five tumblers of punch the night before.

An incident in his magisterial career paints the man, and illustrates the country and the times. The county of Tipperary swarmed with what were called "rebels;" and Power, in his full-blown dignity, was particularly active in hunting them down. Near his house lived a widow and her son, whom he suspected. One night the latter started to go to the smith's to mend his pitchfork. "Johnny dear," said his old mother from her door, as he went, "it's too late to go, maybe Mr. Power and the yeomen are out." "Never fear, mother," replied the lad, "I'll only leave the fork and come back immediately; you know I can't do without it to-morrow." On the road, the first person he met was the redoubtable Power, on horseback, accompanied by his son and a servant. Terrified at the sight, the lad began to run; whereupon Power took deliberate aim at him with a horse-pistol, and shot him through the body. The magistrate then placed his captive on horseback behind his servant, bound him to the saddle, and rode into Clonmel. Lady Blessington "long remembered with horror the sight of the wounded man mounted behind the servant as the party entered the stable-yard of her father's house; pale and ghastly, his head sunk on his breast, his strength apparently quite exhausted, his clothes steeped in blood." The poor creature died during the night; and next morning, according to custom, the body was exposed at the court-house "as a warning to other rebels." The widow, his mother, waited hour after hour for his return in anguish inexpressible; when morning came, she set out on foot for Clonmel, to seek tidings of her lost son. The first sight that met her eye was his bleeding body hanging on the rebels' stand. With a shriek, she fainted, and was carried to the house of a charitable neighbor. "She had," says a writer, touchingly, "no one now of kin to help her, no one at home to mind her, and she was unable to mind herself. Scarcely any one, out of Ryan's house, cared for her or spoke about her. Nothing more was heard of her or hers." Some gentlemen in the neighborhood, by great exertions, had Power brought to trial for the murder; but he was acquitted without hesitation by the honest jury.

With such a father, and a mother who appears to have been a weak, helpless woman, little Marguerite Power owed little to her family. A poor little, pale, sickly child, she grew to girlhood without any of the pleasures or comforts most children find in their home. Her imagination was vivid, and she loved to collect other children around her to tell them stories; but her parents sneered at the amusement. The morning the family left Knockbrit, she ran out into the garden and picked a bunch of flowers, to carry away in remembrance of the place; but she knew so well and dreaded so much the temper of her father and his friends, that the little memento was carefully hidden in her pocket. The only friend she had was a Miss Dwyer, a governess, who appears to have been a sensible woman, and tried, as best she could, to sympathize with the lonely, precocious child.

At the age of fourteen her father sold her to a captain in the British army, named Farmer. There was a refreshing honesty about the whole transaction. Farmer knew she disliked him; her father knew it, and knew, moreover, that he was a half-mad, brutal wretch, who ought not to have been intrusted with the happiness of a dog. All the parties understood each other perfectly. Power wanted money, Farmer was rich, and the marriage was celebrated—the present Lord Hardinge, commander-in-chief of the British army, officiating as groomsman. As Mrs. Farmer, little Marguerite soon became a woman under the hot-house pressure of misery and ill-treatment. At times, her husband was quite insane, and she trembled at the sight of him; at others, apparently from sheer brutality, he would "strike her on the face, pinch her till her arms were black and blue, lock her up when he went abroad," and while he was drinking at the mess, would "leave her without food till she was almost famished." Driven to despair by his cruelties, she at length fled for refuge to her father's, and was received most ungraciously by her worthy parent. Her husband, compelled to sell out shortly afterward, determined to go to India, and commanded his wife to accompany him thither. On her positive refusal, he gave it out that their separation had been owing to her misconduct—an atrocious calumny; for however imprudent she may have been afterward, her demeanor while under Captain Farmer's roof was irreproachable. Twelve years afterward, this fellow was carousing in the debtors' prison at the Fleet, in London, with a party of jovial companions. They had drunk four quarts of rum, and Captain Farmer rose to go. One of the party, by way of a joke, locked the door; Farmer opened the window, and threatened to jump to the ground. While on the window-ledge he lost his balance. For some instants he hung by his fingers to the ledge, calling loudly for help; but his friends were too drunk to render any assistance, and he fell heavily to the ground. Four days afterward he died in hospital.

Husband and father had many points in common. Poor Mrs. Farmer endured almost as much at the hands of the one as the other. She was accomplished and attractive; and was consequently "looked upon as an interloper in the house, who interfered with the prospects and advancement in life of her sisters." After a time she was so plainly made to feel this, that she left her father's, and led a somewhat vagabond life for a period of nine years, living first with one friend, then with another; thankful for any home, and accommodating herself to any companions. In 1817, the period of her husband's death, she was living with her brother in London. There she had met Mountjoy, Count of Blessington, an Irish nobleman, with a dashing person, an old title, and an exceedingly moderate allowance of brains. "He had been led to believe his talents were of the first order for the stage;" and accordingly affected theatricals, haunted green-rooms, lived among actors and actresses, and spent his time in designing and superintending theatrical costumes. He had his picture taken as one of the heroes of Agincourt—probably in Shakspeare's Henry V.—and filled his rooms with stage properties of every kind. He was fond of "parts which required to be gorgeously appareled;" played the green knight in "Valentine and Orson;" and was remembered by his tenants as "a fine actor," whether comic or tragic they could not say, but "the dresses he wore were very grand and fine." Some years previously he had been much annoyed by the perverse vitality of a Major Brown, who would not make his wife a widow, preparatory to becoming Lady Blessington: thus compelling his lordship to go to the expense of separate apartments for her. However, in 1812, the obnoxious Brown did give up the ghost, his affectionate relict became Lady Blessington, and died shortly afterward. Mountjoy's grief was equal to any thing on the modern or ancient stage. He had a room "fitted up at enormous cost" in his residence at Dublin, in which the coffin, "sumptuously decorated," was placed by "a London undertaker of eminence, attended by six professional female mourners, suitably attired in mourning garments, and grouped in becoming attitudes admirably regulated;" when his friends called, the undertaker, having "gone through the dismal ceremony" of conducting them to the catafalque, "in a low tone expressed a hope that the arrangements were to the satisfaction of the visitor." Three years and a half after this splendid affliction, and four months after Captain Farmer's death, Lord Blessington led his widow to the altar.

It was a startling change for Marguerite. From poverty and friendlessness she found herself in a moment elevated into the highest society, surrounded by elegance and luxury, and worshiped by a man who, whatever were the faults of his head, possessed a warm and generous heart. With an income exceeding $100,000 a year, a person whose charms were even ten years afterward regarded as irresistible, and wit and powers of fascination that have rarely been excelled, Lady Blessington seemed to have passed from the lowest depths of domestic suffering to the highest pinnacle of worldly happiness. The world smiled on her. She complained of the sumptuousness of the boudoir Mountjoy had prepared for her use. Canning and Castlereagh, Palmerston and Russell, Kemble and Wilkie, Dr. Parr, and the poet Rogers, were constantly guests at her table. Her reputation as a hostess was already established.

Among the crowds of notabilities who thronged her drawing-room, none could compare, as a man of fashion, with an exceedingly handsome youth who had just crossed from Paris, and was making his debut in English society. This was Alfred, Count D'Orsay; whom Byron has described as a Cupidon déchainé, and who vied, in point of accomplishments, with "the Admirable Crichton." His extraordinary beauty, joined to fascinating manners, and wit far above the average even in Paris, rendered him even at this time—he was barely twenty-one—a lion at the West End. Half the ladies in London fought about him. Lady Blessington carried off the prize, and bore him in triumph with her to Italy. So captivating was the Count that the lady's feelings were shared by her husband; it was hard to say whether "Alfred" were the greater favorite with Mountjoy or with his wife. The latter never suffered him to wander from her side; the former would not rest till the Count became a member of his family. By his first wife, the lady Brown, Lord Blessington had two daughters, then at boarding-school in Ireland, the eldest of whom was fourteen; he made a will, in which he bequeathed the bulk of his fortune to Count D'Orsay, on condition that he married one of them. He was unrestricted in his choice. Pressed by the solicitations of the infatuated father, D'Orsay chose the younger, who had been born in wedlock; she was sent for, and arrived at Naples, where the Blessingtons were staying, prepared to obey her father's orders. Such perfect gentlemen as Count D'Orsay seldom condescend to be good husbands: little Harriet, pale and reserved in her manner, was treated like a school-girl both by her husband and her family, slighted in society, and repelled by all from whom she had a right to expect sympathy and confidence. Not a word of complaint did she utter when her fascinating husband suggested a quiet separation, and drove her into solitude, while he revelled in the delights of fashionable life with her father and her mother-in-law. This was the man of whom Charles Dickens said, that "the world of fashion left his heart unspoiled."

After several years of elegant leisure in Italy, the Blessingtons and Count D'Orsay returned to Paris. His lordship—still exercised by his craving for display—furnished his residence "in a style of more than Eastern magnificence," as Mr. Marshall would have it. For the guidance of ambitious residents of Fifth Avenue, it may be said that "Lady Blessington's bed, which was silvered instead of gilt, rested on the backs of two silver swans, so exquisitely sculptured that every feather was in alto relievo, and looked as fleecy as those of the living bird. The recess in which it was placed was lined with white fluted silk, bordered with blue embossed lace. A silvered sofa stood opposite the fire-place, and near it a most inviting bergère. An escritoire occupied one panel, a bookstand the other; and a rich coffer for jewels formed a pendant to a similar one for lace or India shawls. A carpet of uncut pile of a pale blue, a silver lamp, and a Psyche glass—the ornaments silvered to correspond with the decorations of the chamber—completed the furniture."

A bedroom for a queen, assuredly. Alas! hardly had "my most gallant of gallant husbands" put the last touch to this bower of taste, when a fit of apoplexy carried him off, and Lady Blessington found herself within an ace of insolvency. Like most Irish noblemen, Blessington had lived far above his means. His widow contrived to secure a jointure of $10,000 a year, and with this and Count D'Orsay she removed to London, leaving her magnificent establishment at Paris and the Mountjoy estates to her husband's creditors.

She had set her heart upon ruling society—not mere dancing and dinner-eating society, but men of fashion, intellect, and fame. Accordingly she took a handsome house in Seamore Place, furnished it splendidly, and began, as of old, to draw around her all that was notable or distinguished in the English metropolis. Her invitations soon became the rage. Statesmen, poets, orators, novelists, painters, foreign noblemen, ate off her mahogany, and clustered round her chair of an evening. A stranger had seen nothing till he had been received at Seamore Place; an author was not sure of fame till he had been presented to Lady Blessington, and had been assured of her approval. Though ladies would not visit her, and scandal was rife on the subject of Count D'Orsay, she reigned supreme over the most intellectual men in England.

It was impossible to live as she did on $10,000 a year. Count D'Orsay could not assist her, for he too was in difficulties, led an idle life, and was constantly obliged to dodge writs obtained against him by angry boot-makers and tailors. Lady Blessington resolved to eke out her income by literary labor. Ten years before, when in the height of her splendor, she had published a couple of books, containing sketches of society, which had realized between them a profit of about a hundred dollars. She now related her "Conversations with Lord Byron," in a series of papers in Colburn's New Monthly Magazine, for which she was well paid. Immediately afterward, she published a couple of three-volume novels of slender merit; but Longman complained that they would not sell. She was more fortunate in an humbler walk of letters. At that time (1833) annuals were all the rage. An enormous demand had sprung up for handsome-looking books, with gilt edges, rich binding, and steel plates; the contents were immaterial, but those sold the best which contained the most prose or poetry by "persons of quality." Judging from the prices paid for manuscripts, these annuals must have been very profitable to the publishers: when Moore was in the height of his glory, the proprietor of The Keepsake offered him $3000 for one hundred and twenty lines of verse. Lady Blessington began to write for annuals, and had no difficulty in obtaining the editorship of two of the most successful—The Keepsake, and Heath's Book of Beauty. Her literary associations and her claims on her guests enabled her to secure a far higher class of contributors than usually wrote for periodicals. When she edited the Book of Beauty, such authors as Bulwer, Barry Cornwall, Disraeli, Bernal, Lady E. Stuart Wortley, W. S. Landor, Marryatt, Grace Aguilar, Viscount Castlereagh, Lord Morpeth, and others of equal note contributed regularly to its pages. We find in her correspondence Sir William Gell apologizing for having sent nothing in the shape of manuscript "for the annual," but promising a sketch of Moorish poetry, etc. By thus taxing her friends, who were only too happy to oblige her, the Countess contrived to make what to a person of more simple tastes would have been a fair income. Jerdan supposes that she "enjoyed from her pen, for many years, an amount somewhere midway between £2000 and £3000 per annum." This is probably exaggerated; but her sister, Miss Power, states positively that her income from letters often exceeded £1000 a year. When Hood starved, Moore almost begged, and Charles Lamb compared embracing letters as a profession to throwing one's self from the Tarpeian rock, this was not so bad for a lady who never pretended to any thing higher than taste, grace, and liveliness. Besides her receipts from the annuals, she wrote sketches for magazines and three-volume novels, none of which appear to have been profitable to the publishers, though the authoress was well paid. They were in general illustrations of the society in which she had moved, not devoid of a certain piquancy, but decidedly feeble in characters and plot. "Strathern," for which she received $3000, had a brief success; so had "Marmaduke Herbert:" but the best books she wrote were her "Idler in Italy" and "Idler in France," which showed her best parts to advantage, and are still read. Latterly, however, the publishers were shy of works from her pen. She writes to a friend who solicited her to sell a manuscript of his, that she can not persuade the trade to undertake her own.

We have reached the close of the second period of Lady Blessington's life. The rest is gloomy enough. In 1844, the mania for annuals died out, and the editor of the Book of Beauty found herself $5000 a year poorer by the change in the public taste. Retrenchment seems never to have occurred to her. She had removed to Gore House, and improved on the magnificence of Seamore Place; her salons were still crowded by literati and politicians; Count D'Orsay was still the same lazy, splendid, useless, accomplished gentleman, driving the London ladies and the London tradesmen to distraction, and assisting Lady Blessington to do the honors of her drawing-room. She had lost a large sum by a robbery; nearly as much by the failure of Heath the engraver. Colburn wrote to say that he had lost forty pounds by her last work, and must decline publishing any thing more from her pen. Energetic and industrious as ever, she obtained a sort of connection with the Daily News, and agreed to furnish fashionable intelligence; but the arrangement did not last six months. She wrote a tale for a Sunday paper, but the remuneration was too small to be of any service to her. Misfortune had marked her for its own. Little thought they who assembled each evening in her splendid salon, and did homage to the wonderful charm of her conversation, and the winning grace of her manner, that her heart was still sore from the cares of the morning, and that behind the luxury profusely scattered around them lurked poverty and ruin. There were few to whom was intrusted the painful secret that Gore House was in a state of blockade by sheriff's officers, and that D'Orsay dared not walk out in daylight for fear of being arrested. The evil day, however, could not always be postponed. An execution for $20,000 was put in by a dealer in lace and fancy goods, and though a temporary arrangement was effected by friends, hosts of other creditors pressed equally for payment, and the crash came. Twenty-seven years before, Lady Blessington had commenced her literary career by describing an auction of furniture at a fashionable residence in the West End of London; her description was now verified at Gore House. The collection of objects of art and virtu which it contained were hardly surpassed in any palace in the land; and very many of them were endeared to their owner by associations of friendship and affection. She could not bear to see them sold, and fled to Paris. Count D'Orsay had preceded her with a single portmanteau. Of all her friends Thackeray was the only one who seemed really affected by the scene at the auction.

She had still her jointure of $10,000 a year, which might have been amply sufficient for her wants. But one who has filled the position of leader of society for nineteen years, requires something more than food, dress, and shelter. She "employed her time in furnishing new apartments, buying luxuries, embellishments, and comforts;" and doubtless found her means scanty enough. Moreover, the usual consequences of loss of fortune awaited her. Old friends forgot her. Those who had been constant guests at her table spoke of her as the defunct Lady Blessington. Every one knows that the world always deals thus with the unfortunate; but no one feels it the less keenly. Lady Blessington's heart broke under her sorrows. In the strength of her youth she had endured the brutality of a savage husband, and the unkindness of a wretched father; but her spirit had lost its elasticity. She could bear up no longer. The hour of atonement for a life of splendid sin had come.

The brilliant D'Orsay was living in Paris, devoting himself to art, and expecting preferment of some kind from his former friend, Prince Louis Napoleon, then President of the French republic. It came not. The President paid many attentions to Lady Blessington, but made no offer of assistance to D'Orsay. This neglect preyed upon her mind as well as his, and added a pang to the sufferings caused by her own troubles. She had long suffered from disease of the heart; in June, 1849, anxiety brought the malady to a crisis, and she died in a few hours.

D'Orsay never recovered the blow. His health had already been affected by chagrins and disappointment; from the day of Lady Blessington's death it declined visibly. He lingered for three years, a prey to a severe spinal complaint, and much straitened in his circumstances; having lost with his life's friend the best part of himself, and vainly endeavoring to seek from art "surcease of sorrow." Mr. Madden visited him a few weeks before his death, and says he "found him evidently sinking, in the last stage of disease of the kidneys, complicated with spinal complaint. The wreck only of the beau D'Orsay was there. He was able to sit up and to walk, though with difficulty and evidently with pain, about his room, which was at once his studio, reception-room, and sleeping apartment. He burst out crying when I entered the room, and continued for a length of time so much affected that he could hardly speak to me. Gradually he became composed, and talked about Lady Blessington's death; but all the time with tears pouring down his pale, wan face, for even then his features were death-stricken. He said, with marked emphasis, 'In losing her I lost every thing in this world—she was to me a mother! a dear, dear mother! a true loving mother to me!' While he uttered these words he sobbed and cried like a child. And referring to them, he again said, 'You understand me, Madden.'" Death finally released him, in August, 1852, a few weeks after Louis Napoleon had appointed him Director of the Fine Arts.

He was generous, manly, good-natured; possessing talents of a high order and taste that has long served as a standard. Yet he was a party to a nefarious marriage which blighted the happiness of an innocent child, abandoned his wife, cheated his creditors, and lived scandalously. She had a most kindly disposition, warm feelings, exquisite tact, and remarkable talents de société. Her faults are before the reader.

It seems to have been her destiny to illustrate her own books. One of the most successful of her novels is entitled "The Victims of Society."

THE SECOND BABY.

BETWEEN the first baby and the second what a falling off is there, my countrywomen! Not in intrinsic value, for the second may chance to be "as pretty a piece of flesh as any in Messina," but in the imaginary value with which it is invested by its nearest kin and more distant female belongings. The coming of the first baby in a household creates an immense sensation; that of the second is comparatively a commonplace affair. The first baby is looked for with anxiety, nursed with devotion, admired with enthusiasm, dressed with splendor, and made to live upon system. Baby Number Two is not longed for by any one, except, perhaps, the mother; is nursed as a matter of course, and admired as a matter of courtesy; is dressed in the cast-off clothes of Number One, and gets initiated into life without much ceremony or system.

Such was my reflection the other day as I watched the assembled family welcome the little stranger—the second in our household. I am but a bachelor uncle, and my opinion on such matters may be little worth, but it seemed to me that this second child was a great deal superior to the first, seeing that it was larger, quieter, and not nearly so red as his elder brother. Thereupon, retiring to my accustomed corner of the spacious family parlor, I indulged in various lucubrations apropos of babies generally, and second babies in particular, which I took care not to deliver viva voce at the time, but which I amused myself afterward by committing to paper, and which I now offer to the reader.

"A babe in the house is a well-spring of joy," saith a modern philosopher. He speaks from experience, doubtless; and the saying shows that he hath never had misgivings about getting the daily bread for the babe, or for the mother that should give it suck. Yes, to people with health, peace, and competence, a babe in the house is a well-spring of joy; but to people who are indigent, harassed, and of doubtful health, I fear it is a well-spring of something very different.

I know I shall seem like an old brute of a bachelor to sentimental ladies, married and single, for saying such things; but this is a land of freedom of speech, where "a man may speak the thing he will." And this I will say, on behalf of the poor babies themselves, that if they had any sense at all, they would wish they had never been born—at all events, the second would, and every succeeding baby of the aforesaid unhelpful parentage. The first baby is generally welcome, even to parents who are doubtful about the morrow's meal. It flings a poetry over their poverty; they look on it with unutterable love, with tender respect, as a charge committed to their trust by God himself, as a renewal of their own lives—a mystic bond of love that no time, and perhaps not even eternity itself, can untie. It is a new and wonderful thing! They can't get familiar with the wonder of it! Its whole little being is a marvelous work; and the hearts of the parents, especially of the mother, glow with the purest ecstasy when they take it in their arms, and think: "This is my child, my own flesh and blood! From the care and the love of this creature nothing, I thank God, can set me free!" So it is with the first child. Indeed, one would think no child had ever been born into the world before, when one listens to a couple talking of their first-born during its first year. To them it is as it was to Adam and Eve when they hung together over their infant Cain: it is a new and grand experience. Thoughts of God and Paradise are in it: God is near above them, smiling his blessing; the gates of Paradise are close at hand, and wide open; and the angels look forth with sympathizing eyes upon their joy. Ah! there is scarcely any joy in life equal to that joy at the birth of a first child! It never comes again: there is never another first child. Of course, parents will say and will feel that the second "is very precious;" that "indeed they love it as well as the first;" that "each child brings its full share of love with it;" and that:

True love in this differs from gold and clay—
That to divide is not to take away:

so that they can love a dozen as much as one. But let them compare their sensations at the first birth with their sensations at the second, and if they have any faculty of self-observance, be sure they will acknowledge a wide difference; to the love of the child itself, in the one case, is superadded the novelty of parentage.

But it by no means follows, that because the first child creates so much more vivid a sensation in the household than the second, it deserves to be loved more. As a general rule, you will find the second child, in various ways, superior to the first—often superior to all the succeeding children, where the family is numerous. The law and society give the preference to eldest sons and daughters; fairy tales invariably give the preference to the youngest. I set myself, in this particular, against both the existing social system and the wont and usage of fairyland, and think the second child is generally the best, physically, intellectually, and morally. With all due consideration for the Octavias and Septimuses, for Sextus and Quintus, and with the usual undue consideration for Mr. Primus and my Lady Una, I contend that their second brother or sister is likely to excel them all. I am not prepared to go to the stake as a martyr for this opinion, but I am prepared to wield a pen in its defense, and now add a few of the strongest arguments in its favor.

In the first place, a second child of ordinary parents, tolerably well off, benefits in infancy and childhood by the experience they gained with the first. They try experiments with the first; ask advice of doctors and old ladies; and are so anxious to help nature, that they often hinder her operations. The child is never let alone; it is always being taken notice of by some admiring nurse or relative. Now the proverb of the kitchen, that "a watched pot never boils," applies, mutatis mutandis, to the nursery, and it may be said that "a watched baby never thrives." But the second child profits by the experiments made with the first. The parents, having discovered that "let well alone" is a safer maxim than "trust nothing to chance" in the case of an infant, are content to let Baby Number Two lie on the floor sometimes, instead of being always in the arms; are not anxious to coax it to walk before it can get upon its little feet and stand; will allow it to ask for food, instead of forcing food down its throat; are not frightened into foolishness because it looks up to the open sky without a hat on. So, when it can run about, they do not mount guard over every motion, remove from the child's path every obstacle, and help it to overcome every small difficulty; they have learned that all these acts of love are not so good for the child as its acquiring habits of self-help and self-reliance. If they have any faculty of prevision, they will see that a child who requires to be watched and helped all day long, will probably want watching and helping when he grows a man.

Baby Number Two escapes most of the medicines administered to Number One, and a great deal of the dressing—in which respects Baby Number Two has decidedly the advantage.

Baby Number Two escapes the evil effects of flattering tongues, which tell Number One twenty times a day that it is "the sweetest little thing that ever was seen."

Baby Number Two escapes the evil effects of jealous suggestions, such as, "Ah! your nose is put out of joint. You're not the only one now! The new baby is the darling now."

Baby Number Two has the advantage of the company of an elder brother or sister: he learns a thousand things more easily in consequence. His own voluntary imitation is worth all the direct teaching mothers and nurses can give.

Then, again, if Baby Number Two be followed by more of his kind, he is sure to take to them kindly; as he has never been the only one, he sees no harm in the coming of "another, and another, and another."

It is also an advantage to him to play the protector and the teacher in his turn: he cares for the little ones, and is patient with them. I don't deny that this advantage he shares with his socially-favored elder brother.

"But," says some reader, and with considerable show of reason, "do not all these advantages which you attribute solely to the second son, belong also to the rest of the younger children?" I think not, and for these reasons:

After the second child is born, parents get quite familiar with the birth and infancy of their children; and whereas the first child attracts too much attention, it often happens that the third, fourth, and fifth, do not attract enough. They are cared for well, in a general way, but they do not get that particular care and attention which the eldest child got, and which was too much; nor the half of it, which was bestowed on the second child, and which was just enough. Parents with limited income—as if any incomes were unlimited—find that to educate the younger children at as great a money-cost as the two elder, is more than they can manage; and so the younger children are not so well off as the second child. Of course, I speak only of average children; here and there you have a genius born among the younger members of a numerous family—a Wellington a Nelson, a Scott, a Napoleon; such children arrive at their destination in life, whether they be eldest, second, or younger children. The exceptions may prove the rule, but they do not weaken its truth.

In conclusion, I invite my readers to study the family history of their friends and acquaintances, and see if they do not find my assertion good. The second child is generally the best of the family. I ought to know, for I am a second child myself, and on that ground alone I began to turn my attention to the subject; and having come to the foregone conclusions, I make a point of watching the career of a second baby.

send her to Newcome. The air is good for her."

"By that confounded smoky town, my dear Lady Kew?"

"And invite your mother and little brothers and sisters to stay Christmas there. The way in which you neglect them is shameful, it is, Barnes."

"Upon my word, ma'am, I propose to manage my own affairs without your ladyship's assistance," cries Barnes, starting up, "and did not come at this time of night to hear this kind of—"

"Of good advice. I sent for you to give it you. When I wrote to you to bring me the money I wanted, it was but a pretext; Barkins might have fetched it from the city in the morning. I want you to send Clara and the children to Newcome. They ought to go, Sir. That is why I sent for you; to tell you that. Have you been quarreling as much as usual?"

"Pretty much as usual," says Barnes, drumming on his hat.

"Don't beat that devil's tattoo; you agacez my poor old nerves. When Clara was given to you she was as well broke a girl as any in London."

Sir Barnes responded by a groan.

"She was as gentle and amenable to reason, as good-natured a girl as could be; a little vacant and silly, but you men like dolls for your wives; and now in three years you have utterly spoiled her. She is restive, she is artful, she flies into rages, she fights you and beats you. He! he! and that comes of your beating her!"

"I didn't come to hear this, ma'am," says Barnes, livid with rage.

"You struck her—you know you did, Sir Barnes Newcome. She rushed over to me last year on the night you did it, you know she did."

"Great God, ma'am! You know the provocation," screams Barnes.

"Provocation or not, I don't say. But from

CHAPTER LII. FAMILY SECRETS.

THE figure cowering over the furtive tea-pot glowered grimly at Barnes as he entered; and an old voice said—"Ho, it's you!"

"I have brought you the notes, ma'am," says Barnes, taking a packet of those documents from his pocket-book. "I could not come sooner; I have been engaged upon bank business until now."

"I dare say! You smell of smoke like a courier."

"A foreign capitalist: he would smoke. They will, ma'am. I didn't smoke, upon my word."

"I don't see why you shouldn't, if you like it. You will never get any thing out of me whether you do or don't. How is Clara? Is she gone to the country with the children? Newcome is the best place for her."

"Doctor Bambury thinks she can move in a fortnight. The boy has had a little—"

"A little fiddlestick! I tell you it is she who likes to stay, and makes that fool, Bambury, advise her not going away. I tell you to that moment she has beat you. You fool, to write her a letter and ask her pardon! If I had been a man I would rather have strangled my wife, than have humiliated myself so before her. She will never forgive that blow."

"I was mad when I did it; and she drove me mad," says Barnes. "She has the temper of a fiend, and the ingenuity of the devil. In two years an entire change has come over her. If I had used a knife to her I should not have been surprised. But it is not with you to reproach me about Clara. Your ladyship found her for me."

"And you spoiled her after she was found, Sir. She told me part of her story that night she came to me. I know it is true, Barnes. You have treated her dreadfully, Sir."

"I know that she makes my life miserable, and there is no help for it," says Barnes, grinding a curse between his teeth. "Well, well, no more about this. How is Ethel? Gone to sleep after her journey? What do you think, ma'am, I have brought for her? A proposal."

"Bon Dieu! You don't mean to say Charles Belsize was in earnest!" cries the dowager. "I always thought it was a—"

"It is not from Lord Highgate, ma'am," Sir Barnes said, gloomily. "It is some time since I have known that he was not in earnest; and he knows that I am now."

"Gracious goodness! come to blows with him, too? You have not? That would be the very thing to make the world talk," says the dowager, with some anxiety.

"No," answers Barnes. "He knows well enough that there can be no open rupture. We had some words the other day at a dinner he gave at his own house; Colonel Newcome, and that young beggar, Clive, and that fool, Mr. Hobson, were there. Lord Highgate was confoundedly insolent. He told me that I did not dare to quarrel with him because of the account he kept at our house. I should like to have massacred him! She has told him that I struck her—the insolent brute!—he says he will tell it at my clubs; and threatens personal violence to me there, if I do it again. Lady Kew, I'm not safe from that man and that woman," cries poor Barnes, in an agony of terror.

"Fighting is Jack Belsize's business, Barnes Newcome; banking is yours, luckily," said the dowager. "As old Lord Highgate was to die, and his eldest son, too, it is a pity certainly they had not died a year or two earlier, and left poor Clara and Charles to come together. You should have married some woman in the serious way; my daughter Walham could have found you one. Frank, I am told, and his wife go on very sweetly together; her mother-in-law governs the whole family. They have turned the theatre back into a chapel again: they have six little plowboys dressed in surplices to sing the service; and Frank and the Vicar of Kewbury play at cricket with them on holidays. Stay, why should not Clara go to Kewbury?"

"She and her sister have quarreled about this very affair with Lord Highgate. Some time ago it appears they had words about it, and when I told Kew that bygones had best be bygones, that Highgate was very sweet upon Ethel now, and that I did not choose to lose such a good account as his, Kew was very insolent to me; his conduct was blackguardly, ma'am, quite blackguardly, and you may be sure but for our relationship I would have called him to—"

Here the talk between Barnes and his ancestress was interrupted by the appearance of Miss Ethel Newcome, taper in hand, who descended from the upper regions enveloped in a shawl.

"How do you do, Barnes? How is Clara? I long to see my little nephew. Is he like his pretty papa?" cries the young lady, giving her fair cheek to her brother.

"Scotland has agreed with our Newcome rose," says Barnes, gallantly. "My dear Ethel, I never saw you in greater beauty."

"By the light of one bedroom candle! what should I be if the whole room were lighted? You would see my face then was covered all over with wrinkles, and quite pale and woe-begone, with the dreariness of the Scotch journey. Oh, what a time we have spent! haven't we, grandmamma? I never wish to go to a great castle again; above all, I never wish to go to a little shooting-box. Scotland may be very well for men; but for women—allow me to go to Paris when next there is talk of a Scotch expedition. I had rather be in a boarding-school in the Champs Elysées, than in the finest castle in the Highlands. If it had not been for a blessed quarrel with Fanny Follington, I think I should have died at Glen Short-horn. Have you seen my dear, dear uncle, the Colonel? When did he arrive?"

"Is he come? Why is he come?" asks Lady Kew.

"Is he come? Look here, grandmamma! did you ever see such a darling shawl? I found it in a packet in my room."

"Well it is beautiful," cries the Dowager, bending her ancient nose over the web. "Your Colonel is a galant homme. That must be said of him; and in this does not quite take after the rest of the family. Hum! hum! Is he going away again soon?"

"He has made a fortune, a very considerable fortune for a man in that rank in life," says Sir Barnes. "He can not have less than sixty thousand pounds."

"Is that much?" asks Ethel.

"Not in England, at our rate of interest; but his money is in India, where he gets a great per centage. His income must be five or six thousand pounds, ma'am," says Barnes, turning to Lady Kew.

"A few of the Indians were in society in my time, my dear," says Lady Kew, musingly. "My father has often talked to me about Barwell, of Stanstead, and his house in St. James's Square; the man who ordered 'more curricles' when there were not carriages enough for his guests. I was taken to Mr. Hastings's trial. It was very stupid and long. The young man, the painter,

I suppose will leave his paint-pots now, and set up as a gentleman. I suppose they were very poor, or his father would not have put him to such a profession. Barnes, why did you not make him a clerk in the bank, and save him from the humiliation?"

"Humiliation! why he is proud of it. My uncle is as proud as a Plantagenet; though he is as humble as—as what? Give me a simile, Barnes. Do you know what my quarrel with Fanny Follington was about? She said we were not descended from the barber-surgeon, and laughed at the Battle of Bosworth. She says our great grandfather was a weaver. Was he a weaver?"

"How should I know? and what on earth does it matter, my child? Except the Gaunts, the Howards, and one or two more, there is scarcely any good blood in England. You are lucky in sharing some of mine. My poor Lord Kew's grandfather was an apothecary at Hampton Court, and founded the family by giving a dose of rhubarb to Queen Caroline. As a rule, nobody is of a good family. Didn't that young man, that son of the Colonel's, go about last year? How did he get in society? Where did we meet him? Oh! at Baden, yes; when Barnes was courting, and my grandson—yes my grandson, acted so wickedly." Here she began to cough, and to tremble so, that her old stick shook under her hand. "Ring the bell for Ross. Ross, I will go to bed. Go you too, Ethel. You have been traveling enough today."

"Her memory seems to fail her a little," Ethel whispered to her brother; "or she will only remember what she wishes. Don't you see that she has grown very much older?"

"I will be with her in the morning. I have business with her," said Barnes.

"Good night. Give my love to Clara, and kiss the little one for me. Have you done what you promised me, Barnes?"

"What?"

"To be—to be kind to Clara. Don't say cruel things to her. She has a high spirit, and she feels them, though she says nothing."

"Doesn't she?" said Barnes, grimly.

"Ah, Barnes, be gentle with her. Seldom as I saw you together, when I lived with you in the spring, I could see that you were harsh, though she affected to laugh when she spoke of your conduct to her. Be kind. I am sure it is the best, Barnes; better than all the wit in the world. Look at grandmamma, how witty she was and is; what a reputation she had, how people were afraid of her; and see her now—quite alone."

"I'll see her in the morning quite alone, my dear," says Barnes, waving a little gloved hand. "By-by!" and his brougham drove away. While Ethel Newcome had been under her brother's roof, where I and friend Clive, and scores of others had been smartly entertained, there had been quarrels, and recriminations, misery, and heart-burning, cruel words, and shameful struggles, the wretched combatants in which appeared before the world with smiling faces, resuming their battle when the feast was concluded, and the company gone.

On the next morning, when Barnes came to visit his grandmother, Miss Newcome was gone away to see her sister-in-law, Lady Kew said, with whom she was going to pass the morning; so Barnes and Lady Kew had an uninterrupted tête-à-tête, in which the former acquainted the old lady with the proposal which Colonel Newcome had made to him on the previous night.

Lady Kew wondered what the impudence of the world would come to. An artist propose for Ethel. One of her footmen might propose next, and she supposed Barnes would bring the message. The father came and proposed for this young painter, and you didn't order him out of the room!

Barnes laughed. "The Colonel is one of my constituents. I can't afford to order the Bundelcund Banking Company out of its own room."

"You did not tell Ethel this pretty news, I suppose?"

"Of course I didn't tell Ethel. Nor did I tell the Colonel that Ethel was in London. He fancies her in Scotland with your ladyship at this moment."

"I wish the Colonel were at Calcutta, and his son with him. I wish he was in the Ganges. I wish he was under Juggernaut's car," cried the old lady. "How much money has the wretch really got? If he is of importance to the bank, of course you must keep well with him. Five thousand a year, and he says he will settle it all on his son? He must be crazy. There is nothing some of these people will not do, no sacrifice they will not make, to ally themselves with good families. Certainly you must remain on good terms with him and his bank. And we must say nothing of the business to Ethel, and trot out of town as quickly as we can. Let me see. We go to Drummington on Saturday. This is Tuesday. Barkins, you will keep the front drawing-room shutters shut, and remember we are not in town, unless Lady Glenlivat or Lord Farintosh should call."

"Do you think Farintosh will—will call, ma'am?" asks Sir Barnes, demurely.

"He will be going through to Newmarket. He has been where we have been at two or three places in Scotland," replies the lady, with equal gravity. "His poor mother wishes him to give up his bachelor's life—as well she may—for you young men are terribly dissipated. Rossmont is quite a regal place. His Norfolk house is not inferior. A young man of that station ought to marry, and live at his places, and be an example to his people, instead of frittering away his time at Paris and Vienna among the most odious company."

"Is he going to Drummington?" asks the grandson.

"I believe he has been invited. We shall go to Paris for November, he probably will be there," answered the Dowager, casually; "and tired of the dissipated life he has been leading, let us hope he will mend his ways, and find a virtuous, well-bred young woman to keep him right." With this her ladyship's apothecary is announced, and her banker and grandson takes his leave.

Sir Barnes walked into the city with his umbrella, read his letters, conferred with his partners and confidential clerks; was for a while not the exasperated husband, or the affectionate brother, or the amiable grandson, but the shrewd, brisk banker, engaged entirely with his business. Presently he had occasion to go on Change, or elsewhere, to confer with brother capitalists, and in Cornhill behold he meets his uncle, Colonel Newcome, riding toward the India House, a groom behind him.

The Colonel springs off his horse, and Barnes greets him in the blandest manner. "Have you any news for me, Barnes?" cries the officer.

"The accounts from Calcutta are remarkably good. That cotton is of admirable quality, really. Mr. Briggs, of our house, who knows cotton as well as any man in England, says—"

"It's not the cotton, my dear Sir Barnes," cries the other.

"The bills are perfectly good; there's no sort of difficulty about them. Our house will take half a million of 'em if—"

"Your are talking of bills, and I am thinking of poor Clive," the Colonel interposes. "I wish you could give me good news for him, Barnes."

"I wish I could. I heartily trust that I may some day. My good wishes, you know, are enlisted in your son's behalf," cries Barnes, gallantly. "Droll place to talk sentiment in—Cornhill, isn't it? But Ethel, as I told you, is in the hands of higher powers, and we must conciliate Lady Kew if we can. She has always spoken very highly of Clive; very."

"Had I not best go to her?" asks the Colonel.

"Into the north, my good Sir? She is—ah—she is traveling about. I think you had best depend upon me. Good morning. In the city we have no hearts, you know, Colonel. Be sure you shall hear from me as soon as Lady Kew and Ethel come to town."

And the banker hurried away, shaking his finger-tips to his uncle, and leaving the good Colonel utterly surprised at his statements. For the fact is, the Colonel knew that Lady Kew was in London, having been apprised of the circumstance in the simplest manner in the world, namely by a note from Miss Ethel, which billet he had in his pocket while he was talking with the head of the house of Hobson Brothers.

"My dear uncle" (the note said), "how glad I shall be to see you! How shall I thank you for the beautiful shawl, and the kind, kind remembrance of me? I found your present yesterday evening on our arrival from the north. We are only here en passant, and see nobody in Queen Street but Barnes, who has just been about business, and he does not count, you know. I shall go and see Clara to-morrow, and make her take me to see your pretty friend, Mrs. Pendennis. How glad I should be if you happened to pay Mrs. P. a visit about two. Good night. I thank you a thousand times, and am always your affectionate

"Queen Street. Tuesday night. Twelve o'clock."

This note came to Colonel Newcome's breakfast-table, and he smothered the exclamation of wonder which was rising to his lips, not choosing to provoke the questions of Clive, who sat opposite to him. Clive's father was in a woeful perplexity all that forenoon. Tuesday night, twelve o'clock, thought he. Why, Barnes must have gone to his grandmother from my dinner-table; and he told me she was out of town, and said so again just now when we met in the city. (The Colonel was riding toward Richmond at this time.) What cause had the young man to tell me these lies? Lady Kew may not wish to be at home for me, but need Barnes Newcome say what is untrue to mislead me? The fellow actually went away smirking, and kissing his hand to me, with a falsehood on his lips! What a pretty villain! A fellow would deserve, and has got, a horse-whipping for less. And to think of a Newcome doing this to his own flesh and blood; a young Judas! Very sad and bewildered, the Colonel rode toward Richmond, where he was to happen to call on Mrs. Pendennis.

It was not much of a fib that Barnes had told. Lady Kew announcing that she was out of town, her grandson, no doubt, thought himself justified in saying so, as any other of her servants would have done. But if he had recollected how Ethel came down with the Colonel's shawl on her shoulders, how it was possible she might have written to thank her uncle, surely Barnes Newcome would not have pulled that unlucky long bow. The Banker had other things to think of than Ethel and her shawl.

When Thomas Newcome dismounted at the door of Honeymoon Cottage, Richmond, the temporary residence of A. Pendennis, Esq., one of the handsomest young women in England ran into the passage with outstretched arms, called him her dear old uncle, and gave him two kisses, that I dare say brought blushes on his lean sun-burnt cheeks. Ethel clung always to his affection. She wanted that man, rather than any other in the whole world, to think well of her. When she was with him, she was the amiable and simple, the loving, impetuous creature of old times. She chose to think of no other. Worldliness, heartlessness, eager scheming, cold flirtations, marquis-hunting, and the like, disappeared for a while—and were not, as she sat at that honest man's side. Oh me! that we should have to record such charges against Ethel Newcome!

"He was come home for good now? He would never leave that boy he spoiled so, who was a good boy, too: she wished she could see him oftener. At Paris, at Madame de Florac's

—I found out all about Madame de Florac, Sir," says Miss Ethel, with a laugh: "we used often to meet there; and here, sometimes, in London. But in London it was different. You know what peculiar notions some people have; and as I live with grandmamma, who is most kind to me and my brothers, of course I must obey her, and see her friends rather than my own. She likes going out into the world, and I am bound in duty to go with her," etc., etc. Thus the young lady went on talking, defending herself whom nobody attacked, protesting her dislike to gayety and dissipation—you would have fancied her an artless young country lass, only longing to trip back to her village, milk her cows at sunrise, and sit spinning of winter evenings by the fire.

"Why do you come and spoil my tête-à-tête with my uncle, Mr. Pendennis?" cries the young lady to the master of the house, who happens to enter. "Of all the men in the world the one I like best to talk to! Does he not look younger than when he went to India? When Clive marries that pretty little Miss Mackenzie, you will marry again, uncle, and I will be jealous of your wife."

"Did Barnes tell you that we had met last night, my dear?" asks the Colonel.

"Not one word. Your shawl and your dear kind note told me you were come. Why did not Barnes tell us? Why do you look so grave?"

"He has not told her that I was here, and would have me believe her absent," thought Newcome, as his countenance fell. "Shall I give her my own message, and plead my poor boy's cause with her?" I know not whether he was about to lay his suit before her; he said himself, subsequently, that his mind was not made up, but at this juncture, a procession of nurses and babies made their appearance, followed by the two mothers, who had been comparing their mutual prodigies (each lady having her own private opinion)—Lady Clara and my wife—the latter for once gracious to Lady Clara Newcome, in consideration of the infantine company with which she came to visit Mrs. Pendennis.

Luncheon was served presently. The carriage of the Newcomes drove away, my wife smilingly pardoning Ethel for the assignation which the young person had made at our house. And when those ladies were gone, our good Colonel held a council of war with us his two friends, and told us what had happened between him and Barnes on that morning and the previous night. His offer to sacrifice every shilling of his fortune to young Clive seemed to him to be perfectly simple (though the recital of the circumstance brought tears into my wife's eyes)—he mentioned it by the way, and as a matter that was scarcely to call for comment, much less praise.

Barnes's extraordinary statements respecting Lady Kew's absence puzzled the elder Newcome; and he spoke of his nephew's conduct with much indignation. In vain I urged that her ladyship desiring to be considered absent from London, her grandson was bound to keep her secret. "Keep her secret, yes. Tell me lies, no!" cries out the Colonel. Sir Barnes's conduct was in fact indefensible, though not altogether unusual—the worst deduction to be drawn from it, in my opinion, was, that Clive's chance with the young lady was but a poor one, and that Sir Barnes Newcome, inclined to keep his uncle in good humor, would therefore give him no disagreeable refusal.

Now this gentleman could no more pardon a lie than he could utter one. He would believe all and every thing a man told him until deceived once, after which he never forgave. And wrath being once roused in his simple mind, and distrust firmly fixed there, his anger and prejudices gathered daily. He could see no single good quality in his opponent, and hated him with a daily increasing bitterness.

As ill luck would have it, that very same evening, at his return to town, Thomas Newcome entered Bay's club, of which, at our request, he had become a member during his last visit to England, and there was Sir Barnes as usual on his way homeward from the city. Barnes was writing at a table, and sealing and closing a letter, as he saw the Colonel enter: he thought he had been a little inattentive and curt with his uncle in the morning; had remarked, perhaps, the expression of disapproval on the Colonel's countenance. He simpered up to his uncle as the latter entered the club-room, and apologized for his haste when they met in the city in the morning—all city men were so busy! "And I have been writing about that little affair, just as you came in," he said; "quite a moving letter to Lady Kew, I assure you, and I do hope and trust we shall have a favorable answer in a day or two."

"You said her ladyship was in the north, I think?" said the Colonel, dryly.

"Oh, yes—in the north, at—at Lord Wallsend's—great coal-proprietor, you know."

"And your sister is with her?"

"Ethel is always with her."

"I hope you will send her my very best remembrances," said the Colonel.

"I'll open the letter, and add 'em in a postscript," said Barnes.

"Confounded liar!" cried the Colonel, mentioning the circumstance to me afterward, "why does not somebody pitch him out of the bow-window?"

If we were in the secret of Sir Barnes Newcome's correspondence, and could but peep into that particular letter to his grandmother, I dare say we should read that he had seen the Colonel, who was very anxious about his darling youth's suit, but pursuant to Lady Kew's desire, Barnes had stontly maintained that her ladyship was still in the north, enjoying the genial hospitality of Lord Wallsend. That of course he should say nothing to Ethel, except with Lady Kew's full permission: that he wished her a pleasant trip to —, and was, etc., etc.

Then if we could follow him, we might see him reach his Belgravian mansion, and fling an angry word to his wife as she sits alone in the darkling drawing-room, poring over the embers. He will ask her, probably with an oath, why the — she is not dressed? and if she always intends to keep her company waiting? An hour hence, each with a smirk, and the lady in smart raiment with flowers in her hair, will be greeting their guests as they arrive. Then will come dinner and such conversation as it brings. Then at night Sir Barnes will issue forth, cigar in mouth; to return to his own chamber at his own hour; to breakfast by himself; to go cityward, money-getting. He will see his children once a fortnight: and exchange a dozen sharp words with his wife twice in that time.

More and more sad does the Lady Clara become from day to day; liking more to sit lonely over the fire; careless about the sarcasms of her husband; the prattle of her children. She cries sometimes over the cradle of the young heir. She is weary, weary. You understand, the man to whom her parents sold her does not make her happy, though she has been bought with diamonds, two carriages, several large footmen, a fine country-house with delightful gardens and conservatories; and with all this she is miserable—is it possible?

CHAPTER LIII.

IN WHICH KINSMEN FALL OUT.

Not the least difficult part of Thomas Newcome's present business was to keep from his son all knowledge of the negotiation in which he was engaged on Clive's behalf. If my gentle reader has had sentimental disappointments, he or she is aware that the friends who have given him most sympathy under these calamities have been persons who have had dismal histories of their own at some time of their lives, and I conclude Colonel Newcome in his early days must have suffered very cruelly in that affair of which we have a slight cognizance, or he would not have felt so very much anxiety about Clive's condition.

A few chapters back and we described the first attack, and Clive's manifold cure: then we had to indicate the young gentleman's relapse, and the noisy exclamations of the youth under this second outbreak of fever—calling him back after she had dismissed him, and finding pretext after pretext to see him. Why did the girl encourage him, as she certainly did? I allow, with Mrs. Grundy and most moralists, that Miss Newcome's conduct in this matter was highly reprehensible; that if she did not intend to marry Clive she should have broken with him altogether; that a virtuous young woman of high principle, etc., etc., having once determined to reject a suitor should separate from him utterly then and there—never give him again the least chance of a hope, or re-illuminate the extinguished fire in the wretch's bosom.

But coquetry, but kindness, but family affection, and a strong, very strong partiality for the rejected lover—are these not to be taken in account, and to plead as excuses for her behavior to her cousin? The least unworthy part of her conduct, some critics will say, was that desire to see Clive and be well with him: as she felt the greatest regard for him, the showing it was not blamable; and every flutter which she made to escape out of the meshes which the world had cast about her, was but the natural effort at liberty. It was her prudence which was wrong; and her submission, wherein she was most culpable. In the early church story, do we not read how young martyrs constantly had to disobey worldly papas and mammas, who would have had them silent, and not utter their dangerous opinions? how their parents locked them up, kept them on bread and water, whipped and tortured them, in order to enforce obedience?—nevertheless they would declare the truth: they would defy the gods by law established, and deliver themselves up to the lions or the tormentors. Are not these Heathen Idols enshrined among us still? Does not the world worship them, and persecute those who refuse to kneel? Do not many timid souls sacrifice to them; and other, bolder spirits rebel, and, with rage at their hearts, bend down their stubborn knees at their altars? See! I began by siding with Mrs. Grundy and the world, and at the next turn of the seesaw have lighted down on Ethel's side, and am disposed to think that the very best part of her conduct has been those escapades which—which right-minded persons most justly condemn. At least that a young beauty should torture a man with alternate liking and indifference; allure, dismiss, and call him back out of banishment; practice arts to please upon him, and ignore them when rebuked for her coquetry—these are surely occurrences so common in young women's history as to call for no special censure: and, if on these charges Miss Newcome is guilty, is she, of all her sex, alone in her criminality?

So Ethel and her duenna went away upon their tour of visits to mansions so splendid, and among hosts and guests so polite that the present modest historian does not dare to follow them. Suffice it to say, that Duke This and Earl That were, according to their hospitable custom, entertaining a brilliant circle of friends at their respective castles, all whose names the "Morning Post" gave; and among them those of Dowager Countess of Kew, and Miss Newcome.

During her absence Thomas Newcome grimly awaited the result of his application to Barnes. That baronet showed his uncle a letter, or rather a postscript, from Lady Kew, which had probably been dictated by Barnes himself, in which the Dowager said she was greatly touched by Colonel Newcome's noble offer; that though she owned she had very different views for her granddaughter, Miss Newcome's choice of course lay with herself. Meanwhile, Lady K. and Ethel were engaged in a round of visits to the country, and there would be plenty of time to resume this subject when they came to London for the season. And, lest dear Ethel's feelings should be needlessly agitated by a discussion of the subject, and the Colonel should take a fancy to write to her privately, Lady Kew gave orders that all letters from London should be dispatched under cover to her ladyship, and carefully examined the contents of the packet before Ethel received her share of the correspondence.

To write to her personally on the subject of the marriage, Thomas Newcome had determined was not a proper course for him to pursue. "They consider themselves," said he, "above us, forsooth, in their rank of life (Oh, mercy! what pigmies we are! and don't angels weep at the brief authority in which we dress ourselves up?), and of course the approaches on our side must be made in regular form, and the parents of the young people must act for them. Clive is too honorable a man to wish to conduct the affair in any other way. He might try the influence of his bœux yeux, and run off to Gretna with a girl who had nothing; but the young lady being wealthy, and his relation, Sir, we must be on the point of honor; and all the Kews in Christendom shan't have more pride than we in this matter."

All this time we are keeping Mr. Clive purposely in the background. His face is so woe-begone that we do not care to bring it forward in the family picture. His case is so common that surely its lugubrious symptoms need not be described at length. He works away fiercely at his pictures, and in spite of himself improves in his art. He sent a "Combat of Cavalry," and a picture of "Sir Brian the Templar carrying off Rebecca," to the British Institution this year; both of which pieces were praised in other journals besides the "Pall Mall Gazette." He did not care for the newspaper praises. He was rather surprised when a dealer purchased his "Sir Brian the Templar." He came and went from our house a melancholy swain. He was thankful for Laura's kindness and pity.

J. J.'s studio was his principal resort; and I dare say, as he set up his own easel there, and worked by his friend's aide, he bemoaned his lot to his sympathizing friend.

Sir Barnes Newcome's family was absent from London during the winter. His mother, and his brothers and sisters, his wife and his two children, were gone to Newcome for Christmas. Some six weeks after seeing him, Ethel wrote her uncle a kind, merry letter. They had been performing private theatricals at the country house where she and Lady Kew were staying. "Captain Crackthorpe made an admirable Jeremy Diddler in 'Raising the Wind.' Lord Farintosh broke down lamentably as Fushos in 'Bombastes Furioso.'" Miss Ethel had distinguished herself in both of these facetious little comedies. "I should like Clive to paint me as Miss Plainways," she wrote. "I wore a powdered front, painted my face all over wrinkles, imitated old Lady Griffin as well as I could, and looked sixty at least."

Thomas Newcome wrote an answer to his fair niece's pleasant letter: "Clive," he said, "would be happy to bargain to paint her, and nobody else but her, all the days of his life; and," the Colonel was sure, "would admire her at sixty as much as he did now, when she was forty years younger." But, determined on maintaining his appointed line of conduct respecting Miss Newcome, he carried his letter to Sir Barnes, and desired him to forward it to his sister. Sir Barnes took the note, and promised to dispatch it. The communications between him and his uncle had been very brief and cold, since the telling of those little fibs concerning old Lady Kew's visits to London, which the Baronet dismissed from his mind as soon as they were spoken, and which the good Colonel never could forgive. Barnes asked his uncle to dinner once or twice, but the Colonel was engaged. How was Barnes to know the reason of the elder's refusal? A London man, a banker, and a member of Parliament has a thousand things to think of; and no time to wonder that friends refuse his invitations to dinner. Barnes continued to grin and smile most affectionately when he met the Colonel; to press his hand, to congratulate him on the last accounts from India, unconscious of the scorn and distrust with which his senior mentally regarded him. "Old boy is doubtful about the young cub's love affair," the Baronet may have thought. "We'll ease his old mind on that point some time hence." No doubt Barnes thought he was conducting the business very smartly and diplomatically.

I heard myself news at this period from the gallant Crackthorpe, which, being interested in my young friend's happiness, filled me with some dismay. Our friend the painter and glazier has been hankering about our barracks at Knightsbridge (the noble Life Guards Green had now pitched their tents in that suburb), and pumping me about la belle cousine. I don't like to break it to him—I don't really, now.

But it's all up with his chance, I think. Those private theatricals at Fallowfield have done Farintosh's business. He used to rave about the Newcome to me, as we were riding home from hunting. He gave Bob Henchman the lie, who told a story which Bob got from his man, who had it from Miss Newcome's lady's maid, about—about some journey to Brighton, which the cousins took. Here Mr. Crackthorpe grinned most facetiously. Farintosh swore he'd knock Honeyman down; and vows he will be the death of—will murder our friend Clive when he comes to town. As for Henchman, he was in a desperate way. He lives on the Marquis, you know, and Farintosh's anger or his marriage will be the loss of free quarters, and ever so many good dinners a year to him. I did not deem it necessary to impart Crackthorpe's story to Clive, or explain to him the reason why Lord Farintosh scowled most fiercely upon the young painter, and passed him without any other sign of recognition one day as Clive and I were walking together in Pall Mall. If my lord wanted a quarrel, young Clive was not a man to balk him; and would have been a very fierce customer to deal with, in his actual state of mind.

A pauper child in London at seven years old knows how to go to market, to fetch the beer, to pawn father's coat, to choose the largest fried fish or the nicest ham-bone, to nurse Mary Jane of three—to conduct a hundred operations of trade or housekeeping, which a little Belgravian does not perhaps acquire in all the days of her life. Poverty and necessity force this precociousness on the poor little brat. There are children who are accomplished shop-lifters and liars almost as soon as they can toddle and speak. I dare say little Princes know the laws of etiquette as regards themselves, and the respect due to their rank at a very early period of their royal existence. Every one of us according to his degree can point to the Princekins of private life who are flattered and worshiped, and whose little shoes grown men kiss as soon almost as they walk upon ground.

It is a wonder what human nature will support, and that, considering the amount of flattery some people are crammed with from their cradles, they do not grow worse and more selfish than they are. Our poor little pauper just mentioned is dosed with Daffy's Elixir, and somehow survives the drug. Princekin or lordkin from his earliest days has nurses, dependents, governesses, little friends, school-fellows, school-masters, fellow-collegians, college tutors, stewards and valets, led-captains of his suite, and women innumerable flattering him and doing him honor. The tradesman's manner, which to you and me is decently respectful, becomes straightway frantically servile before Princekin. Honest folks at Railway Stations whisper to their families, "That's the Marquis of Farintosh," and look hard at him as he passes. Landlords cry, "This way my lord; this room for your lordship." They say at public schools

Princekin is taught the beauties of equality, and thrashed into some kind of subordination. Pshaw! Toad-eaters in pinafores surround Princekin. Do not respectable people send their children so as to be at the same school with him? don't they follow him to college, and eat his toads through life?

And as for women—Oh, my dear friends and brethren in this vale of tears—did you ever see anything so curious, monstrous, and amazing as the way in which women court Princekin when he is marriageable, and pursue him with their daughters? Who was the British nobleman in old, old days who brought his three daughters to the king of Mercia, that His Majesty might choose one after inspection? Mercia was but a petty province, and its king in fact a Princekin. Ever since those extremely ancient and venerable times the custom exists not only in Mercia, but in all the rest of the provinces inhabited by the Angles, and before Princekins the daughters of our nobles are trotted out.

There was no day of his life which our young acquaintance, the Marquis of Farintosh, could remember on which he had not been flattered; and no society which did not pay him court. At a private school he could recollect the master's wife stroking his pretty curls and treating him furtively to goodies: at college he had the tutor simpering and bowing as he swaggered over the grass-plat—old men at clubs would make way for him and fawn on him—not your mere pique-assiettes and penniless parasites, but most respectable toad-eaters, fathers of honest families, gentlemen themselves of good station, who respected this young gentleman as one of the institutions of their country, and admired the wisdom of the nation that set him to legislate over us. When Lord Farintosh walked the streets at night he felt himself like Haroun Alraschid (that is, he would have felt so had he ever heard of the Arabian potentate)—a monarch in disguise affably observing and promenading the city. And let us be sure there was a Mesrour in his train to knock at the doors for him and run the errands of this young calif. Of course he met with scores of men in life who neither flattered him nor would suffer his airs; but he did not like the company of such, or for the sake of truth to undergo the ordeal of being laughed at: he preferred toadies, generally speaking. "I like," says he, "you know, those fellows who are always saying pleasant things, you know, and who would run from here to Hammersmith if I asked 'em, much better than those fellows who are always making fun of me, you know." A man of his station who likes flatterers need not shut himself up: he can get plenty of society.

As for women, it was his lordship's opinion that every daughter of Eve was bent on marrying him. A Scotch marquis, an English earl, of the best blood in the empire, with a handsome person, and a fortune of fifteen thousand a year, how could the poor creatures do otherwise than long for him? He blandly received their caresses: took their coaxing and cajolery as matters of course: and surveyed the beauties of his time as the calif the moonfaces of his harem. My lord intended to marry certainly. He did not care for money, nor for rank: he expected consummate beauty and talent, and some day would fling his handkerchief to the possessor of these, and place her by his side upon the Farintosh throne.

At this time there were but two or three young ladies in society endowed with the necessary qualifications, or who found favor in his eyes. His lordship hesitated in his selection from these beauties. He was not in a hurry, he was not angry at the notion that Lady Kew (and Miss Newcome with her) hunted him. What else should they do but pursue an object so charming? Every body hunted him. The other young ladies, whom we need not mention, languished after him still more longingly. He had little notes from these: presents of purses worked by them, and cigar-cases embroidered with his coronet. They sang to him in cosy boudoirs—mamma went out of the room, and sister Ann forgot something in the drawing-room. They ogled him as they sang. Trembling, they gave him a little foot to mount them, that they might ride on horseback with him. They tripped along by his side from the Hall to the pretty country church on Sundays. They warbled hymns: sweetly looking at him the while mamma whispered confidentially to him, "What an angel Cecilia is!" And so forth and so forth—with which chaff our noble bird was by no means to be caught. When he had made up his great mind that the time was come and the woman, he was ready to give a Marchioness of Farintosh to the English nation.

Miss Newcome has been compared ere this to the statue of Huntress Diana at the Louvre, whose haughty figure and beauty the young lady indeed somewhat resembled. I was not present when Diana and Diana's grandmother hunted the noble Scottish stag of whom we have just been writing; nor care to know how many times Lord Farintosh escaped, and how at last he was brought to bay and taken by his resolute pursuers. Paris, it appears, was the scene of his fall and capture. The news was no doubt well known among Lord Farintosh's brother dandies, among exasperated matrons and virgins in May Fair, and in polite society generally, before it came to simple Tom Newcome and his son. Not a word on the subject had Sir Barnes mentioned to the Colonel: perhaps not choosing to speak till the intelligence was authenticated, perhaps not wishing to be the bearer of tidings so painful.

Though the Colonel may have read in his "Pall Mall Gazette" a paragraph which announced an approaching MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE, "between a noble young marquis and an accomplished and beautiful young lady, daughter and sister of a northern baronet," he did not know who were the fashionable persons about to be made happy, nor until he received a letter from an old friend who lived at Paris was the fact conveyed to him. Here is the letter, preserved by him along with all that he ever received from the same hand:

"Rue St. Dominique, St. Germain, Paris, 10 Feb.

"So behold you of return, my friend! you quit forever the sword and those arid plains where you have passed so many years of your life, separated from those to whom, at the commencement, you held very nearly. Did it not seem once as if two hands never could unlock, so closely were they inlaced together? Ah, mine are old and feeble now; forty years have passed since the time when you used to say they were young and fair. How well I remember me of every one of those days, though there is a death between me and them, and it is as across a grave I review them. Yet another parting, and tears and regrets are finished. Tenez, I do not believe them when they say there is no meeting for us afterward, there above. To what good to have seen you, friend, if we are to part here and in Heaven too? I have not altogether forgotten your language; is it not so? I remember it because it was yours, and that of my happy days. I radote like an old woman, as I am. M. de Florac has known my history from the commencement. May I not say that, after so many of years, I have been faithful to him and to all my promises? When the end comes with its great absolution, I shall not be sorry. One supports the combats of life, but they are long, and one comes from them very wounded; ah! when shall they be over?

"You return and I salute you with wishes for parting. How much egotism! I have another project which I please myself to arrange. You know how I am arrived to love Clive as my own child. I very much surprised his secret, the poor boy, when he was here it is twenty months. He looked so like you as I repeat me of you in the old time! He told me he had no hope of his beautiful cousin. I have heard of the fine marriage that one makes her. Paul, my son, has been at the English Embassy last night, and has made his congratulations to M. de Farintosh. Paul says him handsome, young, not too spiritual, rich, and haughty, like all, all noble Montagnards.

"But it is not of M. de Farintosh I write, whose marriage, without doubt, has been announced to you. I have a little project, very foolish, perhaps. You know Mr. the Duke of Ivry has left me guardian of his little daughter Antoinette, whose affreuse mother no one sees more. Antoinette is pretty and good, and soft, and with an affectionate heart. I love her already as my infant. I wish to bring her up, and that Clive should marry her. They say you are returned very rich. What follies are these I write! In the long evenings of winter, the children escaped it is a long time from the maternal nest, a silent old man my only company—I live but of the past; and play with its souvenirs as the detained caress little birds, little flowers, in their prisons. I was born for the happiness; my God! I have learned it in knowing you. In losing you I have lost it. It is not against the will of Heaven I oppose myself. It is man, who makes himself so much of this evil and misery, this slavery, these tears, these crimes, perhaps.

"This marriage of the young Scotch marquis and the fair Ethel (I love her in spite of all, and shall see her soon and congratulate her, for, do you see, I might have stopped this fine marriage, and did my best and more than my duty for our poor Clive) shall make itself in London next spring, I hear. You shall assist scarcely at the ceremony; he, poor boy, shall not care to be there! Bring him to Paris to make the court to my little Antoinette: bring him to Paris to his good friend, COMTESSE DE FLORAC.

"I read marvels of his works in an English Journal, which one sends me."

Clive was not by when this letter reached his father. Clive was in his painting-room, and lest he should meet his son, and in order to devise the best means of breaking the news to the lad, Thomas Newcome retreated out of doors; and from the Oriental he crossed Oxford Street, and from Oxford Street he stalked over the roomy pavements of Gloucester Place, and there he bethought him how he had neglected Mrs. Hobson Newcome of late, and the interesting family of Bryanstone Square. So he went to leave his card at Maria's door: her daughters, as we have said, are quite grown girls. If they have been lectured, and learning, and black-boarded, and practicing, and using the globes, and laying in a store of ologies, ever since, what a deal they must know! Colonel Newcome was admitted to see his nieces, and Consummate Virtue, their parent. Maria was charmed to see her brother-in-law; she greeted him with reproachful tenderness: "Why, why," her fine eyes seemed to say, "have you so long neglected us? Do you think because I am wise, and gifted, and good, and you are, it must be confessed, a poor creature with no education, I am not also affable? Come, let the prodigal be welcomed by his virtuous relatives: come and lunch with us, Colonel!" He sat down accordingly to the family tiffin.

When the meal was over, the mother, who had matter of importance to impart to him, besought him to go to the drawing-room, and there poured out such a eulogy upon her children's qualities, as fond mothers know how to utter. They knew this and they knew that. They were instructed by the most eminent professors; that wretched Frenchwoman, whom you may remember here, Mademoiselle Lenoir, Maria remarked parenthetically, turned out, oh, frightfully! She taught the girls the worst accent, it appears. Her father was not a colonel; he was—oh! never mind! It is a mercy I got rid of that fendish woman, and before my precious ones knew what she was! And then followed details of the perfections of the two girls, with occasional side-shots at Lady Ann's family, just as in the old time. "Why don't you bring your boy, whom

I have always loved as a son, and who avoids me? Why does not Clive know his cousins? They are very different from others of his kinswomen, who think best of the heartless world."

"I fear, Maria, there is too much truth in what you say," sighs the Colonel, drumming on a book on the drawing-room table, and looking down sees it is a great, large, square, gilt pearage, open at FARINTOSH, MARQUIS OF. Fergus Angus Malcolm Mungo Roy, Marquis of Farintosh, Earl of Glenlivat, in the peerage of Scotland; also Earl of Rossmont, in that of the United Kingdom. Son of Angus Fergus Malcolm, Earl of Glenlivat, and grandson and heir of Malcolm Mungo Angus, first Marquis of Farintosh, and twenty-fifth Earl, etc., etc.

"You have heard the news regarding Ethel?" remarks Mrs. Hobson.

"I have just heard," says the poor Colonel.

"I have a letter from Ann this morning," Maria continues. "They are of course delighted with the match. Lord Farintosh is wealthy, handsome; has been a little wild, I hear; is not such a husband as I would choose for my darlings, but poor Brian's family have been educated to love the world; and Ethel no doubt is flattered by the prospects before her. I have heard that some one else was a little gris in that quarter. How does Clive bear the news, my dear Colonel?"

"He has long expected it," says the Colonel, rising; "and I left him very cheerful at breakfast this morning."

"Send him to see us, the naughty boy!" cries Maria. "We don't change; we remember old times: to us he will ever be welcome!" And with this confirmation of Madame de Florac's news, Thomas Newcome walked sadly homeward.

And now Thomas Newcome had to break the news to his son, who received the shot in such a way as caused his friends and confidants to admire his high spirit. He said he had long been expecting some such announcement: it was many months since Ethel had prepared him for it. Under her peculiar circumstances he did not see how she could act otherwise than she had done. And he narrated to the Colonel the substance of the conversation which the two young people had had together several months before, in Madame de Florac's garden.

Clive's father did not tell his son of his own bootless negotiation with Barnes Newcome. There was no need to recall that now; but the Colonel's wrath against his nephew exploded in conversation with me, who was the confidant of father and son in this business. Ever since that luckless day when Barnes thought proper to— to give a wrong address for Lady Kew, Thomas Newcome's anger had been growing. He smothered it yet for a while, sent a letter to Lady Ann Newcome, briefly congratulating her on the choice which he had heard Miss Newcome had made; and in acknowledgment of Madame de Florac's more sentimental epistle he wrote a reply which has not been preserved, but in which he bade her rebuke Miss Newcome for not having answered him when he wrote to her, and not having acquainted her old uncle with her projected union.

To this message, Ethel wrote back a brief, hurried reply; it said—

"I saw Madame de Florac last night at her daughter's reception, and she gave me my dear uncle's messages. Yes, the news is true which you have heard from Madame de Florac, and in Bryanstone Square. I did not like to write it to you, because I know one whom I regard as a brother (and a great, great deal better), and to whom I know it will give pain. He knows that I have done my duty, and why I have acted as I have done. God bless him and his dear father.

"What is this about a letter which I never answered? Grandmamma knows nothing about a letter. Mamma has inclosed to me that which you wrote to her, but there has been no letter from T. N. to his sincere and affectionate

"Rue de Rivoli. Friday."

"E. N.

This was too much, and the cup of Thomas Newcome's wrath overflowed. Barnes had lied about Ethel's visit to London: Barnes had lied in saying that he delivered the message with which his uncle charged him: Barnes had lied about the letter which he had received and never sent. With these accusations firmly proven in his mind against his nephew, the Colonel went down to confront that sinner.

Wherever he should find Barnes, Thomas Newcome was determined to tell him his mind. Should they meet on the steps of a church, on the flags of 'Change, or in the newspaper-room at Bays's, at evening-paper time, when men most do congregate, Thomas the Colonel was determined upon exposing and chastising his father's grandson. With Ethel's letter in his pocket, he took his way into the city, penetrated into the unsuspecting back parlor of Hobson's bank, and was disappointed at first at only finding his half-brother Hobson there engaged over his newspaper. The Colonel signified his wish to see Sir Barnes Newcome. "Sir Barnes was not come in yet. You've heard about the marriage," says Hobson. "Great news for the Barnes's, ain't it? The head of the house is as proud as a peacock about it. Said he was going out to Samuels, the diamond merchants; going to make his sister some uncommon fine present. Jolly to be uncle to a marquis, ain't it, Colonel? I'll have nothing under a duke for my girls. I say, I know whose nose is out of joint. But young fellows get over these things, and Clive won't die this time, I dare say."

While Hobson Newcome made these satiric and facetious remarks, his half-brother paced up and down the glass parlor, scowling over the panes into the bank where the busy young clerks sat before their ledgers. At last he gave an "Ah!" as of satisfaction. Indeed, he had seen Sir Barnes Newcome enter into the bank.

The Baronet stopped and spoke with a clerk, and presently entered, followed by that young gentleman into his private parlor. Barnes tried to grin when he saw his uncle, and held out his hand to greet the Colonel; but the Colonel put both his behind his back, that which carried his faithful bamboo cane shook nervously. Barnes was aware that the Colonel had the news. "I was going to—to write to you this morning, with—with some intelligence that I am—very—very sorry to give."

"This young gentleman is one of your clerks?" asked Thomas Newcome, blandly.

"Yes; Mr. Boltby, who has your private account. This is Colonel Newcome, Mr. Boltby," says Sir Barnes, in some wonder.

"Mr. Boltby, brother Hobson, you heard what Sir Barnes Newcome said just now respecting certain intelligence which he grieved to give me?"

At this the three other gentlemen respectively wore looks of amazement.

"Allow me to say in your presence, that I don't believe one single word Sir Barnes Newcome says, when he tells me that he is very sorry for some intelligence he has to communicate. He lies, Mr. Boltby; he is very glad. I made up my mind that in whatsoever company I met him, and on the very first day I found him—hold your tongue, Sir; you shall speak afterward, and tell more lies when I have done—I made up my mind, I say, that on the very first occasion I would tell Sir Barnes Newcome that he was a liar and a cheat. He takes charge of letters and keeps them back. Did you break the seal, Sir? There was nothing to steal in my letter to Miss Newcome. He tells me people are out of town, whom he goes to see in the next street, after leaving my table, and whom I see myself half an hour before he lies to me about their absence."

"D—n you, go out, and don't stand staring there, you booby!" screams out Sir Barnes to the clerk. "Stop, Boltby. Colonel Newcome, unless you leave this room, I shall—I shall—"

"You shall call a policeman. Send for the gentleman, and I will tell the Lord Mayor what I think of Sir Barnes Newcome, Baronet. Mr. Boltby, shall we have the constable in?"

"Sir, you are an old man, and my father's brother, or you know very well I would—"

"You would what, Sir? Upon my word, Barnes Newcome" (here the Colonel's two hands and the bamboo cane came from the rear and formed in the front), "but that you are my father's grandson, after a menace like that, I would take you out and cane you in the presence of your clerks. I repeat, Sir, that I consider you guilty of treachery, falsehood, and knavery. And if ever I see you at Bays's Club, I will make the same statement to your acquaintance at the west end of the town. A man of your baseness ought to be known, Sir; and it shall be my business to make men of honor aware of your character. Mr. Boltby, will you have the kindness to make out my account? Sir Barnes Newcome, for fear of consequences that I should deplore, I recommend you to keep a wide berth of me, Sir." And the Colonel twirled his mustaches, and waved his cane in an ominous manner, and Barnes started back spontaneously out of its dangerous circle.

What Mr. Boltby's sentiments may have been regarding this extraordinary scene in which his principal cut so sorry a figure—whether he narrated the conversation to other gentlemen connected with the establishment of Hobson Brothers, or prudently kept it to himself, I can not say, having no means of pursuing Mr. B.'s subsequent career. He speedily quitted his desk at Hobson Brothers; and let us presume that Barnes thought Mr. B. had told all the other clerks of the avuncular quarrel. That conviction will make us imagine Barnes still more comfortable. Hobson Newcome no doubt was rejoiced at Barnes's discomfiture; he had been insolent and domineering beyond measure of late to his vulgar, good-natured uncle, whereas after the above interview with the Colonel, he became very humble and quiet in his demeanor, and for a long, long time never said a rude word. Nay, I fear Hobson must have carried an account of the transaction to Mrs. Hobson and the circle in Bryanstone Square; for Sam

Newcome, now entered at Cambridge, called the Baronet "Barnes" quite familiarly; asked after Clara and Ethel; and requested a small loan of Barnes.

Of course the story did not get wind at Bays's; of course Tom Eaves did not know all about it, and say that Sir Barnes had been beaten black and blue. Having been treated very ill by the committee in a complaint which he made about the Club-cookery, Sir Barnes Newcome never came to Bays's, and at the end of the year took off his name from the lists of the club.

Sir Barnes, though a little taken aback in the morning, and not ready with an impromptu reply to the Colonel and his cane, could not allow the occurrence to pass without a protest; and indited a letter which Thomas Newcome kept along with some others previously quoted by the compiler of the present memoirs. It is as follows:

"Colonel Newcome, C. B., private.

"Belgrave St., Feb. 15, 18—

"SIR—The incredible insolence and violence of your behavior to-day (inspired by whatever causes or mistakes of your own) can not be passed without some comment on my part. I laid before a friend of your own profession, a statement of the words which you applied to me in the presence of my partner and one of my clerks this morning; and my adviser is of opinion, that considering the relationship unhappily subsisting between us, I can take no notice of insults for which you knew when you uttered them I could not call you to account."

"There is some truth in that," said the Colonel. "He couldn't fight, you know; but then he was such a liar I could not help speaking my mind."

"I gathered from the brutal language which you thought fit to employ toward a disarmed man, the ground of one of your monstrous accusations against me, that I deceived you in stating that my relative, Lady Kew, was in the country, when in fact she was at her house in London."

"To this absurd charge I at once plead guilty. The venerable lady in question was passing through London, where she desired to be free from intrusion. At her ladyship's wish I stated that she was out of town; and would, under the same circumstances, unhesitatingly make the same statement. Your slight acquaintance with the person in question did not warrant that you should force yourself on her privacy, as you would doubtless know were you more familiar with the customs of the society in which she moves."

"I declare upon my honor as a gentleman, that I gave her the message which I promised to deliver from you, and also that I transmitted a letter with which you intrusted me; and repel with scorn and indignation the charges which you were pleased to bring against me, as I treat with contempt the language and the threats which you thought fit to employ."

"Our books show the amount of x£ xs. xd. to your credit, which you will be good enough to withdraw at your earliest convenience; as of course all intercourse must cease henceforth between you and

"Yours, etc.,

"B. NEWCOME NEWCOME."

"I think, Sir, he doesn't make out a bad case," Mr. Pendennis remarked to the Colonel, who showed him this majestic letter.

"It would be a good case if I believed a single word of it, Arthur," replied my friend, placidly twirling the old gray mustache. "If you were to say so and so, and say that I had brought false charges against you, I should cry mea culpa, and apologize with all my heart. But as I have a perfect conviction that every word this fellow says is a lie, what is the use of arguing any more about the matter? I would not believe him if he brought twenty other liars as witnesses, and if he lied till he was black in the face. Give me the walnuts. I wonder who Sir Barnes's military friend was."

Barnes's military friend was our gallant acquaintance General Sir George Tufto, K.C.B., who a short while afterward talked over the quarrel with the Colonel, and manfully told him that (in Sir George's opinion) he was wrong. "The little beggar behaved very well I thought, in the first business. You bullied him so, and in the front of his regiment, too, that it was almost past bearing; and when he deplored, with tears in his eyes, almost, the little humbug! that his relationship prevented him calling you out, ecod, I believed him! It was in the second affair that poor little Barney showed he was a cocktail."

"What second affair?" asked Thomas Newcome.

"Don't you know! He! he! this is famous!" cries Sir George. "Why, Sir, two days after your business, he comes to me with another letter and a face as long as my mare's, by Jove! And that letter, Newcome, was from your young 'un. Stop, here it is!" and from his padded bosom General Sir George Tufto drew a pocket-book, and from the pocket-book a copy of a letter, inscribed, Clive Newcome, Esq., to Sir B. N. Newcome. "There's no mistake about your fellow, Colonel. No, — him!" and the man of war fired a volley of oaths as a salute to Clive.

And the Colonel, on horseback, riding by the other cavalry officer's side, read as follows:

"George Street, Hanover Square, Feb. 16.

"Sir—Colonel Newcome this morning showed me a letter bearing your signature, in which you state—1. That Colonel Newcome has uttered calumnious and insolent charges against you. 2. That Colonel Newcome so spoke, knowing that you could take no notice of his charges of falsehood and treachery, on account of the relationship subsisting between you."

"Your statements would evidently imply that Colonel Newcome has been guilty of ungentlemanlike conduct, and of cowardice toward you."

"As there can be no reason why we should not meet in any manner that you desire, I here beg leave to state, on my own part, that I fully coincide with Colonel Newcome in his opinion that you have been guilty of falsehood and treachery, and that the charge of cowardice which you dare to make against a gentleman of his tried honor and courage, is another willful and cowardly falsehood on your part."

"And I hope you will refer the bearer of this note, my friend Mr. George Warrington, of the Upper Temple, to the military gentleman whom you consulted in respect to the just charges of Colonel Newcome. Waiting a prompt reply,

"Believe me, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"CLIVE NEWCOME."

"Sir Barnes Newcome Newcome, Bart., M.P., etc."

"What a blunderhead I am!" cries the Colonel, with delight on his countenance, spite of his professed repentance. "It never once entered my head that the youngster would take any part in the affair. I showed him his cousin's letter casually, just to amuse him, I think, for he has been deuced low lately, about—a young man's scrape that he has got into. And he must have gone off and dispatched his challenge straightway. I recollect he appeared uncommonly brisk at breakfast the next morning. And so you say, General, the Baronet did not like the poulet?"

"By no means; never saw a fellow show such a confounded white feather. At first I congratulated him, thinking your boy's offer must please him, as it would have pleased any fellow in our time to have a shot. Dammy! but I was mistaken in my man. He entered into some confounded long-winded story about a marriage you wanted to make with that infernal pretty sister of his, who is going to marry young Farintosh, and how you were in a rage because the scheme fell to the ground, and how a family duel might occasion unpleasantness to Miss Newcome; though I showed him how this could be most easily avoided, and that the lady's name need never appear in the transaction. 'Confound it, Sir Barnes,' says I, 'I recollect this boy, when he was a youngster, throwing a glass of wine in your face! We'll put it upon that, and say it's an old feud between you.' He turned quite pale, and he said your fellow had apologized for the glass of wine."

"Yes," said the Colonel, sadly, "my boy apologized for the glass of wine. It is curious how we have disliked that Barnes ever since we set eyes on him."

"Well, Newcome," Sir George resumed, as his mettled charger suddenly jumped and curvetted, displaying the padded warrior's cavalry-seat to perfection. "Quiet, old lady!—easy, my dear! Well, Sir, when I found the little beggar turning tail in this way, I said to him, 'Dash me, Sir, if you don't want me, why the dash do you send for me, dash me? Yesterday you talked as if you would bite the Colonel's head off, and to-day, when his son offers you every accommodation, by dash, Sir, you're afraid to meet him. It's my belief you had better send for a policeman. A 22 is your man, Sir Barnes Newcome.' And with that I turned on my heel and left him. And the fellow went off to Newcome that very night."

"A poor devil can't command courage, General," said the Colonel, quite peaceably, "any more than he can make himself six feet high."

"Then why the dash did the beggar send for me?" called out General Sir George Tufto, in a loud and resolute voice; and presently the two officers parted company.

When the Colonel reached home, Mr. Warrington and Mr. Pendennis happened to be on a visit to Clive, and all three were in the young fellow's painting-room. We knew our lad was unhappy, and did our little best to amuse and console him. The Colonel came in. It was in the dark February days: we had lighted gas in the studio. Clive had made a sketch from some favorite verses of mine and George's; those charming lines of Scott's:

"He turned his charger as he spake,
Beside the river shore;
He gave his bridle-rein a shake,
With adieu for evermore,
My dear!
Adieu for evermore!"

Thomas Newcome held up a finger at Warrington, and he came up to the picture and looked at it; and George and I trolled out

"Adieu for evermore,
My dear!
Adieu for evermore!"

From the picture the brave old Colonel turned to the painter, regarding his son with a look of beautiful, inexpressible affection. And he laid his hand on his son's shoulder, and smiled, and stroked Clive's yellow mustache.

"And—and did Barnes send no answer to that letter you wrote him?" he said, slowly.

Clive broke out into a laugh that was almost a sob. He took both his father's hands. "My dear, dear old father!" says he, "what a—what an—old—trump you are!" My eyes were so dim I could hardly see the two men as they embraced.

CHAPTER LIV.

HAS A TRAGICAL ENDING.

CLIVE presently answered the question which his father put to him in the last chapter, by producing from the ledge of his easel a crumpled paper, full of Cavendish now, but on which was written Sir Barnes Newcome's reply to his cousin's polite invitation.

Sir Barnes Newcome wrote, "that he thought a reference to a friend was quite unnecessary, in the most disagreeable and painful dispute in which Mr. Clive desired to interfere as a principal; that the reasons which prevented Sir Barnes from taking notice of Colonel Newcome's shameful and ungentlemanlike conduct applied equally, as Mr. Clive Newcome very well knew, to himself; that if further insult was offered, or outrage attempted, Sir Barnes should resort to the police for protection; that he was about to quit London, and certainly should not delay his departure on account of Mr. Clive Newcome's monstrous proceedings; and that he desired to take leave of an odious subject, as of an individual whom he had striven to treat with kindness, but from whom, from youth upward, Sir Barnes Newcome had received nothing but insolence, enmity, and ill-will."

"He is an ill man to offend," remarked Mr. Pendennis. "I don't think he has ever forgiven that claret, Clive."

"Pooh! the feud dates from long before that," said Clive; "Barnes wanted to lick me when I was a boy, and I declined: in fact, I think he had rather the worst of it; but then I operated freely on his shins, and that wasn't fair in war, you know."

"Heaven forgive me!" cries the Colonel; "I have always felt the fellow was my enemy: and my mind is relieved now war is declared. It has been a kind of hypocrisy with me to shake his hand and eat his dinner. When I trusted him it was against my better instinct; and I have been struggling against it these ten years, thinking it was a wicked prejudice, and ought to be overcome."

"Why should we overcome such instincts?" asks Mr. Warrington. "Why shouldn't we hate what is hateful in people, and scorn what is mean? From what friend Pen has described to me, and from some other accounts which have come to my ears, your respectable nephew is about as loathsome a little villain as crawls on the earth. Good seems to be out of his sphere, and away from his contemplation. He ill treats every one he comes near; or, if gentle to them, it is that they may serve some base purpose. Since my attention has been drawn to the creature, I have been contemplating his ways with wonder and curiosity. How much superior Nature's rogues are, Pen, to the villains you novelists put into your books! This man goes about his life business with a natural propensity to darkness and evil—as a bug crawls, and stings, and stinks. I don't suppose the fellow feels any more remorse than a cat that runs away with a mutton chop. I recognize the Evil Spirit, Sir, and do honor to Ahrimanes, in taking off my hat to this young man. He seduced a poor girl in his father's country town—it is not natural? deserted her and her children—don't you recognize the beast? married for rank—could you expect otherwise from him? invites my Lord Highgate to his house in consideration of his balance at the bank—Sir, unless somebody's heel shall crunch him on the way, there is no height to which this aspiring vermin mayn't crawl. I look to see Sir Barnes Newcome proper more and more. I make no doubt he will die an immense capitalist, and an exalted Peer of this realm. He will have a marble monument, and a pathetic funeral sermon. There is a Divine in your family, Clive, that shall preach it. I will weep respectful tears over the grave of Baron Newcome, Viscount Newcome,

Earl Newcome; and the children whom he has deserted, and who, in the course of time, will be sent by a grateful nation to New South Wales, will proudly say to their brother convicts, 'Yes, the Earl was our honored father!'

"I fear he is no better than he should be, Mr. Warrington," says the Colonel, shaking his head. "I never heard the story about the deserted children."

"How should you? Oh, you guileless man!" cries Warrington. "I am not in the ways of scandal-hearing myself much; but this tale I had from Sir Barnes Newcome's own country. Mr. Batters, of the 'Newcome Independent,' is my esteemed client. I write leading articles for his newspaper, and when he was in town last spring he favored me with the anecdote; and proposed to amuse the member for Newcome by publishing it in his journal. This kind of writing is not much in my line; and, out of respect to you and your young one, I believe, I strove with Mr. Batters, and entreated him and prevailed with him, not to publish the story. That is how I came to know it."

I sat with the Colonel in the evening, when he commented on Warrington's story and Sir Barnes's adventures in his simple way. He said his brother Hobson had been with him the morning after the dispute, reiterating Barnes's defense of his conduct: and professing on his own part nothing but good-will toward his brother. Between ourselves the young baronet carries matters with rather a high hand sometimes, and I am not sorry that you gave him a little dressing. But you were too hard upon him, Colonel—really you were. Had I known that child-deserting story I would have given it harder still, Sir, says Thomas Newcome, twirling his mustache; but my brother had nothing to do with the quarrel, and very rightly did not wish to engage in it. He has an eye to business has Master Hobson, too, my friend continued: for he brought me a check for my private account, which of course, he said, could not remain after my quarrel with Barnes. But the Indian bank account, which is pretty large, he supposed need not be taken away? and indeed why should it? So that, which is little business of mine, remains where it was; and brother Hobson and I remain perfectly good friends.

"I think Clive is much better since he has been quite put out of his suspense. He speaks with a great deal more kindness and good-nature about the marriage than I am disposed to feel regarding it; and, depend on it, has too high a spirit to show that he is beaten. But I know he is a good deal cut up, though he says nothing; and he agreed willingly enough to take a little journey, Arthur, and be out of the way when this business takes place. We shall go to Paris: I don't know where else besides. These misfortunes do good in one way, hard as they are to bear: they unite people who love each other. It seems to me my boy has been nearer to me, and likes his old father better than he has done of late." And very soon after this talk our friends departed.

The Crimean minister having been recalled, and Lady Ann Newcome's house in Park Lane being vacant, her ladyship and her family came to occupy the mansion for this eventful season, and sate once more in the dismal dining-room under the picture of the defunct Sir Brian. A little of the splendor and hospitality of old days was revived in the house: entertainments were given by Lady Ann: and among other festivities a fine ball took place, where pretty Miss Alice, Miss Ethel's youngest sister, made her first appearance in the world, to which she was afterward to be presented by the Marchioness of Farintosh. All the little sisters were charmed, no doubt, that the beautiful Ethel was to become a beautiful Marchioness, who, as they came up to womanhood one after another, would introduce them severally to amiable young earls, dukes, and marquises, when they would be married off and wear coronets and diamonds of their own right. At Lady Ann's ball I saw my acquaintance, young Mumford, who was going to Oxford next October, and about to leave Rugby, where he was at the head of the school, looking very dismal as Miss Alice whirled round the room dancing in Viscount Bustington's arms; Miss Alice, with whose mamma he used to take tea at Rugby, and for whose pretty sake Mumford did Alfred Newcome's verses for him and let him off his thrashings. Poor Mumford! he dismally went about under the protection of young Alfred, a fourth form boy—not one soul did he know in that rattling London ball-room; his young face was as white as the large white-tie, donned two hours since at the Tavistock with such nervousness and beating of heart!

With these lads, and decorated with a tie equally splendid, moved about young Sam Newcome, who was shirking from his sister and his mamma. Mr. Hobson had actually assumed clean gloves for this festive occasion. Sam stared at all the "Nobs:" and insisted upon being introduced to "Farintosh," and congratulated his lordship with much graceful ease : and then pushed about the rooms perseveringly hanging on to Alfred's jacket. "I say, I wish you wouldn't call me Al," I heard Master Alfred say to his cousin. Seeing my face, Mr. Samuel ran up to claim acquaintance. He was good enough to say he thought Farintosh seemed devilish haughty. Even my wife could not help saying, that Mr. Sam was an odious little creature.

So it was for young Alfred, and his brothers and sisters, who would want help and protection in the world, that Ethel was about to give up her independence, her inclination perhaps, and to bestow her life on yonder young nobleman. Looking at her as a girl devoting herself to her family, her sacrifice gave her a melancholy interest in our eyes. My wife and I watched her, grave and beautiful, moving through the rooms, receiving and returning a hundred greetings, bending to compliments, talking with this friend and that, with my lord's lordly relations, with himself, to whom she listened deferentially; faintly smiling as he spoke now and again, doing the honors of her mother's house. Lady after lady of his lordship's clan and kinsfolk, complimented the girl and her pleased mother. Old Lady Kew was radiant (if one can call radiance the glances of those darkling old eyes). She sat in a little room apart, and thither people went to pay their court to her. Unwillingly I came in on this levee with my wife on my arm: Lady Kew scowled at me over her crutch, but without a sign of recognition. "What an awful countenance that old woman has!" Laura whispered as we retreated out of that gloomy presence.

And Doubt (as its wont is) whispered too a question in my ear, "Is it for her brothers and sisters only that Miss Ethel is sacrificing herself? Is it not for the coronet, and the triumph, and the fine houses?" When two motives may actuate a friend, we surely may try and believe in the good one, says Laura. But, but I am glad Clive does not marry her—poor fellow!—he would not have been happy with her. She belongs to this great world: she has spent all her life in it: Clive would have entered into it, very likely in her train; "and you know, Sir, it is not good that we should be our husband's superiors," adds Mrs. Laura with a courtesy.

She presently pronounced that the air was very hot in the rooms, and in fact wanted to go home to see her child. As we passed out, we saw Sir Barnes Newcome, eagerly smiling, smirking, bowing, and in the fondest conversation with his sister and Lord Farintosh. By Sir Barnes presently brushed Lieutenant General Sir George Tufto, K.C.B., who, when he saw on whose foot he had trodden, grunted out, "Hm, beg your pardon!" and turning his back on Barnes, forthwith began complimenting Ethel and the Marquis. "Served with your lordship's father in Spain; glad to make your lordship's acquaintance," says Sir George. Ethel bows to us as we pass out of the rooms, and we hear no more of Sir George's conversation.

In the cloak-room sits Lady Clara Newcome, with a gentleman bending over her, just in such an attitude as the bride is in Hogarth's Marriage-a-la-mode as the counselor talks to her. Lady Clara starts up as a crowd of blushes come into her wan face, and tries to smile, and rises to greet my wife, and says something about its being so dreadfully hot in the upper rooms, and so very tedious waiting for the carriages. The gentleman advances toward me with a military stride, and says, "How do you do, Mr. Pendennis? How's our young friend, the painter?" I answer Lord Highgate civilly enough, whereas my wife will scarce speak a word in reply to Lady Clara Newcome.

Lady Clara asked us to her ball, which my wife declined altogether to attend. Sir Barnes published a series of quite splendid entertainments on the happy occasion of his sister's betrothal. We read the names of all the clan Farintosh in the Morning Post, as attending these banquets. Mr. and Mrs. Hobson Newcome, in Bryanstone Square, gave also signs of rejoicing at their niece's marriage. They had a grand banquet, followed by a tea, to which latter amusement the present biographer was invited. Lady Ann and Lady Kew, and her granddaughter, and the Baronet and his wife, and my Lord Highgate, and Sir George Tufto attended the dinner; but it was rather a damp entertainment. "Farintosh," whispers Sam Newcome, "sent word just before dinner that he had a sore throat, and Barnes was as sulky as possible. Sir George wouldn't speak to him, and the dowager wouldn't speak to Lord Highgate. Scarcely any thing was drunk," concluded Mr. Sam, with a slight hiccup. "I say, Pendennis, how sold Clive will be!" And the amiable youth went off to commune with others of his parents' guests.

Thus the Newcomes entertained the Farintoshes, and the Farintoshes entertained the Newcomes. And the Dowager Countess of Kew went from assembly to assembly every evening, and to jewelers and upholsterers, and dress-makers every morning; and Lord Farintosh's town house was splendidly re-decorated in the newest fashion; and he seemed to grow more and more attentive as the happy day approached, and he gave away all his cigars to his brother Rob; and his sisters were delighted with Ethel, and constantly in her company; and his mother was pleased with her, and thought a girl of her spirit and resolution would make a good wife for her son: and select crowds flocked to see the service of plate at Handyman's, and the diamonds which were being set for the lady; and Smee, R. A., painted her portrait, as a souvenir for mamma when Miss Newcome should be Miss Newcome no more; and Lady Kew made a will leaving all she could leave to her beloved granddaughter, Ethel, daughter of the late Sir Brian Newcome, Baronet; and Lord Kew wrote an affectionate letter to his cousin, congratulating her, and wishing her happiness with all his heart; and I was glancing over the Times newspaper at breakfast one morning, when I laid it down with an exclamation which caused my wife to start with surprise.

"What is it?" cries Laura, and I read as follows:

"DEATH OF THE COUNTESS DOWAGER OF KEW.—We regret to have to announce the awfully sudden death of this venerable lady. Her ladyship, who had been at several parties of the nobility the night before last, seemingly in perfect health, was seized with a fit as she was waiting for her carriage, and about to quit Lady Pallgrave's assembly. Immediate medical assistance was procured, and her ladyship was carried to her own house, in Queen Street, May Fair. But she never rallied, or, we believe, spoke, after the first fatal seizure, and sank at eleven o'clock last evening. The deceased, Louisa Joanna Gaunt, widow of Frederick, first Earl of Kew, was daughter of Charles, Earl of Gaunt, and sister of the late and aunt of the present Marquis of Steyne. The present Earl of Kew is her ladyship's grandson, his lordship's father, Lord Walham, having died before his own father, the first earl. Many noble families are placed in mourning by this sad event. Society has to deplore the death of a lady who has been its ornament for more than half a century, and who was known, we may say, throughout Europe for her remarkable sense, extraordinary memory, and brilliant wit."

THE PARADISE OF BACHELORS AND THE TARTARUS OF MAIDS.

I. THE PARADISE OF BACHELORS.

IT lies not far from Temple-Bar.

Going to it, by the usual way, is like stealing from a heated plain into some cool, deep glen, shady among harboring hills.

Sick with the din and soiled with the mud of Fleet Street—where the Benedick tradesmen are hurrying by, with ledger-lines ruled along their brows, thinking upon rise of bread and fall of babies—you adroitly turn a mystic corner—not a street—glide down a dim, monastic way, flanked by dark, sedate, and solemn piles, and still wending on, give the whole care-worn world the slip, and, disentangled, stand beneath the quiet cloisters of the Paradise of Bachelors.

Sweet are the oases in Sahara; charming the idle-groves of August prairies; delectable pure faith amidst a thousand perfidies; but sweeter, still more charming, most delectable, the dreamy Paradise of Bachelors, found in the stony heart of stunning London.

In mild meditation pace the cloisters; take your pleasure, sip your leisure, in the garden waterward; go linger in the ancient library; go worship in the sculptured chapel: but little have you seen, just nothing do you know, not the sweet kernel have you tasted, till you dine among the banded Bachelors, and see their convivial eyes and glasses sparkle. Not dine in bustling commons, during term-time, in the hall; but tranquilly, by private hint, at a private table; some fine Templar's hospitably invited guest.

Templar? That's a romantic name. Let me see. Brian de Bois Gilbert was a Templar, I believe. Do we understand you to insinuate that those famous Templars still survive in modern London? May the ring of their armed heels be heard, and the rattle of their shields, as in mailed prayer the monk-knights kneel before the consecrated Host? Surely a monk-knight were a curious sight picking his way along the Strand, his gleaming corselet and snowy surcoat spattered by an omnibus. Long-bearded, too, according to his order's rule; his face fuzzy as a pard's; how would the grim ghost look among the crop-haired, close-shaven citizens? We know indeed—sad history recounts it—that a moral blight tainted at last this sacred Brotherhood. Though no sworded foe might outskill them in the fence, yet the worm of luxury crawled beneath their guard, gnawing the core of knightly troth, nibbling the monastic vow, till at last the monk's austerity relaxed to wassailing, and the sworn knights-bachelors grew to be but hypocrites and rakes.

But for all this, quite unprepared were we to learn that Knights-Templars (if at all in being) were so entirely secularized as to be reduced from carving out immortal fame in glorious battling for the Holy Land, to the carving of roast-mutton at a dinner-board. Like Anacreon, do these degenerate Templars now think it sweeter far to fall in banquet than in war? Or, indeed, how can there be any survival of that famous order? Templars in modern London! Templars in their red-cross mantles smoking cigars at the Divan! Templars crowded in a railway train, till, stacked with steel helmet, spear, and shield, the whole train looks like one elongated locomotive!

No. The genuine Templar is long since departed. Go view the wondrous tombs in the Temple Church; see there the rigidly-haughty forms stretched out, with crossed arms upon their stilly hearts, in everlasting and undreaming rest. Like the years before the flood, the bold Knights-Templars are no more. Nevertheless, the name remains, and the nominal society, and the ancient grounds, and some of the ancient edifices. But the iron heel is changed to a boot of patent-leather; the long two-handed sword to a one-handed quill; the monk-giver of gratuitous ghostly counsel now counsels for a fee; the defender of the sarcophagus (if in good practice with his weapon) now has more than one case to defend; the vowed opener and clearer of all highways leading to the Holy Sepulchre, now has it in particular charge to check, to clog, to hinder, and embarrass all the courts and avenues of Law; the knight-combatant of the Saracen, breasting spear-points at Acre, now fights law-points in Westminster Hall. The helmet is a wig. Struck by Time's enchanter's wand, the Templar is to-day a Lawyer.

But, like many others tumbled from proud glory's height—like the apple, hard on the bough but mellow on the ground—the Templar's fall has but made him all the finer fellow.

I dare say those old warrior-priests were but gruff and grouty at the best; cased in Birmingham hardware, how could their crimped arms give yours or mine a hearty shake? Their proud, ambitious, monkish souls clasped shut, like horn-book missals; their very faces clapped in bomb-shells; what sort of genial men were these? But best of comrades, most affable of hosts, capital diner is the modern Templar. His wit and wine are both of sparkling brands.

The church and cloisters, courts and vaults, lanes and passages, banquet-halls, refectories, libraries, terraces, gardens, broad walks, domicils, and dessert-rooms, covering a very large space of ground, and all grouped in central neighborhood, and quite sequestered from the old city's surrounding din; and every thing about the place being kept in most bachelor-like particularity, no part of London offers to a quiet wight so agreeable a refuge.

The Temple is, indeed, a city by itself. A city with all the best appurtenances, as the above enumeration shows. A city with a park to it, and flower-beds, and a river-side—the Thames flowing by as openly, in one part, as by Eden's primal garden flowed the mild Euphrates. In what is now the Temple Garden the old Crusaders used to exercise their steeds and jances; the modern Templars now lounge on the benches beneath the trees, and, switching their patent-leather boots, in gay discourse exercise at repartee.

Long lines of stately portraits in the banquet-halls, show what great men of mark—famous nobles, judges, and Lord Chancellors—have in their time been Templars. But all Templars are not known to universal fame; though, if the having warm hearts and warmer welcomes, full minds and fuller cellars, and giving good advice and glorious dinners, spiced with rare divertissements of fun and fancy, merit immortal mention, set down, ye muses, the names of R. F. C. and his imperial brother.

Though to be a Templar, in the one true sense, you must needs be a lawyer, or a student at the law, and be ceremoniously enrolled as member of the order, yet as many such, though Templars, do not reside within the Temple's precincts, though they may have their offices there, just so, on the other hand, there are many residents of the hoary old domicils who are not admitted Templars. If being, say, a lounging gentleman and bachelor, or a quiet, unmarried, literary man, charmed with the soft seclusion of the spot, you much desire to pitch your shady tent among the rest in this serene encampment, then you must make some special friend among the order, and procure him to rent, in his name but at your charge, whatever vacant chamber you may find to suit.

Thus, I suppose, did Dr. Johnson, that nominal Benedict and widower but virtual bachelor, when for a space he resided here. So, too, did that undoubted bachelor and rare good soul, Charles Lamb. And hundreds more, of sterling spirits, Brethren of the Order of Celibacy, from time to time have dined, and slept, and tabernacled here. Indeed, the place is all a honeycomb of offices and domicils. Like any cheese, it is quite perforated through and through in all directions with the snug calls of bachelors. Dear, delightful spot! Ah! when I bethink me of the sweet hours there passed, enjoying such genial hospitalities beneath those time-honored roofs, my heart only finds due utterance through poetry; and, with a sigh, I softly sing, "Carry me back to old Virginny!"

Such then, at large, is the Paradise of Bachelors. And such I found it one pleasant afternoon in the smiling month of May, when, sallying from my hotel in Trafalgar Square, I went to keep my dinner-appointment with that fine Barrister, Bachelor, and Bench, R. F. C. (he is the first and second, and should be the third; I hereby nominate him), whose card I kept fast pinched between my gloved forefinger and thumb, and every now and then snatched still another look at the pleasant address inscribed beneath the name, "No. —, Elm Court, Temple."

At the core he was a right bluff, care-free, right comfortable, and most companionable Englishman. If on a first acquaintance he seemed reserved, quite icy in his air—patience; this Champagne will thaw. And if it never do, better frozen Champagne than liquid vinegar.

There were nine gentlemen, all bachelors, at the dinner. One was from "No. —, King's Bench Walk, Temple;" a second, third, and fourth, and fifth, from various courts or passages christened with some similarly rich resounding syllables. It was indeed a sort of Senate of the Bachelors, sent to this dinner from widely-scattered districts, to represent the general celibacy of the Temple. Nay it was, by representation, a Grand Parliament of the best Bachelors in universal London; several of those present being from distant quarters of the town, noted immemorial seats of lawyers and unmarried men—Lincoln's Inn, Furnival's Inn; and one gentleman, upon whom I looked with a sort of collateral awe, hailed from the spot where Lord Verulam once abode a bachelor—Gray's Inn.

The apartment was well up toward heaven. I know not how many strange old stairs I climbed to get to it. But a good dinner, with famous company, should be well earned. No doubt our host had his dining-room so high with a view to secure the prior exercise necessary to the due relishing and digesting of it.

The furniture was wonderfully unpretending, old, and snug. No new shining mahogany, sticky with undried varnish; no uncomfortably luxurious ottomans, and sofas too fine to use, vexed you in this sedate apartment. It is a thing which every sensible American should learn from every sensible Englishman, that glare and glitter, gimcracks and gewgaws, are not indispensable to domestic solacement. The American Benedick snatches, down-town, a tough chop in a gilded show-box; the English bachelor leisurely dines at home on that incomparable South Down of his, off a plain deal board.

The ceiling of the room was low. Who wants to dine under the dome of St. Peter's? High ceilings! If that is your demand, and the higher the better, and you be so very tall, then go dine out with the topping giraffe in the open air.

In good time the nine gentlemen sat down to nine covers, and soon were fairly under way.

If I remember right, ox-tail soup inaugurated the affair. Of a rich russet hue, its agreeable flavor dissipated my first confounding of its main ingredient with teamster's gads and the raw-hides of ushers. (By way of interlude, we here drank a little claret.) Neptune's was the next tribute rendered—turbot coming second; snow-white, flaky, and just gelatinous enough, not too turtleish in its unctuousness.

(At this point we refreshed ourselves with a glass of sherry.) After these light skirmishers had vanished, the heavy artillery of the feast marched in, led by that well-known English generalissimo, roast beef. For aids-de-camp we had a saddle of mutton, a fat turkey, a chicken-pie, and endless other savory things; while for avant-couriers came nine silver flagons of humming ale. This heavy ordnance having departed on the track of the light skirmishers, a picked brigade of game-fowl encamped upon the board, their camp-fires lit by the ruddiest of decanters.

Tarts and puddings followed, with innumerable niceties; then cheese and crackers. (By way of ceremony, simply, only to keep up good old fashions, we here each drank a glass of good old port.)

The cloth was now removed; and like Blucher's army coming in at the death on the field of Waterloo, in marched a fresh detachment of bottles, dusty with their hurried march.

All these manœuvres of the forces were superintended by a surprising old field-marshal (I can not school myself to call him by the inglorious name of waiter), with snowy hair and napkin, and a head like Socrates. Amidst all the hilarity of the feast, intent on important business, he disdained to smile. Venerable man!

I have above endeavored to give some slight schedule of the general plan of operations. But any one knows that a good, genial dinner is a sort of pell-mell, indiscriminate affair, quite baffling to detail in all particulars. Thus, I spoke of taking a glass of claret, and a glass of sherry, and a glass of port, and a mug of ale—all at certain specific periods and times. But those were merely the state bumpers, so to speak. Innumerable impromptu glasses were drained between the periods of those grand imposing ones.

The nine bachelors seemed to have the most tender concern for each other's health. All the time, in flowing wine, they most earnestly expressed their sincerest wishes for the entire well-being and lasting hygiene of the gentlemen on the right and on the left. I noticed that when one of these kind bachelors desired a little more wine (just for his stomach's sake, like Timothy), he would not help himself to it unless some other bachelor would join him. It seemed held something indelicate, selfish, and unfraternal, to be seen taking a lonely, unparticipated glass. Meantime, as the wine ran apace, the spirits of the company grew more and more to perfect genialness and unconstraint. They related all sorts of pleasant stories. Choice experiences in their private lives were now brought out, like choice brands of Moselle or Rhenish, only kept for particular company. One told us how mellowly he lived when a student at Oxford; with various spicy anecdotes of most frank-hearted noble lords, his liberal companions. Another bachelor, a gray-headed man, with a sunny face, who, by his own account, embraced every opportunity of leisure to cross over into the Low Countries, on sudden tours of inspection of the fine old Flemish architecture there—this learned, white-haired, sunny-faced old bachelor, excelled in his descriptions of the elaborate splendors of those old guild-halls, town-halls, and stadthold-houses, to be seen in the land of the ancient Flemings. A third was a great frequenter of the British Museum, and knew all about scores of wonderful antiquities, of Oriental manuscripts, and costly books without a duplicate. A fourth had lately returned from a trip to Old Granada, and, of course, was full of Saracenic scenery. A fifth had a funny case in law to tell. A sixth was erudite in wines. A seventh had a strange characteristic anecdote of the private life of the Iron Duke, never printed, and never before announced in any public or private company. An eighth had lately been amusing his evenings, now and then, with translating a comic poem of Pulci's. He quoted for us the more amusing passages.

And so the evening slipped along, the hours told, not by a water-clock, like King Alfred's, but a wine-chronometer. Meantime the table seemed a sort of Epsom Heath; a regular ring, where the decanters galloped round. For fear one decanter should not with sufficient speed reach his destination, another was sent express after him to hurry him; and then a third to hurry the second; and so on with a fourth and fifth. And throughout all this nothing loud, nothing unmannerly, nothing turbulent. I am quite sure, from the scrupulous gravity and austerity of his air, that had Socrates, the field-marshal, perceived aught of indecorum in the the company he served, he would have forthwith departed without giving warning. I afterward learned that, during the repast, an invalid bachelor in an adjoining chamber enjoyed his first sound refreshing slumber in three long, weary weeks.

It was the very perfection of quiet absorption of good living, good drinking, good feeling, and good talk. We were a band of brothers. Comfort—fraternal, household comfort, was the grand trait of the affair. Also, you could plainly see that these easy-hearted men had no wives or children to give an anxious thought. Almost all of them were travelers, too; for bachelors alone can travel freely, and without any twinges of their consciences touching desertion of the fire-side.

The thing called pain, the bugbear styled trouble—those two legends seemed preposterous to their bachelor imaginations. How could men of liberal sense, ripe scholarship in the world, and capacious philosophical and convivial understandings—how could they suffer themselves to be imposed upon by such monkish fables? Pain! Trouble! As well talk of Catholic miracles. No such thing.—Pass the sherry, Sir.—Pooh, pooh! Can't be!—The port, Sir, if you please. Nonsense; don't tell me so.—The decanter stops with you, Sir, I believe.

And so it went.

Not long after the cloth was drawn our host glanced significantly upon Socrates, who, solemnly stepping to a stand, returned with an immense convolved horn, a regular Jericho horn, mounted with polished silver, and otherwise chased and curiously enriched; not omitting two life-like goat's heads, with four more horns of solid silver, projecting from opposite sides of the mouth of the noble main horn.

Not having heard that our host was a performer on the bugle, I was surprised to see him lift this horn from the table, as if he were about to blow an inspiring blast. But I was relieved from this, and set quite right as touching the purposes of the horn, by his now inserting his thumb and forefinger into its mouth; whereupon a slight aroma was stirred up, and my nostrils were greeted with the smell of some choice Rappee. It was a mull of snuff. It went the rounds. Capital idea this, thought I, of taking snuff about this juncture. This goodly fashion must be introduced among my countrymen at home, further ruminated I.

The remarkable decorum of the nine bachelors—a decorum not to be affected by any quantity of wine—a decorum unassailable by any degree of mirthfulness—this was again set in a forcible light to me, by now observing that, though they took snuff very freely, yet not a man so far violated the proprieties, or so far molested the invalid bachelor in the adjoining room as to indulge himself in a sneeze. The snuff was snuffed silently, as if it had been some fine innoxious powder brushed off the wings of butterflies.

But fine though they be, bachelors' dinners, like bachelors' lives, can not endure forever. The time came for breaking up. One by one the bachelors took their hats, and two by two, and arm-in-arm they descended, still conversing, to the flagging of the court; some going to their neighboring chambers to turn over the Decameron ere retiring for the night; some to smoke a cigar, promenading in the garden on the cool river-side; some to make for the street, call a hack, and be driven snugly to their distant lodgings.

I was the last lingerer.

"Well," said my smiling host, "what do you think of the Temple here, and the sort of life we bachelors make out to live in it?"

"Sir," said I, with a burst of admiring candor—"Sir, this is the very Paradise of Bachelors!"

II. THE TARTARUS OF MAIDS.

It lies not far from Woedolor Mountain in New England. Turning to the east, right out from among bright farms and sunny meadows, nodding in early June with odorous grasses, you enter ascendingly among bleak hills. These gradually close in upon a dusky pass, which, from the violent Gulf Stream of air unceasingly driving between its cloven walls of haggard rock, as well as from the tradition of a crazy spinster's hut having long ago stood somewhere hereabouts, is called the Mad Maid's Bellows-pipe.

Winding along at the bottom of the gorge is a dangerously narrow wheel-road, occupying the bed of a former torrent. Following this road to its highest point, you stand as within a Dantean gateway. From the steepness of the walls here, their strangely ebony hue, and the sudden contraction of the gorge, this particular point is called the Black Notch. The ravine now expandingly descends into a great, purple, hopper-shaped hollow, far sunk among many Plutonian, shaggy-wooded mountains. By the country people this hollow is called the Devil's Dungeon. Sounds of torrents fall on all sides upon the ear. These rapid waters unite at last in one turbid brick-colored stream, boiling through a flume among enormous boulders. They call this strange-colored torrent Blood River. Gaining a dark precipice it wheels suddenly to the west, and makes one maniac spring of sixty feet into the arms of a stunted wood of gray-haired pines, between which it thence eddies on its further way down to the invisible lowlands.

Conspicuously crowning a rocky bluff high to one side, at the cataract's verge, is the ruin of an old saw-mill, built in those primitive times when vast pines and hemlocks superabounded throughout the neighboring region. The black-mossed bulk of those immense, rough-hewn, and spike-knotted logs, here and there tumbled all together, in long abandonment and decay, or left in solitary, perilous projection over the cataract's gloomy brink, impart to this rude wooden ruin not only much of the aspect of one of rough-quarried stone, but also a sort of feudal, Rhineland, and Thurmberg look, derived from the pinnacled wildness of the neighboring scenery.

Not far from the bottom of the Dungeon stands a large white-washed building, relieved, like some great whited sepulchre, against the sullen background of mountain-side firs, and other hardy evergreens, inaccessibly rising in grim terraces for some two thousand feet.

The building is a paper-mill.

Having embarked on a large scale in the seed-man's business (so extensively and broadcast, indeed, that at length my seeds were distributed through all the Eastern and Northern States, and even fell into the far soil of Missouri and the Carolinas), the demand for paper at my place became so great, that the expenditure soon amounted to a most important item in the general account. It need hardly be hinted how paper comes into use with seedsmen, as envelopes. These are mostly made of yellowish paper, folded square; and when filled, are all but flat, and being stamped, and superscribed with the nature of the seeds contained, assume not a little the appearance of business-letters ready for the mail. Of these small envelopes I used an incredible quantity—several hundreds of thousands in a year. For a time I had purchased my paper from the wholesale dealers in a neighboring town. For economy's sake, and partly for the adventure of the trip, I now resolved to cross the mountains, some sixty miles, and order my future paper at the Devil's Dungeon paper-mill.

The sleighing being uncommonly fine toward the end of January, and promising to hold so for no small period, in spite of the bitter cold I started one gray Friday noon in my pung, well fitted with buffalo and wolf robes; and, spending one night on the road, next noon came in sight of Woedolor Mountain.

The far summit fairly smoked with frost; white vapors curled up from its white-wooded top, as from a chimney. The intense congelation made the whole country look like one petrification. The steel shoes of my pung crunched and gritted over the vitreous, chippy snow, as if it had been broken glass. The forests here and there skirting the route, feeling the same all-stiffening influence, their inmost fibres penetrated with the cold, strangely groaned—not in the swaying branches merely, but likewise in the vertical trunk—as the fitful gnats remorselessly swept through them. Brittle with excessive frost, many colossal tough-grained maples, snapped in twain like pipe-stems, cumbered the unfeeling earth.

Flaked all over with frozen sweat, white as a milky ram, his nostrils at each breath sending forth two horn-shaped shoots of heated respiration, Black, my good horse, but six years old, started at a sudden turn, where, right across the track—not ten minutes fallen—an old distorted hemlock lay, darkly undulatory as an anaconda.

Gaining the Bellows'-pipe, the violent blast, dead from behind, all but shoved my high-backed pung up-hill. The gust shrieked through the shivered pass, as if laden with lost spirits bound to the unhappy world. Ere gaining the summit, Black, my horse, as if exasperated by the cutting wind, slung out with his strong hind legs, tore the light pung straight up-hill, and sweeping grazingly through the narrow notch, sped downward madly past the ruined saw-mill. Into the Devil's Dungeon horse and cataract rushed together.

With might and main, quitting my seat and robes, and standing backward, with one foot braced against the dash-board, I rasped and churned the bit, and stopped him just in time to avoid collision, at a turn, with the bleak nozzle of a rock, couchant like a lion in the way—a road-side rock.

At first I could not discover the paper-mill.

The whole hollow gleamed with the white, except, here and there, where a pinnacle of granite showed one wind-swept angle bare. The mountains stood pinned in shrouds—a pass of Alpine corpses. Where stands the mill? Suddenly a whirling, humming sound broke upon my ear. I looked, and there, like an arrested avalanche, lay the large whitewashed factory. It was subordinately surrounded by a cluster of other and smaller buildings, some of which, from their cheap, blank air, great length, gregarious windows, and comfortless expression, no doubt were boarding-houses of the operatives. A snow-white hamlet amidst the snows. Various rude, irregular squares and courts resulted from the somewhat picturesque clusterings of these buildings, owing to the broken, rocky nature of the ground, which forbade all method in their relative arrangement. Several narrow lanes and alleys, too, partly blocked with snow fallen from the roof, cut up the hamlet in all directions.

When, turning from the traveled highway, jingling with bells of numerous farmers—who, availing themselves of the fine sleighing, were dragging their wood to market—and frequently diversified with swift cutters dashing from inn to inn of the scattered villages—when, I say, turning from that bustling main-road, I by degrees wound into the Mad Maid's Bellows'-pipe, and saw the grim Black Notch beyond, then something latent, as well as something obvious in the time and scene, strangely brought back to my mind my first sight of dark and grimy Temple-Bar. And when Black, my horse, went darting through the Notch, perilously grazing its rocky wall, I remembered being in a runaway London omnibus, which in much the same sort of style, though by no means at an equal rate, dashed through the ancient arch of Wren. Though the two objects did by no means completely correspond, yet this partial inadequacy but served to tinge the similitude not less with the vividness than the disorder of a dream. So that, when upon reining up at the protruding rock I at last caught sight of the quaint groupings of the factory-buildings, and with the traveled highway and the Notch behind, found myself all alone, silently and privily stealing through deep-cloven passages into this sequestered spot, and saw the long, high-gabled main factory edifice, with a rude tower—for hoisting heavy boxes—at one end, standing among its crowded outbuildings and boarding-houses, as the Temple Church amidst the surrounding offices and dormitories, and when the marvelous retirement of this mysterious mountain nook fastened its whole spell upon me, then, what memory lacked, all tribtary imagination furnished, and I said to myself, "This is the very counterpart of the Paradise of Bachelors, but snowed upon, and frost-painted to a sepulchre."

Dismounting, and warily picking my way down the dangerous declivity—horse and man both sliding now and then upon the icy ledges—at length I drove, or the blast drove me, into the largest square, before one side of the main edifice. Piercingly and shrilly the shot blast blew by the corner; and redly and demoniacally boiled Blood River at one side. A long wood-pile, of many scores of cords, all glittering in mail of crusted ice, stood crosswise in the square. A row of horse-posts, their north sides plastered with adhesive snow, flanked the factory wall. The bleak frost packed and paved the square as with some ringing metal.

The inverted similitude recurred—"The sweet, tranquil Temple garden, with the Thames bordering its green beds," strangely meditated I.

But where are the gay bachelors?

Then, as I and my horse stood shivering in the wind-spray, a girl ran from a neighboring dormitory door, and throwing her thin apron over her bare head, made for the opposite building.

"One moment, my girl; is there no shed hereabouts which I may drive into?"

Pausing, she turned upon me a face pale with work, and blue with cold; an eye supernatural with unrelated misery.

"Nay," faltered I, "I mistook you. Go on; I want nothing."

Leading my horse close to the door from which she had come, I knocked. Another pale, blue girl appeared, shivering in the doorway as, to prevent the blast, she jealously held the door ajar.

"Nay, I mistake again. In God's name shut the door. But hold, is there no man about?"

That moment a dark-complexioned well-wrapped personage passed, making for the factory door, and spying him coming, the girl rapidly closed the other one.

"Is there no horse-shed here, Sir?"

"Yonder, to the wood-shed," he replied, and disappeared inside the factory.

With much ado I managed to wedge in horse and pung between the scattered piles of wood all sawn and split. Then, blanketing my horse, and piling my buffalo on the blanket's top, and tucking in its edges well around the breast-band and breeching, so that the wind might not strip him bare, I tied him fast, and ran lamely for the factory door, stiff with frost, and cumbered with my driver's dread-naught.

Immediately I found myself standing in a spacious place, intolerably lighted by long rows of windows, focusing inward the snowy scene without.

At rows of blank-looking counters sat rows of blank-looking girls, with blank, white folders in their blank hands, all blankly folding blank paper.

In one corner stood some huge frame of ponderous iron, with a vertical thing like a piston periodically rising and falling upon a heavy wooden block. Before it—its tame minister—stood a tall girl, feeding the iron animal with half-quires of rose-hued note paper, which, at every downward dab of the piston-like machine, received in the corner the impress of a wreath of roses. I looked from the rosy paper to the pallid cheek, but said nothing.

Seated before a long apparatus, strung with long, slender strings like any harp, another girl was feeding it with foolscap sheets, which, so soon as they curiously traveled from her on the cords, were withdrawn at the opposite end of the machine by a second girl. They came to the first girl blank; they went to the second girl ruled.

I looked upon the first girl's brow, and saw it was young and fair; I looked upon the second girl's brow, and saw it was ruled and wrinkled. Then, as I still looked, the two—for some small variety to the monotony—changed places; and where had stood the young, fair brow, now stood the ruled and wrinkled one.

Perched high upon a narrow platform, and still higher upon a high stool crowning it, sat another figure serving some other iron animal; while below the platform sat her mate in some sort of reciprocal attendance.

Not a syllable was breathed. Nothing was heard but the low, steady, overruling hum of the iron animals. The human voice was banished from the spot. Machinery—that vaunted slave of humanity—here stood menially served by human beings, who served mutely and cringing as the slave serves the Sultan. The girls did not so much seem accessory wheels to the general machinery as mere cogs to the wheels.

All this scene around me was instantaneously taken in at one sweeping glance—even before I had proceeded to unwind the heavy fur tippet from around my neck. But as soon as this fell from me the dark-complexioned man, standing close by, raised a sudden cry, and seizing my arm, dragged me out into the open air, and without pausing for a word instantly caught up some congealed snow and began rubbing both my cheeks.

"Two white spots like the whites of your eyes," he said; "man, your cheeks are frozen."

"That may well be," muttered I; "'tis some wonder the frost of the Devil's Dungeon strikes in no deeper. Rub away."

Soon a horrible, tearing pain caught at my reviving cheeks. Two gaunt blood-hounds, one on each side, seemed muzzling them. I seemed Actæon.

Presently, when all was over, I re-entered the factory, made known my business, concluded it satisfactorily, and then begged to be conducted throughout the place to view it.

"Cupid is the boy for that," said the dark-complexioned man. "Cupid!" and by this odd fancy-name calling a dimpled, red-cheeked, spirited-looking, forward little fellow, who was rather impudently, I thought, gliding about among the passive-looking girls—like a gold flash through hueless waves—yet doing nothing in particular that I could see, the man bade him lead the stranger through the edifice.

"Come first and see the water-wheel," said this lively lad, with the air of boyishly-brisk importance.

Quitting the folding-room, we crossed some damp, cold boards, and stood beneath a great wet shed, incessantly showering with foam, like the green barnacled bow of some East Indian in a gale. Round and round here went the enormous revolutions of the dark colossal water-wheel, grim with its one immutable purpose.

"This sets our whole machinery a-going, Sir; in every part of all these buildings; where the girls work and all."

I looked, and saw that the turbid waters of Blood River had not changed their hue by coming under the use of man.

"You make only blank paper; no printing of any sort, I suppose? All blank paper, don't you?"

"Certainly; what else should a paper-factory make?"

The lad here looked at me as if suspicious of my common-sense.

"Oh, to be sure!" said I, confused and stammering; "it only struck me as so strange that red waters should turn out pale cheese—paper, I mean."

He took me up a wet and rickety stair to a great light room, furnished with no visible thing but rude, manger-like receptacles running all round its sides; and up to these mangers, like so many mares haltered to the rack, stood rows of girls. Before each was vertically thrust up a long, glittering scythe, immovably fixed at bottom to the manger-edge. The curve of the scythe, and its having no snath to it, made it look exactly like a sword. To and fro, across the sharp edge, the girls forever dragged long strips of rags, washed white, picked from baskets at one side; thus ripping asunder every seam, and converting the tatters almost into lint. The air swam with the fine, poisonous particles, which from all sides darted, subtilely, as motes in sunbeams, into the lungs.

"This is the rag-room," coughed the boy.

"You find it rather stifling here," coughed I, in answer; "but the girls don't cough."

"Oh, they are used to it."

"Where do you get such hosts of rags?" picking up a handful from a basket.

"Some from the country round about; some from far over sea—Leghorn and London."

"'Tis not unlikely, then," murmured I, "that among these heaps of rags there may be some old shirts, gathered from the dormitories of the Paradise of Bachelors. But the buttons are all dropped off. Pray, my lad, do you ever find any bachelor's buttons hereabouts?"

"None grow in this part of the country. The Devil's Dungeon is no place for flowers."

"Oh! you mean the flowers so called—the Bachelor's Buttons?"

"And was not that what you asked about?"

Or did you mean the gold bosom-buttons of our boss, Old Bach, as our whispering girls all call him?"

"The man, then, I saw below is a bachelor, is he?"

"Oh, yes, he's a Bach."

"The edges of those swords, they are turned outward from the girls, if I see right; but their rags and fingers fly so, I can not distinctly see."

"Turned outward."

Yes, murmured I to myself; I see it now; turned outward; and each erected sword is so borne, edge-outward, before each girl. If my reading fails me not, just so, of old, condemned state-prisoners went from the hall of judgment to their doom: an officer before, bearing a sword, its edge turned outward, in significance of their fatal sentence. So, through consumptive pallors of this blank, raggy life, go these white girls to death.

"Those scythes look very sharp," again turning toward the boy.

"Yes; they have, to keep them so. Look!"

That moment two of the girls, dropping their rags, plied each a whet-stone up and down the sword-blade. My unaccustomed blood curdled at the sharp shriek of the tormented steel.

Their own executioners; themselves whetting the very swords that slay them; meditated I.

"What makes those girls so sheet-white, my lad?"

"Why"—with a roguish twinkle, pure ignorant drollery, not knowing heartlessness—"I suppose the handling of such white bits of sheets all the time makes them so sheety."

"Let us leave the rag-room now, my lad."

More tragical and more inscrutably mysterious than any mystic sight, human or machine, throughout the factory, was the strange innocence of cruel-heartedness in this usage-hardened boy.

"And now," said he, cheerily, "I suppose you want to see our great machine, which cost us twelve thousand dollars only last autumn. That's the machine that makes the paper, too. This way, Sir."

Following him, I crossed a large, bespattered place, with two great round vats in it, full of a white, wet, woolly-looking stuff, not unlike the albuminous part of an egg, soft-boiled.

"There," said Cupid, tapping the vats carelessly, "these are the first beginnings of the paper; this white pulp you see. Look how it swims bubbling round and round, moved by the paddle here. From hence it pours from both vats into that one common channel yonder; and so goes, mixed up and leisurely, to the great machine. And now for that."

He led me into a room, stifling with a strange, blood-like, abdominal heat, as if here, true enough, were being finally developed the germinous particles lately seen.

Before me, rolled out like some long Eastern manuscript, lay stretched one continuous length of iron frame-work—multitudinous and mystical, with all sorts of rollers, wheels, and cylinders, in slowly-measured and unceasing motion.

"Here first comes the pulp now," said Cupid, pointing to the highest end of the machine. "See; first it pours out and spreads itself upon this wide, sloping board; and then—look—slides, thin and quivering, beneath the first roller there. Follow on now, and see it as it slides from under that to the next cylinder. There; see how it has become just a very little less pulpy now. One step more, and it grows still more to some slight consistence. Still another cylinder, and it is so knitted—though as yet mere dragon-fly wing—that it forms an air-bridge here, like a suspended cobweb, between two more separated rollers; and flowing over the last one, and under again, and doubling about there out of sight for a minute among all those mixed cylinders you indistinctly see, it reappears here, looking now at last a little less like pulp and more like paper, but still quite delicate and defective yet awhile. But—a little farther onward, Sir, if you please—here now, at this further point, it puts on something of a real look, as if it might turn out to be something you might possibly handle in the end. But it's not yet done, Sir. Good way to travel yet, and plenty more of cylinders must roll it."

"Bless my soul!" said I, amazed at the elongation, interminable convolutions, and deliberate slowness of the machine; "it must take a long time for the pulp to pass from end to end, and come out paper."

"Oh! not so long," smiled the precocious lad, with a superior and patronising air; "only nine minutes. But look; you may try it for yourself. Have you a bit of paper? Ah! here's a bit on the floor. Now mark that with any word you please, and let me dab it on here, and we'll see how long before it comes out at the other end."

"Well, let me see," said I, taking out my pencil; "come, I'll mark it with your name."

Bidding me take out my watch, Cupid adroitly dropped the inscribed slip on an exposed part of the incipient mass.

Instantly my eye marked the second-hand on my dial-plate.

Slowly I followed the slip, inch by inch; sometimes pausing for full half a minute as it disappeared beneath inscrutable groups of the lower cylinders, but only gradually to emerge again; and so, on, and on, and on—inch by inch; new in open sight, aliding along like a freckle on the quivering sheet; and then again wholly vanished; and so, on, and on, and on—inch by inch; all the time the main sheet growing more and more to final firmness—when, suddenly, I saw a sort of paper-fall, not wholly unlike a water-fall; a scissory sound smote my ear, as of some cord being snapped; and down dropped an unfolded sheet of perfect foolscap, with my "Cupid" half faded out of it, and still moist and warm.

My travels were at an end, for here was the end of the machine.

"Well, how long was it?" said Cupid.

"Nine minutes to a second," replied I, watch in hand.

"I told you so."

For a moment a curious emotion filled me, not wholly unlike that which one might experience at the fulfilment of some mysterious prophecy. But how absurd, thought I again; the thing is a mere machine, the essence of which is unvarying punctuality and precision.

Previously absorbed by the wheels and cylinders, my attention was now directed to a sad-looking woman standing by.

"That is rather an elderly person so silently tending the machine—end here. She would not seem wholly used to it either."

"Oh," knowingly whispered Cupid, through the din, "she only came last week. She was a nurse formerly. But the business is poor in these parts, and she's left it. But look at the paper she is piling there."

"Ay, foolscap," handling the piles of moist, warm sheets, which continually were being delivered into the woman's waiting hands. "Don't you turn out any thing but foolscap at this machine?"

"Oh, sometimes, but not often, we turn out finer work—cream-laid and royal sheets, we call them. But foolscap being in chief demand, we turn out foolscap most."

It was very curious. Looking at that blank paper continually dropping, dropping, dropping, my mind ran on in wonderings of those strange uses to which those thousand sheets eventually would be put. All sorts of writings would be writ on those now vacant things—sermons, lawyers' briefs, physicians' prescriptions, love-letters, marriage certificates, bills of divorce, registers of births, death-warrants, and so on, without end. Then, recurring back to them as they here lay all blank, I could not but bethink me of that celebrated comparison of John Locke, who, in demonstration of his theory that man had no innate ideas, compared the human mind at birth to a sheet of blank paper; something destined to be scribbled on, but what sort of characters no soul might tell.

Facing slowly to and fro along the involved machine, still humming with its play, I was struck as well by the inevitability as the evolution-power in all its motions.

"Does that thin cobweb there," said I, pointing to the sheet in its more imperfect stage, "does that never tear or break? It is marvellous fragile, and yet this machine it passes through is so mighty."

"It never is known to tear a hair's point."

"Does it never stop—get clogged?"

"No. It must go. The machinery makes it go just so; just that very way, and at that very pace you there plainly see it go. The pulp can't help going."

Something of awe now stole over me, as I gazed upon this inflexible iron animal. Always, more or less, machinery of this ponderous, elaborate sort strikes, in some moods, strange dread into the human heart, as some living, panting Behemoth might. But what made the thing I saw so specially terrible to me was the metallic necessity, the unbudging fatality which governed it. Though, here and there, I could not follow the thin, gauzy veil of pulp in the course of its more mysterious or entirely invisible advance, yet it was indubitable that, at those points where it eluded me, it still marched on in unvarying docility to the autocratic cunning of the machine. A fascination fastened on me. I stood spell-bound and wandering in my soul. Before my eyes—there, passing in slow procession along the wheeling cylinders, I seemed to see, glued to the pallid incipience of the pulp, the yet more pallid faces of all the pallid girls I had eyed that heavy day. Slowly, mournfully, beseechingly, yet unresistingly, they gleamed along, their agony dimly outlined on the imperfect paper, like the print of the tormented face on the handkerchief of Saint Veronica.

"Hallo! the heat of the room is too much for you," cried Cupid, staring at me.

"No—I am rather chill, if any thing."

"Come out, Sir—out—out," and, with the protecting air of a careful father, the precocious lad hurried me outside.

In a few moments, feeling revived a little, I went into the folding-room—the first room I had entered, and where the desk for transacting business stood, surrounded by the blank counters and blank girls engaged at them.

"Cupid here has led me a strange tour," said I to the dark-complexioned man before mentioned, whom I had ere this discovered not only to be an old bachelor, but also the principal proprietor. "Yours is a most wonderful factory. Your great machine is a miracle of inscrutable intricacy."

"Yes, all our visitors think it so. But we don't have many. We are in a very out-of-the-way corner here. Few inhabitants, too. Most of our girls come from far-off villages."

"The girls," echoed I, glancing round at their silent forms. "Why is it, Sir, that in most factories, female operatives, of whatever age, are indiscriminately called girls, never women?"

"Oh! as to that—why, I suppose, the fact of their being generally unmarried—that's the reason, I should think. But it never struck me before. For our factory here, we will not have married women; they are apt to be off-and-on too much. We want none but steady workers: twelve hours to the day, day after day, through the three hundred and sixty-five days, excepting Sundays, Thanksgiving, and Fast-days. That's our rule. And so, having no married women, what females we have are rightly enough called girls."

"Then these are all maids," said I, while some pained homage to their pale virginkiness made me involuntarily bow.

"All maids."

Again the strange emotion filled me.

"Your cheeks look whitish yet, Sir," said the man, gazing at me narrowly. "You must be careful going home. Do they pain you at all now? It's a bad sign, if they do."

"No doubt, Sir," answered I, "when once I have got out of the Devil's Dungeon, I shall feel them mending."

"Ah, yes; the winter air in valleys, or gorges, or any sunken place, is far colder and more bitter than elsewhere. You would hardly believe it now, but it is colder here than at the top of Woodolor Mountain."

"I dare say it is, Sir. But time presses me; I must depart."

With that, remuffling myself in dread-naught and tippet, thrusting my hands into my huge seal-skin mittens, I sallied out into the nipping air, and found poor Black, my horse, all cringing and doubled up with the cold.

Soon, wrapped in furs and meditations, I ascended from the Devil's Dungeon.

At the Black Notch I paused, and once more bethought me of Temple-Bar. Then, shooting through the pass, all alone with inscrutable nature, I exclaimed—Oh! Paradise of Bachelors! and oh! Tartarus of Maids!

THE HIGHWAYMAN'S BRIDAL.

THE early years of the reign of George III. was the time of those gallant robbers, whose fine clothes, high bearing, reckless hardihood, and (frequently) good birth, took away from the superficial observer much of the darkness of the crime actually surrounding their deeds and lives. You were divested of your rings and purses, often with a demeanor so polished, that really it rather resembled paying a toll to good manners than submitting to a highway robbery; a robbery, it is true, yet still it was more soothing to the feelings at the time, than being knocked down with the butt-end of a pistol, or bullied as well as plundered. Fashion, too, capricious in this as in all else, affected some knights of the road above others, and fine ladies interested themselves amazingly about the deeds of highwaymen, conspicuous for handsome persons and brave conduct, or rather, daring villainy. These fair dames also were much concerned in their heroes' final incarcerations and exits at the fatal tree of Tyburn. But highwaymen had, as every body knows, been still more popular in the preceding reign; yet ever and anon as the profession seemed to be on the verge of decay, and likely to dwindle down into mere commonplace theft and murder, some new candidate was sure to start up and revive the dying embers of the road chivalry. One in particular was notorious enough in his brief day for most of the qualities I have described, as sometimes attributes of these knights of the road. He was well-connected, too, his uncle being a clergyman in a high church appointment. His person was elegant, his manners courtly, and he was rash in an extraordinary degree. Mingling freely in fashionable society in his real name, his deeds of robbery were the talk of the town under his assumed one. His proper designation was Richard Mowbray—that belonging to the road, his sole source of revenue, was Captain de Montmorency—a patronymic high-sounding enough. I do not mean, however, to infer that any suspected the man of fashion and the highwayman to be one and the same person; that was never known till the event which I am going to relate took place.

Richard Mowbray had spent his own small patrimony, years before the period at which this narrative commences, in the pleasures of the town; it had melted in ridottos, play-houses, faro, horse-flesh, and hazard; he had exhausted the kindness and forbearance of his relations, from whom he had borrowed and begged, till borrowing or begging became impracticable. He had known most extremes of life; and, moreover, when debts and poverty stared him grimly in the face, he knew not one useful art by which he could support existence, or pay dividends to his creditors. What was to be done? He eluded a jail as long as he could, and one eventful night, riding on horseback, and meditating gloomily on his evil fortunes, he met—covered by the darkness from all discovery—a traveler well mounted—plethoric—laden with money-bags, and bearing likewise the burden of excessive fear.

It was a sudden thought—acted upon as suddenly. Resistance was not dreamed of. Mowbray made off with his booty, considerable enough to repair his exhausted finances, and to pay his most pressing creditors. It was literally robbing Peter to pay Paul. And so by night, under shelter of its darkness, did the ruined gentleman become the highwayman. People who knew his circumstances whispered their surprise when it became known that Richard Mowbray had paid his debts, and that he himself made more than his customary appearance. Now his fine person was ever clad in the newest braveries of the day; and in his double character many a conquest did he make, for he disburdened ladies of their jewels and purses with so fine a manner, that the defrauded fair ones forgot their losses in admiration of the charming despoiler; and Richard, in both his phases, drank deep draughts of pleasure, till he drained the Circean cup to its veriest dregs. Just as even pleasure became wearisome, when festive and high-bred delights palled on his sated passions, and the lower extremes of licentiousness and hard drinking, ruffling and fighting, diversified by the keen excitement and threats of danger, which distinguished his predatory existence began to satiate, a new light broke on the feverish atmosphere of his life. He loved. Yes! Richard Mowbray, the ruined patrician. De Montmorency, the gallant highwayman, who had hitherto resisted every good or evil influence which Love, pure or earth-stained, offers to his votaries, succumbed to the simple charms of a young, unlearned, unambitious girl; so youthful, that even her tastes and habits, childish as they were, could be scarcely more so than suited her years. Flavia Hardcourt had just attained her sixteenth year—had never been to a boarding-school, and loved nothing so much—even her birds and pet rabbits—as her dear old father, an honest country gentleman, and a worthy magistrate. Flavia had never been even to London, for Mr. Hardcourt resided at Aveling—a retired village, about twenty miles from the metropolis. Barring fox-hunting and hard drinking, the old gentleman, on his side, took pleasure only in the pretty, gentle girl, who, from the hour of her birth—which event terminated her mother's existence—had made her his constant playmate and companion. And it was to this simple wild flower that the gay man of pleasure, haughty, reckless, unprincipled, improvident, irreligious, and rash, presumed to lift his eyes, to elevate his heart; and, oh, stranger still! to this being, the moral antipodes of her pure self, did Flavia Hardcourt surrender her youthful, modest, inestimable love. It must have been her very childishness and purity that attracted the desperate robber—the hardened libertine, now about to commit his worst and most inexcusable crime. He had accidentally met Mr. Hardcourt at a county hunt—had, with others of his companions, been invited by that honest gentleman to a rustic fête, in honor of little Flavia's natal day—a day, he was wont to observe, to him remarkable for commemorating his greatest misfortune, and his intensest happiness; and then and there the highwayman vowed to win and wear that pure bud of innocent freshness and rare fragrance, or to perish in the attempt. Master Richard Mowbray! unscrupulous De Montmorency! I will relate how you kept your vow.

He haunted Aveling Grange till the chaste young heart, the old father's beloved darling, surrendered itself into the highwayman's keeping. Perhaps Mr. Hardcourt was not altogether best pleased at Flavia's choice; but then she was his life—his hope—and he trusted, even when he gave her to a husband, that her love and doting affection would still be his own: besides, Mowbray was well connected—boasted of his wealth; whereas a very moderate portion would be here—was received in modish circles, into which the good old magistrate could never pretend to penetrate; and, in short, what with his high bearing, his handsome person, and insinuating tongue, Mr. Hardcourt had irrevocably promised to bestow his treasure into the keeping of the profligate, who numbered himself almost years enough to have been the father of the young girl, whom he testified the utmost impatience to call wife.

It was during the time that Mr. Mowbray was paying his court at Aveling, that the neighborhood began to be alarmed by a series of highway robberies, which men said could have been perpetrated but by that celebrated knight of the road—Captain De Montmorency. No one could stir after nightfall without an attack, in which numbers certainly were not wanting.

"Cudgel me, but we'll have him yet," said old Mr. Hardcourt. "I should glory myself in going to Tyburn to see the fellow turned off."

Ay, and I would take my little Flavia to see him go by in the cart, with a parson and a nosegay; eh, my little girl?"

"Oh, no, father," said Flavia, "I could not abide it, though he is such a daring, wicked man, whose name makes me shrink with fear and terror whenever I hear it. I could never bear to see such a dreadful sight—it would haunt me till my death."

Does the gift of prophecy, involuntarily though it be, lurk within us yet? Does the soul dimly shadow out its own fate, or rather that of its frail and perishable habitation? Sweet Flavia! unsuspecting, innocent girl! your lips then pronounced your own doom, as irrevocably as though you had been some stern Sibyl, delivering inscrutable, unquestioned oracles, not a fair child as you were when I first saw you in your girlish frock and sash. Your brown hair curling down your straight glossy shoulders, your soft eyes shining through your blushes, like diamonds glittering among the freshest of roses. Sweet Flavia, I have lived to see my kindred dust heaped on your fresh young form, and old and withered now, I can not but remember the glow of your sweet, unstained youth, radiant in unforeseeing love, happiness, and joy.

The betrothed pair were together to visit London.

"But I shall not dare," said the girl, as walking together in the old-fashioned Dutch garden, she leant her young sinless head on her guilty lover's breast; "I shall not dare take such a journey, for fear of the highwayman, De Montmorency."

"Fear not, my sweet Flavia; this breast shall be pierced through ere De Montmorency shall cause one fear in thine."

"Richard, sweetest, why do you leave us so early every evening? At sunset, I have remarked. These are not London habits. Ah, does any other than your poor Flavia attract you? Oh, Richard, I must die if it should be so! I could not live, and know you were false."

"Sweetest, and best! my purest love, could any win me from you? were it a queen, think it not. I—I—the truth is, Flavia, I have a poor sick friend not far from here; he is poor, ill, and—I—I—"

"Say no more, dearest. Oh, how much more I love you every day! How good, how noble, thus to sacrifice!" And the blushing girl threw herself into her lover's arms.

Ah! how differently beat those two human hearts. One pregnant with love, goodness, charity, sympathy; the other rank with hypocrisy, dark with unbelief.

They came to town, unmolested, you may be sure; the stranger, because a few days previously a terrible affair had occurred. Old Lord St. Hilary, the relic of the beau-garçons of former days, had been robbed and maltreated. Men were by no means so favored as the beau-sexe. Above all, a family jewel of immense value had been taken from his person; and on recovering his wounds and fright, he swore vengeance. He took active measures to fulfill his vow.

Flavia came to us, to be measured for wedding clothes. She was then the impersonation of radiant happiness. I was much struck with her, and with the handsome, dark-browed swarthy gentleman who accompanied her and her friend, an old lady cousin to her father, at whose house the nuptial ceremony was to take place. The clothes were finished; saffron satin robes, according to a fancy of the bridegroom's, who was fond of the classics in his youthful days; orange blossoms wreath.

The wedding was to take place at the old relation's, Mrs. Duchesne's house; and on lagging wings, that day at length arrived. The marriage was celebrated, and the happy pair were in the act of being toasted by the father of the bride, when a strange noise was heard below; rude voices were upraised; oaths muttered; a rush toward the festive saloon. The company rose.

"What is it?" said Mr. Harcourt.

The door was broken open for answer. The officers of justice filled the room. Two advanced. "Come, Captain," said they, "the game is up at last. It's an awkward time to arrest a gentleman on his wedding-day; but duty, my noble Captain, duty, must be done."

Entranced, frozen beyond resistance or appeal, the bridegroom was fettered; and the bride! she stood there, her hazel eyes dilating, till they seemed about to spring from her head.

"My Richard! what is this?"

"Scoundrels!" said Mr. Harcourt, "release my son."

The men laughed. One of them was examining the necklace of Flavia; it contained a diamond in the centre, worth a ransom. "Where did you get this, miss?" he said.

Her friends answered, for the terror-stricken girl was inarticulate, "Mr. Mowbray's wedding-gift."

"Oh, oh! This was the diamond Lord St. Hilary was so mad about. By your leave," and the gem was removed from the neck it encircled.

She comprehended something terrible. She found speech: "Whom do you take Mr. Mowbray for?" said she.

"Whom? why the renowned Captain de Montmorency."

A shriek—so fierce in its agony as to cause the criminal to rebound—struck on the ears of all present: insensibility followed, and Flavia was removed. So was her bridegroom—to Newgate.

The trial was concluded—justice was appeased—the robber was doomed. And his innocent and unpolluted victim—. For days her life had hung on a thread. But youth and health closed for a short time the gates of death. She recovered. Reviving as from a dreadful dream, she could scarcely believe in the terrible event which, tornado-like, had swept over her. She desired her father to repeat its circumstances. Weeping, and his venerable gray hairs whiter with sorrow, Mr. Hardcourt complied. She heard the recital in silence. Presently clasping her father's hand, "Dear parent," she said, "when—when?" She could utter no more; nor was it necessary; he comprehended her meaning but too well.

"The day after to-morrow," he replied.

"Father, I must be there."

"My Flavia, my dearest daughter!"

"Father, I must be there! Do you remember your jest? Ah, it has come to pass in bitter earnest. I must be there!"

Nor would she be pacified; she persisted. Her physician at length urged them to give her her way. It would, he said, be less dangerous than denial.

Near Tyburn seats were erected. Windows, balconies to be let out on hire. One of these last, the most private, was secured; and on the fatal morning Flavia was taken thither in a close carriage, accompanied by her parent and her aged cousin. She shed no tears, heaved not a single sigh, and suffered herself to be led to the window with strange immovable calmness. Soon shouts and the swelling murmur of a dense crowd reached her ears. The procession was arriving. The gallows was not in sight, but the fatal cart would pass close. It came on nearer, nearer—more like a triumph, that dismal sight, than a human fellow-man hastening to eternity.

She clenched her hands, she rose up, straining her fair white throat to catch a glance of the criminal. Yes, there he was, dressed gayly, the ominous nosegay flaunting in his breast, dull despair in his heart, reaching from thence to his face. As the train passed Flavia's window, by chance he raised his hot, bleared eyes; they rested on his bride, his pure virgin wife. The wretched man uttered a yell of agony, and cast himself down on the boards of the vehicle. She continued gazing, the smile frozen on her face, her eyes glassy, motionless, fixed.

They never recovered their natural intelligence. Fixed and stony, they bore her, stricken lamb, from the dismal scene. Her old father watched for days by her bedside, eagerly waiting for a ray of light, a token of sense, or sound. None came. She had been stricken with catalepsy, and it was a blessing when the enchained spirit was released from its frail habitation—when the pure soul was permitted to take its flight to happier regions. Poor Mr. Hardcourt sunk shortly after into a state of childish imbecility, and soon father and daughter slept in one grave.

VAMPIRES.

OF all the creations of superstition, a Vampire is, perhaps, the most horrible. You are lying in your bed at night, thinking of nothing but sleep, when you see, by the faint light that is in your bed-chamber, a shape entering at the door, and gliding toward you with a long sigh, as of the wind across the open fields when darkness has fallen upon them. The thing moves along the air as if by the mere act of volition; and it has a human visage and figure. The eyes stare wildly from the head; the hair is bristling; the flesh is livid; the mouth is bloody.

You lie still—like one under the influence of the night-mare—and the thing floats slowly over you. Presently you fall into a dead sleep or swoon, returning, up to the latest moment of consciousness, the fixed and glassy stare of the phantom. When you awake in the morning, you think it is all a dream, until you perceive a small, blue, deadly-looking spot on your chest near the heart; and the truth flashes on you. You say nothing of the matter to your friends; but you know you are a doomed man—and you know rightly. For every night comes the terrible Shape to your bedside, with a face that seems horrified at itself, and sucks your life-blood in your sleep. You feel it is useless to endeavor to avoid the visitation, by changing your room or your locality: you are under a sort of cloud of fate.

Day after day you grow paler and more languid: your face becomes livid, your eyes leaden, your cheeks hollow. Your friends advise you to seek medical aid—to take change of air—to amuse your mind; but you are too well aware that it is all in vain. You therefore keep your fearful secret to yourself; and pine, and droop, and languish, till you die. When you are dead (if you will be so kind as to suppose yourself in that predicament), the most horrible part of the business commences. You are then yourself forced to become a Vampire, and to create fresh victims; who, as they die, add to the phantom stock.

The belief in Vampyres appears to have been most prevalent in the southeast of Europe, and to have had its origin there. Modern Greece was its cradle; and among the Hungarians, Poles, Wallachians, and other Slavonic races bordering on Greece, have been its chief manifestations. The early Christians of the Greek Church believed that the bodies of all the Latin Christians buried in Greece were unable to decay, because of their excommunication from that fold of which the Emperor of Russia now claims to be the sovereign Pope and supreme Shepherd. The Latins, of course, in their turn, regarded these peculiar mummies as nothing less than saints; but the orthodox Greeks conceived that the dead body was animated by a demon who caused it to rise from its grave every night, and conduct itself after the fashion of a huge mosquito. These dreadful beings were called Brucolacs; and, according to some accounts, were not merely manufactured from the dead bodies of heretics, but from those of all wicked people who have died impenitent. They would appear in divers places in their natural forms; would run a muck indiscriminately at whomsoever they met, like a wild Malay; would injure some, and kill others outright; would occasionally, for a change, do some one a good service; but would, for the most part, so conduct themselves that nothing could possibly be more aggravating or unpleasant. Father Richard, a French Jesuit of the seventeenth century, who went as a missionary to the Archipelago, and who has left us an account of the Island of Santerini, or Saint Irene, the Thera of the ancients, discourses largely on the subject of Brucolacs. He says, that when the persecutions of the Vampyres become intolerable, the graves of the offending parties are opened, when the bodies are found entire and uncorrupted; that they are then cut up into little bits, particularly the heart; and that, after this, the apparitions are seen no more, and the body decays.

The word Brucolac, we are told, is derived from two modern Greek words, signifying, respectively, "mud," and "a ditch," because the graves of the Vampyres were generally found full of mud. Voltaire, in the article on Vampyres in his Philosophical Dictionary, gives a similar account of these spectres. He observes, in his exquisite, bantering style: "These dead Greeks enter houses, and suck the blood of little children; eating the suppers of the fathers and mothers, drinking their wine, and breaking all the furniture. They can be brought to reason only by being burnt—when they are caught; but the precaution must be taken not to resort to this measure until the heart has been torn out, as that must be consumed apart from the body." What a weight of meaning and implied satire is there in that phrase, "They can be brought to reason only by being burnt!" It is a comment upon universal history.

Pierre Daniel Huet, a French writer of Ana, who died in seventeen hundred and twenty-one, says, that it is certain that the idea of Vampyres, whether true or false, is very ancient, and that the classical authors are full of it. He remarks, that when the ancients had murdered any one in a treacherous manner, they cut off his feet, hands, nose, and ears, and hung them round his neck or under his arm-pits; conceiving that by these means they deprived their victim of the power of taking vengeance. Huet adds, that proof of this may be found in the Greek Scholia of Sophocles; and that it was after this fashion that Menelaus treated Deiphobus, the husband of Helen—the victim having been discovered by Æneas in the infernal regions in the above state. He also mentions the story of Hermotimus of Clazomene, whose soul had a power of detaching itself from its body, for the sake of wandering through distant countries, and looking into the secrets of futurity. During one of these spiritual journeys, his enemies persuaded his wife to have the body burned; and his soul, upon the next return, finding its habitation not forthcoming, withdrew forever after. According to Suetonius, the body of Caligula, who had been violently murdered, was but partially burned and superficially buried. In consequence of this, the house in which he had been slain, and the garden in which the imperfect cremation had taken place, were every night haunted with ghosts, which continued to appear until the house was burned down, and the funeral rites properly performed by the sisters of the deceased emperor. It is asserted by ancient writers that the souls of the dead are unable to repose until after the body has been entirely consumed; and Huet informs us that the corpses of those excommunicated by the modern Greek Church are called Toupi, a word signifying "a drum," because the said bodies are popularly supposed to swell like a drum, and to sound like the same, if struck or rolled on the ground. Some writers have supposed that the ancient idea of Harpies gave rise to the modern idea of Vampyres.

Traces of the Vampyre belief may be found in the extreme north—even in remote Iceland. In that curious piece of old Icelandic history, called The Eyrbyggja-Saga, of which Sir Walter Scott has given an abstract, we find two narrations which, though not identical with the modern Greek conception of Brucolacs, have certainly considerable affinity with it. The first of these stories is to the following effect:—Thorolf Bagifot, or the Crookfooted, was an old Icelandic chieftain of the tenth century, unenviably notorious for his savage and treacherous disposition, which involved him in continual broils, not only with his neighbors, but even with his own son, who was noted for justice and generosity. Having been frustrated in one of his knavish designs, and seeing no farther chance open to him, Thorolf returned home one evening, mad with rage and vexation, and, refusing to partake of any supper, sat down at the head of the table like a stone statue, and so remained without stirring or speaking a word. The servants retired to rest; but yet Thorolf did not move. In the morning, every one was horrified to find him still sitting in the same place and attitude; and it was whispered that the old man had died after a manner peculiarly dreadful to the Icelanders—though what may be the precise nature of this death is very doubtful. It was feared that the spirit of Thorolf would not rest in its grave unless some extraordinary precautions were taken; and accordingly his son Arnkill, upon being sent for, approached the body in such a manner as to avoid looking upon the face, and at the same time enjoined the domestics to observe the like caution. The corpse was then removed from the chair (in doing which, great force was found necessary), the face was concealed by a veil, and the usual religious rites were performed. A breach was next made in the wall behind the chair in which the corpse had been found; and the body, being carried through it with immense labor, was laid in a strongly-built tomb. All in vain. The spirit of the malignant old chief haunted the neighborhood both night and day; killing men and cattle, and keeping every one in continual terror. The pest at length became unendurable; and Arnkill resolved to remove his father's body to some other place

On opening the tomb, the corpse of Thorolf was found with so ghastly an aspect, that he seemed more like a devil than a man; and other astonishing and fearful circumstances soon manifested themselves. Two strong oxen were yoked to the bier on which the body was placed; but they were very shortly exhausted by the weight of their burden. Fresh beasts were then attached; but, upon reaching the top of a steep hill, they were seized with a sudden and uncontrollable terror, and, dashing frantically away, rolled headlong into the valley, and were killed. At every mile, moreover, the body became of a still greater weight; and it was now found impossible to carry it any farther, though the contemplated place of burial was still distant. The attendants therefore consigned it to the earth on the ridge of the hill, an immense mound was piled over it, and the spirit of the old man remained for a time at rest. But "after the death of Arnkill," says Sir Walter Scott, "Bægifot became again troublesome, and walked forth from his tomb, to the great terror and damage of the neighborhood, slaying both herds and domestics, and driving the inhabitants from the canton. It was therefore resolved to consume his carcase with fire; for, like the Hungarian Vampyre, he, or some evil demon in his stead, made use of his mortal relics as a vehicle during the commission of these enormities. The body was found swollen to a huge size, equaling the corpulence of an ox. It was transported to the sea-shore with difficulty, and there burned to ashes." In this narrative, we miss the blood-sucking propensities of the genuine Vampyre; but in all other respects the resemblance is complete.

The other story from the same source has relation to a certain woman named Thorgunna. This excellent old lady having, a short time previous to her death, appointed one Thorodd her executor, and the wife of the said Thorodd having covetously induced her husband to preserve some bed-furniture which the deceased particularly desired to have burnt, a series of ghost-visits ensued. Thorgunna requested that her body might be conveyed to a distant place called Skalholt; and on the way thither her ghost appeared at a house where the funeral party put up. But the worst visitations occurred on the return of Thorodd to his own house. On the very night when he reached his domicile, a meteor resembling a half-moon glided round the walls of the apartment in a direction opposed to the apparent course of the sun (an ominous sign), and remained visible until the inmates went to bed. The spectral appearance continued throughout the week; and then one of the herdsmen went mad, evidently under the persecutions of evil spirits. At length he was found dead in his bed; and, shortly after, Thorer, one of the inmates of the house, going out in the evening, was seized by the ghost of the dead shepherd, and so injured by blows, that he died. His spirit then went into partnership with that of the herdsman, and together they played some very awkward and alarming pranks. A pestilence appeared, of which many of the neighbors died; and one evening something in the shape of a seal-fish lifted itself up through the flooring of Thorodd's house, and gazed around.

The terrified domestics having in vain struck at the apparition, which continued to rise through the floor, Kiartan, the son of Thorodd, smote it on the head with a hammer, and drove it gradually and reluctantly into the earth, like a stake. Subsequently, Thorodd and several of his servants were drowned; and now their ghosts were added to the spectral group. Every evening, when the fire was lighted in the great hall, Thorodd and his companions would enter, drenched and dripping, and seat themselves close to the blaze, from which they very selfishly excluded all the living inmates; while, from the other side of the apartment, the ghosts of those who had died of pestilence, and who appeared gray with dust, would bend their way toward the same comfortable nook, under the leadership of Thorer. This being a very awkward state of affairs in a climate like Iceland, Kiartan, who was now the master of the house, caused a separate fire to be kindled for the mortals in an out-house, leaving the great hall to the spectres; with which arrangement their ghostships seemed to be satisfied. The deaths from the pestilence continued to increase; and every death caused an addition to the phantom army.

Matters had now reached so serious a pitch, that it was found absolutely necessary to take some steps against the disturbers of the neighborhood. It was accordingly resolved to proceed against them by law; but, previously to commencing the legal forms, Kiartan caused the unfortunate bed-furniture, which had been at the bottom of all the mischief, to be burnt in sight of the spectres. A jury was then formed in the great hall; the ghosts were accused of being public nuisances within the meaning of the act in that case made and provided; evidence was heard, and finally a sentence of ejectment was pronounced. Upon this, the phantoms rose; and, protesting that they had only sat there while it was lawful for them to do so, sullenly and mutteringly withdrew, with many symptoms of unwillingness. A priest then damped the room with holy-water—a solemn mass was performed, and the supernatural visitors were thenceforth non est inventus.

The incident of the seal in this narrative will remind the reader who has properly studied his Corsican Brothers—and (as it is customary to ask on these occasions) who has not?—of the appearance of the ghost of the duelist as he comes gliding through the floor to the tremulous music of the fiddles. The whole tale, in fact, falls in a great measure into the general class of ghost stories; but the circumstance of each person, as he died, adding to the array of the evil spirits, and thus spreading out the mischief in ever-widening circles, has an affinity to the distinguishing feature of the Brucolac superstition. Still, for the perfect specimen of the genus Vampyre, we must revert to the southeast of Europe.

Sir Walter Scott says that the above "is the only instance in which the ordinary administration of justice has been supposed to extend over the inhabitants of another world, and in which the business of exorcising spirits is transferred from the priest to the judge."

Voltaire, however, in treating of Vampyres, mentions a similar instance. "It is in my mind," says the French wit and philosopher, "a curious fact, that judicial proceedings were taken, in due form of law, concerning those dead who had left their tombs to suck the blood of the little boys and girls of the neighborhood. Calmet relates that in Hungary two officers appointed by the Emperor Charles the Sixth, assisted by the bailiff of the place, and the executioner, went to bring to trial a Vampyre who sucked all the neighborhood, and who had died six weeks before. He was found in his tomb, fresh, gay, with his eyes open, and asking for food. The bailiff pronounced his sentence, and the executioner tore out his heart and burnt it: after which the Vampyre ate no more."

Voltaire's levity has here carried him (inadvertently, of course) with a smiling face into a very appalling region. It is an historical fact that a sort of Vampyre fever or epidemic spread through the whole southeast of Europe, from about the year seventeen hundred and twenty-seven to seventeen hundred and thirty-five. This took place more especially in Servia and Hungary; with respect to its manifestations in which latter country, Calmet, the celebrated author of the History of the Bible, has left an account in his Dissertations on the Ghosts and Vampyres of Hungary. A terrible infection appeared to have seized upon the people, who died by hundreds under the belief that they were haunted by these dreadful phantoms. Military commissions were issued for inquiring into the matter; and the graves of the alleged Vampyres being opened in the presence of medical men, some of the bodies were found undecomposed, with fresh skin and nails growing in the place of the old, with florid complexions, and with blood in the chest and abdomen. Of the truth of these allegations there can be no reasonable doubt, as they rest upon the evidence both of medical and military men; and the problem seems to admit of only one solution. Dr. Herbert Mayo, in his Letters on the Truths contained in Popular Superstitions, suggests that the superstitious belief in Vampirism, acting upon persons of nervous temperaments, predisposed them to fall into the condition called death-trance; that in that state they were hastily buried; and that, upon the graves being opened, they were found still alive, though unable to speak. In confirmation of this ghastly suggestion, Dr. Mayo quotes the following most pathetic and frightful account of a Vampyre execution from an old German writer: "When they opened his grave, after he had been long buried, his face was found with a color, and his features made natural sorts of movements, as if the dead man smiled. He even opened his mouth as if he would inhale the fresh air. They held the crucifix before him, and called in a loud voice, 'See, this is Jesus Christ who redeemed your soul from hell, and died for you.' After the sound had acted on his organs of hearing, and he had connected perhaps some ideas with it, tears began to flow from the dead man's eyes. Finally, when, after a short prayer for his poor soul, they proceeded to hack off his head, the corpse uttered a screech, and turned and rolled just as if it had been alive—and the grave was full of blood." The wretched man most assuredly was alive; but Superstition has neither brain nor heart; and so it murdered him.

A story similar to the foregoing has been preserved by Sergeant Mainard, a lawyer of the reign of Charles the First; and may be here repeated as a curious instance of the hold which the most puerile superstitions maintained in England at a comparatively recent period, and the influence which they were allowed to exercise even in so grave a matter as a trial for murder. In the year sixteen hundred and twenty-nine, somewhere in Hertfordshire, a married woman, named Joan Norcot, was found in bed with her throat cut; and, although the inquest which was held upon her body terminated in a verdict of felo-de-se, a rumor got about that the deceased had been murdered. The body was accordingly taken out of the grave thirty days after its death, in the presence of the jury and many other persons; and the jury then changed their verdict (which had not been drawn into form by the coroner), and accused certain parties of willful murder. These were tried at the Hertford Assizes and acquitted; "but," says the Sergeant, "so much against the evidence, that the Judge (Harvy) let fall his opinion that it were better an appeal were brought than so foul a murder should escape unpunished." In consequence of this, "they were tried on the appeal, which was brought by the young child against his father, grandfather, and aunt, and her husband, Okeman; and, because the evidence was so strange, I took exact and particular notice of it. It was as followeth, viz.: After the matters above mentioned and related, an ancient and grave person, minister of the parish where the fact was committed, being sworn to give evidence, according to the custom, deposed, that the body being taken out of the grave, thirty days after the party's death, and lying on the grass, and the four defendants present, they were required, each of them, to touch the dead body. Okeman's wife fell on her knees, and prayed God to show token of their innocency, or to some such purpose; but her very [i.e., precise] words I forgot. The appellers did touch the dead body; whereupon, the brow of the dead, which was of a livid or carrion color (that was the verbal expression in the terms of the witness), began to have a dew or gentle sweat, which ran down in drops on the face, and the brow turned and changed to a lively and fresh color, and the dead opened one of her eyes, and shut it again; and this opening the eye was done three several times. She likewise thrust out the ring or marriage-finger three times, and pulled it in again; and the finger dropt blood from it on the grass." This being confirmed by the witness's brother, also a clergyman; and other evidence (of a more human character, but, as it appears to us, very insufficient) having been adduced, Okeman was acquitted, and the three other prisoners were found guilty: a result which there can be little question was mainly brought about by the monstrous story of the scene at the exhumation. That the details of that story were exaggerated, according to the superstitious habit of the times, seems obvious; but the query arises, whether the body of the woman might not really have been alive. It is true that thirty days had elapsed since her apparent death; but some of the alleged Vampyres supposed by Dr. Mayo to have been buried alive had been in their graves three months when their condition was inspected. Not being possessed of the requisite medical knowledge, we will forbear to pronounce whether or not life could be sustained, under such circumstances, for so great a length of time; but what seems fatal to the supposition, in the last instance, is the fact of the woman having had her throat cut.

Vampyres have often been introduced into romance. There is an old Anglo-Saxon poem on the subject of a Vampyre of the Fens; and the Baron von Haxthausen, in his work on Transcaucasia, has told a story of one of these gentry, which may be here appended as a sort of pleasant burlesque after the foregoing tragedies: "There once dwelt in a cavern in Armenia a Vampyre, called Dakhanavar, who could not endure any one to penetrate into the mountains of Ulmish Altstem, or count their valleys. Every one who attempted this had, in the night, his blood sucked by the monster from the soles of his feet until he died. The Vampyre was, however, at last outwitted by two cunning fellows. They began to count the valleys, and when night came on they lay down to sleep—taking care to place themselves with the feet of the one under the head of the other." (How both could have managed to do this, we leave to the reader's ingenuity to explain.) "In the night the monster came, felt as usual, and found a head; then he felt at the other end, and found a head there also. 'Well,' cried he, 'I have gone through the whole three hundred and sixty-six valleys of these mountains, and have sucked the blood of people without end; but never yet did I find any one with two heads and no feet!' So saying, he ran away, and was never more seen in that country; but ever after the people have known that the mountain has three hundred and sixty-six valleys."

In South America a species of bat is found which sucks the blood of people while asleep (lulling them with the fanning of its wings during the operation), and which is called the Vampyre bat from that circumstance. If this creature belonged to Europe, we should be inclined to regard it as the origin of the Vampyre fable.

THE UNITED STATES.

CONGRESS closed its session on the 4th of March. On the 17th of February the President sent in a message vetoing the bill providing for the payment of claims of American citizens for spoliation committed by the French prior to 1801. The President denies that there is any just indebtedness on the part of the United States to these claimants, and rehearses somewhat in detail the history of the treaties upon which the claims are supported. The President insists, as the result of his examination of the whole subject, that the government of the United States has never renounced any of the claims of American citizens against France, and that they are still to be presented and urged against that government if they are just at all; but he does not concede that any such claims exist which have not already been liquidated. In the House of Representatives on the 20th, after some discussion of the message, the vote taken on the passage of the bill, notwithstanding the President's objections, resulted as follows: ayes 118, nays 80; the ayes not reaching two-thirds, the bill was lost.—A bill passed the House of Representatives on the 18th, making an increase in the annual appropriation from $385,000 to $350,000 to the proprietors of the Collins line of Liverpool steamers for mail service, and repealing that clause of the present contract, which puts it in the power of Congress to terminate the engagement upon giving six months' notice of its intention; the vote on the passage of the bill was 92 to 82. It came up in the Senate on the 27th, and was discussed through the day. On the next day a motion to strike out the clause depriving Congress of the power to terminate the contract was negatived, 25 to 24, and the bill was then passed by a vote of 26 to 22. On the 3d of March the President sent in a message vetoing the bill. In this document it was stated that the whole amount paid by the government to the proprietors of the line since the commencement of the service in April, 1850, was two millions six hundred and twenty thousand dollars, while the amount of postages paid into the Department was only seven hundred and thirty-four thousand. By the act of 1852 the compensation of the Company was largely increased, and they were at the same time released from some of the stipulations into which they had entered for the advantage of the government in this service. Congress reserved to itself the right to repeal this contract upon giving six months' notice; and this right the President thinks is one which ought not to be surrendered. The bill, he says, would bestow additional privileges upon the contractors without any corresponding advantage to the government, which receives no sufficient return for the immense outlay involved, which could obtain the same service of other parties at a less cost, and which, if the bill should become a law, would pay an immense sum of money without any adequate consideration. To provide for making a donation of such magnitude would be, in his judgment, to deprive commercial enterprise of the benefits of free competition, and to establish a monopoly in violation of the soundest principles of public policy, and of doubtful compatibility with the Constitution. On receipt of the message in the Senate, Mr. Seward moved as an amendment to the Naval Appropriation Bill, the bill just vetoed, omitting the repeal of the clause which gives Congress the right to discontinue the extra allowance on giving six months' notice; this amendment prevailed by a unanimous vote. When the message was read in the House it occasioned great excitement, and was vehemently denounced as an unwarrantable interference on the part of the Executive with the legislation of Congress. On putting the question whether the bill should pass in spite of the veto, the result was—ayes 98, nays 79; less than two-thirds in favor. The bill, as passed in the Senate, was afterward agreed to, and thus became a law. The Senate also added to the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill, an amendment reducing the duties on various articles, especially wool and railroad iron; but it was stricken out in the House. Various bills of considerable importance were passed during the closing days of the session. Prominent among them was one reorganizing the Consular and Diplomatic service of the United States—fixing the salaries of the several Ministers at rates graduated according to the relative importance of their posts, and substituting salaries for fees in the case of Consuls. A bill was also passed organizing a Board for the purpose of hearing and adjudicating claims upon Congress—which will not only save a great deal of time usually devoted by Congress to this delicate and difficult duty, but will also prevent the injustice to which meritorious claimants are often exposed. Judge Gilchrist, of New Hampshire, Hon. Isaac Blackford, of Indiana, and Hon. Joseph H. Lumpkin, of Georgia, constitute the Board. A bill was also passed providing a retired list for the Navy; and two regiments of infantry and two of cavalry were added to the Army. The sum of seven and three quarter millions of dollars was appropriated to meet the claims of the creditors of Texas who may hold bonds for the payment of which the revenues of the State were pledged. By a bill for the protection of emigrant passengers, the owners and masters of vessels bringing emigrants to this country are required to make better provision for their comfort, and to make themselves responsible to a greater extent for their health. A private Company was authorized to build a line of Telegraph from the Mississippi to the Pacific, receiving from the Government, in aid thereof, the right of way two hundred feet in width. The Postage Bill has been amended by the addition of a provision for the registry of letters containing money, in accordance with the suggestions in the annual report of the Postmaster-General. An appropriation of twenty-five thousand dollars was made for statutory to be executed by Hiram Powers.—A debate of considerable interest took place in the Senate upon a bill introduced by Mr. Toucey, of Connecticut, authorizing the transfer to a United States Court of any proceedings that might be commenced in State Courts, under authority of State laws, against officers of the United States while acting in the execution of laws of the General Government. The passage of the bill was resisted with earnestness, especially on the ground that it was designed to aid in the execution and enforcement of the law for the restoration of fugitive slaves—a design which was vindicated by its friends, on the ground that it had been rendered necessary by the action of several of the States in making laws to prevent the enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Law. Senator Seward, on the 23d of February, spoke against it, resisting it as one of the usurpations of slavery, to which of late we have become accustomed, and pointing out the extent to which it encroached upon the rights and powers of the individual States, which had been jealously guarded by the founders of the Republic as essential to the protection of personal freedom. The law, he said, was an innovation upon the legal system of the country, and would involve even its friends in evils infinitely greater than they imagined. The bill was eventually passed in the Senate, by a vote of 29 to 9, but was not acted upon in the House of Representatives.—In addition to the laws enacted, several joint resolutions of considerable public interest and importance were appointed. One of them, approved on the 15th of February, authorized the President to confer the title of Lieutenant-General by brevet, in a single instance, for eminent services. The President, in accordance with the intent of Congress, conferred the title upon General Scott.

On the last day of the session the President transmitted to Congress a very large collection of diplomatic correspondence relating to a conference of American Ministers held at Ostend in October of last year, with regard to the foreign policy of the country, and especially the purchase of Cuba. The documents are quite voluminous, and, although they are highly important, it will be impossible in this place to do more than state their general tenor. The first letter in the collection is from Mr. Marcy to Mr. Soule, dated July 23, 1853, directing him to urge upon the Spanish Government the cession or sale of Cuba; and to protest against any interference on the part of other European powers; and suggesting that Spain might profitably grant Cuba a more independent government, retaining some commercial advantages for herself. On the 2d of July, Mr. Marcy had written to Mr. Buchanan complaining of the conduct of Great Britain in maintaining large fleets on the coast of Cuba, and directing him to endeavor to induce the British Government to abandon any arrangements into which it might have entered with Spain detrimental to our interests in regard to Cuba. On the 11th of March, 1854, Mr. Marcy instructs Mr. Soule to demand redress from the Spanish Government for the Black Warrior outrage; and, in a letter dated the 17th of the same month, fixes the indemnity at $300,000. On the 3d of April he writes that fears are entertained of a design to introduce a new system of agricultural labor into Cuba, and gives Mr. Soule full powers to negotiate for the purchase of the island. On the 16th of August the Secretary suggests a meeting of Messrs. Buchanan, Mason, and Soule, at some convenient point, for the purpose of adopting measures for a perfect concert of action in aid of the negotiations in progress at Madrid. This conference was commenced at Ostend on the 10th of October, and was transferred to Aix la Chapelle in Prussia, continuing until the 18th, the day on which the official report of its proceedings and conclusions is dated. The three Ministers, in this report, state that they have arrived at the conclusion that an immediate and earnest effort ought to be made to purchase Cuba from Spain at any price not exceeding a maximum sum not mentioned, but which subsequent indications prove was one hundred and twenty millions of dollars. The proposal, in their judgment, ought to be made in such a form as to be laid before the Supreme Constituent Cortes, which was then about to assemble; and all our proceedings in regard to it should be, they said, open, frank, and of such a character as to challenge the approbation of the world. The Ministers proceed to state the various reasons, growing mainly out of its geographical position, which convince them that the United States ought to purchase Cuba with as little delay as possible. It is next urged that the commercial nations of Europe would be greatly benefited by a transfer of Cuba from Spain to the United States, inasmuch as their commerce with the island would be greatly increased; and the dispatch next urges at length the benefits which Spain herself would derive from the proposed sale. Two-thirds of the purchase-money, employed in the construction of a system of railroads, would stimulate beyond calculation the industry and prosperity of the country; and the remaining third would satisfy the demands now pressing so heavily on her credit, and create a sinking fund which would gradually relieve her from the enormous debt which now paralyzes her energies. Cuba, in its best days, never yielded to the Spanish exchequer more than a million and a half of dollars annually; and her expenses have of late so largely increased as to create an annual deficit of six hundred thousand. Under no probable circumstances can Cuba yield to Spain one per cent. upon the sum the United States are willing to pay for the island. But it is furthermore urged that Spain is in imminent danger of losing Cuba without remuneration. The oppression of her government has created a feeling which will inevitably lead to insurrection, and, in case of such an event, in spite of our Neutrality Laws, it will be impossible to prevent the people and government of the United States from taking part in such civil war. And, finally, after we shall have offered Spain a price far beyond its value, and this shall have been refused, the question will remain whether Cuba, in the hands of Spain, does not endanger our internal peace, and the existence of our Union. If so, the Ministers urge, we should be justified by every law, human and divine, in wresting it from Spain, if we possess the power.—The President did not deem it advisable to follow the course indicated in this dispatch; and, in consequence of this hesitation, Mr. Soulé, in a letter, dated December 17, 1854, resigned his office as Minister at Madrid, saying he had no alternative but to take that step, or linger in languid impotence at the capital.

From California we have intelligence to the 16th of Feb., but the advices are without special interest. From the Sandwich Islands we learn that the new king has ordered the discontinuance of the negotiations which were commenced by his predecessor for the annexation of the islands to the United States. At his reception, on the 16th of January, he addressed the officers of the English, French, and American vessels of war, and declared that they represented the three great maritime powers of the earth—the three greatest supporters of his kingdom.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Our last Record mentioned the resignation of Lord John Russell from the Ministry, which he justified in the House of Commons, by saying that he could not conscientiously resist the resolution for inquiry into the conduct of the war, of which notice had been given by Mr. Roebuck. The resignation was announced by the Earl of Aberdeen, in the House of Lords, on the 26th of January. The Earl said he was not aware of all the motives that had prompted it; he knew that Lord John had been dissatisfied with the conduct of the war two months previously, but supposed he had waived his opposition. In the House of Commons, on the same day, Lord John Russell spoke at length upon the subject, the main point of his remarks being that the Duke of Newcastle had not met with cordial acquiescence his suggestions looking to a more vigorous prosecution of the war. Lord Palmerston, who followed him in debate, thought he should have resigned sooner, so as to give the Ministry an opportunity of supplying his place, or else have remained, and shared the fate of the government with which he had been connected. Mr. Roebuck then rose and made his motion for a Committee of Inquiry, which he supported briefly, and was followed by several speakers on both sides, Mr. Sidney Herbert making the most elaborate attempt to vindicate the government. The debate was then adjourned until the 29th, when it was renewed—Mr. Stafford leading off with a detailed and very touching narrative of what he had himself seen of the results of mismanagement in the army of the Crimea, and of the sad scenes that had met his view there. Sir E. Bulwer Lytton also spoke eloquently in support of the motion, insisting that the expedition to the Crimea had been undertaken in utter ignorance of the country they were to invade, the forces they were to encounter, and the supplies they might expect. Mr. Gladstone followed, censuring Lord John Russell for abandoning the Ministry at so critical a moment, after he had himself written to the Prime Minister that he had abandoned the views he had formerly pressed on the Cabinet in regard to the conduct of the war. As for the inquiry proposed, he did not believe it would benefit the army, or tend in any degree to alleviate the evils complained of. The disorganization of the army, he thought, had been exaggerated, although he admitted the defective administration of the war departments at home. Mr. Disraeli renewed the attack, declaring that the blame of acknowledged evils ought not to be thrown upon the Duke of Newcastle alone—the whole Cabinet was responsible. The course of Lord John Russell he censured as being akin to what in the eighteenth century would have been styled a profligate political intrigue. Lord John replied to this, denying that there had been any thing in his acts to which such a term could be applied. Lord Palmerston accepted the issue made by Mr. Disraeli, but said that a resolution of inquiry was not a frank or proper mode of declaring lack of confidence in the Ministry. If it were adopted and carried out, it would set a dangerous precedent—and the country would be disappointed if it were not. Several other members spoke briefly, and, upon a division, there were for Mr. Roebuck's motion, 805; against it, 148; majority against the government, 157. Of those voting with the majority, 99 were members who had previously been Ministerialists; 84 Ministerialists, 47 of the Opposition, and 64 who had paired off, were absent. On the 1st, Lord Palmerston announced that the Ministry had resigned. The same announcement was made in the House of Lords by the Earl of Aberdeen, who took occasion to say that he was not surprised at the result; serious misfortunes had occurred, and it was perfectly natural that the censure they involved should fall upon the Government. But the sufferings of the army had been greatly exaggerated, and, instead of seeing any cause for discouragement in the present condition of affairs, he indulged sanguine hopes of ultimate success. The French Emperor was still able to send large reinforcements to the Crimea; a treaty with Sardinia would place 15,000 Piedmontese troops under Lord Raglan's command; and an understanding had been had with Austria which engaged her military aid if peace were not restored. The present want of the country was a strong Government, and he trusted such a one might be formed. The Duke of Newcastle followed in a full and not unsuccessful vindication of his own zeal and devotion to the service—denying that he had withheld due deference from Lord John Russell's suggestions, or that he had shown any desire whatever to retain office if it could be better filled. The Earl of Derby spoke sarcastically of the internal dissensions in the government which these events had revealed, and said he had been invited by the Queen to undertake the formation of a Cabinet, but had not succeeded in doing so. On the 6th, the debate was still further continued, Lord John Russell making a full reply to various imputations that had been made public against him, and especially to the charge that he had at any time been anxious to retain office in the Cabinet, as the Duke of Newcastle had intimated. Considering, he said, that he had been Prime Minister for five years and a half, and that he had consented to take a subordinate position in Lord Aberdeen's ministry, he thought such an intimation, especially from the Duke, was entirely misplaced. He admitted freely that he had made a mistake in not resigning at an earlier day—at the moment, indeed, when he became satisfied that the war was not conducted in a manner which he could defend. But having committed the error of remaining too long, he could not admit that he ought to have staid still longer, and awaited the result of the motion for inquiry; for that, he said, would have involved a still greater error—an error of morality. Mr. Gladstone replied to a portion of Lord John Russell's remarks, and disavowed emphatically any belief in the charges of political treachery or cowardice that had been brought against him. These discussions were continued until the 9th, when it was announced in the House of Lords by the Earl of Granville that Lord John Russell had attempted the formation of a Ministry but without success, and that Lord Palmerston had then been invited to undertake it and had succeeded. The principles of his Cabinet would be identical with those of the late Government. The Duke of Newcastle was succeeded by Lord Panmure in the War Department, and the Earl of Clarendon would still remain in charge of the department of Foreign Affairs. This arrangement, however, proved to be but temporary. When it was ascertained that the inquiry authorized by Mr. Roebuck's resolution was actually to be instituted, Mr. Gladstone, Sir James Graham, and Mr. Sidney Herbert withdrew from the Ministry. Mr. G. C. Lewis succeeded as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Lord John Russell took the Home Department, intending first to perform the duties of Envoy to Vienna, to which he had been appointed. We have no space for a sketch of the debates on the occasion of this change.—Joseph Hume died on the 20th of February, at the age of seventy-nine.—At the Lord Mayor's dinner on the 6th, Sir Charles Napier made a speech, declaring that he had been dismissed from the service, vindicating his conduct in the Baltic, demanding a committee of inquiry, and stigmatizing the treatment he had received from the Admiralty as insulting to the last degree. Admiral Berkeley in taking notice of this speech in the House of Commons, gave a decided and distinct denial to every material statement which Sir Charles had made.—The Earl of Elgin was cordially welcomed in Scotland on his return, and made a striking speech at Dunfermline on the 2d. He said he returned with stronger faith than ever in his countrymen's power of self-government, and with a profounder conviction that the English constitution was the most nearly perfect in the world. In England the head of the state represents the national unity, while in the United States he represents a party; and while in England an unpopular Government can be overthrown at once by a simple vote of censure, in the United States it must be endured four years.

THE CONTINENT.

Very few incidents of importance have occurred on the Continent during the month. In France the camp at Boulogne is to be increased to two hundred thousand men; its officers have received orders to march at short notice. Rumors are afloat that the Emperor intends to proceed to the Crimea in person for purposes of observation.—In Germany affairs are still in doubt—Prussia maintaining her equivocal position, declining to pledge herself to act with the Western Powers, and still insisting upon being admitted to share in the conferences at Vienna. Hanover has pledged herself to act with Austria; but Bavaria refuses to declare her intentions.—In Spain the Cortes are still discussing the new Constitution. A motion declaring that all public powers emanate from the nation was rejected, on the 1st, by a vote of 214 to 18. Epartero has made an appeal to the country, insisting on the necessity of maintaining order and regularly paying the taxes. Mr. Soulé, the American Minister, had an audience of the Queen, on the 31st of January, and took leave.—From Russia reports are received of active efforts on the part of the Government to push on preparations for the war. Immense supplies have been ordered to be ready in the early spring, and the total forces in the field amount to six hundred and ninety-five thousand men.

From the Crimea we have no intelligence of special interest. Active operations on the part of the Allies against Sebastopol have been entirely suspended by the severity of the weather. The condition of the English army, in point of health and comfort, has been somewhat improved, but it is still far from satisfactory. The Russians make frequent sorties, which are marked by increasing boldness and vigor, but have been hitherto without much success.

Editor's Table.

THE SELF-MADE MAN—Who is he? What is he? and what his true position for good or for evil among the powers of the age? In laying this subject for dissection upon our Editorial Table, it is first of all important that we should see clearly what is before us. The phrase is an ambiguous one. It may include characters alike in some outward traits, yet essentially and widely different. In one import of the term, we can not help regarding the self-made man as the great nuisance of the age. For the sake of truth, then, as well as to avoid giving unnecessary offense, it becomes proper to define him with the utmost strictness. The language is often employed to denote not so much the inward state or culture, as the outward manner through which it has been attained. In this sense, it would represent nothing essential, nothing strictly entering into that peculiar spiritual constitution which it is our object to describe, and to which alone, in logical strictness, the term in question may be rightly applied.

To clear the field, then, it may be necessary, in the first place, to determine who the self-made man is not. The name is sometimes given to the truly noble individual who has received an education in the schools, but through pecuniary means acquired by his own exertions, or through the still harder struggle of patient privations for so honorable an end. This is not the self-made man. The term so applied is a gross misnomer, denoting a mere accident of life instead of essential character. This essential element of the spiritual state does not depend at all upon the fact of a man's having gone through college, as the phrase is. He may have had this advantage, and yet come forth one of the most odious specimens of the mischievous genus. He may have gone through college, and yet have been made, or made himself, through the newspaper, and the political debating club, instead of close converse with those studies which bring the individual mind in communion with the best thinking of the race and of the age. Our colleges are beginning to turn out a good deal of this self-made article. He may, on the other hand, have never been within the walls of a literary institution, and yet be possessed of an extensive, a thorough, and, at the same time, a most conservative culture, in all respects the opposite of that obtained by many a one who flaunts his bachelor's or master's degree.

Again, the term is sometimes applied to one whose education, or mental culture, has come through strictly private study without the aid of schools in any way. But neither can this mere accidental circumstance give us the essential difference of which we are in search. The culture thus acquired may, in truth, have come from without, just as much as though it had been obtained through the drill of the recitation-room, or the discipline of the office. A well-selected course of reading may have brought such a one in closest connection and sympathy with the best thinking of the best and most cultivated minds. It may have moulded his spirit into a catholic communion with such thinking, and thus produced in him that essential feature of soul which distinguishes between the true conservative and the mischievous self-made man in the worst aspect of the character. The one thus educated may have well used his "private judgment" in procuring from the best books the best outward teaching. And this was pre-eminently the case with the oft cited and wrongly cited Franklin. This remarkable man was most remarkable in this, that his mind had been formed by closest converse with the best thinking and best writing, of the classical age of English literature. Franklin, although he lived in a revolutionary period, was eminently conservative in his modes of thought and feeling. Not that he was an admirer of aristocracy; for we know that all his tastes were republican; but in the higher and purer sense of the term he was conservative in all that respects those long settled ideas of government, those fundamental moral truths, and above all, those social and domestic institutions, which had grown out of the very constitution of humanity. There never was a man, we say it boldly, whose well-cultivated common sense would have more heartily despised that gabble about "ideas," and "movements," and "radical reforms," which characterizes your modern self-made railer at Society and the Church. Franklin is often claimed as an example of the uselessness of classical education; but any one who carefully examines his literary history must see that the legitimate inference from it is all the other way. It is true, he had not received such education directly, and yet he possessed its benefits in a more substantial manner than many who have graduated with college or university honors. The predominant conservatism of his literary tastes led him to see where the true excellence lay, and hence those efforts to form his style after the most classical English models—we mean those who were themselves most familiar with the sound thinking, the clear, manly, lofty spirit of the ancient classical authors. The admirer of Addison and Butler would never have been found among those "movement" men who now so falsely claim him. With all his well-known hatred of domestic oppression, he would have abhorred the doctrine of "woman's rights." His philanthropy would have held no fellowship with Garrison abolitionism. Although not distinguished for evangelical views in religion, he would have stood aghast at Parker, and found himself utterly puzzled to know what to make of New England and German transcendentalism. He knew too well what human nature was, and what it most needed, to believe for a moment that any of the "new phases of faith" that come floating up from these "children of the mist" could ever exert a moral power to be compared with that of the old homely "doctrines of grace." He was too truthful a spirit to have condemned Paine as he did, and yet to have had any respect for that deeper and more poisonous unbelief, that more faith-destroying denial of a personal Deity which is now openly vented in the lecture-room of the Young Men's Association, or finds a free passage in the columns of the widely-circulated daily newspaper. He was too honest a man to have understood why the Age of Reason should be banished to some obscure hole in Chatham Street, while a book of Mr. Newman, or a discourse on the "Mistakes of Jesus," or rank atheism in the form of German philosophy should command the most respectable publishers in New York, Boston, or Philadelphia. Simple republicanism he loved with all his soul; but socialism, Fourierism, all that beastly herding together of men and women to which we may apply the term communism, would have been an abomination to our republican sage. The pretended reasoning and the unhealthy sentiment of the school that supports it, with all its kindred ideas, would have been utter loathsomeness to the sound common sense, the conservative historical knowledge of such a mind as that of Benjamin Franklin.

But it may be said that such a man is, after all, self-made, because his selection of books, his choice of teachers, and thus, in some measure, the determination of the ideas suggested or received, may certainly be called his own. So it might seem on a superficial view of the case, and yet even here there must be the conservative character as a condition precedent. This is a state of mind rather than the possession of any certain dogmas or ideas. It is, in other words, the simple love of truth in distinction from the love of originality, or the vain conceit of "thinking for one's self." This love of truth will guide him, like an instinct, to the best sources of truth. Once upon the track, every step becomes more and more sure. One good book will lead him to another. That docility of soul which is the surest foundation for subsequent mental independence, as well as mental greatness, will be sure to bring him and keep him in the stream of soundest authority. And so his education is from without, however he may have come by it. Place such a mind in the most extensive library, and leave it to its own free roving. Order will soon arise out of the apparent chaos. He will soon get upon the track of catholic truth, because its consistency is in harmony with his own inward spiritual tastes. He will soon begin to separate the chaff from the wheat, the precious from the vile. He loves truth however old, and this preserves him from being led away by that apparent originality, but real monstrosity, of error, which is its great charm to the opposite state of soul.

There is another and modern example that is sometimes cited, but with still less propriety. The renowned Hugh Miller is brought forward as a fair specimen of the self-made man. Any one, however, may disabuse himself of the absurd notion, by merely comparing Hugh Miller with known examples of men among ourselves who are undoubtedly entitled to the name in all the merit or demerit of its most radical significance. How striking the difference between the sound, clear, conservative, religious, Bible-loving Scotchman, and the men whose idea the term most readily calls up! Who would venture to compare this sober believer in the soberest dogmas of the sober Church of Scotland with the apostles of the so much talked of Church of the Future? What sympathy has such a mind with the orators of Woman's Rights Conventions, and Hartford Conventions for disseminating the claims of the Scriptures, and Conventions of Spiritual Rappers, and all other conventions that have grown out of what are called the "movements" of the day? Besides, we may say of Hugh Miller, as we said of Franklin—Although his education was of the most private kind, in one respect, yet it was, after all, by communion with the best outward teaching. He was a man made from without, notwithstanding his hours of study were snatched from the labors of the quarry, and his school-room was the shanty of the stone-mason. There was first of all among his teachers the old conservative Church of Scotland. Her catechisms were his first text-books; her faithful catechising ministers his first instructors. This basis of truth once securely laid, he had an anchor that would hold him fast, or bring him back, however wide his after roamings. The next educational inflexion was his well-selected course of reading, as so graphically set forth in his own autobiography. His early training gave him a right start here, and then the causes we have already mentioned secured, for such a mind, that his way would become clearer, firmer, safer, at every step in his moral and intellectual progress.

We might dwell upon other uses of the phrase. There is the self-made man in business, the maker of his own fortune, as he is styled. All credit be awarded to him for the example he gives the world of energy and successful perseverance. But he is not the character of which we are in search. He is not our self-made man. But where, then, is he to be found? If not Franklin, or Hugh Miller, or such a man as Astor or Girard, who and what is he? We beg the reader's patience. The man is a reality, a most mischievous reality. He is in the midst of us, doing his work of spiritual disorganization. The males and females of this noxious species are daily vending a spiritual poison more hurtful to the souls of men, especially the young, more injurious to the ultimate health of society, than all the bad liquor that is retailed from the dens, and cellars, and bar-rooms that the righteous Maine Law is soon about to close. The name of this self-made man is not one but legion. He is to be found in almost all the departments of life—in the office, in the lecturer's desk, in the editorial closet, in the school-room sometimes, and occasionally even in the pulpit. We have dwelt long enough on the negative side; let us proceed to describe him positively. He is the man who boasts of having done all his own thinking, who utterly despises that teaching by authority, which, when made the beginning of education, either religious or secular, will ever be found to be the surest foundation for clear, manly, independent thought in all after-life. He is the man who professes to have thought out of himself, and by himself, and for himself, and in his own right, all the difficulties in morals and politics, to have solved all the hard problems in theology. He is the man who claims to reopen all questions, and to regard nothing as settled. With him any established opinions are but fetters on the human mind. The world has been all wrong; but instead of the humbling feeling such a conviction of human weakness ought to produce and would produce in the truly thinking soul, it only fills him with the inflating conceit that the rectification of all this error, the enlightenment of all this ignorance, is his allotted mission. Society has failed, the State has failed, the Church has failed, and now he, modest man, would try alone. They have rather covered the earth with darkness; it is his office to dissipate it. Truth has not yet been found in a search of six thousand years; it is his mission to draw her up from the dark well in which she has lain so long concealed. This is the man; and in this sense of the term so carefully defined, may it be truly maintained that the individual who has thus made himself, has made a very narrow, a very conceited, and a very mischievous thing.

Directly opposed to this is the conservative mind, and the conservative man. As his name implies, he is for holding together all the world has ever learned. The conservative loves to think with others as far as he possibly can. He loves to hold with the wise and good of past ages. He may not be able always to do this, for he acknowledges the infallibility of nothing human; but when compelled to differ, it is with pain and great reluctance. He loves to think with the most serious minds that have represented the unearthly teaching of the Church; he loves to agree with the soberest intellects that have adorned the State. If he finds the course of his own speculations leading in a different direction, he would examine and re-examine opinions apparently the most plausible, rather than hold them at such a sacrifice of communion with the head and heart of all past humanity. He holds to the noble aphorism of Burke, "The individual indeed is weak, but the race is strong." He knows from history that each age has its immense amount of froth, and scum, and useless debris, borne down by its swollen torrent, and yet that every age leaves its small residuum to be added to the general stock of human wisdom. It is this he reverences; not that noisy, empty, explosive effervescence, which never can be rightly estimated until it has passed away—not the "spirit of the age," but the higher, the more abiding, the more divine spirit of the ages.

Hence we may boldly assert what will strike some minds as a paradox. The radical may wonder at it as a sort of invasion of a prescriptive right, and yet it is none the less certain, that the conservative is the true humanitarian, none the less certain that radicalism, or this so-called self-culture, is the grand disorganizer. The reason comes directly from our fundamental definition of the man. The state of soul which constitutes him what he is, is the most intense form of selfishness. And hence that monstrous result which some chapters in modern history have so strikingly shown—a movement commencing with the cant of fraternity and philanthropy, yet ending in a demon cruelty, of which, had not the experiment been tried, human nature might well have been thought incapable. The actors were doubtless sincere in a certain sense; they doubtless believed in their "mission" as patriots and reformers; and yet it is none the less certain that they knew no more of themselves than Hæzel did when he said to the prophet, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" "We may well ask—Are the same species of men now on the stage of action any more to be trusted?"

But let us proceed to some of the distinctive traits of the character we are discussing. In the first place, then, we say, that our self-made man may be known by his intolerance. This, too, may sound paradoxical; and yet who that studies him well can doubt its most literal truth? Experience here most abundantly confirms the conclusion which might have been derived from the elemental analysis of the character. If you wish to find bigotry of the rankest kind, go to the men who are making the age ring with their talk of progress and new ideas. If you wish to find the narrowest intolerance toward all other men's thinking, go to those who are claiming for themselves the widest license to depart from all doctrines that have been held most sacred among mankind. If you wish for examples of coarse vituperation, of bitter railing, of impudent impeachment of other men's motives, go to those who are the most keenly sensitive lest their own claim to the most disinterested philanthropy should be called in question, and who erect themselves into martyrs on the least appearance of opposition to any of their favorite dogmas.

And here, too, the explanation of the paradox is found in the same elementary constitution of character. The self-made man's opinions are his own. He has made them; he has begotten them; he has nursed them; he has thought them all out, and without any external aid. He has got them neither from books nor from the schools. Hence, whoever calls them in question is invading a private right, an individual peculium, and he turns upon the assailant with the growl of the mastiff; he denounces him with a wrathfulness to which the hottest war of ecclesiasticism can hardly be compared. The world has experienced the evils of spiritual despotism; it has yet, perhaps, to try that harder experiment, the tender mercies of an infidel radicalism, when it has become the predominant influence in society. The true conservative, on the other hand, believes his fundamental character, if he be not long-suffering toward error, and charitable even to the intolerant. He knows too well with what effort truth is gained and error shunned. He sees too keenly the difficulties that hang round all those questions which the self-taught radical disposes of so flippantly. He understands too well that all such questions have two sides to them, and that the plausible aspect that presents itself to the man who does all his own thinking is in most cases the same that has ever deceived this class of minds. Their strikingly new and original truths are ever old errors coming over and over again, although perhaps in ever-varied and deceptive forms.

The self-made man boasts of his independence. It would be easy to prove him the veriest slave. His avoidance of any thing like settled truth through fear lest he should be regarded as not thinking for himself on all subjects, puts him under a servile yoke which has all the constraint without any of the dignity of true authority. The conservative, on the other hand, can afford to maintain a settled dogma; he has the moral courage to say things that are not original; he can afford to hold trite opinions, if they are but sound and salutary. In his eyes truth loses none of its beauty through age. The purer, the brighter, the holier it becomes, in proportion to the number of souls it has guided to the haven of spiritual rest. The conservative can afford to have a creed. His maligner knows nothing of the hard thinking, the mental throes through which the mind may have been brought to repose upon it. He treats lightly the symbols and confessions of the Churches, and sometimes he is joined in this by the man who would even be esteemed orthodox and evangelical; but neither of them has any true conception of the real nature of the authorities they so love to revile. To such men the Confessions and Articles of sober Christendom are nothing more than results of individual thinking; and hence their foolish clamor about the right and freedom of private judgment. One man's opinion, they say, is as good as another's. Besides, thinking is a right instead of a high and responsible duty, with truth, however obtained, for its only aim. It is a right, say they, like the right of speech, or the right of the press, or the right of suffrage. It is a right, and therefore every man has a right to think as he pleases, whether he thinks right or not. He has a right to be absurd, if he fancies he can be original in that way. Thus viewed, to be sure, nothing could be more preposterous than to have one man's thinking controlled by another's thinking. But the intelligent conservative knows better than all this. He sees in the common symbol or confessions of the Church of which he is a well-instructed member, the collective instead of the individual mind, and therefore he reverences even where he does not deem them infallible. They are the religious thinking of the ages that has assumed these outward forms. They are the thinking of the most pious, the most wise, the most learned, ever converging to a communion both of idea and expression on the great truths presented by revelation. They are like the old melodies which were never made by any individual composer, although he may have arranged them and given them their artistic form, but have grown out of the heart of the nation, no one knows when nor how. Who that has a soul to his ear would not feel how much better their music than that which is manufactured expressly for the orchestra? He is the true re-former who revives these old harmonies. He is the true re-former who stamps anew, bright and clear, the old coins whose image had become obscured through abuse, or debased by a corrupt authority. Or, to change the metaphor, he is the true re-former who digs up old truths, who restores them to their true place in the catholic thinking, and cleanses them from the rubbish under which they may have been buried in the world's false progress.

To the conservative mind such articles and confessions, thus representative of the best thinking of the ages and of the Church, are prima facie evidence of truth. He most rationally takes them as starting positions, to be called in question only when another and higher authority imperatively demands that he should do so. More truly independent than the radical, he yet loves to think as the best in the world have thought before him. It gives him pain when compelled to differ from them. He shrinks from that in which the other man finds his supreme pleasure. To him there is darkness, and skepticism, and almost despair, in the thought that all are wrong while he alone is right, if, indeed, in such circumstances, he can bring himself to believe that right and truth are attainable by the human mind.

The difference between the two characters is a moral one. It springs from the presence or absence of the humanitarian spirit. It is all the difference between the pure love of truth and the love of opinion. Clear, certain, established truth, in respect to the great relations of the soul to other souls, and to the Father of spirits; this is the rest, the beatific vision for which the conservative longs, and which he prizes above all progress. It is such truth he loves all the better for its being old. Its preciousness is in proportion to the number of dark souls it has enlightened, the number of weary souls it has refreshed. He loves truth for its own sake; but he despairs of finding it, if it has not yet been found, or revealed to the world. If now six thousand years, at least, since the creation of man, the very prime articles of moral and political philosophy are unknown; if, eighteen hundred years after the Light Himself has come, the question may yet be asked, What is Christianity? he has no hope in any individual discovery; no faith in any individual solutions of the great problems of the ages.

The reader, of course, can not fail to see that our remarks are not applicable, or intended to be applied, to physical discovery, but to the great truths of mental, moral, political, and theological science. Here steamboats, and telegraphs, and even printing-presses, give one age no advantage over another. Here arise the great questions with which the best minds of the world have been ever intensely occupied—the great questions on which revelation professes to have come to our assistance. And now to think of a man ignoring all this, either because he knows no better, or because he chooses to make a merit of it, and gravely telling his readers, or an audience like himself, that in one or all of these departments he has thought out for himself what all other minds had failed to see before; that the world and the Church, for example, had been all darkness heretofore in respect to the right idea of moral obligation, or the nature of sin, or the true idea of punishment; that men had never possessed any proper notion of the nature or end of Government; that the nations had remained profoundly ignorant of the laws of social organization until Fourier revealed it to them; that Christianity had never been understood until the days of Maurice, and that the Bible had remained a dead letter until some modern interpretation unlocked its secret cabala, and revealed its long hidden cipher.

The most melancholy part of the spectacle is the unconscious ignorance often exhibited in respect to what has been done before by stronger and better minds in all these departments. A man writes a book, for example, on the "Nature of Evil," or he tries his hand, nothing daunted by a thousand failures, on the awful question of its "origin." To one familiar with the history of this question it is quite clear that he has explained evil only by denying its existence. He, however, is sure of having "solved the problem." He is quite certain he has made predestination as plain as the drawing of a lottery, and original sin as easy to be understood as a bond and mortgage. He has found out the radical error of the Church, and right where St. Paul, although he meant well and had some glimpse of the truth, did not fully understand himself. But the real wonder is his perfect ignorance of the fact that the world has been told all this before, many times before. What is there in it all which one schoolman has not dreamed of, and another schoolman abundantly refuted. We make bold to affirm that it can all be found in Thomas Aquinas, either as answer or objection, and plenty more of the same kind beside. And so we may say of the most acute productions of our self-taught metaphysics, or self-inspired transcendentalism. The latest New England speculation was refuted by Anselm one thousand years ago. Go to the Astor library. Turn over the clasped pages that have slumbered for centuries, and you will find it all. Make allowance for the difference between the modern pretentious style and the concise technical logic of the old scholasticism or the old mysticism, and it will be seen that every thought which the modern writer puts forth, all his "keys" and "problems," his new discoveries in Christianity, his metaphysical eclecticism, all thought out by himself and bran-new as he supposed them to be, may all be found substantially, somewhere in these old worm-eaten, dust-covered memorials of controversies which the world can never settle, yet never suffer to repose.

This unconscious ignorance is absurd enough; but there is an absurdity beyond it all, when such writers, and such lecturers, gravely talk of their being martyrs—martyrs for their new ideas forthright—and complain of the persecution they encounter from an ungrateful world and a bigoted Church. With what modesty, too, will they not sometimes compare their opponents to Scribes and Pharisees, thereby hinting at no very obscure parallel between themselves and the Saviour of the world! They work no miracles it is true, but then the higher rationality of their doctrines gives them a better claim to the world's deference than those bare dogmas of authority which demand so unphilosophical a support.

But what then of the Protestant Reformation? it may be said. We have already characterized it. It was an age in which old truths were brought to light and re-established as old truths. It was a most serious age; it was a modest age; and in all these respects, especially in the latter, it differed widely from our own. Not less foolish than the opposing radicalism is that conservatism which would deny the present century great and peculiar merits in some most important departments of knowledge. But, certainly, modesty is not one of its excellences. In the Protestant Reformation there was deep earnestness; there was keen excitement; there was intense thinking on fundamental truth; there was a wide waking up of the human soul; but it was because of all this deep earnestness that there was no time or thought of boasting. It was a true reforming age, and had work to do which would not allow it to be forever talking about itself, and "its mission," and keeping up an eternal din about what it was going to do, and contemptuously asserting its immense superiority over all others, and foolishly maintaining that in coming to its birth time had actually made a leap and released it from all connection with the past. We are only asserting what every one at all acquainted with the history of that period knows to be true. The reader is left to draw the only inference that can be drawn in its bearing upon our own age. In all the voluminous theological works of the Reformers there is not so much talk of high views, and deep views, and new views, as in one modern sermon. All the writings of every kind during that remarkable period, and, we may even say, the century that followed it, would not present so much of this frothy self-laudation, as may be heard in one Hope Chapel meeting of "strong-minded women" and "self-made" men.

Editor's Easy Chair.

JOHN did not send Jemima a Valentine this year, as he has been in the habit of doing. Jemima was surprised; and when he came in the evening, she displayed a little natural displeasure.

"Why have I not received a Valentine?" she asked, at length; and hinted darkly that she feared the faithlessness of man.

"My dear Jemima," said John, "it is a vulgar thing. How could I send you what Sambo was going to send to Miranda? I am very sorry, but every boot-black now sends a Valentine to every chamber-maid, and I have too profound a respect for my Jemima to insult her by doing what every bumpkin could do."

John thus expressed the philosophy of the decline of the honor for this happy festival. Every few years the ardor revives, and the postman groans under the sweet missives, as tables are said to groan under the delicacies of the season. It is a sad defection. All youths and maidens naturally sigh. John secretly curses Sambo; and Jemima wishes Miranda wouldn't. It is a decline in which we are all interested.

Our elegant young friends in the city have long since outgrown this weakness, however. They remember to have read of this festival, and to have sent pictorial sugar-plums, at an earlier day, to the queen of the moment. They are astonished now, being nineteen years of age, that they could ever have condescended to such folly. Life is a draught so soon drained! They are content to quote Ophelia now, when Valentine's Day comes round, and to suffer silence in their muse. Sambo can send a Valentine, Miranda can receive a rose. What Sambo can send, and Miranda can receive, is not for John and Jemima. It is hard, because it cuts them off from a good deal. But they resign themselves with pure heroism, and endure like martyrs.

There are certain things, to be sure, which an irrevocable fate will not allow them to avoid. They are compelled to breathe the same air, to see the same sky, to smell the same odors, and to hear the same sounds as Sambo and Miranda. There is no exclusiveness of the senses. It is amusing to see John's inability to perceive that a gentleman shows himself, not in what he does or avoids doing, but by the manner in which he does or refrains from doing. A gentleman is not an affair of fine broadcloth and small boots. He is a being who wears coarse clothes and large boots, if necessary, in such a way that your exquisite pedestals, dear Adonis, seem to be trivial and feeble. If all the Sambos in creation make a vulgar bow, bowing does not thereby become vulgar; but when Sir Philip Sidney salutes a friend, the act is a most graceful and courteous recognition.

It is hard for Adonis to learn this. He will not believe it. Adonis tries to be fine by not doing what his valet does. But he can not help it. He must eat and drink, and sleep, and talk, and love Venus. His French valet does no less. When will Adonis learn that if he be a gentleman, and his valet only a valet, there can be no more real resemblance between them than between a star and the sun, which are both light-giving bodies.

Ah! gracious reader, forgive a grave old Easy Chair, that moralizes even on St. Valentine's Day. It will be long past when you hear this moralizing; gone with the summer walks and the remembered dances of years and years ago. Such distance is there in a few days! So far and so fatally a little time severs us from what we believed to be immortal!

These happy holidays belong to youth in this country, and youth enjoys them with a half shame and a doubtful glance over the shoulder, and seems a little ashamed to enjoy. This, too, is an affectation that we have carefully imported from England, and it is also deeper and sadder than an affectation, for it is grounded in our national character. The affectation comes from an imitation of the English habit of not suffering the conversation to rise above the level of the lowest capacity, which—if we may believe Mr. Willis, whom the English have never forgiven for what he saw and said in England—is the grand principle of British conversation. This was a fineness of observation, a subtlety of criticism, which we do not pretend to justify. We beg indignant John Bulls not to break the legs of our Chair. We are not responsible for the remark.

Contemporary with this, of course, was the insistent indifference which the American Adonis conceives to be the height of elegance. Where general social stupor reigned, there was a natural torpidity of manner. Gradually this grew into a desire to avoid all appearance of excitement. Hence came the indifference, and hence, in due season, the affectation of indifference.

These are all presumptive results, based upon the Willis theories of English society. If those theories are false, or foolish, it makes the task of defining the origin of the well-bred young American dullness more difficult.

But, whatever be its origin, its influence is plain. Enthusiasm—ardor of every kind—is not the thing. Bumpkins have had holidays, but what will the gentleman do with a holiday? Peasants dance with vigor; will the gentleman forget himself into enjoyment? In the South, in Italy, upon sunny days, the bright-jacketed contadino dances the Tarantella or the Saltarella with his dark-eyed partner. Eyes flash, feet twinkle, bosoms heave, and graceful hands play in the sparkling air. It is a movement and a melody which are not forgotten; which forever restore Italy to the most treacherous memory, when they are seen and heard. The air, the sky, and the scene, have each their part in it. The waters of the bay, and the fragrance of the orange groves, and the glistening of the olives, have their share in the Tarantella and the Saltarella. Manliness and agility unite in the man; picturesque beauty and bold grace in the woman. A handsome Italian peasant dancing is sculptured on memory like a faun upon a vase.

Behold the American Adonis! With what grave sadness, with what sweet melancholy, he moves through the swift waltz! The solemnity of life strikes him at that moment! The profound grief of many misdeeds confronts him. Ye who listen with credulity to the whispers of Fancy, and pursue with eagerness the phantoms of Hope; who expect that age will perform the promises of youth, and that the deficiencies of the present day will be supplied by the morrow, ponder the dancing of the American Adonis.

You will not wonder, when you see him, that our fairest festivals languish, that the poetman groans under no sweet messages, and that the good Bishop Valentine sways his mild crozier over heretics. But looking away from him, even into the national character, you find a deeper and more real gravity, a sombre dullness, which sufficiently explains the gloom of our holiday calendar.

It is hard for us to enjoy. We do not taste the exhilaration of wine, which the Temperance Society holds to be its worst foe, but we get drunk. We can not have cheap pleasures. We estimate delight, as we do a dinner, by its cost. Charles Lamb entertained upon toasted cheese and gin-toddy. But we must have the rarest game and the costliest wines. Therefore we meet less frequently, and we treat our enjoyment as we do our best furniture. Once in a while we take off the covers, and then sit dismally still lest we should soil the damask. Epaminondas—that sharp observer of men and manners, and our special friend—says that in Germany he has so often seen a man with his pipe and mug of beer and newspaper, and his frau with her knitting and coffee, sit for a long evening and listen to the best music, performed as we can not hear it even by engaging front seats at a premium, and all for a mere song, that he pities his friends who pay heavily for the privilege of sitting solemnly in good places for poor sights and sounds.

The Germans are much inferior to the independent American citizen in many things, but the capacity of enjoyment is not one of these. That is one of the things in which Europeans generally are superior to him.

But it is foolish to rail at it; it is foolish to make fun of fate. National character is not to be laughed into a radical change. Manners may change, and morals may yield to sly satire and delicate reproof, but complexion remains the same. Into the Italian music you can not import the grave splendor of the German, nor can you kindle the latter with the airy sparkle and the passionate touch of the south. The Yankee can not play. If he goes to Rome and tries the Carnival, he flings handfuls of blinding confetti at every passenger, supposing that to be the fun. He does not know that the Italian used to fling a handful of light sugar-plums to his mistress upon the balcony, to attract her attention before tossing her a bouquet; and that the grim Englishmen and sad Yankees have spoiled the sport and the poetry by the baskets of lime with which they shower blindness upon Rome.

Jonathan must let the fêtes and holidays go. They have their gentle laureates, who have embalmed their memory in poetry and prose—which is, perhaps, almost as fine a pleasure as the festivals themselves. All the rites of rustic England live for us in Gay; and Charles Lamb is at least Arch-Deacon of Bishop Valentine. Only let the children enjoy while they may. Be as little surly as possible when they are noisy and romping in their games. There is sweeter music in the boy's loud shout in the nursery—in which it sounds as if the wardrobe had tumbled into the bedstead, and both had simultaneously smashed in great agony—than in the hushed sob of the mother at your side and the unnatural silence up stairs.

Ah! if we can't be merry, let us be as merry as we can.

MR. MUMM, the great lecturer, stepped in the other day, and wished us good-morning. Mr. Mumm has a pleasing air of importance. He has a genial patronizing air which seems to say cheerfully to every body, "You didn't know I was Mumm—the eminent Mumm—did you?"

But he has a right to put his hands in his pocket and laugh at the world. Mumm is in demand. Mumm has innumerable invitations to lecture. He makes his choice among all the leading lyceums. He views life from the lecturing point of view. All the world's a lyceum, and all the men and women merely audience. He districts the country. He has his beat, his parish, let us rather say his diocese.

A mild diocesan is Mumm. He fulminates no anathemas; but gently, and with regard to the weaklings of his charge, he gets off his smooth sentences, his calm platitudes.

Sitting in this Easy Chair, we can smile at Mumm, and crack jokes, that go off without much report, about Mumm's head. He smiles too, and receives his nightly fee. Perhaps several men could be hired as butts at a liberal salary. At least it is unfair to make them so before you have concluded a bargain. In the case of Mumm, you never know distinctly whether you or he is the mark of a butt. He has such a placid way of taking your thrusts, that you feel your own breast to see if you are yourself wounded, and remember vaguely the ingenious headman of the Sultan who removed heads so smoothly that not until a sudden movement made it fall did the victim know that he was headless.

Mumm has just returned from a long tour, and he exasperates Adonis—who passes for a man of talent, upon the score of a kind of supercilious sarcasm in which he indulges—by talking rather loftily of his success.

"My dear Mumm," says Adonis, "do you know the difference between you and me?"

Perhaps it would not be difficult to interpret Mumm's smile, but he says placidly:

"No; I wish there were no difference. It grieves me to be different from my dear Adonis."

"The difference is, that you have given your guage to the public and I have not. Every body knows just what you can do. Now they don't know but that I am capable of Miltonic or Shakspearian performances. At least, dear Mumm, I have the advantage of obscurity."

"That is true," replies the lecturer, musing, "that is very true. Perhaps I have made a mistake. But, dear Adonis, I can advise you one thing very sincerely."

"Well?" said Adonis, serenely triumphant.

"Never give your guage to the public, and you will be sure of its good opinion," says Mumm.

Adonis trips gracefully away, and Mumm answers his lecture invitations.

We turned to read some of the anonymous letters which are sent to us by the indignant gentlemen who do not chance to agree with us in our comments upon life around us—letters which frighten us so much, and inspire such admiration of the courage of their authors; for, of all heroes, certainly the writer of an anonymous letter is the most remarkable—when Mumm looked up and said, in effect:

"The truth is, that the popular lecture is an American and a Yankee institution. In Europe they have learned lectures, and college lectures, and occasional lectures before lyceums of working-men; courses of lectures before Academies of Science, Literature, and Art; but there is nothing corresponding to our popular lecture, which is delivered a hundred times in a season, from the Penobscot to the Mississippi, which is by far the best paid literary work, and by which a reputation may be made.

"The lecture with us takes the place of the theatre in Europe. The theatre is not indigenous in America. The managers are usually foreigners, and the actors and the plays are the same. We hear London jokes, and Cockney slang, and a general humor which would seem to imply some knowledge of London for its full enjoyment; and we have French vaudevilles, in which the delicate wit of the Gaul suffers in the English as Ariel suffered in the pine, and which shrinks and shudders outside of Paris. There has never been an American theatre. Americans have written plays which have been popular—but the sceptred pall has passed us by. The whole spirit of the drama with us is foreign.

"But the lecture has all the freshness and success of a native growth. It began some twenty or thirty years ago in New England. The vicinity of Boston was first lighted by this rising power; and Boston, with poetic gratitude, now furnishes a greater proportion of the best and most popular lecturers than any other city. Most of the young professional men, and all who love the Muses, try it, at least. New England is dreadfully beleaguered. Every evening of the week usually brings some 'entertainment' of the kind, as it is courteously termed. The Mercantile Library of Boston, like an immense corporation doing a tremendous business, runs, as it were, two express trains of lectures during the week. The huge Tremont Temple is crowded, and all the noted men of the moment pass in review before the sad, hard eye of Boston and its neighborhood. It is not often deceived. It has had such long experience, and is so impervious to quips that would set a Western audience into roars of hilarity, that, while it cheerfully welcomes, that sad, hard eye discreetly measures, every aspirant.

"I should say," said Mr. Mumm, probably remembering some joke of his own which hung fire, "I should say that the New England audience was blasé.

"Yet nothing," he continued, "can be pleasanter than to watch the differences of audiences. There are always two sides to a lecture—the lecturer's and that of the audience. The elders go to judge—but they are also judged. The youth go to admire—but they are in turn admired. Some audiences are sensitive as a young girl. They betray the slightest emotion, as her cheek flushes and pales with fitting feeling. They smile where even I, Mr. Mumm, hardly expected a smile; and to every well-directed joke they pay the homage of the loudest laughter."

"And tears?" interrupted we—

"Are rarely shed in the lyceum," responded Mr. Mumm.

"Yet," said he, after a pause, "I am not sure that silence is not the best applause.* An audience will often laugh at a joke when they care nothing for the lecture, as in the dullest political speech they will cheer any favorite allusion. To hold a hundred or a thousand people eagerly interested, 'breathless,' as the enthusiastic newspapers say the next morning, is a satisfaction which only the speaker or singer can know. To sway them magnetically to and fro; to make them half-draw their swords, as Hungarian orators have done; or to listen to the clank of chains, with Patrick Henry; or to throw rings and ribbons into the charity-box, as with Whitfield and Bossuet—these are the rare and lofty triumphs of oratory; these are the incidents that elevate eloquence to a fine art.

"Some of our lecturers have made the great mistake of supposing that success was sure, if they could only make the audience laugh. They have disproved their own theory by not being asked again. In every audience there is a nucleus of sense and judgment which passes the final decree. The Rev. Dr. Azote comes up to the lecture-desk wrapped in a prodigious mantle of theological fame; but the wise men yawn and sleep in their hearts, and the Rev. Dr. Azote is immensely complimented, and is not asked next year. Dr. Azote's 'solempnity' does not impose upon the lyceum. Young Farr Niente, who came home from Europe yesterday, goes out to the Codtown Literary Institute this evening, and lectures upon the present state of the war, with a general glance at history and a theory of the future. Farr thinks it is rather a brilliant thing, although he threw it off one morning between the third and fourth cigars. But the sensible young men of Codtown don't happen to agree with Niente, and he is cheerfully paid, praised—and dropped. It is the same with Rident, the funny man, who was droll for an hour. The next morning the shoemaker asked the baker what the lecture was about. 'Well, I declare I've forgotten,' said the baker. It is prophetic; and Rident arrides the baker no more.

"A lecture," continued Mr. Mumm, holding fast to the arm of our Easy Chair, so that polite escape was hopeless, "is neither a sermon, nor a speech, nor an essay. It partakes of the pith of a sermon,* the fluency of a speech, and the ease of an essay. But it must hit a hundred audiences and please all. It is not the easiest thing to write; and a man used to writing to be read will be surprised to find how much he must change and modify—how he must heighten his lights and deepen his shadows before the work is appreciated as he wishes it to be.

"It is my opinion," said Mr. Mumm, as if he were about saying a pretty good thing, "that a lecture is like a picture which must be painted up to the general tone of the gallery, in which it is hung. When it is finished in the studio, it may fail of its proper effect in the exhibition; and as the artist is admitted upon 'vanishing day' to paint up his picture, or paint it down, as may chance, so ought the lecturer to have a rehearsal or two, not of friends—those inconsiderate flatterers—but of strangers. Let him go quietly out to the dustiest village he knows and try his weapon. If the audience goes out, or goes to sleep, or talks loud, there is one verdict. If it whispers and yawns at intervals, there is another. If it rustles, that is good. If it is still, without sleep, and scrapes its feet a little at the end, that is best of all, and the lecture will do.

"Lecturing is becoming a profession," said Mr. Mumm, jingling the loose coin in his pocket. "I said that no literary work was so well paid. A man writes a single lecture, and delivers it forty, fifty, or a hundred times. He receives emolument, therefore," said Mr. Mumm, slowly, as if calculating. "During all this time he is traveling, and may do nothing else, if he has nothing else to do. If he has, it will be hard to find the time to work. Fragments of days, sudden odd hours after long travel and fatigue, and subject to the irruption of committees, are not the best times nor conditions for working. But he sees many people and many things in the most intimate and agreeable way. If he is fond of incense, he has a chance of sniffing it. If he thinks he is a great man, and that every body in the reading-room of the village tavern is looking over the top of the paper, and nudging his neighbor with the hot whisper, 'That is MUMM!' he has one chance of being undeceived. If he listens slyly, he will overhear, 'And who is Mr. Mumm?' On the whole, I consider lecturing good to bleed a man's vanity. The newspapers have a chance at him. 'Mr. Mumm, of whom we have heard such astounding reports, will probably not set the river on fire. His voice is monotonous, his manner uninteresting, and his matter trivial. The stalwart stomachs of a Codtown audience require something stronger than sweet froth.'

"When you open the paper in the morning, it is not so pleasant to suppose that the other people are looking over the top of the sheet, having just read the notice of last evening's lecture, and saying, 'that's MUMM!' It is not so pleasant to be Mumm the next morning.

"Then time goes in lecturing, and valuable time. I, Mr. Mumm, who am married, hear plaintive requests from Mrs. Mumm, when I return after a month's tour, that I would stay at home a little.

"My dear Mrs. Mumm," I always say, with, I hope, pardonable levity, 'I do stay at home a little; and a very little, my fond Amelia Jane,' I exclaim, clasping that person to my bosom.

"But if I were a bachelor even, I should regret this constant travel in winter. A lecturer becomes a Bedouin, a 'vagrom' person, a tramp; and his mind tramps too. He loses the good habit of regular work. He feeds upon a gentle excitement. He strikes for immediate and palpable results—forgetting that the foundations of great works, like those of great temples, are laid out of sight. He wants applause, or admiration, or, at least, appreciation. This, I mean, gets to be the tendency.

"But it is hard to make lecturing a profession, because the public is capricious. It tires of its favorites. They must retire and refresh. They must not try to live always in its eye. Besides, it summons lecturers to look at them. Having walked across the street upon your elbow, you are mentioned in the papers—and the Codtown Literary Institute immediately invites you to lecture. You appear, and discourse upon the esoteric doctrines of Plato. The Literary Institute is indignant, for it wanted you, somehow, to walk on your elbow in the lecture. The Literary Institute always wants a man to do in his lecture the particular thing which made him famous enough to be asked.

"Ah! well, I am afraid that even I, Mr. Mumm, am sometimes only invited as a phenomenon.

"This caprice is not unnatural when you consider that the lyceum is usually a resort for amusement. It is the theatre, the opera, the assembly, the exchange of the town. Girls go there to flirt; young men go to help them. Mothers go because they want to break up the intolerable monotony of staying at home, and fathers go because their wives do. If you can amuse, you are fortunate; yet, if you only amuse, you have not succeeded. Under cover of your fun you must say what you have to say.

"Meanwhile the lecture is growing to be one of the great powers of this country. The lecturer is a preacher, with perfect freedom to make fun or to draw tears. The audience sit before him willing and open-hearted, not mailed in the sense of habit and a tacit resistance as in church. People go to church, and expect to hear trite moral truths put in a commonplace way, and they curl up easily in the corner and doze pleasantly through the sermon. But the same truth flashing and sparkling in the lecture-desk, comes home with a force they had not dreamed of. It takes them unawares. The appeal is from man to man, and as man to man, which it is not always from the pulpit.

"It is remarkable, also, that the men who are the most popular and the most eagerly sought as lecturers, are those who have been marked a little, either in the pulpit or out of it, for freedom and generosity of thought and the warmest sympathy with all humane movements. It shows that the public mind is alive and throbs with noble emotion. But the audience grows also in its requirements. It insists upon a constantly higher excellence in the lecturers. The standard rises, and the man who pleased last year will not satisfy this season, unless he does better than then.

"In fine," said Mr. Mumm, "to hear a thinker tell his thoughts, and a traveler his travels, and an observer of life and society his criticisms, is among the purest of social pleasures, because it is man imparting his individuality to man. Nor will the fame of one consume that of another. Doe need not be jealous of Roe; there is plenty of fame for every body who can make a name, just as there is plenty of light for any number of dark holes. If the mammoth cave should be suddenly opened and light let in, the air of Kentucky would not be a shade darker. There is light enough, and fame enough, and love enough, for all objects.

"True love in this differs from gold and clay,
That to divide is not to take away."

"And yet," said Mr. Mumm, after a pause, "those lines were written by Shelley, who despaired, when he heard some cantos of Byron's Don Juan. He knows now that it is as true of fame as of love, and that the Cenci and the Odes, the Alastor and the Adonais, are not less dear because Childe Harold is fine and Don Juan the saddest and most sparkling social epic of its era.

"But I forgot that I was not in the lecture-desk," said Mr. Mumm, releasing the arm of the Easy Chair.

We lately rolled our Easy Chair into a railroad car, and saw more sights and went farther than we had paid for. For we went back into the past century, and saw groups with which the old novelists were familiar; scenes that are rare with us Americans, and which recall Fielding, Smollet, and the Beggars' Opera. It is by such odd and out-of-the-way incidents that the actuality of the old authors is proved. Their reality, of course, is self-evident. A man who reads Goldsmith's essays observingly, is surprised to find how entirely different in the details London life is from our own. And yet he will understand the jokes, and sympathize with the general spirit of the scene. Few men in Boston, or New York, or Cincinnati, or New Orleans, have ever met such a charming vagabond as Goldsmith's friend, the poor player, in the park. And yet what man in all these cities, who observes life and the play of character, does not know him perfectly well? As for his little man in black, he is one of our especial friends, and we mean to introduce him, in good time, to the other friends of this Easy Chair.

But this time our adventure is with a party of players, which we met in the cars, genuine "play-actors," traveling together, not strolling about the country with a covered wagon, as in last century times, and yet "strolling" as much as was possible in cars.

We were scarcely seated before we knew our company. They occupied about a quarter of the car, and talked constantly with a loud laugh in their voices, not as if any thing in particular amused them, but as if they had a habit of jollity. One voice was sweet; the others were coarse and hard. The sweet voice was called "Miss Beverley," and they were all named just as players should be, precisely as Cairo looks as a city of the Arabian Nights ought to look. There were "Miss Beverley," and "Mr. De Wolfe," and "Mr. Mortimer," and "Frederick," and "Julia." It was hard to say whether these names were real or only translated from the stage. There is some subtle magic by which a player's life is just reversed. Seen by daylight it is tawdry, and glittering, and pallid, like his cheeks and dress. But by lamp-light, and upon the stage, it becomes harmonious and proper.

Miss Beverley, and Julia, and the other ladies were quietly dressed. Their kid gloves were soiled, and their collars were not fresh, and their mouths were not beautiful. But there was nothing flashy nor obtrusive in their appearance. "Miss De Vere" had a low brow and serpent eyes, like the model Grazia in Rome, and could have well done the Lady Macbeths and Queen Catherines. Miss Beverley, with her sweet voice and sparkling eye, would have brought down the house as Julia or Rosalind. Miss Julia could have filled all parts equally well.

But the gentlemen were very fine. Mr. De Wolf had a smooth black hat with the under part of the rim roughed up, and a cloak draped Hamlet-wise upon his shoulders. Mr. Mortimer's black eyes languished in a jungle of hair curried by the barber into resistless ringlets; and all the gentlemen wore impressive buttons and heavy chains—generally not gold—while full fancy trousers and gay cravats completed the effect. Sing, O Muse! that their cheeks had the chalky pallor of old and dry rouge-beds; that there was a general odor of pomatum and essential oils; that the hair of each was curled and glistened; that their fingers had a slightly "grimé" aspect; and their feet were large enough to support any possible future corporeal increase.

They had pet dogs and Guinea pigs, which ran about the cars, making friends every where, climbing up and leaning over, nosing about for choice bits of cake, or standing, suppliant, upon hind legs and eating peanuts.

The lively players did all the talking in the car. Solemn students of newspapers glared up from the other end, and evidently wondered what wild race was defying the respectable and grim Yankee silence. Yankees in a railroad car always seem to be going to their own funerals. It is so very fast and very solemn a business. But the merry Theatians babbled on like children. They had nothing to say, but they said it cheerfully.

"Miss Harcourt will never die of consumption," said Mr. Mortimer, alluding to her power of sustained conversation.

"No. Your lungs are too strong for that," replied the fair Harcourt, with the air of repartee.

The general company took it at her own estimate, and laughed gayly at Mr. Mortimer's discomfiture. But no one laughed so much as Mr. Mortimer himself.

"Now don't," said he, "don't be so dreffal smart;" and another peal greeted his witty rejoinder.

They were well called players, for every thing was play. They talked all at once, and laughed at the cross answers.

"Oh, dear me! I must stop, or my tongue will drop out," said Miss Julia, throwing herself back.

"No fear of that," said Frederick; "your tongue is hung in the middle."

There was immense hilarity at this burst, and De Wolfe threw pieces of cookey at the ladies with—"I beg your pardon, I forgot to offer you the cake."

So the happy hours and smiles flew by, and we looked at the troop, and tried to determine the probable distribution of parts.

"Who," said we, "who can be the great tragedian, the Mr. Folair of this dramatic company?"

"D— — — — —!" There came a furious torrent of oaths which sufficiently answered the question. The incantation Frederick had risked an inquiry of Mr. Mortimer's whereabouts the previous morning, and that gentleman retorted in a way that was very expressive of his general estimate of Frederick's character, but hardly conveyed much information.

"Ho! ho! that's gentlemanly!" said Miss Beverley.

Mortimer only turned round and shook his fist at the unhappy Frederick, who had entirely withdrawn from conversation.

But the little gust whiffed by. The sun shone again, and even the thunderous Mortimer smiled. Miss Harcourt studied the cover of one of Dewitt and Davenport's novels, and read out the list of new publications. Mr. De Wolfe devoted himself to the young Emily, who hugged the most cottony of the lapdogs to her bosom. The gentlemen sat upon the arms of the seats and chatted at large. The car was made a booth, a barn. It was any thing but New England and a railroad.

Yet we thought of old actresses and sighed. Here went the light-hearted company undreaming of the future, untouched by the past. The house was pretty good last night. Perhaps it will be better to-morrow. It was a troop of gentle, social outlaws, strutting in pomatum pride and gewgaw glory. "The times" tighten or relax, but they are unaffected. Mr. Mortimer or Miss Julia leaves the company, goes to the South or the West. The remainder laugh at them with the lips, but their eyes drop an honest tear of regret for them. The Thespians are out of place and lost. The American's plan of life has not included them; and they serve only to show some idle passenger how true old stories are, and how unchanging are certain characters.

Yet how often in the midst of a comic actor's greatest triumph the mind wanders to his future; and—if it be a woman—how the face saddens in its smile! As we sat gazing at Miss Julia, and heard the really sweet voice of Miss Beverley, we could not but recall an evening of our youth, when we saw in London the farewell and charitable benefit of an old actress.

She had seen seventy years, and for more than fifty of them had been a hard worker in the theatre. She was a good stock actress of available talent, and the Green Room tried to sustain a tradition of her descent from Betterton. At length she became too infirm for longer service, and after fifty years of labor in amusing the public, she had only a prospect of immediate starvation. So several of the influential London theatre lovers arranged a complimentary benefit. The poor old actress had been very ill, and it was feared that she could not perform. But she defied the doctors, and resolved to die, if it must be so, at her post.

The evening came. It was in the height of the London season, and old Drury Lane was crowded with such an audience as now rarely assembles there. The play was Sheridan's Rivals, and the old actress was to take her favorite part of Mrs. Malaprop.

She came on, led by old Farren, himself half paralytic, and the house rose as they advanced down the stage. Tears were in the eyes of both of them. There was something pleading and pitiful in their aspect as they stood there hand in hand and bowing to the tumultuous crowd before them. There was no pleasure, there was nothing but sadness in the old faces. "Thank you," they seemed to say, "but what is it now?"

The play proceeded. It was too touching to be funny. The Rivals was never before so seriously received. Helen Faucit was Julia, and her tenderness toward Mrs. Malaprop was evidently real, as if she felt in her heart, "This may be my future." We were all glad when the curtain fell, and the play was over, and we were to have Charles Matthews and Madame Vestris.

But before they came, the audience called for the old actress. The house shook and roared with applause and impatience. But the curtain did not rise. The tumult became fearful; until suddenly the prompter's bell was heard. Then, in profound silence the curtain rose, and revealed a group upon the stage. In the centre, facing the audience, sat the old actress, with old Farren leaning over her on one side, and all the company of the theatre gathered beside and behind her chair. The house shouted, and rose, and roared again, and heaps of bouquets were piled upon the stage. But the old actress did not smile, nor bow. Her eyes were closed, and her head lay gently upon one side. She was utterly exhausted and had fainted away. The actors gathered the flowers and placed them in her lap, and strewed them about her feet.

The spectacle lasted but for a moment; then, amidst the pitying stillness of the vast audience, the curtain fell slowly, and for the last time, over the old actress; and within a few days she died.

After a weary life she had at least the pleasure of an ovation of the kind she loved. But you, O Miss Beverley, and ye, O Julia and Miss De Vere, will your sweet voices, or your low brows, secure you even as much? How lavishly you bought from the fluent young peddler the thimbles that grow on trees,* and the hickorsome candy and cookey. The gallant De Wolfe gayly tossed the cake about. The sun shone and ye were making your hay. Blithe Thespians, remember the evil day and the falling of the curtain; reflect that even Dumas's comedies have an end, and that the sad face of the old actress said so piteously, "Thank you, but what is it now?"

OUR FOREIGN GOSSIP.

WE delight in these famous "league-boots" of ours—paper-soled indeed—with which we traverse, in a day or a week, wide-away countries; making naught of a trip on water in the storm-days of February, and caring not one iota for all the mud and slough in which the poor Crimean adventurers struggle and grow hungry, despair and die.

We go from Balaklava to camp—always in our paper-soled boots—as dry as the maiden-slippers which, in the carnival of the year, have pattered their waltzes out upon the parquetée floors of the Parisian Hôtel de Ville. We nudge the old sergeants—off duty—who smoke their pipes on the sunny side of the hospital at Scutari, and listen to their proxy stories of the campaign; and in the next hour we clink our glass—wet with Isnikowen—against the brimming one of Russel of the Times. Anon, we hob-nob with the body-servant of the one-armed Raglan, and watch him as he stirs up the camp-bed of the old general, and receives his orders for a "curry" and a "grilled fowl" at noon.

We listen to Bulwer Lytton in the "House," most anxious to be orator, as he was once to be poet, but lacking, with his thin face and fine voice, the "presence" of a man who makes his spoken opinions weigh like the stroke of a hammer. We see dark-eyed Disraeli, with his impetuous language and flashes of satire, out-matching altogether the novelist Baronet, and launching out strains of invective which, however you may disapprove, will win and keep your ear until, with a euphonious period—like the last fire-flash of a rocket—he closes and "subsides."

We hear good Mr. Stafford, who, in the opening of the year of desolation, wrote so many letters for the dying soldiers in the Turkish hospitals, now telling the story of what he saw to a House which forgets eloquence, and business even, in the heart-touching tales of an eye-witness.

We see all London agog with a ministerial crisis, and knots of people, on the Square of the Royal Exchange and on the door-steps of Thread-and-Needle Street, discussing eagerly the great war-grief which is hanging now more heavily than ever over the hearts and homes of England. And it has ceased now to be only a grief which enters into private houses, and which brings tears to families of mourners: it has spread to the proportions of a national woe and shame; and England, that was so grand and proud in her strength, has been driven to the reluctant confession that, with all her wealth, and all her civilization, and all her practical ability, there are yet other peoples in the world who can more than match, even upon her own ground of practical economy and effective military execution.

It is not the money only, or the lives, which Great Britain has recklessly swamped in the South Russian campaign; she has swamped, besides, a very great measure of that national influence to which she has heretofore laid claim by a sort of prescriptive right. A country which can make its manifestoes effective in no better way than she has done in the Baltic or on the Euxine, must needs have a new interpretation put upon all her future manifestoes; and it is ten to one if the world tremble at them so much as they once did. The truth is, Great Britain has made too great a stride toward liberalism in her Government, to admit of a resort to that energy and unity of administration which belongs to an Imperial despotism; and, on the other hand, she has not yet purged herself enough of old-time privileges of caste and prescriptive worship of titles, to admit that vitality of administration which characterizes a people utterly free from aristocratic dogmas, and which calls men to places of trust for their practical capacity, and not for their position on any feudal roll.

If we might broach so sober a subject in this place, we should say that the faults of the war were working a revolution in England; and that, with the Times for a leader, thinking men are perceiving, and acting upon the perception, that their army system is a very expensive nursery for the younger sons of nobles, and that it is time now to cut off the premium which has been paid these many generations to aristocratic names and to their Moloch of primogeniture. Is not this the real tendency of the questions at issue between the administration and the country? And to cope energetically with the representatives of despotism in Europe, must not England make herself and her fighting sons either more free or less free?

But we are trenching on the province of the political papers, and must sidle away to the unimportantancies which mark the European life and which make up the talk at the tables.

WHILE so near to our mention of the fatuity of English hereditary privilege, we make a merit of citing a piece of barbarity which belongs to their kindred "antiquity" of "Church and State" dispensation.

Our authority lies in Paris Journalism, and is confirmed by "foreign correspondents" for our home papers.

A poor gentleman, of British birth, living in Paris, lost, not long ago, a little child. Cold and fever, and maybe want of somewhat of the luxuries of life, made way with it, and brought desolation to the islander's home. A few friends, Americans among them, offered their services in forwarding the last sad arrangements before the child should be dropped forever in the stranger's grave.

A poor woman—a neighbor—stole a few hours from her labor for that mournful office which comes immediately after death—the making ready for the grave. She did it quietly and quickly. Nothing was neglected; and the child looked "well" as it lay ready for burial.

The same good neighbor sent a little boy next day to know if any thing further was wished; and the boy, with the grave curiosity common to us all in such times, wished to see the dead child. He came to the coffin, looked over, dropped upon his knees, and, after the manner of his religion, said a prayer.

It was enough in itself—simple and true as was the manner of it—to consecrate the burial, and to draw Heaven's mercy upon the dead one.

But the mother, reared in the faith of another church, wished naturally enough that the holy offices might be filled by a Protestant clergyman of her own church.

Appeal was made through a friend, to the chaplain of the British Embassy; and at the same time a hint was dropped of the narrow circumstances of the family, and of the expenses which sickness had brought in its train.

The rosy-faced chaplain, very pompous in his manner, never made bargains; if it was desired that he should attend the funeral, he would be ready the next day at eight.

The next day a thick snow was falling; but the little child was made ready—the last look taken—the coffin closed. A humble bier bore the body away, with a few mourners in the train. By appointment with the friend who had gone for the clergyman, they were to meet over the grave. But when the little convoy arrived there was no clergyman to be found. The attendants were waiting—patiently at the first; but another funeral was expected; the burial could not be long delayed; so at length the body was lowered, and the ground closed over it.

The father met his friend at the gate; but no clergyman was with him. His story was this: he had called according to appointment upon the chaplain; that official had appeared in his robes, but objected strongly to the flimsy one-horse cab in which he was to drive to the grave-yard. By dint of urgency, however, this objection was overcome, and they set out—the clergyman in very ill-humor with himself for the degraded task he had undertaken.

They had driven half the distance, when the horse missed footing and fell; the carriage was broken by his fall.

The friend had set off immediately to find another coach; but owing to the icy state of the streets the stable-keepers near by one and all refused the drive. The friend returned to the chaplain, quite at ease in the cab, and implored him to go on with him on foot to the burial-ground—the distance not being greater than to his own door. The British chaplain, however, was shocked by the demand: he “never walked;” all the urgency of the friend was unavailing. The chaplain, however, did not scruple to demand and to pocket a fee of a guinea—“his usual fee on such occasions.”

He generously proposed, moreover, if the weather was fine, and nothing prevented, to say prayers at the house of the parents on the next day.

The next day, indeed, he sent his servant with his card, with the announcement that a wedding was coming off, which would forbid his attendance; but he should have no objection to make an arrangement for some future day.

The guinea disturbed the chaplain's conscience.

And all this while the poor child's body, with the hearty prayer of the neighbor's boy sanctifying its grave, was resting calmly where they laid it, in a corner of the great field of Montmartre.

The name of this precious chaplain of the British Embassy—who never fails an invitation to a dinner or a wedding—is given as the “Rev. Dr. Hale.”

Like the staff in the British army, the staff among the British clergy, as a general thing, know better how to adorn a dinner, than to do their duty.

FROM one crime to another the transition is easy. The scene is still in Paris. The name of the criminal is, or was, Arsene Rémond Lescure. He was twenty-seven years old, and was tried in November last, before the criminal court of the Seine, for his participation in at least three murders, and frequent robberies. A girl of the name of Montagu, his mistress, was tried with him as an accomplice, but—whether winning by her tears upon the sympathies of the jury, or by her weakness upon their mercy—she was acquitted.

Lescure was born in Paris, and was bound out at an early age to learn the trade of a tailor. He succeeded very well at this, and bore the reputation of a good workman, when, one day, the conscription for the army changed his lot, and made him a soldier. He showed spirit and energy, and speedily rose from the ranks to the place of sergeant. At Nancy, where he was quartered some time after, he was guilty of some act of brutal violence toward one of his men, which occasioned him the loss of his grade. He was constantly in difficulties with his officers from this time forth until his dismissal from the army in the year 1852. Returning to Paris, he brought with him the girl Montagu, and led a disorderly life; sometimes working at his former trade, but oftener hanging about the low ball-rooms and drinking-places on the outskirts of Paris, and associating very intimately with a certain Gousset, a conciierge of the Rue Neuve des Petits Champs, who bore a strong personal resemblance to Lescure.

It was observed by the lodgers in the house, that these two men often entered late at night, bringing with them large packages, which disappeared as mysteriously as they had come. At times Gousset passed the night away from home altogether; on which occasions he told his wife, who acted as porter in his absence, that he “went fishing” with Lescure, and being belated staid with him over night.

In March, 1854, there was found upon a waste plain in the neighborhood of Paris, the body of a man who had been strangled by a cord passed several times tightly around his neck, and abandoned at a little distance from the high road. Upon investigation, it was found that the man was named Bonhomme, and that he had been in possession of certain jewels and moneys at the time of his death, of all which he had been rifled.

Certain circumstances appeared to direct suspicions against the conciierge Gousset; his rooms were searched, and an inquiry set on foot, but none of the missing jewels were found, nor any evidence sufficient to warrant his being brought to trial.

Not a very long time after, an industrious carpenter, Chauvin by name, who worked in the environs of Paris, suddenly and mysteriously disappeared upon the day following the one on which he usually received his week's salary. It was known that he had attended a ball at a barrier of Paris on the night before his disappearance; that he danced with a girl named Montagu; that the same night he had been seen walking in her company; but the most active investigation could not discover any trace of the missing man; nor did a most searching inquiry to which the girl was subjected bring forward any criminating evidence against her. She admitted having been in his company; she described circumstantially the place and time of their meeting and of their parting; none of his money or effects could be found upon her; it was not even positively known that he was dead.

Hardly had the rumor of this sudden disappearance ceased to be talked of, among those who had known Chauvin, when a telegraphic message was sent up from Sens to the prefect of Paris, informing him that a fearful murder had just been committed in the outskirts of that city, and that suspicion rested upon two unknown persons who, it was supposed, had gone up by a night train to Paris.

The victims at Sens were an old man and his wife, who kept together a little ale-house and billiard-room, frequented by laborers and cartmen. Upon a certain Sunday morning it was observed that the shutters of their shop remained closed. A neighbor, who had knocked vainly at their door, prying in through a hole in the shutters, was shocked to see the old man who kept the shop lying lifeless upon the floor of the billiard-room. The alarm was at once given, and, on forcing an entrance, it was found that both the old man and his wife had been foully murdered, and all the money and valuables of the establishment carried off.

Gousset, the conciierge already spoken of, was a relative of the murdered man at Sens. It was found, besides, that he had been upon a visit to that city at the date of the crime, but was there no longer. It was conjectured that he was one of two unknown men who had taken passage in a night train, at a station four miles away from Sens, for Paris. Through their disguise, or by neglect of the officials, these men had not been identified on their arrival.

Upon application at the house of Gousset, it was learned that nothing had been heard of his whereabouts. A close watch being kept up, however, a message from him was intercepted a few days after, informing his wife that he had arrived and was staying at a certain house in the suburbs. The police presented themselves at the place designated, and found that Gousset had left. A bundle of half-made clothing, for which he had engaged to call again, was all that gave a clue to him.

Not many days after report came to the police that two suspicious men had taken lodgings in a house upon Montmartre. A bevy of officers approached the place just as one of the suspected persons was leaving; a violent struggle, on his part, to escape seemed to confirm suspicions, and he was arrested. Ascending to the chamber which the men had occupied, an officer found the door closed; and, as he forced it open, he heard the report of a pistol, and found the other lodger quite dead. The body was speedily recognized as that of Gousset, who had anticipated justice by committing suicide.

The arrested man was Lescure. He was arraigned for trial, as we have said, in November last, in company with his mistress, the girl Montagu.

From the revelations made by the last, upon this trial, the actual murder of Chauvin the carpenter was made certain, and his body discovered in a deserted quarry-pit near to Paris, with a cord about his neck, seeming to show that he was the victim of the same murderers who made way with Bonhomme. Her testimony, moreover, implicated Lescure in the crime; and she avowed that it was only her fear of his brutality which had forbidden her before from bearing the same evidence.

Lescure persisted in asserting his innocence; and he charged all the alleged crimes upon Gousset, who had committed suicide. Notwithstanding the direct testimony of various witnesses, he solemnly swore that he had never visited Sens, and that the witnesses had been deceived by the strong resemblance existing between Gousset and himself.

Before the Court, when asked at the close of the trial if he had any thing to add to the defense made out by his advocate, he replied that he had nothing.

Thereupon the judge condemned him to death.

Lescure grew pale, and passing his hand in a disturbed manner over his forehead, passed out of the Court chamber to the prison of Roquette.

An appeal was made, at his instance, against the finding of the Court, but was rejected.

After this he grew sullen and moody in his cell, and attempted to starve himself; but upon the representations of the parish priest, or from the pains of hunger, he broke over his resolution, and, with renewing strength, seemed to gain a hope of ultimate pardon, or at least of some commutation of his sentence. He avowed a great horror of dying on the scaffold. He even professed sincere repentance for such crimes as he might have committed; and made some revelations with respect to accomplices in his various robberies, which were the occasion of further arrests.

Finally, on the 31st of January, 1855, at seven o'clock of a cold, snowy morning, the Abbé who officiated at the prison chapel announced to him that his last hour was come. The guillotine had been erected at midnight on the high road before the prison gates.

Lescure exclaimed "My God!" and gave way for a moment to utter prostration. Recovering, however, he swore frightfully against society, his accusers, and the Court which had condemned him.

Being partially calmed by the Abbé, he followed him to the prison chapel, and went through the last religious ceremonies with an air of penitence.

He passed from here into the area of the prison, where the executioner arranged his toilet, by removing his coat and vest, rolling his collar low down upon his neck, and binding his hands tightly behind him by a leathern thong. He asked permission to say a word to those about him, who were mostly men of the police, or employés of the prison.

He protested again solemnly his innocence, and assured them that his accusers had been misled by his resemblance to the dead man Gousset. He even looked about appealingly, as if even at this late hour he had hope of pardon.

It was now within three minutes of eight, the time fixed for his execution. He walked with firmness out of the prison gates, and kissing the crucifix which the Abbé extended before him, ascended the steps of the scaffolding which supported the instrument of death.

A corps of two hundred soldiers of various arms were drawn up at a little distance around the guillotine, and behind them a motley crowd of perhaps a thousand spectators. In a moment he was thrown down in proper position, and his head almost in place, when, to the astonishment of the throng, he gave a sudden side-spring, raised his brawny shoulders, seized the hand of the executioner in his teeth—lacerating it severely—and for a few seconds in which the fearful struggle lasted, seemed to defy the efforts of the attendants. But other officials having come to the aid of the executioner, the poor wretch was thrust under the fatal knife, and with a crash it fell—putting an end to all his fears and his crimes at a blow.

At the risk of giving a very sombre tinge to the pages of this month, we must attach to this sad story of crime another almost as dark in its coloring, about a favorite paragraphist of Paris, Gerard de Nerval, who on one of the bitter mornings which closed the Paris January, was found hanging by the neck to a window-grating, in one of the most obscure streets of the city, quite cold and dead.

Did he himself choose so strange a place and time to finish his feuilleton career (giving thus a rich subject for Guinot and Gautier, and the rest), or was he the victim of a crime?

Even now the question is not wholly determined. There was, indeed, nothing about the man to tempt assassination for robbery's sake; and his irregularities of life (with which his life was full) were of too gross a level to expose him to the vengeance of any rival. But, on the contrary, it was observed that the body, swinging as it did upon the outer wall of a crazy old hotel, was dressed as usual, even to the hat! Could a man commit suicide with his hat on? The question has been mooted by the journalists, not so much in its relations to etiquette (as the reader might suppose) as to mechanical laws. We can not learn that any definite decision has been arrived at.

But who was Nerval? We will tell all we know. He was a man of forty and odd years, born in Paris, under the name of Labrunie. His father was an army surgeon, who wished nothing more than that his son should accomplish himself in hospital practice, and in deft management of the scalpel. But the son, Gerard Labrunie, loved poetry more than his father's physic, and so came to make stolen visits in the corners of journals, under the name of Gerard de Nerval. His grace of expression, and his dainty fancies, soon made his papers remarked, and he received a rare and welcome aid in the voluntary praise of Goethe, whose Faust had been rendered into French by the son of the surgeon.

All this while he was scarce eighteen, and enrolled in the classes of the College Charlemagne. His vacations were spent in this time at the home of an uncle, who lived in the little village of Ermonville: here Gerard lent himself to the village frolics with the warmth of young blood and the dreams of a poet. He danced with the village girls; he made madrigals, in which some bare-ankled Sylvie became a nymph; and he astounded the village curé by the richness and the wantonness of his muse.

Once when they danced in the season of the vintage, Gerard coquetting with his Sylvie, there appeared upon the lawn a strange girl, with light complexion and hair, whom they called Adrienne, and with whom Gerard, as the special ornament of the fête, danced again and again, feeling his blood run high when the flaxen ringlets of the fair Adrienne touched his cheek, and listening to her voice when she sang an old song of melancholy and of love in the dusk of the evening, with an earnestness which, they say, never wholly left him till it ended on the window-grating, where he hung in January.

The girl Adrienne, true to a good romance, was of a noble family, and had come for the day only from a neighboring chateau, to have her last familiar look at the world; for within a month, the story ran, she was to enter a convent, and her flaxen ringlets were to give place to the cap of a novice.

Gerard de Nerval brooded over the memory of that dance upon the lawn—of the golden curls which waked wild dreams in him—of the low voice, plaintive and soft—of the moon rising over the towers of Ermonville—of the rustle of the night-air in the elm-trees—of the dew gathering into crystal drops upon the grass!

But the chateau gates closed upon the figure of Adrienne, and on his next visit she was nowhere to be seen, except by her sister novices.

Meantime Nerval grew mystic over Faust, and very dreary, with his memory of Adrienne. The passing years found him a regular collaborateur in the journals of Paris. The death of parents brought him a little fortune, which he soon squandered in the purchase of rare and ancient bits of furniture, such as a carved bedstead, which at one time had served the queen of France, or a jeweled watch of some old date, whose only value lay in its history. He stored those quaint purchases in various garrets of the town, which he rented for the purpose, sometimes passing the night in one, and sometimes in another; but oftener wandering widely from home and from sense, he lingered for days together in the worst haunts of the city.

Always, as his friends say, there seemed to float tenderly over him the memory of the figure of Adrienne; and with all his waywardness was blended a refined sensibility, which made friends cling to him even amidst his vices.

One day—it was now many years after he had passed his autumn vacations at Ermonville—he was startled by the sight of Adrienne (or so it seemed to him) upon the stage of a metropolitan theatre.

Could it be so? He went to Ermonville to inquire among those who knew her; but he gained little satisfaction. Her religious life had, indeed, taken a bad turn; she was no longer a nun. She had, doubtless, broken away from the cruel restraints around her, and meeting no sympathy among her natural protectors, had thrown herself wantonly upon the world.

Even now, flaming as he was with the old fire re-lit, Gerard de Nerval did not suddenly venture to approach the lost and found Adrienne. He would write a play for her; he would be present at the rehearsals; he would be thrown near her; he would be happy; the matter would arrange itself; there would be no demand upon his sensitive nature; he would escape the effort of boldness.

So he wrote the play, with Alexandre Dumas to aid him, and he saw Adrienne; but his castle toppled down to the ground. She had learned fieri; he was timid and sensitive as a boy. He was really farther from any approaches when in her presence than when dreaming of her in his garret.

She had a hundred admirers—the least of them bolder than poor Gerard. He lamented his weakness, and he nursed it. He strolled by night around the house where she slept; he drank deeply, and wrote drunken madrigals about her, which pained him when he was sobered. His little fortune wasted by degrees, and with it his confidence grew ever less.

Finally, with only a bit of ribbon, which she had worn, to tie up his bruised heart withal, he started away from France. He traveled through Germany and Switzerland, sometimes without a penny in his pocket, and living upon charity; sometimes finding friends who got him employment, to which he would remain very steadfast for ten days together; then, before they could know any thing of him, he was gone.

In this way he went through Italy and Turkey, writing back letters which had great beauty, and which were published in the reviews of Paris. In some of these he details the strange adventures which befell him in company with a Moslem slave which he had purchased in the market of Cairo; in others he describes, with wonderful force and accuracy, the luxurious modes of the Eastern life, and his periods seem heated with an Oriental blaze.

Yet before he had gone from France, and on his return, his more intimate friends had seen traces in him of the intellectual breaking-up, to which Faust and Adrienne had contributed each their share, and which, at the last, very probably occasioned his singular death.

At one time he whispered in confidence that he was the natural son of the first Napoleon; at another he told, as a great secret, the story of his being elected Sultan of the East. Yet all this while he was making up material for the reviews, which compared well with that of the keenest Paris paragrapihists, and which only brought him less of wealth or of renown from a certain over-refinement of style and of thought, which buoyed him always above the tamer level, where the popular feuilletonistes made their gains.

Adrienne died while he journeyed in the East, but the ribbon she had worn he cherished still; and there were those among his friends who thought always that from the first sight of her, and the bruised hopes that came in the train of that gay twilight dance, his mad melancholy began.

It was, at any rate, a queer French life he lived; having no home at all—now sleeping in a garret, upon the floor, for fear of doing dishonor to some quaint couch which had borne, in its day, a worthier man or woman—now stopping with a friend—again buying a loathsome bed, at the cost of five sous for the night; and, in summer weather, lying at times under the open sky, upon a shock of grain, in the fields that skirt Paris.

When the officers of the police cut him down, they found in his pocket a fragment of an unfinished paper publishing in the Revue de Paris, called "Dream and Earnest." They say, moreover, that the cord by which he was suspended was the faded ribbon which Adrienne once wore.

This looks as if it had been suicide.

The poor fellow's body was taken to the Dead House, and for three days lay exposed there, to whosoever might choose to look on the "talented author." Fancy reading one of his graceful stories, and going there with the memory of his pleasing fancies dancing on the brain, to look at the wretched hulk which held them and which bred them!

His friends—only literary friends, however, for long ago he seems to have been deserted by all others—gained a dispensation, in virtue of which he might be buried in consecrated ground; and his body, with Dumas, Gauthier, Méry, Arsène Houssais, and others following after it, was carried to Notre Dame, where it rested a little time (longer, we dare say, than in many years before), and thence was borne on, over the icy pavements, by a long road (past the very scene where Lescaur suffered a few days before), to Père la Chaise. There the Literary Fund people had purchased a spot of ground for him to lie upon—the only home he ever knew; and when he quits it we shall all see him.

In contrast with the dismal things we have put down (for which the journals are in fault, and not we), and the still more dismal actualities which make a cloudy veil for the Crimea, we read stories of strange gayety in Paris palaces and streets. The Imperial receptions have drawn their throng of carriages to the gates of the Tuilleries, and their throng of worshipers and wonderers around the Imperial throne of the anxious Napoleon. But whatever may be the throng, that perfect system and organization which seems to run through every representation of French life, whether in camp or in salon, does not admit of confusion or of disorder. Every guest has his or her appointed place, and every nationality has its appointed chamber of assemblage; every carriage has its direction given by a guard stationed, maybe, a half mile from the palace; and whatever may be the delay, the guest may rest always assured that it arises from the throng, and from no want of foresight or of management.

A gossip girl, redolent of her first winter in Paris (we hope she may be as happy always!), writes thus of the receptions:

"Such a world of people! And the toilettes were magnificent; not so showy, but recherché; the French do dress well. It was a morning reception, you know, and the Empress wore a charming light silk hat, with the prettiest flowers (but I can't tell what kind) in the world; she wore a light watered silk, of a charming shade, with a single flounce, reaching almost from the basque down; I think she wore a rich lace mantilla. Her form is very graceful, saving the shoulders, which—let the prints say what they will—are certainly round, as round as M——'s. She is not so pretty either as the pictures, looking very thin and ill, and careworn (I wonder if he treats her well?). Yet there is a something about her eye (and you get that in the best pictures) which is very gazelle-like. It has a pleading, tending, look-through-you look, that I should have thought might have carried off the heart of the Emperor.

"Such a face as he has! He looks like an elephant; and yet one can't help admiring him, he keeps such good order here in Paris, and things go on so nicely, what with the soldiers, and music, and palace-building; the workmen are so content, never making a row, and things managing themselves, as it seems. Oh, I think Napoleon is a great man, whatever you may say!

"But he hasn't a good nose; and his color is like a bit of yellow sheep-skin; and his eye, so gray and heavy, with not a sparkle of any sort in it, whether of pleasure or vexation. They tell me it is always so—never pleased and never vexed. What a man to live with, to be sure!

"They say Eugénie loves him: Dieu le sait!

"To come back to the reception, it was very funny to see how frightened some people were! And so afraid, too, when they were fairly there, lest their dress was not quite right—looking at each other so curiously as they did, as much as to say—Pray, madame, is that the fashion?

"Of course, rich velvet and lace mantillas were the properest things a body could wear. Mine you know of last winter—well, it has gone to the palace now; but I put upon it first three yards of black lace, half a yard deep, so you would hardly have known the 'old customer.'

"The Empress speaks English very well, you know (isn't she Scotch partly?) and said a word or two, I think, to almost every one. It is funny to see some of our New York beaux (not very martial, you know) wearing a sword and cocked hat—as they are compelled to do at these receptions. Such a figure as little Willy — cut! I would give any thing to have D — see him and put him in one of his queer sketches!

"Then there was old Doctor — (isn't he a clergyman, or what?). Well, he was there, in a blue velvet cut-away, with a little sword dangling at his belt, and a yellow vest, making his scrubby little face look droil enough!

"T — was in full velvet dress, with collar and sleeves of Honiton, and looked admirably. You know her figure?—they say the Emperor even was waked into looking after her. It is to be hoped she didn't open her lips!

"I was at the ball, too, at the Hôtel de Ville—the most brilliant thing you can imagine. I will tell you all about it in my next."

If her future paragraphs are as neatly uttered as these, we shall certainly lay them before our readers.

EVEN as we write, some one whispers in our ear a story of a great book-exhibition which that inveterate patron of literary exchanges and international "hyphen," M. Vattemare, is arranging for the coming world's show in Paris; and all in the interest of America. It appears that these seven or eight years he has had at heart the establishment of an American library in the city of Paris; that so, in the centre of Europe and of Old-World learning, the savants, of whatever name, nation, or degree, might have in their eye an exposé of the intellectual growth and riches of our great Republic.

The idea was certainly a grand one, and worthier of happier auguries than have thus far attended it. But, at length, one grand object—the appropriation of a proper and elegant hall to the object, in the Hôtel de Ville—has been gained. An accumulation of books, too, numbering some ten thousand, in every branch of inquiry, are now in M. Vattemare's hands, waiting installment.

With the American feeling strong in him, M. Vattemare wants to make this show such an one as Americans may look on boastfully, and such as may retrieve our name and credit in the eyes of those over-ocean people who have rated us simply as the killers of Mexicans, the growers of great wheat-crops, and the blowers-up of huge steam-boats!

M. Vattemare proposes that this library installment shall take place at some day near to the opening of the Crystal Palace, with such simple ceremony of commemoration as shall mark the date of the new establishment and call the attention of the reading world. Is it not a matter which comes near to the pride of every thinking Republican of us all? and is it not worth a little effort, to the end that we may wear such face on the shelves of the Hôtel de Ville, as shall gain us the respect of those who read and of those who think?

For ourselves, when we write a book (if we ever do), we will present it, through M. Vattemare, to the city of Paris! Then, what a charm in regaling ourselves (if in future years we travel) with the sight of our offspring, calf-bound and gold-lettered, three thousand miles from home, in the very eye of the great capital of the European world!

We may further hope that such a library may set the French literary chifioniers right in many points, in regard to which they are now certainly laboring under violent prejudices. We may hope, without exaggeration, to see them recognize the fact that Daniel Webster did not write a Universal Dictionary—that Alabama planters do not feed terrapins with young negroes—that "Capt. Mayne Read" is not the daughter of Fennimore Cooper—that the "Reverend Beecher" is not Under-Secretary of State, and that "Miss Queechy" is positively not the sister-in-law of Miss Wetherel, or the "Lampighter" a shrewd hit at the "foolish virgins!"

Editor's Drawer.

APRIL, "the month of showers, the month of flowers; the month that cheers, the month of tears," is here, and while the young, and some of the old, are making themselves merry at the expense of each other, let us look up the origin of that custom; "more honored in the breach than the observance," of making the First of April ALL-FOOLS' DAY!

In a sketch of the religion of the Hindoos, Mr. Maurice tells us that "the First of April was anciently observed in Britain as a high and general festival, in which an unbounded hilarity reigned through every order of its inhabitants; for the sun, at that period of the year, entering into the sign Aries, the New Year, and with it the season of rural sports and vernal delight, was then supposed to have commenced." The proof of the great antiquity of the custom of celebrating this day is abundant, and Colonel Pearce, in his Asiatic researches, proves it to have an immemorial practice among the Hindoos. Mr. Maurice shows that the boundless hilarity and jocund sports prevalent on the first day of April in England, and during the Hull Festival in India, have their origin in the ancient practice of celebrating with festival rites the period of the vernal equinox, or the day when the New Year of Persia anciently began. We have a poem which was published in an English newspaper forty-five years ago, entitled

"THE ORIGIN OF ALL-FOOLS' DAY,

Which happened in the Isle of Chiekoch, on the 7th of the moon Ne-ada, which, in the European Calendar, makes the first of April."

It begins:

"Ye sportive nymphs who on Parnassus play, Though old as ages, young and ever gay!"

And after the invocation, the poet tells a tale of an Eastern prince who was magically changed into a lake; and there arose a custom, on the part of parents and husbands, of sending their children or their wives to this lake to see the prince, and they always returned having been sent on a fool's errand:

"The daughter goes, no soothing power appears,
And soon returns, dissolved in doubtful tears."

This story got abroad and reached Japan, and traveled into the "islands of the Western world,"

"And thus the legend of two thousand years,
The cause of April All-Fools' Day appears."

So the custom of "making fools" is derived from the East, and in England was all but universal fifty years ago. All ranks and classes, ages and conditions, entered into it with a zest becoming a better cause. Some of the tricks were very silly, such as sending children for dove's milk, or servants to the apothecary's for a grain of common sense. Sometimes every undertaker in town has received an order to send a coffin to the same house, where the family have been first alarmed, and then tormented all day by their arrival. Invitations have brought a hundred guests together to a feast where not one was expected, and many a lover has received the letter he or she had long been looking for; but, alas, it has proved to be an April fool!

But all these are foolish jests compared with the trick which was played about thirty years ago upon the credulous London public. A Frenchman had heard much of their fondness for new things, and the greediness with which they run after every wonder that came along. He determined to put it to a practical test, and at the same time to have the amusement of seeing the result of the experiment. He caused to be inserted an advertisement in the newspapers, setting forth a newly invented mode of taking portraits, which he said was to be done by placing the subject before a mirror, and then, by a process known only to the advertiser, he would make the portrait permanent upon the mirror. All who desired to see the operation were invited to call the next day at twelve o'clock, at No. 26 in the Strand. This number was a barber's shop opposite the windows of his lodgings, where he sat the next day and laughed at the crowds who flocked in carriages and on foot, to the dismay of the barber, who was amazed at the rush into his humble apartments, and who could make no other explanation of the advertisement than the intimation of its being the First Day of April! But the most wonderful part of the story remains to be told. What this roguish Frenchman announced as a joke, was in a few years reduced into an actuality, and all the splendid promise of the humbug was performed by the most beautiful invention of the age, which has given immortality to the name of Daguerre. In this art of sun-painting, the subject is placed before a mirror, and the image is fastened there: the very thing which was selected as the richest joke of the day.

We are happy to say that the custom is fast disappearing from America, and we presume it is less common now than formerly in England. April is no fool of a month.

"To see thee smile all hearts rejoice,
And warm with feelings strong;
With thee all nature finds a voice,
And hums a waking song.
The lover views thy welcome hours,
And thinks of summer come,
And takes the maid thy early flowers,
To tamper her steps from home."

DR. FRANKLIN, we know, was somewhat of a wag as well as a philosopher. We have before us a letter of his, written from Paris, in 1779, when he was seventy-three years old, to his daughter, Mrs. Sarah Baché, whom he calls his dear Sally, in which he speaks of himself in this humorous strain:

"The clay medallion of me you say you gave to Mr. Hopkinson was the first of the kind made in France. A variety of others have been made since of different sizes; some to be set in the lids of snuff-boxes, and some so small as to be worn in rings; and the numbers sold are incredible. These, with the pictures, busts, and prints (of which copies upon copies are spread every where), have made your father's face as well known as that of the moon; so that he durst not do any thing that would oblige him to run away, as his phiz would discover him wherever he should venture to show it. It is said by learned etymologists that the name doll, for the images children play with, is derived from the word idol. From the number of dolls now made of him, he may be truly said, in that sense, to be i-doll-ized in this country."

The old philosopher had a vein of sarcasm as well as humor about him; witness the following question and answer:

"Question. I am about courting a girl I have had but little acquaintance with—how shall I come to a knowledge of her faults, and whether she has the virtues I imagine she has?"

"Answer. Commend her among her female acquaintance."

His daughter had written to him to send her from Paris some lace and feathers, which extravagance, on her part, he says "disgusted me as much as if you had put salt into my strawberries."

And he adds: "As you say you should 'have great pride in wearing any thing I send, and showing it as your father's taste,' I must avoid giving you an opportunity of doing that with either lace or feathers. If you wear your cambric ruffles as I do, and take care not to mend the holes, they will come in time to be lace; and feathers, my dear girl, may be had in America from every cock's tail."

Writing to Mrs. Catherine Greene, he begins: "My dear old friend: don't be offended at the word old. I don't mean to call you an old woman; it relates only to the age of our friendship." And then he goes on to tell her that he hopes the war is nearly over; "for though the wickedness of the English court and its malice against us are as great as ever, its horns are shortened, its strength diminishes daily, and we have formed an alliance here (in France), and shall form others that will help to keep the bull quiet and make him orderly."

While he was one of the American Commissioners in Paris, and the war still going on in this country, he received a secret proposal to make peace. The offer he believed to come from the British ministry, and it proposed to give offices or pensions for life to "Franklin, Washington, Adams, Hancock," etc., and to make these persons or their descendants "peers of the realm," if American peers should ever be created. Franklin replies to this infamous overture in terms of warm and honest indignation; but can not close without his own pleasantry. "You will give us PENSIONS, probably to be paid out of your expected American revenue, and which none of us can accept without deserving, and perhaps obtaining, a sus-pension. PEERAGES! Alas! Sir, our long observation of the vast servile majority of your peers, voting constantly for every measure proposed by a minister, however weak or wicked, leaves us small respect for that title. We consider it a sort of tar-and-feather honor; or a mixture of foulness and folly, which every man among us, who should accept it from your king, would be obliged to renounce or exchange for that conferred by the mobs of their own country, or wear it with everlasting infamy."

Dr. Cox, lately of Brooklyn, has a mind of extraordinary make, and the brilliancy of his corruptions is unsurpassed by those of any man living. He baffles all attempts at reporting; and the best things he has ever said fall to the ground for the want of a painter capable of catching a sunbeam or a streak of lightning. His written performances bear no comparison to his oral. With an inventive word-faculty exceeding Carlyle's, and a far happier arrangement, with a slight impediment in his speech that always gives piquancy to what he is saying, he never fails, when speaking extempore, to keep the attention of his audience, either in the social circle or the crowded hall. He is as well aware as any other man of his peculiarities, and is quite as willing to speak of them. When it was told him one day that the Rev. Caleb Colton had said that Dr. Cox would be a very great man, if it were not for his Coxisms, the Doctor replied, "Very likely; if it were not for my Coxisms, I should be the Rev. Caleb Colton!"

We remember hearing him in a speech on the Church of Rome. He had inveighed with great power against the Pope, and suddenly checking himself, he said, "But I am sure I wish him well; I wish him b-b-better!"

When Dr. Cox was presiding over a Google ecclesiastical meeting, one of the rural clergy was speaking in terms of contempt of Doctors of Divinity. Dr. Cox called him to order, saying, "The brother should not speak disrespectfully of Doctors of Divinity, he does not know to what he may come himself!"

One of the Doctor's peculiarities is a habit of using a free sprinkling of Latin in his public discourses and prayers, of which a thousand specimens could be given; but we recall nothing more characteristic than his invocation—"O Lord, thou art the se plus ultra of our thoughts, the sine qua non of our blessings, and the ultima thule of our desires." To turn these expressions into equally epigrammatic English would be impossible, however pedantic the Latinity of the prayer may appear.

JONES, the chorister in one of our Eastern churches, is very fond of getting up new music, and tinkering the hymns to suit the taste. He thinks that words are nothing, the notes are every thing. He gave a grand concert about the holidays, professedly for the benefit of the poor, really to the honor and glory of Chorister Jones. On one of the anthems he had laid himself out, and wishing to make it a permanent piece of music for Sunday morning, he adapted to it the words of one of Watts's Psalms:

"Sweet is the day of sacred rest;
No mortal care shall seize my breast.
Oh, may my heart in tune be found,
Like David's harp of solemn sound!"

Taking the music and the words to the minister, he said that he wished to alter the last two lines for the sake of more elegant expression, so as to read:

"Oh, may my heart be tuned within,
Like David's sacred violin!"

The minister has a streak of humor in him, and not wishing to offend the conceited music-man, expressed his approbation of the new version, and then added that he would venture to suggest yet another change, so that the verse will read:

"Oh, may my heart go diddle diddle,
Like unto David's sacred fiddle!"

Mr. Jones accepted the amendment, but dropped the anthem altogether.

This psalm-tinkering has been carried to such a frightful extent, that now it is as hard to tell the true reading of one of Watts's or Wesley's Hymns as of a play of Shakespeare. And the worst of it is, that the best hymns are tinkered the most, their beauties ruined, and the wretched ones, unfit to be put into any Christian book, are preserved with pious care, as if it were sacrilege to do them the justice of capital punishment. Thus, in the Village Hymns we have a composition of which the following is a fair sample:

"Oh, how the resurrection light
Will clarify believers' sight;
How joyful will the saints arise,
And rub the dust from off their eyes!"

The book goes through hundreds of editions, and such stuff is treasured as if it were a gem. We commend it to Jones and his minister.

To watch the operations of our own minds is what very few of the multitude pause to do. Coleridge says, "If you are not a thinking man, to what purpose are you a man at all?" "Of all animals," said the same philosopher, "man alone was endued by the Creator with self-consciousness." A wide-awake man is not always the most conversant with what is going on in his own mind, and a man asleep is sometimes keeping up a wonderful thinking. Locke says, "When we sleep soundly without dreaming, we have no perception of time, or the length of it, while we sleep; and from the moment wherein we leave off to think till the moment we begin to think again, seems to have no distance. And so, no doubt, it would be to a waking man, if it were possible for him to keep only one idea in his mind without variation and the succession of others."

But now that we are among the philosophers, read what Malebranche says: "It is possible that some creatures may think half an hour as long as we do a thousand years, or look upon that space of duration which we call a minute as an hour, a week a month, or a whole age."

And Todd adds, that "if Locke's theory be correct, it follows that time will seem long or short, just in proportion as our thoughts are quick or slow. Hence he who dies in the very morning of life not unfrequently lives longer than another who falls at threescore and ten. Hence, too, the prediction of the prophet may be literally true, 'The child shall die an hundred years old.'"

Even the Orientals imagine that time in paradise flies swiftly, and Todd cites the illustration of Addison "In the Koran it is said that the angel Gabriel took Mohammed out of his bed one morning, to give him a sight of all things in the seven heavens, in paradise, and in hell, which the prophet took a distinct view of, and, after having held ninety thousand conferences with God, was brought back again to his bed. All this, says the Koran, was transacted in so small a space of time, that Mohammed on his return found his bed still warm, and took up an earthen picher which was thrown down at the very instant that the angel carried him away, before the water was all spilt!"

And that is a very beautiful thought of Tom Moore:

"Take all the pleasures of all the spheres,
And multiply each into endless years,
One minute of heaven exceeds them all."

So Emerson says: "The spirit sports with time—

'Can crowd eternity into an hour,
Or stretch an hour out to eternity.'

We are often made to feel that there is another youth and age than that which is measured from the year of our natural birth. Some thoughts always find us young, and keep us so."

A WESTERN correspondent writes to the "Drawer" of a sad blunder, showing that the best signs fail sometimes. He says that old Mr. Spoon kept a cake and beer shop in the village, and made a fortune in the business, leaving his money and the stand to his only son, who has long been flourishing on his father's profits, and turning up his nose at the baking business as altogether beneath a sprig of his quality. As soon as the old man was fairly under the sod, the rising son fitted up the shop on the corner, put in a show-window, through which a heap of bills and shining gold was seen, and over the door he spread a sign in handsome gilt letters, BANKING HOUSE. He was now in a new line adapted to his taste and genius.

One day as he was loitering over the counter, a stranger drove his horses close to the door, and called out to the new broker:

"I say, Mister, got any crackers?"

Spoon (very red and indignant): "None at all. You've mistaken the place."

"Any cakes, pies, and things?"

"No, Sir" (accompanied by a look intended as an extinguisher).

Stranger (in turn growing red): "Then what on earth makes you have BAKIN' HOUSE writ in sich big letters over your door for? Tell me that!"

The difference between baking and banking was not so great as young Spoon supposed.

"It's awful hot," said the client, as he stepped into his lawyer's office. "What do you keep it so all-fired hot for?"

"Because I bake all my bread here," replied the lawyer.

Another from the same region of country sends us the following, which is not bad:

"The 'Sons of Temperance had a grand turn out. In their beautiful regalia they made a fine show, marched through the village and into the church. It was a cold day, and while the exercises in the house were in progress, a smart rain set in, which froze as it fell, covering the steps of the church with a sleet more slippery than glass. A crowd of boys stood on the outside to see the procession come forth with music and banners. The men in front, with some caution, managed to get down safely, with only a slip here and there, till at length a very short "son," with very short legs and long regalia, a doughty round figure and one of those unfortunate red faces which the most temperate of men do sometimes wear, stepped forth bravely, and apparently strong in the faith that his feet would never slip, now that he was in the path of the faithful. On the top step his feet shot out ahead, and he came bumping down step by step to the bottom, to the infinite amusement of the boys, one of whom cried out, "I say, Jim, I guess that fellow's just jined."

To which Jim replied: "I call him the setting son."

Not bad, was it, for two boys out West!

"THE death of an old man's wife," says Lamartine, "is like cutting down an ancient oak that has long shaded the family mansion. Henceforth the glare of the world, with its care and vicissitudes, falls upon the old widower's heart, and there is nothing to break their force, or shield him from the full weight of misfortune. It is as if his right hand was withered—as if one wing of an eagle was broken, and every movement that he made brought him to the ground. His eyes are dim and glassy, and when the film of death falls over him, he misses those accustomed tones which might have smoothed his passage to the grave."

OUR landlords are getting mighty particular about their tenants, as well as their rents. If a body has half-a-dozen children, and of course more need of a house than if he had none at all, he is very coolly told that he can not have the premises.

"Have you children, madam?" inquired one of these sharpers, of a lady in modest black who was looking at one of his houses just finished and in perfect order.

"Yes," said the gentle mother, "I have seven, Sir, but they are all in the church-yard." A sigh and the dew of a tear gave impressiveness to the painful remark, and without further parley the bargain was closed. Her little flock were waiting for her in the church-yard around the corner, and were delighted to hear that she had found a snug house so speedily. The landlord says he shall never trust a woman in black after this.

JOE DOVEFAIL had a wife, a strong-minded wife. She looked upon Joe as a sort of necessary evil, treating him very much as the lady did her husband on the North River steamboat, who ventured to object to some of her arrangements for travel, when she shut him up suddenly by telling him in the hearing of a dozen passengers, "Why, what is it to you? if I had known you were going to act so, I wouldn't have brought you along." But Joe and Mrs. Joe Dovefail never traveled. They were always at home, though Joe was rarely seen there or elsewhere. She had long trained him to the habit of retiring under the bed when company called, and so familiar had he become with that retreat, it was a question whether, in default of personal service, a warning to a militia training would hold him, unless left under that bed, as being his "last usual place of abode." During the stay of Mrs. Joe's friends, he occasionally thrust out his head, like a turtle, but one glance of the loving eye of his spouse would send him under with cold shivers running up his back. One day, as she was hob-nobbing over the fire with a friend and a social glass, Joe thrust out his figure-head, and defied the shakes and frowns of his wife, till growing valiant and desperate, he sung out—"My dear, you may shake your head just as much as you please, but I tell you, as long as I've got the spirit of a man, I will peek."

"I CALLED at Doctor Physio's office one day," writes a Philadelphia friend, "and found one of the most noted of our sexton-undertakers lying on a settee, waiting for the return of the doctor. The easy familiarity of his position, and the perfect atmosphere indicated, led me to say:

"Why, Mr. Plume, have you gone into partnership with the Doctor?"

"Yes," he replied, as he raised himself up; "we've been together some time—I always carry the Doctor's work home when it is done."

"I ADVISE tapping," said the Doctor, after having exhausted all the powers of his healing art on the case. The father of a family, a hard drinker, was bloated with the dropy to the size of a barrel. He had drunk nothing but whiskey for years, but the doctor said he was full of water nevertheless, and advised him to be tapped. The old man consented, but one of the boys, more filial than the rest, blubbered badly, and protested loudly against it.

"But why don't you want father to be tapped?"

"Cause nothing that's tapped in this house ever lasted more than three weeks."

The same doctor had another patient of the same sort, and when he found him near his end, he sought to break the news to his wife in a gentle way, by telling her that her husband would probably soon be in the world of spirits.

"And won't he be glad when he gets there?" she said, "for sure he never could get enough here."

Is there a better specimen of penning than is found in the last two lines of Hood's "Faithless Sally Brown?" Indeed the whole stanza is perfect. Ben was a sailor:

"His death, which happened in his berth,
At forty odd befell;
They went and told the sexton, and
The sexton tolled the bell."

A GENTLEMAN stepping on board the boat at the Brooklyn Ferry, a short time ago, stumbled against the pail which, as usual, a woman was using in cleaning the floor when the people were flocking into the cabins. A by-stander remarked,
"He has kicked the bucket."

"Oh, no," said another, "he has only turned a little pail."

That is better than the noted one of Charley Lamb, who, on being pointed—or rather having his attention turned—to a church spire in which several gentlemen were said to have dined, remarked that they must have been sharp set.

MOST of the conundrums are plays upon words, and some say the worse they are, the better. We never understood why. Here are two or three as good as new:

When two men are running a race, which one has no legs?—The one whose legs are a head.

What slight difference is there between a duck with one wing and a duck with two?—Only the difference of o-pin-ion.

THE Scotch parson was betrayed into more puns than he meant to make. When he prayed for the Council and the Parliament, that they might hang together in those trying times, a countryman standing by cried out,

"Yes, with all my heart, and the sooner the better; it's the prayer of all good people."

"But, my 'friends,' said the parson, "I don't mean as that fellow does; but I pray that they may all hang together in accord and concord."

"No matter what cord," the inveterate fellow sung out again, "so it's only a strong one."

IN the old town of Windsor, in Connecticut, is a tomb-stone bearing this quaint inscription:

"HERE LYETH EPHRAIM HVIT,
SOMETIMES TEACHER TO THE CHVRCH OF WINDSOR,
WHO DYED SEPTEMBER 14, 1644.

Who when Hee lived, we drew our vital breath,
Who when Hee died, his dying was our death,
Who was the stay of State, the Church's staff—
Alas! the times forbid an Epitaph."

IN Springfield, Massachusetts, is a grave over which is written,

"HERE LYETH THE BODY OF MARI, THE WIFE OF ELIZUR HOLYOKE,
WHO DIED OCTOBER 26, 1657.

She that lies here was while she stood
A very glory of womanhood;
Even here was sown most precious dust,
Which surely shall rise with the just."

HORNE TOOKE, on being asked by George III. whether he played cards, replied, "No, your Majesty; I can not tell a knave from a king."

SPEAKING of cards reminds us of what Sir Walter Scott said was the shrewdest reply he ever heard. Doctor Gregory, of Edinburgh, was a witness on a trial of vast importance, to prove the insanity of a very distinguished man. It was shown by his counsel that that he was very skillful in playing cards.

"And do you seriously say," said the learned counsel to the doctor, "that a person having a superior capacity for a game so difficult, and which requires in a superior degree memory, judgment, and combination, can be at the same time a deranged man?"

"I am no card-player," replied the doctor, "but I have read in history that the game of cards was invented for the amusement of an insane king."

WE never had sympathy with the spirit that makes light of old maids. The most of those whom it is our joy to know are lovable people, as all loving people are. Hence we can not imagine any thing more despicable than to put up such an epitaph as this, which is copied from an old newspaper (1750):

"Epitaph on a talkative Old Maid.
"Beneath this silent stone is laid
A noisy, antiquated maid,
Who from her cradle talked till death,
And ne'er before was out of breath."

Or this:

"Here lies, return'd to clay,
Miss Arabella Young,
Who on the first of May Began to hold her tongue."

IN the New England Primer (Boston, 1691), is the following quaint heading to one of the chapters, a short catechism for children:

"SPIRITUAL MILK, FOR AMERICAN BABES, Drawn out of the Breasts of both Testaments, for their Souls' Nourishment. By JOHN CORTON."

Lord Lindsay, in his Lives of the Lindsays, ascribed to his kinsman, the elder David, a posthumous work under the title:

"The Heavenly Chariot layde open for transporting the New-borne Babes of God from Rome infected with Sin, towards that Eternitie in which dwelle Righteousness; made up of some Rare Pieces of that purest Golde, which is not to be found but in that Richest Thesaurie of Sacred Scripture," etc. Imprentit at Sanct Androia, by E. Raſan, Printer to the Vniversitie, 1622."

Three years afterward a similar work was published, with this title-page:

"The Godly Man's Journey to Heaven, containing Ten severall Treatises, viz.: 1 and 2. An Heavenly Chariot; 3. The Blessed Chariotsman; 4. The Lanthorn for the Chariot; 5. The Skillful Chariot-driver; 6. The Gard of the Chariot; 7. The Sixe Robbers of the Chariot; 8. The Three Rockes layd on the Way; 9. The only Inne God's Babes aime at; 10. The Ghosts of the Inne. By Maister D. Lindsay, Minister of God's Word at Leith. 12mo. London, 1625."

SOME curious particulars might be collected respecting quaint texts and sermons, such as that of the Dean of St. Stephen's, when Vienna was relieved by King John Sobieski of Poland, "There was a man sent from God whose name was John" (St. John, i. 6); and that of Dr. South before the Merchant Tailors' Company: "A remnant shall be saved," Romans, ix. 27.

About the year 1640 a controversy occurred in London, which called out a variety of pamphlets; several of the titles are annexed:

"Messe of Pottage, very well seasoned and crumbed with Bread of Life, and easie to be digested, against the Contumelious Slanderers of the Divine Service. A Pottage, set forth by Gyles Calfine. London, 1642, 4to."

"Answer to lame Gyles Calfine's Messe of Pottage, proving that the Service Booke is no better than Pottage, in comparison of divers Weeds which are chopt into it to poyson the taste of the Children of Grace, by the Advice of the Harlot of Babylon's Instruments and Cooks. London, 1642, 4to."

"Answer, in Defence of a Messe of Pottage, well seasoned and crumb'd, against the last, which falsely says the Common Prayers are unlawfull, and no better than the Pope's Porrage. London, 1642, 4to."

"Fresh Bit of Mutton for those fleshly-minded Cannibals that can not endure Pottage; or, a Defence of Gyles Calfine's Messe of Pottage, against the idle yet insolent exceptions of his monstrous Adversary. London, 1642, 4to."

About those days and for many years afterward, running down through Cromwell's time, we have much of this sort of nomenclature for books and also of people. The first name on the list of Cromwell's Parliament was Praise-God Barebones. Others quite as peculiar were given to children by the Puritans in Old England and New. It was not an unusual thing to confer upon a child a whole text of Scripture. A good old lady died, within our circle, not many years ago, who was familiarly known as Aunt Tribby, but who was baptized with the more extended title of "Through-much-tribulation-we-enter-into-the-kingdom-of-heaven Crabb." In their fondness for Scripture names, some parents have not been sufficiently discriminating; one we remember, in Vermont, having named his son Most Noble Festus. Another, having complimented the four evangelists by naming a son after each of them, called his fifth "Acts of the Apostles," as he did not wish to be partial.

General Taylor said it was unwise to name a child after a living man, as it was quite uncertain what he might turn out to be; and on the same principle, he thought it unsafe to honor a general until after the war was over. We perceive that our English friends have not adopted this sagacious suggestion, but are already naming their children after the heroes of the Crimea. One little Bull already rejoices in the euphonious cognomen, Raglan Inkermann. The Countess of Trapani, in Naples, has lately honored the great event of the present year, by naming her new-born daughter, Maria Theresa Ferdinanda Immaculate-Conception Sabatia Luciana Philomena, the Queen of the Two Sicilies being her sponsor.

BUT let us get out of these quiddities and close by singing a song, perfect in its kind, characteristic of the time. It is from a work entitled An Hour's Recreation in Music, by Richard Alison, published in 1606:

"There is a garden in her face,
Where roses and white lilies grow;
A heavenly Paradise is that place,
Wherein all pleasant fruits do flow.
There cherries grow, that none may buy,
Till cherry ripe themselves do cry

"These cherries fairly do inclose
Of orient pearl a double row,
Which, when her lovely laughter shows,
They look like rosebuds fill'd with snow;
Yet these no peer nor prince may buy,
Till cherry ripe themselves do cry.

"Her eyes, like angels, watch them still,
Her brows like bended bows do stand,
Threatening with piercing frowns to kill
All that approach with eye or hand
Those sacred cherries to come nigh,
Till cherry ripe themselves do cry."

AN up-country reader and writer says: "Our people were afflicted badly with an organ-ic fever. Some of them had been "to" Albany, and were so much astonished with the magnificent organ peals in the church which they attended, that nothing would do but we must have one of our own. To pay three or four thousand dollars was, however, quite as much of an impossibility as to do without, or to build a pyramid. At last they heard of a small second-hand organ, quite out of repair, which would be put in order and sold for five hundred dollars. They bought it. The gem of an organ was set up in our neat little church. The long expected day for its first performance arrived. It was a summer Sabbath, and among our people was a lady from the city with a pet boy of three years old, who had often seen and heard the music-grinders in the streets with a monkey to amuse the children. Instantly, as the organ opened its throats, the boy turned and looked into the gallery. Then he stretched his neck; then he mounted the seat.

"'Sit down,' said his mother. 'Sit down, I say!' she repeated.

"'No I won't,' said the anxious child, 'I want to see the monkey!'

"The remark was heard by all the good people in the vicinity, who were thus reminded that our organ sounds more like a street-machine than one of the noble instruments they had heard of in Albany."

"THE good time coming," which the prophets have been promising, is just at hand. We feel quite certain of it. And the doctors, not of the law nor of theology, are to bring it in. The pills are to do the business. We find an advertisement in all the papers headed "UNHAPPINESS," and are there assured that to secure its perfect cure the unhappy individual has but to take Brandreth's pills. But there are some who prefer homeopathy, and we have a book of prescriptions, in which the symptoms are described, and the medicines adapted to each case are indicated. Among them we find the following: "For anxiety of mind about business or the soul's salvation—sulphur."

These assurances that the sources of misery may be dried up by the free use of Brandreth's pills under the old practice, or of sulphur under the new, will be a joyful announcement to all the wretched sons and daughters of men. Whenever we "feel bad," without looking into the cause, we have only to look to the cure, and dispose of the matter at once by taking a pill; and even anxiety of mind about this world, or the world to come, is to be cured by swallowing a few grains of brimstone! Vive la bagatelle!

HEAR an old veteran, of seventy-five years of age, in a communication to "The Drawer:"

"Having a little business, I was called to the place of my nativity not long since—one of the numerous pleasant towns on the banks of the beautiful Connecticut river. There the sober and saddened summer-light of 1779 first broke upon my now dimmed eyes. After I had finished my business, I walked a mile to the burying-ground; first casting my eyes around to discover, if I could, the earliest stone or stones. I think I succeeded, for I found red sandstones as far back as 1650. By scratching away green moss and mould, I managed to make legible a good many names. There were 'Ralph,' 'Rufus,' 'Edith,' 'Matilda,' and from these names I inferred their Norman and Saxon descent. Pursuing the same course of thought, I looked for the old Puritans. I soon found 'Preserved,' 'Recompense,' 'Tribulation,' 'Overcome' (a fact), 'Hope,' 'Patience,' 'Charity,' etc. 'Now,' thinks I to myself, 'I will look for the veterans of the old French War and the Revolution.' I soon found 'Sergeants,' 'Ensigns,' 'Lieutenants,' 'Captains,' 'Majors,' 'Colonels,' and 'Generals'—a noble company of heroes—to say nothing of 'Drummers,' 'Fife-majors,' and 'Corporals.' An imposing stone proclaimed one to be a branch of nobility; it bore only the name—

—HUNTER.

"Passing on, I may say I was literally 'arrested' by one inscription, which ran as follows:

'In Memory of
LIEUTENANT ———:
DIED 1783.
Death and the Grave—
Without any Order.'

"I wish I knew the meaning of this inscription. Should you think my brain so worn by seventy-five years of use as to be unable to comprehend it, please say so, and give me the light of your better judgment."

The idea intended to be conveyed appears to us to be, that Death and the Grave await no "orders" to seize and bear away their captives.

SOMEBODY has been amusing himself and his readers with the following "backward readings," or rather readings that, backward or forward, are precisely the same—that is, have all the letters, and nearly all the entire words:

"Name no one man."

And the other:

"Snug and raw was I ere I saw war and guns."

This last "curiosity of literature," doubtless many a wasted, wounded young recruit, toiling and bleeding in the Crimea, can avouch to be but too true.

It will task the nerves of most readers to avoid laughing at the following most amusing account of the "Evils of being Near-sighted," involving also an instance of the whimsical good-nature and politeness of the French character:

"I was passing down Broadway one pleasant morning, when my dog—as I thought, but, alas! it was another's—rushed between my legs, and nearly threw me down. Although naturally, or rather commonly, a good-natured man, I was not, at that precise moment, in my smoothest mood. The tranquil current of my mind had been agitated by more than one circumstance that day, and the little dog rendered me absolutely angry. With an exclamation of wrath I gave this member of the canine race a kick, which sent him howling to the opposite side of the street.

"Sare!" said a tall, swarthy, Frenchified, ferocious-looking personage, bowing until his very mustaches brushed my nose; 'you 'ave kick my dog! What for you 'ave done dis for, eh?'

"My dear Sir," I exclaimed, terribly discom-composed, 'I beg ten thousand pardons! I really thought it was my own dog.'

"Ah! you t'ought it was your dog, ah? No, Sare! it vas my little dog zat you 'aves kick!'

"Sir, I am exceedingly sorry; I mistake him for my own dog. I assure you I thought it was my own dog at the time."

"But, by gar, Sare, dere is not de resemblance dere. De one dog is of ze white, and de oder dog is of ze black color. Besides, Sare, de one 'aves got ze ear ver' wide, and de oder ver' short. Yess; and ze one 'aves got de tail ver' moch, and ze oder 'aves lose de tail ver' moch! Dere is not resemblance, Sare! Non!!'

"But, Sir, I am near-sighted; my eyes are impaired. I could not see the difference between the dogs."

The foreigner looked steadily in my face for a moment, but perceiving nothing there but truth, his countenance became calm and comparatively pleasant.

"Ah! you 'aves den, Monsieur, ze vision not very far, eh?'

"I assented.

"Ah! den zat is all de apology zat I shall demand," and, with a graceful adieu, he passed on.

"How fortunate for me," soliloquized I, "that he was a Frenchman! Had he been one of 'our folks,' I might have figured in the gutter before I could have an opportunity to explain, or excuse myself. My apology would have been laughed at by a Yankee. 'Alas!' sighed I, pausing, and wiping the glasses of my spectacles, 'who ever pitied a near-sighted man?'

We scarcely remember to have read a more simply-touching record, in a long time, than the following description, by the author of "Europe in a Hurry," of the death of a banjo-player attached to a company of sable melodists, recently at San Francisco, from the Atlantic States. The sketch is from a new but promising magazine, "The Pioneer." We annex a single extract—a fair "sample" only of the beauty of the whole:

"You'll never see the like of poor Tom Briggs again! He was different from most other players, Tom Briggs was. They seldom take any pride in their business, and are generally satisfied with any cheap instrument which they can get. But Tom was very particular. He never stood upon the price of a banjo, and when he got a good one, he was always studying some way to ornament it, and improve it.

"He had a light one, and a heavy one, for different kinds of work; and he played so strong, that he had to get a piece of steel made for the end of his finger, as a sort of shield, like, to prevent his tearing off his nails. He was very fond of playing the heavy one; and when we were coming up the coast (it is one of his brother-players who is speaking), he would sometimes strike his strongest notes, and then turn round to me, so proud, and say:

"Ah, Eph! what will they say in San Francisco, what will they think, when they hear the old Cremona speak like that?'

"It didn't make any difference even when he took sick. He played away all the same. Only after he got here to 'San Fran.,' he could play only the light one. He used to have it hanging against the wall, so that he could reach it in bed. Most any time you went in, you'd hear him talking to 'the old Cremona,' as he called it, and making it talk back to him. But by'm-by, he got so weak he could scarcely hold on to it; and I have sat beside his bed and watched him till the sound became so faint that it seemed as if he and the banjo were both falling into a dream. All the while, though, he kept a good heart, poor fellow! and we kept encouraging him along, too; and every now and then he'd raise himself up and say:

"Ah! how I'll make 'em look around when I get strength enough once more to make the old banjo speak!"

... "But at last, he felt that he was gone: and after some straight, sensible talk, he told us when he died, to take the two banjos and pack them up carefully, and send them home to his father and mother. An hour before he went, he asked me to hand him his banjo. He took hold of it and looked at it for a moment, as if he was looking at a person he was going to part with forever, and then he tried to strike the chords. But he could merely drop the weight of his thin fingers on them. There was no stroke to his touch at all. He could just barely make a sound, and that was so fine that it appeared to vanish away, like the buzz of a fly. It was so dim, that I don't believe he heard it himself, and he dropped his hand as if he gave it up. Then he looked at me as if he understood every thing in the world, and shaking his head, said:

"It's no use—hang it up, Eph; I can't hit it any more!"

"These were the last words that poor Tom Briggs ever spoke!"

MANY a reader, if he has arrived at the mature age of manhood, will recall to mind some remote Sabbath-scene, kindred to his feelings, on reading the following:

"I shall never forget a scene in which deep pathos was a principal characteristic, which I once saw at a country church in the interior of the State of New York. A pious clergyman, whose three-score years and ten had turned his hair to snow, and given to his limbs the tremulousness of age, was to preach his farewell discourse to his little congregation, over whom he had presided for nearly half a century.

"The place itself, and the time, were accessories to the 'abiding effect' which was left upon the minds of all who were present.

"It was the afternoon of a mild day in October, and the bare leaves of the trees which shaded the church were falling in slow eddies by the opening windows. After recapitulating his long labors among his congregation—his "teachings publicly, and from house to house," like Paul; the number he had married, christened, baptized—after these affecting reminiscences, which touched an answering chord in the bosoms of all his hearers—he adverted to that day wherein all the actors in the drama of life must enter at the last scene, to complete and make up the sublime catastrophe, and warned them to prepare for its momentous solemnities.

"For myself," said he, "I can say, standing upon a narrow point between two worlds, that I account myself as nothing until I was my Saviour's, and enrolled in the register of the Redeemer."

"Here, raising his trembling, attenuated hands to heaven, his dim eyes streaming with tears—for although he had all along struggled successfully with his emotions, his feelings now entirely overcame him—he repeated these lines in the most melting cadence:

"E'er since by faith I saw the stream
Thy flowing wounds supply,
Redeeming love has been my theme,
And shall be till I die.

"Then in a nobler, sweeter song,
I'll sing thy power to save,
When this poor lisping, trembling tongue Lies silent in the grave."

"The look which followed these touching verses—the subdued emotion, the pious hope, the spiritual fervor which beamed in the countenance of the venerable father—will never be banished from my memory."

"POLITE and elegant to the last!" was our thought as we read the following in a miscellaneous column of the London "Dispatch" weekly newspaper:

"In the year 1792, Lieutenant Campbell, of the Middlesex militia, was found guilty of forgery, and as the penalty then existed, he was condemned to die for the offense.

"On the eve of his hanging, he sent invitation-cards to many of his brother officers, couched in the following language:

"Lieutenant Campbell's compliments to ———: he requests the pleasure of his company to-morrow morning, to take a cup of chocolate, and to do him the honor to accompany him to Tyburn, to be present at his execution."

Now, if this had been an invitation to attend a marriage in state, could it have been more "cavalierly" penned?

ALTHOUGH it is quite certain that the Chinese fowls known as *Shanghai*s have fallen into some disrepute, from the alleged fact that they "Grow largely to legs,

And eat up their own eggs," yet they are not without their defenders, even after they are dead and gone. For example, read the subjoined affecting notice of the death of a Shanghai rooster, from the pen of his former afflicted owner:

"His voice, when heard amidst the crowing of other roosters, was like the trombone in an orchestra of violins, or the gigantic bass of rumbling thunder amidst the hum of a dozen spinning-wheels:

"Farewell, faithful servant! a lasting farewell!
From thy side let all roosters take warning:
No more will thy voice, in a long and loud wail,
Awake us to get up and go to work about half-past three o'clock in the morning!"

From this last line, which is liberally constructed so far as "any quantity" of "feet" are concerned, we infer that the Shanghai, among their other defects, are somewhat too early risers to suit the "generality of customers in general."

ANY one whose memory can go back some twenty years ago, will recognize the condensed picture which we abridge below, of what was then "The Ancient and Modern Book-auctioneer."

The "Ancient Book-auctioneer" had an "apartment" on the ground-floor of a store on Broadway, or in the near vicinity of that great thoroughfare, on a cross-street. That was the Temple of the "Intellectual Knight of the Hammer." His stores were all well-thumbed; a stray work of the moderns, in faded, garish gilt binding, was only rarely to be seen.

Here sat the "Ancient Book-auctioneer," on a tall, three-legged stool, "knocking off" (what a desecration of genius and intellect is that word!)—knocking off philosophy, poetry, science, metaphysics, cataphysics, geology, mineralogy, syntax and prosody, with no more immediate idea of what he was doing than if he were an automaton figure (like Maelzel's Chess-Player) with a small hammer in his hand, moved by cunning machinery, adroitly concealed below. But listen to him for a moment: what time he addresses seedy literateurs of the last century—embryo authorlings—idlers of all and every grade—respectably-dressed mechanics and ill-dressed laborers—sickly students, with pale countenances, and learned savans, in quest of some rare work. Hark, for a moment, to the Ancient Book-auctioneer:

"Gen-tell-men! here's a copy of—a mag-nif-icent copy, gen-tell-men—of Plutarch's Lives. 'Poor old Plute,' we used to call him, I remember, in college. 'Twas a way we had; boys will be boys, you know, gen-tell-men. We did so with all of 'em. Wenus we called 'Weeny'—Apollo, 'Poll'—and Cicero, 'Cis?' Well—how much for our old friend 'Plute?'—sometimed called Pluto—one of the very biggest of the heathen gods, who came down to earth in the shape of a most tremendous Tom-cat! How much, gen-tell-men, for our old college friend Plute, or Pluto? How much 'm offered for Plute? Say ten dollars to start him, gen-tell-men!"

The Ancient Book-Auctioneer embodied the very romance, the poetry of the literary or intellectual rostrum. His admiration of Milton approached idolatry. You might revile all the saints in the calendar, and meet only his calm rebuke; but doubt the infallibility of the Bard of Paradise, and the vials of his wrath were immediately poured out. Milton was a "stock-book" with him. One night some unlucky wight bid sixpence for it.

"SIXPENCE!" shouted the Ancient, "for the legacy of the sublime MILTON!—S—I—X—P—E—N—C—E! Boy, put out the lights! No more sales to-night! No premises in my possession shall ever shelter an audience who can stand tamely by and permit such a literary sacrilege!"

And out the lights went, sure enough, and the grumbling auditory groped their way to the street.

THERE is something a little ludicrous in the straits which an Old Bachelor may be put to, when we find him, in the absence of other companions, making love to his tea-kettle:

"I have been so often and so unprofitably in love, I have serious thoughts of paying my addresses to my Tea-Kettle. I have found her a very warm friend. She sings, too; and you know how fond I am of music. She sings a very cheerful tune: I have heard a voice a thousand times more unpleasant than hers. On a winter's night, after a well-spent day with a volume of old poetry—Shakespeare, Milton, Spenser—a volume of Dr. Johnson, or a new novel; when the wind is blowing and pattering the rain against one's window—then sweet is the song of the kettle—much sweeter to a studious man than a crying child or a scolding wife. However, I must consider seriously before I offer her my hand—lest she should burn it!"

A VERY beautiful illustration of the External In- fluence of the Sabbath is contained in this brief isolated passage, which we find in a "lower depth" of our capacious "Drawer."

"Every Sabbath morning, in the summer time, I thrust back my curtain to watch the sunrise stealing down a steeple which stands opposite my chamber window. First the weather-cock begins to flash; then a fainter lustre gives the spire an airy aspect; next it encroaches on the tower, and causes the index of the dial to glisten like gold as it points to the gilded figure of the hour.

"Now the loftiest window gleams, and now the lower. The carved frame-work of the portal is marked strongly out. At length the morning glory, in its descent from heaven, comes down the stone steps one by one; and there stands the steeple, glowing with fresh radiance, while the shades of twilight still hide themselves among the nooks of the adjacent buildings.

"Methinks, although the same sun brightens it every fair morning, yet the steeple has a peculiar robe of brightness for the Sabbath."

On the beautiful Lake George, or "Lake Hori-con," as the late Colonel Stone named it, is a charming scene called "Sabbath-Day Point." There is a similar "point" in the mind of all who look upon nature in its loveliness on a bright Sabbath-day in Spring.

A WORKMAN at a Lunatic Asylum in England, left a chisel, more than three feet long, on a recent occasion, in one of the wards. A furious patient seized it, and threatened to kill with it any one who approached him. Every one then in the ward immediately retreated from it. At length the attendant opened the door, and balancing the key of the ward on his hand, walked slowly toward the dangerous madman, looking intently at it. "His attention," said the attendant, "was immediately attracted. He came toward me, and asked:

"What are you doing with that?"

"I'm trying to balance this key on my hand," said I, "and I can do it; but you can not balance that chisel in that way on the back of your hand."

"Yes, I can," said he; and he immediately placed it on the back of his hand, balancing it carefully, and extending it toward me.

"I took it off very quietly, and without making any comment upon it. He seemed a little chagrined at having lost his weapon, but he made no attempt to regain it, and in a short time all irritation passed away."

BY-THE-BY, "speaking of chisels," that was an affectionate way of applauding an actor, when on the stage, which was adopted in the case of a popular performer at New Orleans, the younger Placide:

A lady, a great favorite with the New Orleans public, was performing on the same evening, it being for her "benefit." At the close of the performance she was called out, and bouquets, and other and more costly tokens of approval, were liberally bestowed upon her. Nor was Mr. Placide not remembered. He was enthusiastically applauded in an after-piece; and while he was engaged in his part, amidst applause, something very bright came whizzing and flashing upon the stage, passing only a little distance above his head, and going through a scene in the rear of the stage, and disappearing from view.

"Turn him out! turn him out!" said a hundred voices at once; and the vociferators looked up to the quarter of the house whence the missile, or whatever it was, had proceeded.

But at length all was still, and the play proceeded to the end without interruption. The man who had created the disturbance was removed (struggling, to be sure, but simply remonstrating, without other resistance).

As Mr. Placide was in his un-dressing-room, preparing to leave the theatre, a man appeared at the stage-door, inquiring for him.

"Show the gentleman up," said Mr. Placide. And up he came.

"Play-side," said he, almost with tears in his eyes—for he was in a maudlin mood—"Play-side, you have always been a very great favor-ite of mine—always. Now I've been cruelly treated here to-night, and I was determined not to go home till I had seen you, and told you about it—for, Play-side, you have always been a great favor-ite of mine."

"But, my friend, what is your cause of complaint? Who has insulted you?"

"Well, you see, when I see 'em throwing flowers, and diamond-pins, and little pocket-books down to that pretty Mrs. H——, thinks I, I'll throw something to Play-side, for he's my favorite; and I did throw it!"

"What was it?" said Placide, having an inkling of a curious explanation.

"Why, it was my best chisel! I'm a cabinet-maker, and I'd had it put in first-rate order, and 'twas handy in my pocket; and I sent it, 'cause you was always a favor-ite of mine, Play-side! If it had been three times as good a one you should ha' had it, 'cause you was always a favor-ite of mine!"

Placide says that he likes cordial applause, but he doesn't want it to come "full chisel!"

"We know not what's resisted," says Robert Burns, speaking of those who may never, by sad reverses—by want—have been tempted to do a mean or dishonorable action, which nothing could excuse, and which Burns never for a moment contemplated. The "resistance" of which he spoke was the resistance which Feeling offers against Honest Pride.

The Scottish poet Thom, a hand-loom weaver in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, was "hard beset" by poverty. He is out of employment, and sets out with his sick wife, with an infant, and two older, but also small children, to seek the means of keeping them "safe from hunger" by honest labor. On their sudden journey—for they have been "turned out of house and home" at a moment's warning—they set forth at nightfall on a sour, disagreeable November day. Poor Thom is a cripple, having had his ankle broken by the carriage of an English earl. Seeing a "comfortable-looking steading" by the roadside, "twixt the gloaming and the mirk," he seeks shelter, but is "denied the hospitality of even an out-house and straw." He returns to his little family without; the "wee things," weary and way-worn, "travel and foot-sore," and one little thing, who was "stupid and waesome-like," had fallen asleep. He announces to his weeping wife the result of his application, and then goes on to say:

"Few more words passed. I drew her mantle over the wet and chilled sleepers, and sat down beside them. My head throbbed with pain, and for a time became the tenement of thoughts I would not now reveal. They partook less of sorrow than of indignation; and it seemed to me that this same world was a thing very much to be hated; and on the whole, the sooner that one like me could get out of it, the better for its sake and mine own. I felt myself, as it were, shut out from mankind; inclosed; prisoned in misery; no outlook—none! My miserable wife and little ones, who alone cared for me, what would I not have done for their sakes at that hour!

"Here let me speak out; and be heard too while I tell it; that the world does not at all times know how unsafely it sits; when Despair has loosed Honor's last hold upon the heart; when transcendent wretchedness lays weeping Reason in the dust; when every unsympathizing on-looker is deemed an enemy; who then can limit the consequences? For my own part, I confess that, ever since that dreadful night, I can never hear of an extraordinary criminal, without the wish to pierce through the mere judicial view of his career, under which, I am persuaded, there would often be found to exist an unseen impulse; a chain with one end fixed in Nature's holiest ground, that drew him on to his destiny."

Doesn't this touching passage remind one of the admirable satire of Dickens upon "Duty to Society," always owed, but never paid in any other coin than punishment and wrath:

"Oh, ermined Judge! whose 'duty to society' is now to doom the ragged criminal to punishment and death, had'st thou never, MAN, a duty to discharge, in barring up the hundred open gates that wooed him to the felon's dock, and throwing but ajar the portals to decent life?"

"HAVE you ever included," writes a lady correspondent, from Richmond (Virginia), "the following lines, by Miss Hannah F. Gould, in your pages? If you have not done so, they will be found most acceptable to many a reader of your 'Drawer.' I think them very beautiful."

They are so; but we take the liberty to correct one line, to the form it bore in the original, which is misquoted. The piece was entitled

A NAME IN THE SAND.

Alone I walked the ocean strand,
A pearly shell was in my hand;
I stooped, and wrote upon the sand
My name—the year—the day.
As onward from the spot I paced,
One lingering look behind I cast;
A wave came rolling high and fast,
And washed my lines away.

And so, methought, 'twill shortly be
With every mark on earth from me;
A wave of dark oblivion's sea

Will sweep across the place
Where I have trod the sandy shore
Of Time, and been, to be no more;
Of me, my frame, the name I bore,
To leave no track nor trace.

And yet with Him who counts the sands,
And holds the waters in His hands,
I know a lasting record stands

Inscribed against my name,
Of all this mortal part has wrought.
Of all this thinking soul has thought,
And from these fleeting moments caught,
For glory or for shame!

Literary Notices.

THE most important publication of Harper and Brothers, during the past month, is the Statistical Gazetteer of the World, by J. CALVIN SMITH, which is now completed in one large octavo volume, forming a copious repository of geographical knowledge, brought down to the latest dates, and especially full on the United States and British America. A gazetteer of this kind has been a desideratum for some time past, so great has been the progress of geographical discovery, and so rapid the development of regions and countries which have been almost called into existence within a few years, and assumed a place among the nations of the civilized world. The introduction of steam and electricity, as mediums of communication between distant places, has changed the relations of society, opened new fields for commercial enterprise, greatly enlarged our stock of international information, and rendered unavailable the standard works on geography and statistics on which we could heretofore rely without error. The present volume is the first to embody in a compact form the facts which have been scattered through a variety of works, and many of them too rare and expensive to permit their being consulted by the mass of readers. It presents the most important results of the late census of the United States, Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, furnishing complete returns of the social, agricultural, and industrial statistics of the people. The elaborate works that have recently been published on various specialties of geographical science, have been diligently consulted by the author; their essential points have been preserved, and their facts arranged in a convenient and lucid method. In treating of the countries of the Old World, the latest census returns have been employed, free use has been made of the researches of standard writers, and no pains have been spared to glean every particle of information which libraries could furnish; while, in regard to the Western Continent, personal recourse has been had to original sources of information that have not before been collected and arranged in a systematic form. By a skillful typographical method great economy of space has been attained, enabling the editor to offer a vast amount of facts without crowding the page, confusing the eye, or preventing the utmost facility of consultation. The type is of a medium size, but so clear and legible as to cause no inconvenience; the paper is of a substantial texture, and of unspotted white in its complexion; and the binding of the massive volume presents a workmanlike union of beauty and strength. It is believed that this gazetteer—which reflects so much credit on the diligence, sagacity, and knowledge of the editor, Mr. J. Calvin Smith—will be found indispensable, not only in the libraries of schools and other literary institutions, for occasional reference, but as a constant companion on the table of the merchant, the student, the editor, the artisan, and the professional reader, as well as in every family collection of standard works.

Questions of the Soul, by J. T. HECKER (published by D. Appleton and Co.), is a statement of the answers presented by the Catholic Church to the religious inquiries proposed especially by the thinkers of the Transcendental school, represented by Emerson, Carlyle, W. H. Channing, and several popular modern poets. The interest of the volume consists chiefly in its free discussions of topics of current interest, especially of those connected with social reform and progress. The writer strenuously maintains the importance of ecclesiastical authority against the latitudinarianism of the times; but aims to produce conviction by appeals to the imagination rather than by force of logic.

The Country Neighborhood is the title of a novel (published by Harper and Brothers) founded on incidents of Southern life, and illustrative of many striking features of society in the interior districts of that region. It deals in forcible contrasts of character, which it sets forth in high-wrought language—the style partaking more of the fervor and luxuriance of the tropics than of the severe precision of a colder clime. The plot includes several situations of exciting interest, portraying the lurid exhibitions of unbridled passion, in the form of vengeful and insatiate hate, combined with pictures of the most attractive features of feminine loveliness. A vivid imagination glows on every page of the story, and sometimes wreaks itself in an excessive intensity of expression.

Redfield has issued an edition of Satire and Satirists, by JAMES HANNAY, a series of lectures discussing, with considerable vivacity and point, the characteristics of the most celebrated satirical writers of ancient and modern times. The writer is never profound—his apparent originality often fails to prove genuine—but he is seldom dull, sometimes eloquent, and occasionally hits upon a vein of striking and suggestive remark. The principal persons that figure in his pages are Horace, Juvenal, Erasmus, Boileau, Dryden, Swift, Pope, and Byron. His volume is not one of great pretensions, but may furnish an hour of agreeable reading.

The Story of the Peasant-Boy Philosopher, by HENRY MAYHEW, is an ingenious and highly successful attempt to popularize the principles of natural science in a manner adapted to the comprehension of the youthful mind. It is founded on the early life of the celebrated shepherd-astronomer Ferguson, explaining, under the garb of an agreeable fiction, the methods by which he was initiated into a knowledge of physical laws. It is not often that the attempt to beguile the irksomeness of study by the charms of a narrative is so skillfully accomplished as in the present case. However nicely the pill is sugared over, most children will retain the sweet and leave the medicine. Such experiments may serve to while away a tedious winter-evening; but, in general, they impart as little substantial instruction as the merest fiction. It is an old saying that there can be no royal road to science; and the wisest teachers have usually refrained from trying to conceal the difficulties of the path by covering them with flowers. This little work of Mr. Mayhew's, however, is an exception to the general rule. It is happily conceived and ably executed. His exposition of the principles of science is simple and attractive. In a style that is a model of descriptive composition for juvenile readers, he elucidates the methods of astronomy and mechanics, connecting the exact results of calculation with a pleasing dialogue, and just enough of a story to keep curiosity awake. He has judiciously avoided every thing that approaches to the detestable cramming system, always aiming to inspire the pupil with a love of the research in hand, and to tempt onward his uncertain steps from one attainment to another, until he almost unconsciously finds himself in possession of an ample fund of knowledge. This is in accordance with the processes of nature, and guarantees the excellence of the work. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Father Clark, or the Pioneer Preacher, is an interesting narrative of the adventures of one of the earliest religious pioneers in the valley of the Mississippi. He was a man of remarkable eccentricity of character, though of devoted piety and unquenchable zeal. The author has collected a variety of amusing anecdotes, illustrative of the personal peculiarities of "Father Clark," and of the primitive condition of society at the period of his labors. The volume is the first of a contemplated series, and gives favorable promise of its attractive character. (Published by Sheldon, Lampert, and Blakeman.)

The Physical Geography of the Sea, by M. F. MAURY, U. S. N. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) The high scientific fame of the author will be enhanced by the issue of the present volume. It forms the natural sequel to the "Wind and Current Charts," that have so widely attracted the attention of both the philosophical and the commercial public. They were designed to collect the experience of every navigator as to the winds and currents of the ocean, and present the results thereof to the world in a convenient and instructive form. The practical success of these charts was immediate and complete. By the knowledge which they furnished the remote corners of the earth were brought closer together, in some instances by many days' sail. The passage to the equator alone was shortened some ten days. Before the preparation of the charts the average passage from New York to California was one hundred and eighty-three days; but, following their guidance, navigators have reduced the average to one hundred and thirty-five days. But, besides the maritime observations on which these charts were founded, a more extensive system is now in operation, which promises to result in a new department of science—the physical geography of the sea. This term includes a philosophical account of the winds and currents of the ocean—of its depth and temperature—of the wonders that are hidden in its bosom, and of the phenomena that are exhibited at its surface. The economy of the sea and its adaptations—its salts, its waters, its inhabitants—also pertain to the subject, and are amply treated in the present volume. The discussion, it will be perceived, is of a unique character, and opens details that are rarely touched in the records of science. In the hands of Lieutenant Maury it assumes a popular interest, no less than scientific importance. His descriptions of the phenomena of the Gulf Stream, of the Currents of the Sea, the Salts of the Sea, and other cognate topics, are singularly graphic in their style, besides containing a rich fund of curious and valuable information. It is rarely that a treatise on any branch of physical science is so attractive in its details or so fruitful in its instructions as the volume before us. It can not fail to awaken universal interest and admiration.

Lives of the Queens of Scotland, by AGNES STRICKLAND. The fifth volume of this series (published by Harper and Brothers) continues the romantic biography of Mary Stuart, and pleads with earnestness and emphasis for a favorable judgment on the character of that unfortunate queen. Miss Strickland writes with exuberant feminine sympathies, but her glow of feeling has not enticed her from the careful research which is the first duty of the historical writer. She has faithfully consulted the contemporary documents pertaining to the subject—her opinions are sustained by a plausible show of authorities—and, if she does not always exhibit a rigid, judicial impartiality, she makes a skillful use of the evidence before her, but without permitting the zeal of the advocate to impair the honesty of the chronicler. The narrative in this volume, as usual, is flowing and graceful, and, in the long run, both piques and rewards the curiosity of the reader.

Scottish Songs, Ballads, and Poems, by HEW AINSLIE. (Published by Redfield.) The admirers of Scottish poetry will find much in this volume to gratify their taste. Its author, as he informs us in his neat preface, has long been a truant from the walks of literature, and now returns, in the "autumnal gloaming of life," with an offering in his native tongue, gathered in part during a long residence in the Far West, but every where glowing with native Scottish enthusiasm. Most of the pieces here printed betray a genuine poetical temperament, an impassioned love of nature, refined domestic sentiments, and an easy flow of versification. A glossary, on the margin of the page, will prove a great convenience to readers not familiar with the Scotch idiom.

The new Pastoral, by THOMAS BUCHANAN READ. (Published by Parry and M'Millan.) A succession of agreeable pictures of American rural life and scenery compose the substance of this latest production of a favorite native poet. It is a more ambitious performance than any of his former poems, and we think will not detract from his well-earned reputation. Many of its strains suggest a reminiscence of Cowper, whom Mr. Read resembles in his natural descriptions of rural scenes, his pleasing domestic allusions, and his vein of tender and pensive sentiment. The volume is not remarkable either for originality or vigor; but its fidelity to nature, its freedom from forced and gaudy coloring, and its general healthfulness of tone will commend it to the approval of judicious readers, and insure it a permanent place in American poetry.

THE London journals announce several rumors of interesting books that are expected to make their appearance early the present season. Among these, we notice a collection of his best narrative poems by LEIGH HUNT, the ever-youthful veteran of literature, who so well preserves the freshness both of his intellect and heart at an advanced age. ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING and ROBERT BROWNING are each preparing new poems. Mrs. Browning's, it is understood, is a narrative poem; but no further details in regard to his character have as yet transpired. Miss JEWSEY has a novel on the eve of publication. A volume of Selections from the Writings of THOMAS CARLYLE is said to be preparing by one who will do his work with taste and discrimination. The closing volume of GROTE's History of Greece is nearly ready for the press. A new English version of Herodotus, by the Rev. G. RAWLINSON, assisted by Colonel RAWLINSON and Sir GARDNER WILKINSON; Vols. IV. to VI. of Dean MILMAN's History of Latin Christianity and of the Popes; Kämpfe Visser: Songs about Giants and Heroes, translated from the Danish; and Songs of Europe, by GEORGE BOWROW, Esq.; and, by the same author, a sequel to Lavengro, entitled The Romany Rye—are announced by Murray.

THE Russian War has called forth several volumes of new poetry. Among them is one by GERALD MASSEY, entitled War Waits, which exhibits the characteristic inequalities of that versatile but uncertain genius. It is thus spoken of by a leading critical journal: "Gerald Massey's descriptions of the scenes and events of the war are spirited, but at the same time so crude and irregular that they can not have more than a passing interest. Vigor without refinement, and genius without taste, will never achieve enduring success in poetry, though it is the fashion of the literary criticism of the day to depreciate and despise art in composition. So much flattery has been heaped on some of the young poets who have lately appeared that, we fear they will give little heed to the warnings and counsels of a severer taste. Time will test the real worth of works now inordinately praised. Of the poetry that passes under our review very small is the proportion that will live among our standard literature; and this not from want of genius and feeling, but of art and labor in composition."

OF recent English books, The Life of Etty, by ALEXANDER GILCHRIST, possesses considerable interest to art-students and the admirers of that distinguished painter; but is sadly disfigured by the affectation, pomposity, and Carlylese jargon of the writer. He is handled gently by most of the reviewers, but the Athenæum tells the truth about him with sufficient explicitness:

"The friends of William Etty have been unfortunate in their choice of a biographer; Mr. Gilchrist has undertaken a task which he is not qualified for, and the public, no less than the artist's memory, are no small sufferers through his incompetence. The author's style is hard and unintelligible, and his language—as in the opening paragraph of the second volume—not always grammatical. His punctuation is very erroneous throughout, and his use of italic and capital letters almost ludicrous. But the chief objection is to his style, and the manner in which the painter's letters are broken up and interpolated with foolish comments."

The first and second volumes of the Memoirs of the Life and Writings of James Montgomery, by JOHN HOLLAND and JAMES EVERETT, have been issued by Longman, bringing the biography of the poet down to the year 1812—the year after the publication of the "World before the Flood."

"His biography," says a London reviewer, "is that of a patriot and a Christian, as well as of a poet and a man of letters. The memory of such a man the world would not willingly let die, and the appearance of the present memoir has been looked for with much interest. Nor will the reader be disappointed. The biographers seem to have been intimately acquainted with the subject of their memoir, and display for his character a genial sympathy and a reverent admiration. The chief fault of the book, we fear, will arise out of the very excess of the esteem in which the memory of 'the bard of Sheffield' is held by his friends."

The History and Poetry of Finger-Rings, by CHARLES EDWARDS, is favorably noticed by The Spectator. It remarks:

"This volume is one of the best American books that has appeared of late. It is true that the subject is limited, perhaps narrow; for the history, archaeology, uses, curiosities, and sentiment of finger-rings, with the addition of personal anecdotes or gossip, do not seem to promise much. Mr. Counselor Edwards, of New York, has, however, made an interesting book. He has collected an immense number of widely-scattered facts, arranged them well, and presented them concisely, constantly authenticating his statements by reference to authorities. It has the least of verbiage and the most of matter in a brief compass of any American books that we have met: the author's profession probably has contributed to this result. The most obvious fault of Mr. Edwards is insufficient discrimination as regards his authorities."

THE Venerable JULIUS HARE, Archdeacon of Lewes, died during the last month, at the Rectory, Herstmonceux. It may almost be said that the venerable archdeacon was better known in England than in Sussex—in Europe than in England. His literary reputation is founded, to a considerable extent, on his share in giving an English dress to the great German writer who revolutionized Roman story; and it is probably as the translator of Niebuhr that he is best known to the world. Seldom, however, has there been a more original or profound thinker than the Archdeacon of Lewes. Even when taking an active part in the questions of the day, he appeared to regard events with the calm impartiality of a historian treating of some by-gone age, or, rather, of a philosopher considering the policy of a foreign country. In the Church of England he was regarded by many, and was named in the celebrated "Edinburgh Review" article, as the leader of a party. "The Church of England is not high or low, but broad," said the "Times" once in a leading article; and it was as the leader of "The Broad Church" that Archdeacon Hare was designated in the northern quarterly. That this was a leadership which the archdeacon would have been the first to repudiate, we may confidently affirm. It was evidently always his wish to belong to no party, but to join with all parties in the Church of England in every good work. He was best known in this country by the admirable gems of wisdom entitled "Guesses at Truth" written in connection with his brother, the late CHARLES HARE, and by his "Life of Sterling," which so aroused the wrath of Carlyle as to provoke him to a rival biography. The following lines addressed to his memory have a melancholy interest, both on account of the subject and the author:

JULIUS HARE.

Julius! how many hours have we
Together spent with sages old!
In wisdom none surpassing thee,
In Truth's bright armure none more bold.
By friends around thy couch in death
My name from those pure lips was heard.
O Fame! how feeble all thy breath
Than Virtue's one expiring word!

COLLECTING ALMS FOR THE HOLY GHOST.

SKETCHES IN BRAZIL.

BY THOMAS EWBANK.

FESTA OF THE HOLY GHOST.

FORTY days after Lent the most popular of the Brazilian festivals takes place—that of the Holy Ghost. It is celebrated for several days, in the Lapa, Rita, and Santa Anna churches—three competing establishments. Each has sent out a band of collectors, who, for five weeks, will canvass and recanvass the city, suburbs, and surrounding country. They have already visited the shipping in the bay, with their cry, “Es-molas para Espirito Santo!” Musicians always attend them; commonly negroes. The Lapa troop is composed of white barbers, who to a man are reputed as expert handlers of violins and bugles as of lancets and razors. They are hired at a higher rate than their sable brethren.

The first time my attention was called to them I was engaged in writing, when Dona H—— came running up stairs, to urge me to descend. “Quick! Here’s the Holy Ghost coming up the Cattete. Don’t you want to see him?” I am sure no one could be more startled at such an announcement than I was, nor at the unaffected simplicity with which it was made. I went down, and looking out of the open window, asked, Where? “Gone into that venda” (a grocery, half a block off), “but will be out directly,” replied half a dozen voices. In a little while a negro band, consisting of two French horns, three drums, a clarinet, and a fife, emerged, and recommenced a waltzing air in the middle of the street. Next appeared four white men, in red albs over their ordinary dress. Two had small crimson banners, on each of which was a figure of a dove in a triangle. Another bore a little silver bird on a stand resembling a chamber candlestick. Like the banner-men, he also carried an alms-dish. The fourth bore a capacious bag.

The minstrels, except when they leave it—as just now—to take a drink, keep the middle of the street, and regulate their steps to the progress of the alb-men on the side walks; now creeping, anon standing, and then dashing onward; the music rising with their motions. The collectors call at every house, but have occasion to knock at few, as the music draws the inmates out. Yonder a lady is throwing back a pair of laticed blinds; a banner-man flies over, and burying for a moment her face in the flag, she adds a contribution to his dish. Next door a cluster of girls have got the little bird among them, and return it with vintems. A neighbor now takes a flag in, that every member of his family may perform an act of devotion by kissing it; and there, a Mozambique fruit-woman bathes her face in its folds—her offering, two oranges, is dropped into the bag, the receptacle of donations other than money—no, not for all such, for the musicians have now come up, and, as I live, the clarionet player carries a live rooster under his left arm, the gift, probably, of some dealer in poultry. Of course it would not do to put it among eggs, bread, fruit, and kindred quiet things. Nothing is refused, from bank bills to a banana, or half a yard of ribbon as a streamer for a banner staff.

It is our turn now: one of the embroidered treasures comes in at the window; all the ladies save one shrink from it, but old Senora P—— gives it the kiss of reverence. In her zeal, poor soul, and under the popular belief that it is a powerful charm, she used it far too much like a pocket handkerchief, rubbing her eyes, face, neck, and bosom with it. I now perceived that every Romanist female does not care to become too intimate with such things; and on a subsequent day I both saw and felt the cause. The central part of one I myself took in was stained and stiff with grease, perhaps the accumulation of years from perspiring faces, black and white. Pompey took the oleaginous ensign to the kitchen, that Chica, the old black cook, might wipe her face with it.

The troop now passed on. The minstrels struck up a fresh air that set young feet a-tripping. The rooster actually crowed an accompaniment. How the negro managed to carry it without its interfering with the free use of his fingers was strange. Before he came up I thought he was playing on bagpipes. Independent of the exhilarating fife and drum, and rousing trumpets, the scene is a stirring one. The collectors, with their banners fluttering over their heads, and their albs streaming behind them, are running hither and thither, crossing and recrossing the street as devotees appear at windows and door-hatches; while their brethren with the little bird and bag are as busy answering calls made on them.

Specimens of the official advertisements from the daily papers are subjoined:

"The Board of the Brotherhood of the Divine Holy Ghost of the Parish of St. Anna participates to the respectable public that the Feast of the Divine Holy Ghost will begin on the 31st inst.; St. Bartholomew's on the 1st proximo (June); and that of Jesus, Mary, and Joseph on the 2d of June, with all splendor and religious pomp compatible with the means and zeal of the administrators. On the third day of the Feast of the Holy Ghost there will be fire-works, such as have never before been exhibited, and superior from their magnitude and novelty of their mechanism. On Sunday, June 7, the Emperor elect of the Holy Ghost will take possession, which act will be followed with a Te Deum and sermon. At night there will be the Empire and the Auction. We beg the brethren and the pious to concur, with their alms and their presence, to make more brilliant acts so worthy of our religious regard.

"JOSE J. G. FERRERIA, Secy."

The Emperor is a boy elected annually, and crowned in the church. His "empire" is a portion of ground adjoining the church, and fenced in for spectators, including the stage erected against the church, on which he sits enthroned, to preside over the auction and amusements. Formerly an Empress of the Holy Ghost sat by the Emperor, with little maids of honor to wait on her. Such is still the practice in the interior.

"The Brotherhood of the Divine Holy Ghost of the Convent of Friars of the Carmo, in the Lapa do Desterro, inform the public and devout persons, that on the 22d inst. begins the Novena of the Ritual, and on the 31st the Feast of the Holy Ghost. On the 1st proximo the Feast of our Lord of the Paces; and on the 22d, that of St. Anna and St. Joaquim—all of which will be celebrated with appropriate magnificence. Every night there will be music and an auction. On the last one, beautiful fireworks."

"The Chairman and Directors of the Divine Holy Ghost of the parish of St. Rita inform the respectable public that to-day, 22d inst., will begin, with much pomp and decency, the Novena and Auction. They hope the brethren and the pious will contribute, by their presence and their alms, to the brilliancy of the Feast."

I thought of accepting this last invitation, but F—— said, "It is a long way to go, and there will be a poor sale to-night. Wait till the great day of the feast; then almost every person sends a present to the Holy Ghost, and there will be a Bom Leilão—a good auction." After tea, however, I felt inclined for a walk, and bent my steps to the city by lamplight. Calling at T——'s, Messrs. C—— and M—— readily joined with me in a visit to the neighboring shrine of Santa Rita. A day view of this old structure and the adjoining fountain is subjoined. To have been in character with our visit, it should have been a night scene.

As we drew near, the church tower was seen decked with colored lamps, and the white front red as blood with the glare of flambeaus in the little triangular largo. The scene which then burst on us was more suited to the suburbs of Tartarus than the court-yard of a heavenly lady. Nine young negro-heads, soaked in tar and tallow, and stuck on poles let into the pavement, were blazing before the church, amidst the shouts and laughter of a crowd of men and boys, both black and white. The air was suffused with smoke, whose dense curling volumes appeared white in the universal darkness overhead—the sickening odor, hissings and spurtings of bursting blisters, the grinning visages of the restless throng—now lost to sight, and anon lit up with fire, as the wind affected the flames. There is but one place which such a scene could call to mind. But lest the reader should denounce the goddess of the place a she-Moloch, delighting in roasted skulls, he is informed that the festival torches—"Cabeças de Moleques"—are spherical masses of oakum saturated with pitch and kindred matters.

We passed into the fane, between two armed soldiers at the door. Hung round with showy tapestry, it was brilliantly lit up. The Lady's altar was a sheet of light. At a table on the floor sat a committee in albs, bartering "blessed pictures" for vintems and patacas. There were three qualities and sizes—quarto, octavo, and duodecimo. When a contribution was laid down, the chairman, eying it, spoke to the brother at his right, who then drew from a drawer a print of the proper value, while the treasurer, at his left, added the money to a pile on a silver tray. As usual at festivals, two centurions, with fixed bayonets, stood by to guard the treasure. Senhor M— procured for me one of the paper gems; printed in red ink, it represents a dove and triangle within a nimbus, and over them an old man, with a long beard, looking out of a cloud.

After looking round awhile, we crossed the floor and passed—as did most of the visitors—through an open door into an adjoining apartment, and found ourselves in a crowd. The room was long and narrow, and the benches on both sides jammed with men and boys. Against the left wall sat three brethren in official robes, and before them a table, upon which stood, between three-branched candlesticks, one of the portable symbols of the Holy Ghost carried by street collectors. Between the benches a short brother, in a crimson alb, was walking to and fro, and addressing the congregation with perspiring fervor. Every moment he kept applying a handkerchief to his streaming forehead. As he drew near I perceived that he was descanting on a sugared cake which he held up on a salver. We were in Santa Rita's auction room, and this gentleman was her salesman. The cake was knocked down—the purchaser handed a bill to the auctioneer, who hurried to the table and returned with the change and a small print—such as were being disposed of in the church—every purchaser at the auction receiving one gratis.

Several large frosted cakes were put up, but the sale dragged heavily. The salesman was far from being No. One in the profession—he lacked volubility and wit. A laugh was now and then elicited, but seldom by his own jokes. He was much annoyed by young fellows predisposed to fun, and determined to enjoy it—they tried his temper severely. There was, in truth, something about him that whetted humorous appetites, as he came puffing along, holding up the salver to every face that looked like a buying one, and repeating, with a supplicatory tone and look, "Hum milreis—hum milreis—hum milreis, Senhor." His head, half isolated from his body by the alb, and nearly denuded of hair, with his glistening face, was incessantly drawn this way and that by bids which he could find none to acknowledge. At length a quiet-looking young man made an offer, and was declared the purchaser. The article was handed to him—and, lo! he had no money! The enraged knight of the hammer seized him by the collar, and led him to the managers at the table amidst roars of laughter. As he had no means of payment, nothing could be done but to reprove him and let him go. A gentleman took the lot and paid for it—or, rather, exchanged money for it.

Nothing sacred is sold, only exchanged. We, of course, would consider these transactions "cash sales;" for the terms are cash on delivery, and delivery immediately.

Every eye was again turned to the recess or niche behind the managers, to see what next would be brought out, as pastry was evidently becoming dull. An officer, in a black gown and white tippet, who seemed to have charge of the goods, handed forth something, which the chairman no sooner passed across the table than there arose such a "clucking!" It was a live hen. Grasped by the thighs it appeared to sit quite comfortably on the auctioneer's hand. It was struck off at fifty cents; double its market value. Next came a superb white chanticleer—the signal of a general crowing and clapping of elbows in imitation of wings. One or two young men were natural ventriloquists; the cock-a-doodle-do-o-o-ing came in at the street door, then out of the church, and anon was under the managers' table! The merriment was universal. The fluttering bird brought 1260 reis.

A large custard was now tried, and the buyer turned out to be the one that had no money: he said he would call to-morrow for it! This gave rise to a general screech, and led to a scuffle between the bidder and the bantered salesman. The dispute was ended by a higher bid; but when the article was offered to the new bidder, he said it was too hard baked, and would not take it! The vender became furious; but recovering himself, he said it was too hard for such fellows' teeth—meaning too costly for their pockets. The fillip was applauded, and the lit-the man, tickled with the hit, threw back his head, and laughed louder and longer than any one else.

He next brought round a folded paper and put it up, contents unknown. He refused to break the envelope, or say what the contents were. It brought 300 reis, and proved to be cold roast-chicken. Three "Macaés Americana" (Newtown pippins) brought thirteen cents each. A lady informs me she has known fifty milreis, or twenty-five dollars, given for an apple at this feast—the competitors showing in this way their attachment to the Church. Other matters were put up; but I got tired, and left the auctioneer trying a large plum-cake, over the frosted top of which he kept drawing his hand, as if stroking the back of a pet bird or rabbit.

Most of the articles sold at these ecclesiastical auctions are purchased at wholesale prices by the managers, and thus retailed at profits varying from 50 to 500 per cent.—the donations brought in by collectors not being sufficient, nor always suitable. One of the best specimens of the salesman's eloquence is the following scrap, translated by an accompanying friend:

"Twenty-five—thirty—thirty-five vintems for this blessed cake; blessed by the Holy Father Xavier Maria Luiz Oliveira. Who bids more? Thirty—Ah! the good-will of Our Lady be with you, my friend. Forty are bid!—only forty vintems for food which will purge all diseases lurking in him that eats it. The saints befriend you, Senhor. Forty-five! Who is the next bidder? Who? Forty-five! Alleluia! Fifty vintems are bid—it is enough—and" taking the money "may your virtuais be always as sweet as you'll find this, Senhor!"

No females were present. Though respectable families are invited, it was obviously no place for ladies. One of my companions belonged to the Church, and, in answer to my inquiries, said the place was wholly unfit for respectable females to appear in. Of this evening entertainments the following puff was inserted in one of the daily papers:

"Mr. Edrooz—The auction of the Divine Holy Ghost, in Santa Rita, to be continued to the 3d proximo, is very interesting. The select company that assembles there, the order and decorum with which the auction is conducted, reflect credit on the provider and managers. Permit me to invite, through your columns, all devotees of the Miraculous Holy Ghost to attend, with their families, in order to increase the brilliancy of this devotional exercise. U M Devoro."

The same paper had the following notice to sporting devotees:

"The Brotherhood of the Divine Holy Ghost of San Gonçalo (a small village across the bay) will hold the Feast of the Holy Ghost on the 31st instant with all possible splendor. Devout persons are invited to attend, to give greater pomp to this act of religion. On the 1st proximo the feast of the Most Holy Sacrament, with a procession in the evening, a Te Deum, and sermon. On the 2d, the Feast of the patron San Gonçalo; at three p. m., there will be brilliant horse-racing, after which a Te Deum and magnificent fire-works."

As I shall not have an opportunity to pay a visit to Gonçalo, I may as well remark here that he is a popular friend of Portuguese and Brazilian elderly single ladies. Young ones invoke him too, but in a petulant spirit. Their staple address is:

"San Gonçalo de Amarante,
Match-maker for old women!
Why don't you marry young ones?
What harm have they done you?"

The Carmelites at the Lapa Church surpassed St. Rita's managers in external display. The front of the place was covered with festoons of colored lamp; cords stretched from the roof across the street bearing flags and tapestries. A handsomely draped stage for the auction was fitted up at one side of the doorway, and at the other a band of musicians sat. A fifty-foot mast, painted red, bore "the flag of the Holy Ghost." The fire-works were not confined to blazing skulls of negroes; for on high poles were secured other victims—men and women—who, like those at an auto da fé, were waiting to be consumed. But after all, the festival was not very attractive during day or night. The auctioneer had neither tact nor wit, so that his sales dragged most heavily. He and the musicians performed alternately. The board of managers, I understand, were sensible of the deficiencies of their salesman, but knew not where to get a better. The poorest of artists he was; to use a native proverb: "a John Lopez—neither vinegar, honey, nor Malmsey wine—nothing."

All concede that the brotherhood of Santa Anna bears off the palm. This church stands on one side of the Campo, a wide, open square, and is represented in the following illustration; the flag-staff and flag of the Holy Ghost in front, a portion of the pyrotechnic poles with figures mounted on them, the auctioneer and empire fenced in, etc. Before noticing them, let us glance at the establishments of lay-showmen, who are always welcomed here by their ecclesiastical brethren: both parties being mutual aids to each other. Here are

"1. The beautiful Dog of the North—the Phoenix of Europe. Madame Neif has the honor of requesting ladies and gentlemen to attend early to enjoy the brilliant spectacle of 'The beautiful Dog of the North,' as she can remain only a short time. The exhibition is in one of the tents in the Campo de Santa Anna, every evening during the Feast of the Holy Ghost.

"2. Theatro Magico. Phantasmagoria and natural magic.

"3. Theatro do Bom Gusto. Posture-making, tumbling, lifting weights.

"4. Tourinhos Mechanicos. Punch and Judy and other puppets.

"5. Trabalhos (acts) do Senhor Otto Motti."

The precocious poodle of the advertisement was a gamester, a canine roué; he played at cards, spelled out ladies' names, and did many other wonderful things.

There were three more booths, in one of which sword-swallowing and drawing ribbons from the mouth were the chief feats, except that the performers rinsed their parched throats with fire. In another were ground and lofty tumbling with rope-dancing.

FEAST OF THE HOLY GHOST AT SANTA ANNA'S CHURCH.

The feast opened on Sunday, the last day of May. It was dark before I reached the place. The illuminated tower and steeple of the church sparkled in the distance as with strings and wreaths of diamonds. Bengola and other lights were streaming upward, and inverted cones of rockets—a dozen from one stick—were every few moments sent aloft; while bombs exploded with reports loud as from the heaviest ordnance; the church-bells pealed away, the drums, cymbals, and trumpets of the showmen helped them. Opposite the show-booths were others for the sale of wines, cigars, pies, and other refreshments. One poetical proprietor informed visitors, in the following verse, that his place contained every thing that could be wished for by those who love to taste and suck good things:

"Quem bons potiscos
Quizar chucar,
Pessa que tudo
Selhe ha de dar."

Avenues were formed by colored women seated on the grass, each with a basket of fruit, cakes, or doces, lit up with a paper lantern. Here were "Holy Ghost rusks," gingerbread, and scores of other articles thus designated, being stamped with a dove in honor of the festival. The noise, bustle, and excitement of the scene made a perfect Bartholomew Fair. The ground was alive with people, who kept moving hither and thither like a colony of ants in commotion.

But let us turn to the church, and try to get through the crowds in front of the stage erected against one side of it, and communicating with its interior. This stage is very artistically got up. At each end an angel holds a lamp, while chandeliers, vases, and blue and crimson tapestry enlighten and decorate the whole. "The Emperor of the Holy Ghost," seated on a throne, presides, and really acts the part to admiration. The little fellow is about ten years old: he wears a crown; a wide frill adorns his neck and rests on an ermine tippet; his coat, vest, small clothes with strings at the knees, white stockings, and buckled shoes are those of adults two centuries ago. When crowned, he sits at the altar till his chaplain performs mass. The board of managers and a number of ladies are sitting near him. The band is playing a lively air, and see! the little monarch points with his gilt sceptre to a side-stand—a signal for one of his secretaries to hand him a paper of sugar-plums. He wears "the sash of the order of Christ."

There is probably some alliance between these juvenile monarchs and the "Boy Bishops" of the middle ages.

Soon as the music ceased, out sprang the auctioneer, dressed in motley! A young man of twenty-five or six, a genuine droll—a Brazilian Grimaldi. In disposing of a large rusk his antics elicited shrieks of approbation. After disposing of several more, and handing to each purchaser, with the change, a sacred print, he disappeared, and in a twinkling reappeared in a striped close-fitting dress like harlequin's, with bells sewed on the front and side seams. Making a profound reverence to the Emperor, he introduced, in a comic dance, a large white rooster to the audience. Holding it in a natural position by its legs, he made it scream by pulling down the tail feathers, and soon knocked it down to a laughing buyer, with a fine rich woodcut of a dove in a triangle thrown in. A quick broker, he put the first bid on himself, and struck off the lots at the first or second advance. He kept the company in the best of tempers, and there was no putting a joke upon him. Some one attempted this when he took hold of his

THE GENERAL.

"silver quizzing-glass," which hung by a ribbon low as his knees, and applying it to his eye, thrust his whole face through it. It was an open ring cut out of a sheet of tin. His postures and his manner of using it were irresistible.

Retiring, he came out next in the worn-out dress of a general with enormous epaulets, and performed a comic dance, the music accompanying him. With every change of the step he changed the figure of his magic hat. One moment a regular chapeau de bras, the next a Bishop's mitre; now a Phrygian bonnet; now a Quaker's castor; anon an inverted truncated cone; and last of all, a perfect cone with asses ears, in which form he fell to business, and disposed of, in quick succession, fowls, pigeons, pies, rusks, custards, and confectionery. To find a bidder, he occasionally used his mammoth eye-glass. After disposing of a dozen pair of pigeons, the musicians played a popular overture; and thinking I had seen enough, I turned to leave, when a sudden shout announced his reappearance. He was in a white and scarlet dress, mounted on high stilts, and danced a polka on them to perfection. With a hen in one hand and his eye-glass in the other, he placed his arms a-kimbo and in other positions. Without hesitation he came down eight or ten steps into the "empire," and traversed it for bids, stalking among the crowd like a heron or flamingo among penguins. For fun and drollery no actor among the showmen could surpass him. He had one drawback. His voice was hoarse and cracked.

Before I left he appeared in a night-gown and night-cap, which last he changed into various standard coverings for the head, and generally by hitting some one with it. The worst thing about him was his cruel treatment of the fowls and pigeons, which he whirled and jerked about him without the least regard to their sufferings. The latter suffered in silence, while the screechings of the former added to the general merriment. He is said to be a professional buffoon, employed by this church on its chief festivals.

Fire-works. In pyrotechnics Brazilian artists are, I suppose, equal to those of any country, China perhaps excepted. While they excel in staple "fogos," they have a variety which, though of ancient date, I have seen nowhere else. Admitting of endless applications, and opening a new field for our artists, a few specimens from this exhibition may as well be given. But first let us read the official announcement:

"Espirito Santo de Santa Anna. This evening, June 2, will be given, if the weather permits, a grand display of artificial fire-works, of every variety and color—all made by the famous artist Bernardino José da Cunha. The attention of the respectable public is solicited. All are invited to enjoy the spectacle, and at the same time view the Empire, which is fitted up in a style surpassing that of previous years."

Here were forty poles varying from twenty-five to fifty feet in height. Against some were fixed wheels, wheels within wheels, suns, moons, stars, cones, polygons, vases, baskets, and forms various as produced by a kaleidoscope. A row of splendid archways of fire arose, and over them, in words of flame, "Lozoures ao Divino Espirito Santo." But these are more or less akin to similar things with us. It was the human figures on the top of the poles, and the movements imparted to them, that constituted the novelty.

They were as large as life, dressed in character, and so well got up, that at a short distance all might be taken for living persons. A few feet off, the illusion was very strong. They represented barbers, razor-grinders, wood-sawyers, tumblers, rope-dancers, ladies, and ladies' maids, etc., etc. The ablest tailors and mantua-makers could not have dressed them better. Workmen wore roundabouts and caps; gentlemen were in blue coats, striped pants, and black neckcloths. The barber's shirt bosom was figured, the collars projected fashionably, and his cravat was tied à la mode; he wore white jacket and pants, an apron and highly polished shoes, with a razor in his hand, and a comb behind his ear. One lady is dressed in spotted pink, with frills, sash, kid gloves, and every thing else to correspond. She is ready for a pirouette when the general dance begins. Had I not examined one or two before they were raised from the ground, I could hardly have believed that all of them, their silk hats and bonnets, coats, vests, polished boots, fine linen, leather caps, vails, muslin de laines, etc., were nothing more than colored paper, supported on delicate wire frames; the faces were masks.

RAZOR-GRINDER.

A slight reference to the mechanism by which motion was imparted to them will be sufficient. The base on which each figure stands is a horizontal wheel, some ten feet over. Its axis coincides with that of the pole, upon which it is made slowly to turn by a band of small rockets going round its periphery. Suppose on the upper side of one of these wheels two upright posts, supporting the ends of a horizontal crank-shaft, on which is a small vertical wheel. Imagine a man standing on one foot on the larger wheel and the other foot on the crank, and you have one form of the popular razor-grinder. He appears to turn the wheel with his foot, and holding the instrument to the surface, a stream of fire flies from it as from a dry grindstone.

WOOD-SAWYER.

The movements of the wood-sawyer and the rest were produced in the same or in a similar way. At ten P. M. the display began, and continued till twelve. The place was as light as day with artificial flames. On one pole two gentlemen raised their hats and bowed to each other; close by them, a chamber-maid waited with a candle in her hand to show them to their apartments. A lady on another moved her hands, as if to join them to a dandy on a neighboring pole, and whirled away in a cotillion. A tumbler stuck fast in a summerset, and remained in an inverted position to the close, when, with the rest, he vanished in a flash—not an atom of him left. The wood-sawyer and his African assistants worked away; I was afraid his arms would be jerked from his body. The razor-grinder's wheel flew round, and his foot rose and fell with the treddle at a preternatural rate. Occasionally his grindstone lacked moisture, and then he spat jets of liquid fire on it; his face glistening with sweat or varnish. While admiring his ardor I felt a slight movement at my coat pocket. It was picked. Five seconds had not elapsed since I felt my pocket-book in it. Turning quickly round, my eyes met those of two young fellows looking innocent as doves. One of them had it. They had, I presume, seen me take it out repeatedly. It contained only memoranda and sketches—chiefly of the auctioneer and empire. I had been often reminded of pickpockets at the feast, and had no money or watch about me.

Having a long walk before me, I left ere half the figures on the poles were in motion. In passing the Lapa Church I observed mechanical devices resembling windlasses or wheel-work in motion on a few poles. Over an illumined doorway an angel unfolds a scroll, exposing the words "Gloria ao Divino Espirito Santo." The auctioneer was inviting bids for a fowl; his audience were chiefly negroes and low fellows. T— told me he stopped a moment in passing, and that the language of the dull brute was abominably indecent.

The fête was kept up by the Santa Anna Church for eight days. On the last day the Emperor for the next year was elected. The same boy was chosen. He is the son of an apothecary, who is fond of the honor, which costs him five hundred dollars a year—so it is said.

The concluding official advertisements were as follows:

"It is communicated to the respectable public, and to the brotherhood of the Divine Holy Ghost of Santa Anna, that on Sunday, 7th inst., there will be celebrated a Te Deum and Sermon, when the re-elected Emperor will take possession. At night the Auction and Empire.

"J. J. GOMES FERREIRA, secy."

"Divino Espirito Santo de Santa Anna: On Sunday, 7th, the ceremony of the Emperor of the Holy Ghost taking possession will occur on the afternoon, with a Te Deum and Music. Signorina Cardiani [an Italian Cantatrice] and other artistes will perform gratis. The Empire will be illuminated at night. There will be an Auction, Music, and splendid Fire-works."

In the same paper the booth and showmen advertise their attractions. On the evening of the 7th the Campo was in my way home from Mataporcos. The auctioneer wore a court dress, his hair powdered, a long queue, etc. He was in high glee—sold a basket of fowls and pigeons in no time. I left him dancing a polka on stilts. The Italian performers had got through their parts before I arrived. The showmen were doing a good business. The wide steps to one booth, where "the diverting scene of the monkey in a sack" was announced, gave way under the crowds waiting for admission.

Of tradesmen's advertisements relating to festivals the annexed is a sample:

"Notice to the Illustrious Preparers of the Festival of the Holy Spirit: In Silvermith Street, No. 78, may be found a beautiful assortment of Holy Ghosts, in gold, with glories, at 80 cents each; smaller sizes, without glories, at 40 cents. Silver Holy Ghosts, with glories, at 64 dollars per hundred; do., without glories, 54 dollars. Holy Ghosts of tin, resembling silver, at 75 cents per hundred."

SAINT GEORGE.

Corpus Christi is a great day with Romanists every where. Here the Emperor, his court, senators, and soldiers, join in the procession. It is the only occasion on which St. George appears in public. Mounted on his charger, he, in his official character of "Defender of the Empire," takes the precedence. Prince and people walk behind him. As the Church's champion he heads her squadrons too. Not having been so fortunate as to find the door of his residence once open during repeated visits, I must attend, if only to become acquainted with a character so popular with Protestants and Papists as this chief of dragon-killers.

The morning papers announced that "The Board of Directors of the Brotherhood of the Glorious St. George invite the brethren to attend at his chapel at 9 A. M., to accompany him in the Procession of the Body of God. The Image will pass through Theatre Square, Piolho, and Cadeia streets, to the Imperial Chapel, and return through Dreihe, Alfandega, and Fogo streets, to his chapel in Rue do Lampadoza."

The Brotherhoods generally are notified in the papers. The Capuchins advertise "a rich canopy and custodia (a cupboard for the Host), lately arrived from Rome." It is to be exposed for veneration to-morrow at their establishment on Castle Hill for the first time. Other professors are on the alert. The showmen in the Campo offer the following attractions. I quote the Diario :

"In the Barraca of Good Taste there will be an extraordinary Divertissement on the day of the Body of God.

"In the Theatro Magico, a Representation in Three Parts: Part 1. The Passion of our Lord, viz., The Birth—St. Joseph—Garden of Olives—Holy Magdalen—The Tortures—St. Peter—Our Lord of the Faces—St. George—The Crucifixion—St. John Baptist—The Resurrection—The Holy Virgin. Part 2. Cosmographic Views. Part 3. Diverting Phantasmagoria: The Sorcerer—Flying Death's Head—The Parisian Galatea—The Changed Head—Don Quixote—Walking Woman—Garden of Love and The Monster. To conclude with

"THREE CATS DANCING THE POLKA."

Of religious plays and interludes by which this day was celebrated in the middle ages, "The Passion of our Lord" was one; The Creation, Deluge, Susannah, Dives and Lazarus, Burial of Christ, and scores taken neither from the Old Testament nor the New, were others. Even the whiskered artists are not wholly novel, though the part assigned them may be. They were anciently made to act an easier part in France. At Aix, on the festival of Corpus Christi, the finest tom-cat of the country, wrapt in swaddling clothes like a child, was exhibited in a magnificent shrine to public admiration.

The day is not designated, as with us, Corpus Christi, but "Corpo de Deus," and is celebrated, in the language of the Calendar, "By a solemn procession of the Body of God, with the assistance of their Imperial Majesties and court." Under the date of the 14th inst., "Procession of the Body of God in the parishes of St. José and Candelaria." On the 21st inst., "Festival and procession of the Body of God in the parishes of St. Rita, St. Anna, and the Gloria," etc. This is the uniform language of the Church and people, though it sounds strange in ears not used to it.

The streets were thronged with people hoping against hope; for the sky was lowering. The early morning promised a splendid day. The Corcovado, in verdant vesture, and set off with the bright ethereal ground behind him, reared his head in glorious relief, as if he, too, had donned his best in honor of the festival, and was waiting for it to begin. Within an hour he shrunk out of sight; for the smiling heavens put on a face of sorrow, and at length burst into tears. A drizzling rain set in, and continued with little intermission through the day.

As St. George is the only saint that goes through the streets on horseback, and that only once a year, I determined, notwithstanding the unpromising weather, to call upon him. Reaching his shabby quarters in the Rua Lampadoza—a poor neighborhood—I found a troop of cavalry in front, waiting to escort him to the Imperial chapel in Dercita Street, where the Emperor, ministers of state, the legislature, judges, provincial governors, and the elite of the army and the church were ready to receive him. A native of the East, his fane reminds one of Arabian palaces with exteriors indicative of poverty's abodes. Here is neither steeple, tower, nor clock; no vestibule, railings, steps, nor even flagging, to separate its precincts from the common carriage-way, so that a cart may as easily be turned in it as round the corner. The front elevation resembles the gable-end of a barn—no higher, wider, and hardly more tasteful. The sill is, of any thing, below the wet and clammy pavement. All things look mean about it—even to the red curtain that hangs between the door-jams. It is faded, worn out, and borrowed from a sister saint—"Luzia"—whose name is wrought on it.

Like others we push it aside, and entering, find the place a mean one; the walls rough, and rafters bare, the damp floor giving way under one's feet, while bits of old carpet covered the worst spots. Passing by a committee busily employed in "exchanging" penny portraits of the saint for milreis brought in by devotees, we discover George himself, standing in full dress against the wall, waiting for the weather to clear up. Females crowd to kiss his hand, courtesy to him, and some sit down in front to admire him. He wears a plumed helmet, a cambric tippet frilled round his neck, a crimson tunic with skirts reaching to his knees, black leggins or boots, with large spurs; his feet are already in the stirrups, which are attached to his thighs instead of the saddle. He grasps a shield in one hand, and a baton in the other. A mantle lies ready to throw over him when mounted. A short sword is at his waist, and muslin frills at his wrists. His stature is that of an ordinary sized soldier, but his ruddy, smooth face, without beard, whiskers, or mustache, is not much like a warrior's. His horse is in a neighboring stable. His helmet, corselet, and armlets, were of pasteboard, colored in imitation of steel; the shield was made of tin-plate.

At two P.M., no signs of the weather improving, the troops, including the mounted guard of honor to the saint, were dismissed, and the procession given up. I called at the Imperial chapel on my way home, and found it crowded. Two rows of Imperial halbardiers, extending from the entrance to the altar, had just formed a clear passage for a miniature procession. The organ was playing and eunuchs singing, and so foul was the air that two negroes dropped and were borne out as dead. I found it impossible to remain in five minutes without approaching the door for fresh air. The programme was at length arranged: first came chanting eunuchs, the brotherhood with candles, priests, and canons; the Body of God under a canopy; the emperor with a lighted candle; ministers of state and others, with their sons in court costumes, strongly reminding one of Tom Thumbs in morris dances. Then followed the guard with their burnished spears. In this order the whole passed three times up and down the floor, and so wound up the official ceremonies of the day.

I subsequently called with a friend on the "Defender of the Brazilian Empire," and was not a little surprised to find him stowed away in a dark closet, and stripped as clean as if a troop of Ishmaelites or Camanches had met him. He had not a rag to his back. As his equestrian attitudes required something more than a stiff statue, I now saw how the positions of his limbs were varied. He was sitting on a trestle, and is made, in all respects, like a jointed doll. His present charger, a present from the Emperor, the sacristan denounces as "a wicked beast," for dishonoring the saint last year by kicking and shying, so that but for Our Lady's aid, he would have been thrown to the ground! The image is an old one, of hard and heavy wood; its weight about 300 or 350 pounds. It is always mounted in the church. One horse was trained to kneel till it was properly adjusted to the saddle.

In reply to a remark about the saint's nudity, the zealous sacristan almost shed tears while telling us that the church was too poor to buy him any clothing. "We contract," said he, "with an armador to dress him on his festival, and that is all we can do." It was suggested that, as Defender of the Country, he was as much entitled to army-pay as Saint Antony. "Si, senhor." It was a national shame to leave him thus neglected—"Si, si, senhor"—adding, "In Lisbon the saint receives the salary of a Lieutenant-Colonel, and his chapel there is very rich."

THE BURIAL OF GOD.

"The Burial of God" was celebrated in two or three parishes on subsequent days. I witnessed a portion of the proceedings of each. Passing the Candelaria Church I entered and found it thronged. The panel front of Our Lady's altar was removed, exposing "a Dead Christ" within, as represented below. I got up to the place as a gentleman, who had just saluted the image, arose and drew back. A negro girl dropped on her hands and knees, crept to it, and repeatedly kissed the hand, showing, meanwhile, the soles of her muddied feet to every eye. She rises, drops a vintem into a mammoth silver salver, overflowing with coin and bills—courtesies, and retires. Two white lads, ragged and dirty as clam-boys, speak a few words to each other, cross themselves, fall on their knees, and creep forward together; one waits till the other salutes the hand, and then wriggles himself forward to take his turn; each drops in a vintem. Next comes a lady with a female slave behind her; drops on her knees, and for half a minute prays and crosses herself, rises, drops some vintems, and goes away. She won't kiss the hand on which so many black mouths have been rubbed—and she is right, for I've seen enough diseases on black faces here to justify her.

I was about to leave, when a feeble and purblind old negra crept forward to the feet; putting in her head, she pressed her lips to them a dozen times. Then turning to the hand, she fondled it, kissed it, laid her left cheek on it, then her right one, then drew both sides of her face over it, and again rested them on the open palm. She seemed unwilling to give place to others waiting. I think some one gave her a hint, for she reluctantly rose, put a copper acknowledgment in the salver, courtesied three times down to the floor, and went her way. She was succeeded, while I remained, by a score of devotees of both sexes, of whom half were whites. On mentioning her case to a devout lady, I was told she most likely had some troublesome disease in her face, which she, in common with thousands, believed would be expelled by placing it in contact with the hand of the holy image. Although mid-day, there were probably a thousand candles burning, and all in costly candlesticks. Both blacks and whites thronged about the prone image. Before I left, three ladies knelt and kissed the wooden hand immediately after it had been touched by negro lips.

The enterprising brotherhood of "Bom Jesus" held their fête not far off. Half a dozen mustached, bare-headed soldiers paraded before the door, handling and puffing cigars, recalling to mind old match-lock heroes blowing their lints preparatory to firing off their pieces. Pushing the crimson screen aside, the place was lit up more brilliantly than a ball-room at midnight. Two of the candelabra at the altar were a couple of brethren in albs, who stood as steady almost as the gilt wooden and plated ones. Here was more bowing, kneeling, courtesying, kissing, and leg-making going on than in the Candelaria, though no image was placed within reach of the worshipers. For want of one they kissed the floor, steps, carpeting, and penny pictures on the walls. A gentleman—I was told he was a dry-good merchant—between thirty-five and forty years of age, rose from his knees near me, went directly to the right wall, and put his mouth to something on it; next crossed himself, went to the railing, then knelt and kissed the step—not the altar step, but one where the nave is separated from the choir or chancel; getting up, he made a leg and crossed over to the opposite wall and kissed something there, four or five feet above the floor; and standing on his toes, his neck stretched to the uttermost, he attempted to reach a higher object with his lips. The objects of his worship were coarse prints of saints. Next two negroes drew up through the middle of the audience, and kissed the floor, then the step. Three white men and one woman followed them. The filthy condition of the soles of the negroes contrasted strongly with a pair of new pumps a dandy of a man turned up a little way from them. At one time five men and two women were before me with their mouths on the floor: I had rather have seen them in any other position.

Not feeling much edified by these groveling scenes, I turned toward the Paula. The steps in front swarmed with negroes selling fruit and doces to exhausted worshippers. The altar was as gorgeous as that of the Carmo; but the greatest novelty were the contents of two silversmiths' shops, piled on tables at each side of the altar, and guarded by musketeers. Here were trays, ewers, basins, pitchers, and other things, besides some large caldron-looking vessels, whose use was not apparent. Of trays alone I counted over forty, most of which were not less than three feet long, and of proportional width. What this meant I could not imagine, not dreaming that the whole could belong to one church; but it was even so. The Paula Brotherhood is very wealthy, and surpasses others in this branch of devotion.

I next strolled up Castle Hill, to witness some new performances announced by the Capuchins. Seventy or eighty persons, mostly women and children, were waiting for the service to begin. Suddenly the profound silence was broken by a loud hammering that knocked all meditation on the head—carpenters fitting up a scaffold for musicians, six of whom soon came in, with a bass-viol, two violins, a couple of flutes, and a clarionet. One of the preachers emerged from the vestry. Bless me! I exclaimed to myself, how like the pictures of his class I have seen! There is something unpleasant to Protestant feelings in his appearance, independent of a coarseness that of itself is any thing but agreeable. A shaven crown, a reddish peaked and matted beard, uncovered neck and exposed sternum, bare legs, and feet pushed into slip-shod wooden slippers, large and hairy hands, and his only garment a brown serge gown, tied round his middle with a cord, from which hangs a string of beads. Then there is the ugly hood or cowl flapping behind, turned back like the hinged cover of a coffee-pot or tankard.

The music struck up, and two Capuchins began a chant, during which the people knelt, and the friar just described got into a box-pulpit, which, like all pulpits here, is so placed that the speaker does not lose sight of the images, or turn his back to them or the altar. As the chanting ceased he rose to speak, and every now and then broke into long wailing ejaculations of "Madonna!" "Nossa Senhora!" "Sangue!" "Miserere-cordia!" "Feridas!" etc.; turning occasionally and pointing to the images. As he warmed, his gesticulations became energetic. He leaned over the edge of the box till his wide-spread hands nearly touched the shoulders of devotees below him; then stepping back, he threw his head, his eyes, and, to the uttermost, his arms up to the ceiling—the very action of a nurse lifting an infant from the floor, and holding it at arms' length above her. There was one novelty in his manner which struck me rather favorably, viz.: as he finished each telling passage, he sunk—and not ungracefully—into his seat, where he remained half, and sometimes a whole minute, till fresh ideas rose in him. He rarely spoke five minutes without sitting down; occasionally he gave out a sentence in that position, with one hand on the edge of the pulpit and the other applying a handkerchief to his perspiring face; but the instant a new view of the subject, or a touching thought occurred, he started up, and put it into glowing language, i. e., if one might judge by his excitement. I suppose his hearers were affected, though they gave no visible sign of being so. Possibly the indifferent Portuguese in which these Italian apostles are said to deliver themselves, diminishes the effect of their elocution. He had no book nor notes about him.

I began to tire, and thought of leaving; but after another short chant, another friar stepped into the speaking-box, older and stouter than his predecessor, with a darker beard and fairer skin: his action was confined chiefly to his head, combined with a singular habit or power of drawing down his neck into his body, and suddenly pushing it up again. Seated or standing, his head rose with his ideas and his voice—now buried beneath his cowl, now half a foot above it, and still rising.

A slight rain was falling, which I preferred encountering to remaining longer. As I came in sight of Derie-a Street the sound of music came up, and shortly after appeared, some two hundred feet below, the Mizeracordia Procession of the Burial. I reached the Hospital in time to witness its order and arrival. The unpleasant weather had reduced the number of spectators. The performers were drabbed, and seemed anxious to get in-doors.

THE COFFIN.

First came a man with a powerful matraca; then a young monk in a white hood and tippet, both in one—the latter went all round him, and reached to his elbows: the former was bound round his head with a new $\frac{1}{2}$ -inch hempen rope. He carried before him a black wooden cross, over the transverse bar of which a white cloth was thrown in the form of the letter M, to signify death—Morte. The cloth is supposed to be the one in which the body of Christ was enveloped by Joseph of Arimathea. A number of monks, draped like the cross-bearer, follow. Then came brothers in white gowns, bearing candles; and after them angels—children, chiefly girls, dressed as such, with wings and a colored gauze cloud attached by wire to the shoulders of each. Next three women (or men disguised as such), representing “the three Marys.” They were concealed in gowns and hoods, with their faces bent toward the ground, and had a mournful appearance. A large ring of silver was attached to the head of each, to signify a halo, or nimbus.

The coffin, more like a French bedstead, came next. It had four short posts and feet, with panels richly carved and gilt. On a mattress lay a “Dead Christ”—one of those exposed in churches, or, as it is here named, “The Body of God.” The whole was borne by four monks on two staves, whose ends rested on their shoulders. Each carried a pronged stick to support the load, at intervals, when all stand to hear an angel-chant. They wore hoods, and tippets, and hempen cords by way of ribbons. The canopy was borne high over the coffin by men in the same style of mourning.

More angels, led by brothers, came next, followed by the tallest of their number, a girl of fourteen, who mounted a pair of steps, and, chanting, opened a white cloth, the handkerchief of Veronica, whom she represented. She performed the part exceedingly well, notwithstanding the thick drizzling rain. Stepping down, the brother took up the steps, and all went forward again. Now came brothers, monks, and candles; angels, monks, and brothers; and then “Nossa Senhora,” erect, large as life, in purple dress, silver rays on her forehead, and standing on a stage richly paneled, and set off with cypress but no flowers. Borne, as the coffin was, on men's shoulders, she might be seen over the heads of the people a mile off, by far the most conspicuous member of the Pomp.

The band of music, more brothers in white albs and bearing candles, came next, and last of all the soldiery. In the hurry to get out of the rain, Nossa Senhora was nearly knocked off her base. Her head came slap against the door-jamb, in consequence of the bearers on one side not lowering her from their shoulders in concert with their comrades. She passed through at a low angle with the horizon. After the doors were closed, the leader of the "Pomp" once more worked his matraca, whose sounds died gradually away in the extensive interior.—The soldiers now put on their caps, and, with reversed arms, were marched to their barracks.

THE ANGELS.

Some of the implements (in miniature) carried by the angels are figured below.

The rain so increased that no one supposed any other pageant would take place. The Carmo one did not; but the Paula brotherhood, who excel in these things, after waiting in vain till six o'clock for clear weather, determined not wholly to disappoint the public, the angels, and themselves. Arranging matters as well as they could, in large apartments connected with the church, the Pomp emerged from the side passage, where the waxen Ex Votos were, on the front stoop or platform, and pacing slowly along it to the main entrance, turned in, proceeded toward the high altar, and thence, through a side-door, into the interior again.

Of the last spectacle of the kind I ever expect to see I shall preserve a few particulars, although, excepting the superior style in which it was got up, it differed little from that of the Mizeracordia. The managers being wealthy and ambitious of outshining other establishments, their angels are allowed to be the handsomest, and, with their saints, to have the best fit-outs. While others can hardly draw an audience, they command full houses.

The church was darkened—the glimmering of a solitary candle barely preventing persons from running against each other. Only when a new-comer, or one whose patience in waiting was worn out, pushed the crimson screen in the door-way momentarily aside, did sufficient light flash in to enable us to distinguish the faces of those close by us. The place was three-fourths full of people (no females), all moving and muttering like so many discontented phantoms. The greater part had been thus employed between three and four hours.

At last the sound of a distant rattle came from the interior; it drew nearer, ceased, and soon after was heard as if in the street, when those with umbrellas rushed forth and met the bareheaded musicians and soldiers stepping out of the side-passage upon the platform or long stoop, along which the troops formed a passage to the church door. Soon there came forth a swarm of candle-bearers, who, with undignified speed, hastened in again through the front door for shelter. They were followed by a monk in a white long gown and hood—the latter bound round his temples with a half-inch rope—bearing a black cross, on which a towel formed the letter M, as in the Mizeracordia spectacle. More candle-bearers, then brothers and a legion of angels; over the heads of several their guardians held umbrellas. Next, a neat pedestal was brought forth and placed on the flagging. An angel came, and, being lifted up, chanted a strain on the sufferings of the Saviour—unfolding from a roller, as she sung, a piece of white muslin, full six feet long, on which was depicted a full-length figure of Christ dead. This she turned gracefully round that all might see. Her voice was sweet and plaintive, and the little performance quite affecting. Veronica's handkerchief took a likeness only of the Saviour's face, but the cloth his body was laid in received an impression of the whole. It was a copy of the latter that the little songstress unrolled before us.

She passed in and made way for the Coffin, or Golden Bed, as some call it, upheld by monks in white hoods and cassocks. "A dead Christ" lay on it. It was partially covered by a rich counterpane. "The three Marys" followed weeping, dressed in long russet gowns and close hoods, and handkerchiefs in their hands. Their halos seemed made of bobbin wire, and might any where else have been taken for the frames of caps or bonnets. Next came Saint John and Mary Magdalene; she is one of the preceding trio, being twice represented. In the Carnio procession the Prophets always attend as mourners.

Next three suspicious-looking, bare-armed chaps in steel caps drew up—Roman executioners. Behind them walked the centurion in gorgeous array; golden helmet, scarlet tunic, a staff surmounted by an eagle, and every insignia of an ancient military officer. The character was well conceived, but spoiled by attempts to make it gigantic. The person of this actor was swelled by stuffing, and, from the vibration of the upper part, his head was clearly within the breast of the figure; the face was a mask. The helmet and metal ornaments were too heavy to be controlled by the artificial neck and shoulders. He passed quickly, as if desirous of escaping observation; but his sight was defective: he stumbled on ascending the only steps at the front door, and would have fallen but for St. John, against whose back he staggered.

Flocks of angels now flitted past us. Ere they had disappeared the image of "Our Lady" was out on the stoop, and exposed to the rain. Similar in size and outline with her sister of the Mizeracordia, she was beautifully carved, painted, and arrayed. Between the rays of her crown were seven stars. Diamonds and other gems formed her frontlet. Her robe was purple velvet, with gold stars wrought on it. She stood on an elaborately ornamented platform, which rested on the shoulders of men draped like the coffin-bearers. Aware of her being the most attractive person in the Pomp, the managers allowed her to remain full five minutes in the storm. Nothing common is put on her. Her dress and jewels are of the most costly material.

Parents commonly send a confidential person with their angels, who is careful not to lose sight of them, on account of the jewels on the persons and dresses. The breast-piece of one was almost covered with diamonds. A doctor last year decked out his daughter so gorgeously, and chiefly with borrowed gems, that he would not trust her even in the vestry without an attendant. If a father belongs to the brotherhood, he can accompany his child in the procession. If not, no. It is a rule that none but a church brother must lead an angel.

BOJERMAN AND LION.

THE LION AND HIS KIND.

UNTIL within a few years past, very little has been known of the history and habits of the most notable members of the feline family. Every thing relating to the tiger—except as an animal killed in the chase, or as a captive—is still unreliable. The constant emigration of our adventurous citizens to the wilderness of our vast continent, has recently made us acquainted with the cougar—the largest of the cat-family known to America—while the prowess of Cumming has unfolded the haunts of the lion to the gaze of the civilized world. Speaking, therefore, with authority regarding these two animals, we can devote more space to their description than to those of inferior importance. The Western Continent has been exempted by Providence from animals of the most destructive kinds, as the lion is a native of Africa, and the tiger of India; the ounce, the ocelot, the leopard, the lynx, and the cougar are more diffused, but are never met in sufficient numbers to occupy a prominent place in natural history. In the development of our paper, we have endeavored to use the most popular names, and have proceeded in our descriptions from the smallest representative of the felines up to the acknowledged head of the family; and, by common consent, the noblest beast that lives.

THE DOMESTIC CAT.

The Household Cat—the only domesticated representative of the feline race—is a universal favorite; it is so neat in its habits, so beautiful in form, graceful in gesture, and so useful withal; for without the cat, our houses, in many cases, would not only become uninhabitable on account of vermin, but it is safe to say that sections of country would be overrun with rats, and rendered unfit for the residence of man. Although the cat is not distinguished for its intelligence, still, when closely observed, it will be found to possess great sagacity; but it seldom exerts its faculties except for selfish purposes. The cat, as a general rule, shows no attachment to persons, only to places; yet it is one of the few dumb creatures that take an interest in their young after they are able to provide for themselves. In European countries it is quite common to hear of eccentric individuals who make companions of cats, and in England wills are not infrequent, which provide for these feline favorites after the testator is in the grave.

The cat, long as it has been domesticated, retains, in a remarkable degree, its instinctive passion for hunting; and a tame cat, once adopting a wild life, is more destructive, its size considered, than any other animal; and, after one or two generations, its progeny assumes a bluish-gray color, which no doubt is the appearance of the original type. Tame cats frequently abandon the ignoble labor of destroying rats and mice, and take to the hedges and neighboring woods, and bring home woodcock, partridges, quail, and other game birds; and in England they have been trained to become most successful poachers upon the preserves of the wealthy landholder.

The most remarkable illustration of this habit is given in an account of a cat owned by a gentleman living on Elk Run, in Virginia. It would seem that the plantation was much infested by snakes, which were protected by stone fences and thorn hedges. The cat having killed one of the reptiles, it devoted its energies to their extermination. In time it extended its field of operations to the adjoining woods, distant perhaps a mile, and would often return home with a snake many feet in length in its mouth.

The fondness of cats for certain sweet-scented herbs is well known, valerian being their favorite perfume. They are also highly susceptible of every change in the atmosphere, becoming gloomy and hypochondriacal in damp and rainy weather, and buoyant and playful on bright and sunny days. As an inmate of the family circle, they are never objected to by the most careful housekeeper; and the fat and pampered grimalkin, as it lies curled up on the hearth-rug, or reposes in the luxuriously cushioned chair, sheds an air of comfort and quiet about its vicinity that is felt by the most casual observer. The voice of the domestic cat is peculiar; and unlike all its species, in being very flexible, its cry frequently approaching the tones of the human voice. It was these mysterious sounds, joined with its unsocial characteristics, that made the cat an object of superstitious veneration among our ancestors; at the present day it holds an envied place at the fireside, and divides with the faithful dog the attentions and caresses of the social circle, from which all other quadrupeds are rigorously excluded.

The Wild Cat is common to almost every country, and is celebrated for its ferocity; it is distinguishable from the domestic cat not only by its superior size, but by the shortness of its tail, which shows that it is of another species. In the

CATS' TAILS.*

South and West it is still very numerous in the forests and swamps, and affords much sport for the hunter. We question if it was ever tamed, or made to show the least indication of friendship for its captors. We had, for very many weeks, caged in a room that we almost constantly occupied, a full-grown animal, which had been raised from a kitten in captivity—in all the time that it was in our possession, we never remember looking up but the cat had its malignant eye upon us, and greeted our observation by a growl of defiance or a snarl of hate. The wild cat makes its nest in hollow trees, near the ground, and is so ingenious in disguising its location that it is rarely discovered. It is very successful in its search for food, and every species of bird and small quadruped becomes its prey. When it once discovers a drove of wild turkeys, it will keep in their vicinity until the young and inexperienced are destroyed.

In hunting the cat, the creature has been known to display a great deal of intelligence in its efforts to escape the hounds. It will, when hard pressed, run up and down the trunk of a tree several times, and then, climbing to the topmost branches, take a flying leap to an adjoining monarch of the forest, and thus endeavor to destroy the trail. As a last resort for safety, it will take to some gigantic and heavenward-lifted limb, from which it will look down upon the dogs below, and snarl and growl defiance. Tormented by an occasional discharge of bird-shot, it will finally leap from its airy perch into the very jaws of the hounds, and throwing itself on its back, do more hard fighting with its claws and teeth, in a given length of time, than any other animal in the world; and give the spectator a realizing sense of the tremendous exaggeration of the Western bravo, who, among other things, professes himself perfectly able "to whip his weight in wild cats."

We had an acquaintance, some years ago, who, upon a business trip, left the crowded streets of New York, and threaded the then half-wild wastes of Northern Mississippi. While riding along, he heard in the road what he supposed to be a stray kitten, and upon examination discovered, among some dried leaves, a juvenile wild cat, that could scarcely walk. Without reflection, he transferred the little creature to his coat pocket, where it kept up its cries. Suddenly the gentleman was startled by a growl in his rear, and to his horror he discovered the infuriated mother, fierce with rage, and ardently bent upon avenging the attempted abduction of her young. Striking spurs to his already jaded horse, he dashed along the road as best he could, the while finding it perfectly impossible to pull the kitten out of his pocket, so firmly did the young imp fasten its claws to the lining. Each moment seemed more imminent with peril; twice did the "varmint" nearly succeed in fastening upon the haunches of the horse, but, as good fortune would have it, the appearance of a plantation, and the sound of dogs, alarmed the cat, and she beat a retreat. It was many months before our friend got entirely over his "scare," and was relieved of dreams that he was pursued by a dread phantom that resembled that terrible cat.

In the early settlement of Kentucky, a school-master was sitting alone in his log-cabin, when he was surprised to see a large cat enter his premises. Ignorant of the prowess of the animal, he shut the door, and commenced the attack. The battle was long and bloody, the man being nearly torn into shreds; and when discovered in the morning, he was found with his hands upon the cat's throat, his knees upon its haunches; the animal dead and stiffened by cold. The victor, in his terror, had probably remained in the position described the livelong night, his muscles paralyzed, his nerves shattered; and never, through a long life, did he entirely recover from the terrible encounter.

THE OCELOT.

The Ocelot is the tiger-cat of Peru and Mexico. It is beautifully marked, and is altogether a very attractive and playful little animal. It is quite common among the Indians in a half domesticated state; and is often led about the streets by a string, and, thus feebly guarded, offered for sale. Its principal food, when wild, is the monkey, which it rivals in activity and stratagem.

THE CARACAL.

The Caracal of Asia and Africa, and the Lynx of North America, are animals strongly resembling each other in appearance and disposition. They are both perfectly untamable, and seem to be designed by nature to keep within bounds the numbers of the smaller animals of the forest, acting the same part on land that destructive fish do in the sea. The skin of the lynx forms an important article of commerce, many thousands being annually imported into England by the Hudson's Bay Company.

The Chetah is one of the most beautiful animals, not only of the feline family, but of the world, and is common to India and Africa. In the former country they are domesticated, and trained to pursue and bring down game. It is the custom to take them hoodwinked upon the field, where they are brought as high as possible to the place where deer and antelopes may be feeding; the eyes of the chetah are then exposed and directed toward the game. The moment that the animal understands the wishes of its master, it leaps from the cart, and creeps along as it does in its wild state, hiding behind intervening bushes and stones, precisely like a cat when attempting to catch a bird. Nearing the vicinity of

The Ounce is a native of India, and until recently was confounded with the leopard. It is easily distinguished from that animal by its rough exterior and bushy tail; but many naturalists still contend that it is the leopard, its peculiarities arising from its being an inhabitant of mountainous regions. Nothing is known of its natural history.

THE LEOPARD.

The Leopard, though smaller than the tiger, when wounded is considered but little less formidable by its enemies. The usual method of capturing it is in traps. People having the greatest knowledge of its habits refrain from confining it in a cage, but fasten it by a thong around the loins, and a chain attached to a post, just as they are every where represented in Pompeian paintings. In this state of semi-confinement the animal best displays its wonderful grace and action. The leopard is without difficulty trained to perform many feats, and seems to be the most sportive of its whole family. Among the branches of trees, while at their play, they spring about so swiftly that the eye can scarcely follow their movements. Individuals have become quite celebrated for their intelligence and good-nature. An Englishman in India owned one, named Sai, that went at pleasure about the house, and seemed to find the greatest amusement in looking at the street scenes out of a certain window. If the children of the family wished to occupy his place, they unceremoniously thrust him aside. He was full of play, and was by no means averse to a practical joke, such as knocking over his attendant if he got asleep, or perhaps jumping upon the back of the servants as they would be stooping down to clean the floor. Sai was passionately fond of lavender water, a predilection accidentally discovered; on one occasion, while his master was pouring some lavender water on his handkerchief, Sai, who was sitting by, tore it out of his hands, and continued rolling over with it until it was reduced to fragments. Before the unsuspecting herd, it singles out its victim, reaches it by two or three tremendous leaps, and brings it to the ground.

THE OUNCE.

his social qualities were known, he escaped from the yard where he was kept, and rushed round the ramparts, creating consternation in his course. The castle gates were closed, the officers, who had doors to their apartments, shut them, and the sentinels, who had none, ran away. The playful creature was thus left to complete his frolic by himself; and at last permitted his keeper to quietly lead him back to his cage. Sai was finally carried to England. On the voyage he got ducked in the sea, which seemed to nearly break his heart, and he suffered terribly from sickness. His daily allowance of food was a parrot a day, hardly enough to keep him from starving. On his arrival in England he was presented to the Duchess of York. One morning his new mistress called to see him, and he appeared playful and in his usual health, but at evening he was found dead. Sai, after he once became civilized, showed for his benefactors all the affection and faithfulness of a dog, and illustrated, in a most remarkable degree, that in natural disposition the leopard is far less cruel than the other representatives of the feline family. The Romans, in celebrating the feast of Bacchus, used to have a pageant, drawn through the streets, consisting of a pair of leopards attached to a car, in which rode a human representative of the infant god.

THE JAGUAR.

The Jaguar is a native of America, and very closely resembles the leopard. It follows in the track of wild herds of cattle and horses, and thus finds its principal subsistence. Its mode of killing its prey differs from that of the other felidæ, which is to seize by the throat. The jaguar, on the contrary, is said to spring upon the back of its victim, and, by its arms and with a sudden jerk of the head, dislocate the neck. Its strength is sufficient to enable it to drag the body of a horse a great distance. Unlike the other members of the cat family, it readily takes to the water, and not only swims rivers, but is successful in catching fish in shall-low water, of which it seems to be very fond. It is related that, many years since, a jaguar took possession of the church of Santa Fé, and killed the padre. The priest's absence caused suspicion, and a coadjutor went into the church, but, to the people, was as unaccountably delayed as his predecessor. After some time another priest entered the church, and was instantly attacked by the jaguar, but he managed to escape and give the alarm. No one now could be found brave enough to enter the building, so the people unroofed a corner of the church, and shot their enemy from a safe distance.

A jaguar penetrated a squatter's hut in search of food, and the wife, the only human occupant at the moment, leaped for safety into a large store-chest, fastening with a spring, which obliged her to keep her fingers between the lid and the side of the chest, lest she should be suffocated for want of air. The jaguar soon discovered the hiding-place, and tried to push his head into the chest, but he could not raise the lid, nor could his paws obtain entrance. Presently he discovered the woman's fingers, and began to lick them with his rough tongue. Not being able to accomplish any thing at the side of the box, he jumped on the top, and by his weight broke his poor prisoner's fingers. For a long time he continued his efforts to obtain his prey, but at last, finding all of his endeavors useless, he went away. The woman at daybreak released herself and alarmed the neighbors, and, on the return of the husband, a search for the jaguar was commenced, which resulted in finding a pair, together with their cubs. It is hardly necessary to say that these "varmints" were summarily dispatched.

THE COUGAR.

The Cougar is the American lion—at least it bears a closer resemblance to that noble brute than any other of the feline family, for it is destitute of the stripes of the tiger, the spots of the leopard, and the rosettes of the jaguar; but when full-grown possesses a tawny-red color, almost uniform over the whole body, and hence the inference that it is like the lion. Some naturalists call it the puma; the Anglo-Americans the panther, or "painter," as it is generally termed in the back-woods. Cougar is a corruption of the Mexican name, and such we please to term it. The animal is remarkable for the extensive range of country which it inhabits, for it has been found in all the intermediate space between Paraguay and the great lakes of North America. In form it is less attractive than the generality of its species, there being an apparent want of symmetry; for it is observable that its back is hollow, its legs short and thick, and its tail does not gracefully taper; yet nature has invested the cougar with other qualities as a compensation, the most remarkable of which is an apparent power to render itself quite invisible; for so cunningly tinged is its fur, that it perfectly mingles with the bark of trees—in fact, with all subdued tints—and stretched upon a limb, or even extended upon the floor of its dimly-lighted cage, you must prepare your eye by considerable mental resolution to be assured of its positive presence. We knew a party of hunters, on the prairies of Louisiana, who spent a portion of a day under quite a small and perfectly leafless tree, and never suspected, until it leaped to the ground, the presence of an immense cougar, that was all the time a few feet above their heads in the naked branches; and then so quiet were its movements that the interruption would have passed for a fleeting shadow of the sun, had not the animal been discerned as it moved away upon the open plain.

The cougar, which is not unfrequently killed in the Southwest and in Texas, seldom measures more than six feet in length; and fortunately—for they are very destructive—they are but seldom seen in any inhabited part of our continent; but we notice that one was recently slain in California which measured nine feet, including the tail, which is about one-third of the whole. Their habits are exceedingly solitary, and they never approach the residences of human beings except when impelled by hunger—preferring the most retired passes in the mountains and the deeper gloom of the swamps. Hunting only for game in the night, and possessing, as we have already stated, an extraordinary power of concealment, they are strangers every where, and their appearance throws neighborhoods into excitement, for the mystery attending their movements ever exaggerates the idea of their power to injure and destroy.

The cougar reaches the top of a tree with almost the ease of a bird—depending upon his claws to retain the momentum in his favor gained by his first spring. Selecting a lower limb of some gigantic tree that overhangs a watering-place, or a “salt-lick,” if one be in the neighborhood, he lies extended along his perch, looking—upon the most critical examination of a spectator—more like a line of dried moss, or an excrescence on the bark, than a blood-thirsty beast of prey. Here he keeps his vigil—his eyes alone are moving; but even their fires are partially quenched from observation by silken lashes, which, like the lantern of the thief, darken the light that it may not betray. Most animals of the forest drink at night, and at particular places; thus finally the deer, the elk, or even the lordly buffalo appears, and ere it has slaked its thirst, the cougar has dropped from his nestling-place and descended as quietly as a dried leaf upon the neck of his victim. But now all is changed—the cougar instantly becomes the active fiend—his claws and teeth sink into the quivering flesh, and away flies the fated victim with the speed of an arrow. In vain it rushes against the trunks of trees, or scours through the inhospitable cane-brake to brush off the destroyer—the cougar has fastened himself with the tenacity of death, and even as the wild race continues, drinks up the warm and throbbing blood. Life, tenacious as it is among the ruminants of the forest, is soon sapped by the remorseless appetite of the destroyer; and as the victim falls and expires, the cougar stealthily extends himself along the body, suspiciously glances around, as if challenging a dispute for the prize, and then satisfies for the moment his insatiable appetite.

Excited now, rather than appeased, he rushes back to his eyrie, resumes his watching, and darts down again upon some helpless animal, accompanying his acts with ten-fold ferocity—blood rather increasing than appeasing his lust. Thus passes the night, until the butcher is literally covered with gore. The first streak of the morning sun that illumines the horizon sends him to his hiding-place. With the stealthy, cowardly step of the midnight assassin and murderer, he seeks obscurity, and calms his passions by cleansing his soiled coat of every stain, and at the close of the labor sinks into disturbed sleep, to resume his work again when the darkness of night rests upon the earth.

There are times, however, when a destroyer more terrible than the cougar himself is on his path. The hunter has brought the well-trained dogs to assist him on the scent, and already the deep bay of the excited hound is yelping forth the desire for blood. The wild beast—a short time before so relentless, so powerful, and in his domain so apparently omnipotent—feels that his doom is sealed. Strange as it may be, he has an instinctive dread; the lord of the creation is upon him; the breath of powder unnerves his muscles of iron; and the cougar flies—flies with even more terror than the helpless deer that has suffered in his grasp. As a last resort, he mounts a tree; the unerring scent of the dogs shames the sight in its knowledge, and betrays the presence of the now immolated destroyer. The sharp ringing of the rifle is followed by the body of the lifeless cougar coming helpless to the ground; for, with all his power, he yields to the fiat which gave man dominion over every living thing that moveth upon the face of the earth.

It is a singular fact regarding the cougar that his flesh is used by some people as an article of food, and it is represented as tasting, under the charms of the culinary art, like any thing but "cat." In stock-raising countries, where the cougar is most frequently found, its thefts are mostly confined to stealing young heifers for food.

A poor fellow, living on the prairies of Opelousas, who was suspected of such acts, was once surprised with various quarters of supposed beef hanging pendent from the rafters of the veranda of his house; nay, more, it was smoking upon his table, and giving out any thing but unsavory fumes. Upon being charged with taking what was not his own, he showed first his title to what he possessed in the characteristic document of an old rifle, and as dress makes the animal as well as the man, he farther confirmed his rights by exhibiting the skins of two large cougars, which belonged not to the drove of the servile brutes of the vacherie, but to the wilds; and were the property of the hunter who possessed the strong arm and unflinching bravery to slay them, and set the mark of ownership where by nature all was free and untamed.

A hunter on the Rio Grande, who was invariably unsuccessful, became so much annoyed by the taunts of his companions, that he determined to adopt the Camanche Indian fashion of hunting, and accordingly dressed himself in a deer-skin, and ornamented his head with huge antlers. Thus equipped he sallied out, and took his place at a favorite "stand." A few moments only elapsed before a cougar, perched in the limbs of the tree above, thinking that he saw "a sure enough buck," leaped from his airy abode plump on the hunter's back, at the same time burying his claws and teeth deeply into the dried skin. A yell of fright and astonishment greeted the cougar, such as never before was heard from the throat of living venison, and dropping his game, the animal and the hunter took different directions, it being a matter of uncertainty, even to this day, which of the two was most alarmed.

An American lady, Mrs. Jane Swisshelm, furnishes the world with a description of the cougar that is thrillingly interesting. She says that at a certain time past, her husband bought in Arkansas a cougar, six months old, which had been caught while a kitten in the woods. The creature was brought home, and remained a prisoner four years, at the end of which time he died. Tom, such was his name, was nine feet in length, of a gray color on his back and sides, and nearly white on the belly and throat. His back was generally perfectly straight, his form symmetrical, and his movements lithe and graceful. If in exceeding good-humor he would purr; but if he wished to intimidate he would raise his back, erect his hair, and spit like a cat. In the twilight of the evening the animal was accustomed to pace back and forth to the full extent of his limits, ever and anon uttering a short, piercing shriek, which made the valley reverberate for half a mile or more in every direction. Mrs. Swisshelm says these sounds were the shrillest, and at the same time the most mournful she ever heard. They might, perhaps, be likened to the scream of a woman in an agony of terror.

The natural ferocity of the panther was at length so far subdued, that his fair mistress sometimes ventured, when he was in good-humor, to stroke his head and feel his paw. On one occasion, indeed, when he had broken his chain, and all the men in the house, with the exception of Mr. Swisshelm, had fled to the barn for safety, she seized him by the collar as he took refuge in the dining-room, and held him until her husband took effectual measures to secure him. At length, however, the lady was thrown from a carriage, and so severely injured that she was confined to her bed several weeks. She says:

"When we appeared on crutches we inadvertently went quite near the cougar, and were warned by a low growl that he was regarding us as his prey. We turned and found him crouched within five or six feet of us, ready to spring—his eyes green and blazing, and the tip of his tail moving from side to side. We kept our eyes fastened on his; there was no one within call, and we tried to make him remember us by talking to and naming him.

"'Tom—poor Tom!' but Tom's eyes lost none of their fire, and the tail kept up its regular motion.

"Then we tried to intimidate him, as we had often done before, by assuming a voice of command. 'Tom! Tom! Down Tom!' but Tom kept his hostile attitude, and we—in doubt as to whether his chain was long enough to reach us, or strong enough to resist the spring we saw he intended making—kept our place and tried to stare him out of countenance.

"After what appeared to us a long time, trusting to the power of the eye to keep him still, we set our crutches, and still speaking to him, threw ourself backward a step. The instant we moved he sprang, but the chain held him, and being too short, he rebounded against a post, and fell to the floor some eighteen inches from where we stood."

It is no wonder that a woman possessed of such nerve should become a champion for her sex.

The Royal Tiger is a native of Hindostan, and although it has been hunted from time immemorial by the native princes, and in recent times by numberless Europeans, still nothing is known of this most formidable animal beyond the incidents connected with its destruction in the jungles. No one has followed it to its den, or watched its nocturnal adventures. Its habits remain, therefore, matters of speculation.

The ferocity of the tiger's disposition has been exaggerated; but although capable of being made quite gentle, they are unreliable in their habits, and apt at any instant to attempt the gratification of a blood-thirsty disposition. Keepers of menageries, however much confidence they may feel in the friendship of the "king of beasts," are always nervous about the tiger, and cautious in their movements. We think it was Van Amberg who was unexpectedly set upon by a tiger, when the lion came to his rescue, and actually threw the tiger down, and held him fast until the man escaped. The circumstance is still familiar with the public, where the "Lion Queen," at Wombwell's menagerie, England, fell a victim to the sudden irritability of the tiger. While going through the daily performance, and in presence of hundreds of spectators, this young lady was forced to chastise the tiger for some disobedience of orders, when the animal suddenly turned upon her and grasped her throat, and although, when she was rescued, no perceptible injuries were visible, yet life was extinct. In a wild state the tiger is more dreaded than the lion, for he is constantly disposed to destruction, and has been known to put whole flocks of domestic animals to death after his appetite had been gorged to repletion.

The tiger grows to an immense size, and is sometimes heavier than the largest lion. His strength seems amazing. A peasant in the Sundah Rajah's dominions, had a buffalo foundered in a quagmire, which could not be removed by the united strength of many men. Upon going for more assistance, the party on their return were surprised to discover that a tiger had pulled the buffalo out of the mud, and throwing it across his back, was bearing it away to his den.

Tiger-hunting is pursued in the East on the back of elephants, and every thing depends upon the firmness of these naturally timid animals, particularly when they meet the tiger. The manner of training them is difficult, and is managed as follows: A tiger deprived of his teeth, claws, and with his mouth sewed up, is fastened to a stake by a strong rope about thirty feet long. The elephants in training are then urged on to the attack; the tiger springs upon their trunks with the greatest ferocity, and is beaten back, or thrown into the air upon the formidable tusks.

In this way the elephants, escaping injury, are deceived into a false confidence, and afterward face the wild animal with the same courage as they did the one so cruelly deprived of the power of effective defense.

Captain Basil Hall, while in India, witnessed very many of these tiger-fights, and describes one where the animal was urged into the netted court of the exhibition by a handful of lighted squibs and crackers. On reaching the centre of the ring, he was greatly bewildered by the shoutings, drummings, and shriekings which, coming from the spectators, resounded on every side; and was farther put out by the evolutions of some donkeys within the ring, to the tails of which were fastened blown bladders filled with dried peas. On finding all retreat to his den cut off, the tiger flew at the wooden figure of a man that had been stuck up in the ring, and twisted its head off in an instant. Discovering the cheat, he first tore the image to pieces, and then made a dash at the netting in front of his cage, up which he scrambled until his fore paws were already on the roof, and in another half-minute he would have been among the assembled crowds. Fortunately a brave lad, about twelve years of age, had perched himself on the cage, and the moment the infuriated tiger showed his head above the ropes, the boy, with a short club, struck him such a rap on the nose that the animal fell back head over heels into the inclosure. After long badgering the order was given to put the tiger to death. One of the native chiefs discharged a great number of arrows into the animal's body, so that it bristled all over like a porcupine's. At last, the English officers, disgusted at his lengthened tortures, begged leave to try the effect of a musket-ball, which laid him dead instantaneously, although several arrows had previously passed entirely through the tiger's body without producing any visible effect.

A gentleman who participated in a tiger-hunt kindly furnished us a detailed sketch, from which we make the following extracts. After describing the hunting party, as it set out for the jungle, he says: "A quarter of an hour brought us to the place where the tiger was first seen; and sure enough in the vicinity lay the remains of the poor brute the animal had carried off. While we were contemplating the gnawed and half-consumed body, one of the elephants that had lingered behind began to trumpet aloud with his trunk, a sign that he perceived the vicinity of the tiger. It was plain, therefore, that we were near the foe, and that he was concealed in the thicket. Cautiously we urged our elephants toward the jungle, the footmen meanwhile keeping up a continual hallooing, which, with the trumpetings of the half-frightened elephants, caused the welkin to resound with a commingled noise sufficient to daunt even a tiger, in all the consciousness of his solitary dominion and untamed ferocity. A few moments were thus anxiously spent, when one of the old hunters suddenly cried out 'Sher! sher! bah! bah!' when we saw the jungle violently agitated all along the straight line leading toward the swamp; and a couple of rifles were discharged from the gentlemen on the nearest elephant, which served to produce a more rapid advance of the moving body, when in a moment, breaking cover, out the tiger sprang into the clear swamp and made for the opposite wood.

"On went the crowd in pursuit, the Europeans urging their drivers to get the elephants into a run; three shots were fired, but apparently without effect, before the tiger reached 'cover.' The hunters soon crossed the swamp, and the beast was again roused. Shot followed shot in quick succession, until at length every thing except the report of our arms was as still in the jungle as if naught but the hand of Nature had ever ruffled its surface. Captain Angew, my companion, exclaimed, 'By Jove, he is hit and fallen! in with you after him! Twenty rupees to the man who first draws his body forth!' This last sentence was uttered in Hindoostanee, and our footmen spread themselves about in all directions, each anxious for the honor of the discovery, as well as impelled by the hope of reward. To our former well-organized system of action succeeded a scene of hurry and confusion, overweening confidence, and careless movements, which baffles description. A few moments were occupied by this species of search, when a low growl, followed by that subdued noise which all the feline tribe are accustomed to make when irritated, suddenly struck our ears, and the footmen commenced scattering in all directions. A poor servant, belonging to a gentleman of the party, was running away in great confusion, when he was encountered by the enraged monster, and before any of us could collect our confused senses, he was seized by the tiger with both teeth and claws, and desperately wounded in the neck, shoulder, and breast. The tiger, however, was too much alarmed to attempt to bear off his prey; but abandoning it he moved, with great rapidity, toward that part of the jungle most clear of the fugitives, which, by good luck, led back to the swamp.

"Back again we all followed, and the elephants having by this time become familiarized with the tiger's appearance and smell, with admirable sagacity, now began to understand the object of the morning's excursion; and, putting out their strength, they advanced with so much speed that we were up with the enemy before he got half way across the swamp. I had just raised my rifle to my shoulder, and was on the point of pulling the trigger, when, good heaven! I saw him suddenly turn, and with two or three bounds, as quick as lightning, he literally flung himself through the air, and alighted on the upper part of the neck of an elephant, and there attempted to cling with teeth and claws. The elephant roared, and shook his head with frantic motion, while the whole of us who were surrounding him, were fearful of discharging our pieces, in consequence of the danger our friends on his back were in, of receiving their contents. The tiger was at length shaken off, after having almost torn the poor animal's trunk from his head. The moment that he was on the ground a couple of rifle-balls entered him, one in the shoulder and one in the breast. Streaming with blood, and desperately wounded, the animal then rushed upon the elephants; in the second charge, he actually buried his claws in the huge saddle of the animal on which we were seated, and I shall never forget the sight of the savage as he hung suspended from its back. I looked over the edge of the howdah in which I was seated, and caught sight of his eye-balls, rolling as if in a sea of blood, so suffused did they seem with mingled pain and rage. One of my fellow-companions had the honor of giving him the fatal shot, the ball hitting the forehead and entering the brain. The footmen had kept out of the way during the conflict, but they now all hastened to the spot where the tiger lay, carried him to the edge of the jungle, and laid him on the grass. He was a full-grown royal tiger, measuring four feet seven inches from the nose to the insertion of the tail at the rump. Unlike the miserable wretches we see in our menageries, with collapsed abdomens, loose skin, and dull, dirty, ill-defined colors, his belly was round, large, and well distended, the muscular development in his shoulders and thighs magnificent, and the stripes were as clear and vivid as if the fleshy integuments they covered were still boiling with the intemperate spirits to which they are said to owe their brilliancy. The poor man who was wounded, died soon after he was borne to the native hospital. We rested from the scene of our labors a couple of hours, made a plentiful repast of cold meats, cheese, bread, and bottled porter; and amidst the heartfelt thanks of the villagers of Dongerthal, and the loud congratulations of all the sporting men attached to our force, we entered camp with our magnificent trophy just as the sun was declining in the west."

By the common consent of naturalists and historians, the Lion stands as the head of the feline tribe; recent discoveries, however, are calculated to give the noble animal a distinct place in the creation, and disconnect him from the association. The lion possesses great individuality; he is the most noble of all brutes, and can not with strict justice be confounded with the tiger, leopard, and ounce—species which seem to be the least removed from the lion, yet are so little distinguishable from each other that they have often been confounded together by travelers and intelligent classifiers. Buffon—who was one of the most agreeable of enthusiasts—gives a description of the lion which is so calculated to raise the animal in your estimation, that if one were to read it on Mount

THE LION.

Atlas, or in the desert of Sahara, and then unexpectedly encounter the animal in his native haunts, so far from retreating from his presence, he would approach and cultivate his acquaintance. The occupation of Algeria by the French, and the inroads into the wild regions of Africa by Cumming, have conjointly been the means of obtaining really authentic histories of the lion; and although his race furnishes many very exceptionable specimens, still, as a whole, the lion has risen in public estimation, and now possesses more real interest than he did when only viewed through the eulogies and exaggerations of half-fabulous records.

The habits of the lion are interesting. They associate in couples, display great attachment for each other, and with the greatest care rear and protect their young. The male lion, in defense of his family, will, with the coolest indifference, face a thousand men. The magnanimity of his disposition is proverbial, and no anecdotes are better authenticated than those of his sparing his human foes at the very moment of victory. It is quite common in Southern Africa to meet with natives who have been wounded by lions, and who have escaped death solely by the mercy of the beast. A boor, in attempting to mount his horse, was thrown to the ground by a lion. The animal merely stood over him, lashed his tail, and growled at the man's friends, who were at a safe distance, and then slowly and dignifiedly commenced a retreat.

The strength of the lion is almost fabulous: he has been known to leap a wide ditch with perfect ease while holding a full-grown heifer between his teeth, and there is nothing living that can receive with impunity a blow of one of his paws. He instantly tears down the buffalo and giraffe, and will make equal battle with the rhinoceros and elephant. In fact, so tremendous, and so compact, is the dread machinery with which nature has provided him, that he overcomes almost every beast of the forest, however superior in weight or stature.

The lion never drinks except before the moon rises, or after it sets. He approaches the fountain as if deeply conscious that he is happy in possessing the cooling draught. Extending himself with ceremonious precision upon the ground, he stretches out his powerful arms before him, and brings his chest close to the ground; these things being accomplished, he gives a few laps, and then rests as if to more perfectly enjoy the luxury. Cumming relates that he has often heard them lapping within twenty yards of where he was encamped, yet, from their tawny color, he was never able to distinguish their outline. This confirms the general idea that the lion has no scent; for he would not approach so near an enemy, if he were warned, as in the case of other animals, by the, to them, infection of the air. Nature has given the lion the protection of perfectly harmonizing with the dried grass of the plains and the burning sands of the desert; and thus compensated him for the lack of a sense so common to inferior animals.

One of the distinctive traits of the lion is his voice. All others of his ascribed species are silent and stealthy. The lion, on the contrary, announces his presence by a challenge that makes the earth quake, and carries terror for miles around. As a general rule, the lion is heard throughout the entire night; at the approach of darkness the sighing moans commence, and, but for the occasional interruption of a distinct roar, continue until break of day. Lions have their separate districts, and allow of no intrusion; but there are times when an unusual drought occurs—then two or more strange troops meet together at the same fountain. On such occasions, if it be a cool, frosty night, the voice of the lion is heard in its perfection. Every member of each troop sounds a bold volume of defiance at the opposite parties, then all join together, and each individual seems to vie with his comrades in the intensity of his power of voice. If these challenges result in bringing two strange animals together, a battle ensues, which seldom ends without the death of one of the combatants. The nervous susceptibility of the lion is displayed in the fact that, in hazy and wet weather, contrary to his usual custom, he can be heard in subdued growls throughout the livelong day, complaining of the depressing influence of the atmosphere, and no doubt expending, at the same time, a commendable degree of ill-nature upon the solicitous inmates of his domestic hearth. The lion's notes seem to embody the language of the vast forests and deserts in which he delights to dwell. He gives vocal expression to the mysteries of his strange haunts, and tells of love, daring, success, and defeat, in the wonderful modulations of his orchestral voice. A lion troop is an opera in which the instruments are attuned by nature; the theme destruction, defiance, victory, death. Hence there come the low, deep notes of sorrow, like the wails of mothers over the slain; then the deep-toned, solemn roars follow in quick succession, like the rapid discharge of heavy artillery—growing louder and louder, they seem to engulf the surrounding world, and threaten to shake the elements into chaos; then follows the finale of sobs, of groans, so appalling, because so indicative of human woe.

The lion is supposed by naturalists to have the average life of thirty-five years, yet this seems very inconsistent with the well-known fact, that one was kept in the Tower of London over threescore years and ten, and no one knew the age of the animal when it was first made a prisoner. By a kind arrangement of Providence, lions and other destructive animals are never numerous. A certain area is necessary for their support, and they destroy each other if the prescribed limits are interfered with. Gerard, the French lion hunter of Algeria, calculates that there are thirty lions now living in the colony, and that the Arabs pay an annual tribute of twenty-five cents to the government, and an average of two hundred and fifty cents to the lions, in the destruction of their horses, mules, sheep, and camels; so it would seem that the reign of the king of beasts, like that of all other kings, is rather an expensive luxury.

In the life of the great missionary, Judson, occurs a story of a starving lion, which has all the elements of a fearful tragedy. Confined in prison by the Burman authorities, Judson was electrified by the news of a British victory over his oppressors. This increased the severity of his treatment. Just before the war between Burmah and the English, the king had received a present of a majestic lion, which had become a pet in the palace, particularly with his majesty. After the defeats of Bandoola, some of the courtiers discovered the fearful resemblance between the king's favorite and the insignia on the British flag, and the regal beast was looked upon as a demoniac ally of England, and he was finally cast into prison. The cage was newly ironed and barricaded, as if some unusual resistance might have been expected. And now commenced to the unhappy prisoners with whom Judson was confined a new and fearful scene of misery. The unhappy men had seen their own friends starved, and beaten, and smothered, and strangled to death, and then dragged by the feet from the door, and thrust like dogs into some shallow pit, or left to be devoured by jackals—and they thought they had gained a familiarity with every species of wretchedness. But there was something almost supernatural in their new horror of a starving lion. Day after day the noble beast writhed in the pangs of hunger, parched with thirst, and bruised and bleeding in his fearful struggles, while his roarings seemed to shake the prison to its foundations, and sent a thrill of indescribable terror to the hearts of its occupants.

The jailer said that it was the British lion ineffectually struggling against the prowess of the conquering Burmans. Sometimes, after dark, a compassionate woman would steal to the cage, and thrust a mouthful of food between the bars, but it was necessarily a trifle to the powerful beast, and only seemed to increase his ravings. At other times, one of the keepers would throw water over him, which would be greeted by almost human shrieks of pleasure, though it only seemed to lengthen for a little his term of suffering. At last the scene was over: the skeleton of the unhappy beast was dragged from its cage, and buried in the earth.

In endeavoring to perfectly comprehend the habits and natural history of the lion, Cumming's adventures in Africa are calculated to give the most vivid idea. He presents many new pictures, all of which elevate the king of beasts in the reader's estimation, and involuntarily suggest a comparison between man and the lion, as a destructive animal. The noble quadruped pursues his way through the interminable wilds, kills from necessity, and, having satisfied his hunger, leaves the remains of his repast for the weaker animals that follow in his path. Wantonness or cruelty he never displays; on the contrary, he has mercy upon the weak, and disdains to strike a blow, except for the benefit of his own existence and those dependent upon him. Cumming, on the contrary, stalks through the wilderness more blood-thirsty than a thousand lions—he seems to literally revel in blood; without any other reason than to gratify his destructiveness, he disfigures the vast plains with the mountain carcases of elephants and giraffes; antelopes, gnus, zebras, and buffaloes fall before his pestiferous saltpetre, as if he were a breathing pestilence. At nightfall, the wolf and the jackal swarm on his track, and screech and yell as if the fiends were unloosed; at day-break, the eagle and the vulture darken the air over his head, and gorge their unholy appetites in the victims of his prodigality of God's life. Surely the lion, by comparison, is the being of humanity, and his bloody deeds pale before the records of his Christianized rival, as a destroyer on the face of the earth.

DARIEN EXPLORING EXPEDITION,*
UNDER COMMAND OF LIEUT. ISAAC C. STRAIN.

BY J. T. HEADLEY.

I WILL now transfer the course of the narrative to the proceedings of the advanced party, which left the main body on the 18th of February.

Breakfastless, but full of hope, the four adventurers set out, and after making a détour in the forest to avoid undergrowth, again struck the river, where the walking was good. Truxton's camp was in sight, and Strain hailed it to bid the party keep the bank. Following this bank until it became scarped and impassable, they took to the forest, and although still attempting to keep the river in sight, were at length forced from it by the denseness of the undergrowth. After an hour's journey they saw the river again close upon their right, and supposing that it was a sudden bend, regained the bank, which was clear and sloping, and followed it for nearly a quarter of a mile, when they found by their old trail that it was the same ground they had already passed over, the river having made a turn upon itself. This was very discouraging at the outset; and hearing the voices of the main body ahead, already following on, and unwilling to discourage them in their march, Strain struck into the forest, and making a wide détour, regained the river, and by rapid traveling left them far behind.

About noon they halted for an hour to allow Mr. Avery to rest, but, with that exception, marched steadily during the day, and made about fifteen miles on the course of the river. At dark they encamped, and kindling a fire to intimidate wild beasts and keep off alligators, laid down to sleep. With so small a party, and traveling rapidly, they did not think it worth while to appoint a watch.

The next morning (14th), at earliest dawn, they were afoot. Having obtained no food the day before, there was no delay in cooking and eating. Writing by the dim dawn the note, formerly alluded to, to Truxton, Strain gave the order to march, and the four pushed on. They were, however, soon forced from the river by the undergrowth, and after a march of about two hours, found themselves in a dense thicket, where it was necessary to cut every foot of the way for some two hundred yards. During the time they occupied in making this distance they rarely if ever touched the earth, so matted and close were the standing and fallen branches and bushes. It was painful work, and not without danger; but they cut and floundered through. Emerging into the more open forest, they found themselves in an almost impassable swamp. Struggling through this as they best could, they saw a large body of water, and Strain, in attempting to approach it, became so effectually bogged, that it was with great difficulty he extricated himself. The order to countermarch was then given, and after incredible labor they reached the river about noon, and at a point only about 200 yards below the camp from which they had set out some seven hours before. This was disheartening, but they pushed on for two hours longer, when they halted for an hour's rest.

Strain now felt quite discouraged; for, at this rate, the party would perish before it could get through. He determined, therefore, again to try a raft, and finding on the beach some driftwood sufficiently dry to float, he halted at four o'clock and commenced collecting timbers, cutting cross-pieces, and getting vines for lashings. This was slow work, as they had nothing with which to cut the hard logs—that were in some cases imbedded in the earth—except the machete (a sort of cutlass of good steel and highly tempered). Still, by working hard, they had by dark collected enough logs to float two or three men. They then began to look around for some food, not having tasted a mouthful since the night previous to leaving the main body, two days before. Having obtained a few acid nuts, they made a fire, spread their blankets, and were soon fast asleep on a hard clay bank, with a brilliant full-moon shining down upon them.

At daylight they were hard at work upon the raft, and by ten o'clock had logs enough lashed together to support two persons. Wilson and Strain then got upon it, and pushing off, slowly floated down the river; while Mr. Avery and Golden followed along the bank.

At noon another large log was secured and lashed to the raft with strips of canvas torn from Strain's haversack, and the whole party embarked. But the weight was too heavy, and the crazy structure sunk until the water was knee-deep above it. They, however, kept on, but in a short time struck a rapid current which swept them upon a sunken snag. In a moment the logs parted and one broke entirely loose. All was consternation, when Strain cried, "Silence!" and sitting down on one log, threw either leg over those each side and kept them together. For a few minutes there was great danger of losing all their arms, and even their lives; and nothing but the presence of mind and coolness of every man saved the raft from entire destruction and in deep water, while, owing to their debility and the weight of their accoutrements, swimming was out of the question.

Landing below, where the current was not so strong, they repaired the raft, and floated sluggishly on till nearly sunset, when they struck upon a shoal. Unable to force the raft over this, they were compelled to take it to pieces and float it down, log by log, to a shelving clay beach, where they could reconstruct it. While getting the raft over they discovered a species of clams—said to be nearly identical with the "Little Neck clams" of New York—one hundred and twenty of which made quite a supper, after their hard day's work. While sitting on the bank they saw a shark, some five feet long, attempting to swim over the shoal; but all attempts to get his body for food proved abortive.

The next day, by nine o'clock, the raft was repaired, and the four again embarked; Strain with neither pantaloons nor drawers—nothing on, in fact, but a shirt—bare-legged, sat exposed to the full rays of a tropical sun, and with the rest not much better protected, drifted lazily down the sluggish, tortuous current. At noon, however, they struck another snag. While working hard to extricate themselves, a heavy rain shower came up, which drenched them thoroughly. Soon after another snag was struck, which caused a delay of two hours. Near sunset they came upon a shoal, and swinging off met a swift current, and were dragged by its force under some overhanging branches, which swept Mr. Avery and Golden off into deep water, while Strain, with Wilson, whose leg was nearly broken, hung on, and were carried upon a snag in deep water. In endeavoring to cut loose, they lost a macheta. But Golden, finding his leg not broken, plunged to the bottom, and fortunately recovered it. At length, getting loose, they paddled ashore, and as it was already nearly dark, they encamped for the night. Mr. Avery had all the matches upon his person when he swam ashore, consequently they were wet, and no fire could be obtained. This was the more disagreeable, as their clothes and blankets were all soaked with water. Although the weather was mild, they seldom suffered more; for the cold wet blankets chilled them through and through. Worn and exhausted, they could get no sleep. Wilson and Golden lay growling at each other all night.

In the morning they woke thoroughly chilled and sore from the effects of sleeping on the hard clay bank and in wet clothes. They had determined to abandon the raft, as the snags and shoals were too frequent; and spreading their blankets in the sun, remained in camp till they were dried. They employed the time, however, in cutting down a large tree with hard nuts, the kernels of which being extracted supplied them with four days' provisions, that is, the means of sustaining life, for their hardness and tastelessness hardly entitled them to the name of food. While thus occupied, they discovered a saw-fish, about two feet long, working his way up the shallow water, apparently to enjoy the warmth of the sun. Strain shot him with a revolver, and then jumping upon him succeeded in capturing him. Divided between the four, he was but a scanty breakfast, but the meat was sweet and palatable. They started at half past twelve from "Saw-fish Camp," but after making two or three miles were obliged to encamp, as both Mr. Avery and Strain suffered extremely from sore legs. Exposed as they had been to the sun on the raft for two days, Strain's, which were utterly unprotected, were burnt to a blister in many places, while the undergrowth and vines scratched and irritated them to such a degree, that it produced a fever, which was followed by a chill. This looked discouraging enough, especially as they saw no more indications of approaching the Pacific than two weeks before. The bright hopes with which the men had set out began to fade, and they lay stretched about the bank, saying but little, but looking moody and desponding. Strain spent the long afternoon pacing slowly up and down the pebbly beach, pondering over the condition of his men, and vainly endeavoring to come to some conclusion respecting the future. However, with steel and powder, they succeeded in obtaining a fire, which, sending its bright light through the forest, imparted a little more cheerfulness to the scene.

At half past seven next morning they set out, and moved slowly down the left bank. Hearing a heavy report, they thought it was a gun from the main body, and were much surprised at the rapid progress it had made. About ten, after marching some three miles, they halted on a shingle beach, where Mr. Avery was taken extremely ill with severe vomiting and retching. While halting another gun was heard, supposed to be from the main party, which Strain answered, hoping that they might come up, as he intended to leave Mr. Avery with them and push on. At sunset, Mr. Avery showing no signs of recovery, they went into camp No. 6. Fish were abundant in the stream, but they had no hook to catch them with, and so made their supper on hard nuts.

The next day (Sunday) Avery was better; but convinced that he would embarrass the march, Strain was anxious to leave him with the main party, and fired signals to bring them up, but received no answer.*

The next day they started early, but Avery's knees pained him severely. At times, exhausted with pain, he would cry out, "Oh, Captain, hold on! hold on!" Strain would then stop and wait for him to limp up, but never went back. The necessities of the case were too stern to admit of a backward movement. Thus painfully marching—around swamps, through thickets, still on, toward an ocean that seemed infinitely removed—the half-naked, half-starved group cut their toilsome, disheartening way. At half past four they encamped on a shingle beach, having made about eight miles.

The following morning they started early, but were compelled to halt frequently for Avery, who would be left far behind, his extreme suffering causing faintness and sickness at stomach. He, however, bore up nobly; and, as Strain in his report says, "He comforted himself in the most manly manner; and few men, I believe, even when marching for their own lives and the lives of others, could have done better than he, with boils on all parts of his person, and fire on one knee." Strain killed a fine wild turkey during the day, which gave them a good supper, though, when divided among four hungry men, the portion that each received appeared small. They also found an abundance of acid palm-nuts.

Next day the marching was more open and easy, and they were fortunate enough to find clams. About 5.15 P.M. they encamped on a wet sand-beach. In cutting down some guineagrass to protect them from dampness, Strain narrowly escaped being bitten by a large snake of the adder species; his macheta cleaving the reptile just as he was about to strike. Every night a stick was set on the shore to see if there were any signs of tide. The eagerness with which this was inspected every morning showed the longing of the men for this indication of the proximity of the ocean. In the morning they thought they discovered a slight fall in the water, but found afterward that they were mistaken.

* Truxton's party at this time were lying in the camp where they had halted on the first night after Strain had left them, and the supposed guns were falling trees.

The day following (February 22) the marching a part of the time was tolerably easy, but Wilson and Golden began to show signs of debility. Strain, nearly naked, went ahead and cleared a way with his cutlass. On finding the bushes too thick, he would plunge into them head foremost to break them down, trampling them under foot for those behind. During the day he killed another adder coiled to strike, but did not tell his men of it, lest they should become alarmed. Golden carrying no fire-arms, was often ordered forward to cut a path, but to-day he gave out completely, and when given the cutlass and directed to go to work, he laid the instrument down on the ground, then stretched himself beside it, and wept like a child. Destitution and toil were telling on him. He was a fine, splendid-looking young man, only twenty-two years of age, and brave as a lion; but this was a form of evil he had never dreamed of.

The next morning they proceeded on their journey through the woods and along the banks until one P.M., making about five miles, when they halted, as Strain had a most painful boil on his right instep, which prevented him from marching or wearing any boot. He was, moreover, suffering severely from a fall into a deep ravine the day before. Near the camp, where the river runs S.S.W., a small stream (the Uporganti) comes in from the N.E. This encouraged the belief that they might still be upon the Iglesias, as a small stream is shown on the map, coming into that river four miles from its mouth, and another about eleven miles above. About four o'clock, as they lay stretched around on the bank of the river, they were startled by a heavy booming sound, like that of a gun, which they thought at once came from Darien Harbor, the "El Dorado" of the expedition. The delusion for a moment made every heart bound.

In the morning (February 24) Strain made a moccasin from a leather legging which formerly belonged to Truxton, who had proposed to boil it down and eat it. The former, however, prevented him, saying they might yet need it for moccasins. So it turned out, and but for this very insignificant circumstance, it is very doubtful whether Strain could ever have got through at all, and consequently the whole party would have perished. On such simple suggestions, growing out of the knowledge of a backwoods life, the fate of scores of men often depends. Slinging his spare boot to his blanket for future service, Strain gave the order to march at half past six, fondly hoping to reach Darien Harbor before night, but having traveled with great pain some eight miles, and seeing no signs of tide-water, at five o'clock encamped on a sand-bank. Having passed during the day two or three rapids with some ten or twelve feet fall, they consoled themselves with the reflection that this accounted for the absence of tides. During the day Strain killed a bird about the size of a partridge, which they ate raw. I find the following recorded in the journal:

"Saturday, February 25. Slept well last night, the camp being free from mosquitoes. Set out at eight A.M., and found bad walking all day, both in the forest and on the beaches which we met. In the former we had to cut our way, while the beaches were so steep that we had sometimes to cut steps to crawl along, and even then we were in constant danger of falling into the river, which I did on one occasion.

"Encamped about six P.M. on a mud bank, having made about six miles. During the day's march we found about thirty-two clams, which, divided, gave us something to support life, as the acid nut-skins are less ripe than some miles above, while their kernels are so hard as to be almost inedible in the existing state of our teeth, which have been deprived of their enamel by the use of the acid.

"Saw several turkeys, but could obtain none, owing to the state of our fire-arms, which had become almost useless. My carbine, which was the best in the party, being loaded with difficulty, and requiring two men to fire it, one to take aim and pull the trigger, and the other to pull the cock back, and let it go at the word, invariably destroying the aim; under these circumstances I am not ashamed to say that I fired several times at turkeys without success."

"About sunset we saw a wild hog, weighing some 300 pounds, which came rushing toward us as if intending to attack, but paused about twenty yards distant. Considering the ferocity of this animal, and the state of our fire-arms, I should have hesitated in attacking him had we not been so pressed for food; but it was a matter of life and death in either case. I took deliberate aim at his body behind the shoulders, and with the assistance of Wilson fired my carbine, wounding him severely. I feared firing at his head, lest I should miss him altogether. After receiving the ball he paused a moment, as if uncertain whether to attack, after which he rushed off rapidly some fifty yards, when he was seized with a coughing fit, and slackened his pace to a walk. Handing my carbine to Wilson to reload, I followed him into the jungle, but soon lost him in the darkness of the forest. I am inclined to believe that this animal was not the peccary or wild hog of tropical climates, but one of the domesticated species, which, either in his own generation or that of his progenitors had become wild, because I do not think the peccary ever grows so large. His color was black, with white spots. I passed an almost sleepless night in regretting that we had not obtained him, for at this time food was our only thought, except to push through and obtain assistance for those behind."

The next morning (Sunday) they started early, but the long absence of food had so debilitated them that the marching was slow and difficult. They could make but short distances without being compelled to halt for a long rest. This tattered, skeleton group of four, stretched silent and sad in the forest beside that mysterious, unknown river, presented a most piteous spectacle. It is very doubtful whether the men ever would have started again but for the orders of their commander. As they staggered up to a jungle, Strain, after exhausting himself in clearing a path, would order the men to take their turn; but so feeble and dispirited were they, that often nothing but threats of the severest flogging could rouse them to make another effort for their lives. At length their attention was arrested by the cry of a wild animal. It proved to be the howling of a monkey, and the men, elated at the prospect of food, cried out, "There's a monkey, Captain, shoot him!" "Cut away," replied Strain, thinking that the noise would excite its curiosity to come nearer. He was right, for the creature kept leaping from tree to tree, until at length it sat crouched on a limb directly above Strain, who was lying upon his back on the ground.

His carbine being damaged, he took the Sharpe's rifle belonging to Avery, and shooting nearly perpendicularly, sent a ball through the monkey's neck. The rifle, however, being loaded with stronger powder than usual, recoiled, cutting Strain's eyebrow and seriously endangering the eye itself. The monkey, after receiving the wound, made off. Strain, though bleeding freely, fired again. His distrust of the rifle, however, distracted his aim, when he drew a pistol and shot the creature through the heart. She fell over dead, but her tail would not uncoil, and she hung suspended from the limb. Strain then turned to take care of his eye, saying to the men, "If you want that monkey you must cut down the tree." Though tired and feeble, they attacked it with a will, and notwithstanding the trunk was three feet in circumference, and they had only a cutlass to work with, soon had it down. This monkey was a prize. She was soon cut up, and portions of her crammed into a tin kettle, which was placed over a blazing fire. Each one took turns at the pot, and they kept it up till midnight, when the animal was nearly all devoured. Weighing some twenty pounds, she gave about five pounds to a man. The starved men, however, were not satisfied, and demanded that the skin should be cooked. But this Strain, with that foresight which again and again saved his little band, refused to give up, saying he should yet need it for lashings in making a raft.

This feast was on Sunday night, and the next morning at ten o'clock they pushed on; but the thick undergrowth was almost impassable, and after cutting for seven hours, making only three quarters of a mile per hour, they encamped on a damp clay bank.

During the day they crossed several deep ravines, down the steep banks of which they were compelled to slide, and then cut steps in the opposite sides, up which to climb to the top.

The course of march was generally southerly. The journal at this place remarks, that then, and for some time previous, "our bodies were literally covered with wood ticks, and we were obliged to pick them off morning and evening."

During the march Strain shot three small hawks, upon which they made their scanty supper. They suffered severely from mosquitoes during the night, but at eight in the morning were again afoot; and proceeding about two miles over some hills, discovered a considerable river (the Iglesia), entering from the northeast. After making in all about six miles, they encamped at six in the evening.* Their only food this day consisted entirely of acid nuts, which were gradually wearing away the teeth.

Having suffered less than usual from mosquitoes, Strain roused his little party at daybreak, and by six o'clock they were again cutting their slow and almost interminable path to the Pacific. After making some six miles they encamped on a bank of rock and indurated clay. During the day they had nothing whatever to eat, and when they halted the whole party were thoroughly worn out. They were too tired even to kindle a fire, but lay down in the darkness and slept on the cheerless bank of the stream. Strain now began to think of another raft, as all were so thoroughly debilitated, and so covered with boils, sores, and scratches that they could not much longer cut their way through the jungle.

Mr. Avery was almost disabled, while the men were becoming daily more and more discouraged. Golden—who was a fine, hale young man when he left the Cyane—was fearfully attenuated, and his spirit so utterly broken, that when ordered to do the least work he would lie down and weep bitterly. For several days Strain could make him march only by threatening to tie him up and flog him: then his dread of physical pain overcame for the time-being his debility. Had he not resorted to this expedient, he would have been obliged to leave him to perish, or remain and perish with him. Strain had once or twice thrown out a hint of his intention to build another raft; but found the two men violently opposed to it, as the danger they had incurred on the last completely intimidated them. But finding the river bends deeper, free from rapids, and comparatively free from snags, he determined to carry out his design at all hazards, especially as he felt convinced that the condition of his foot would not permit him to march more than two or three days longer. The constant irritation, produced by contact with bushes and vines, was rapidly extending the inflammation from the ankle, down the instep and up the leg. At first the men were disheartened; but when told that they need not get on the raft, but might keep along shore in sight, while he and Mr. Avery managed it, they were better contented.

That night being unmolested by mosquitoes

* Says Strain in his journal: "I may remark that our time was estimated, as my pocket-chronometer had stopped soon after leaving the main body; probably owing to the dampness of the climate, which affects every time-piece not secured by a hunting case. Then, it almost appeared to me that time had refused to register the tedious hours which we passed in the wilderness. On some occasions almost all men become to a certain extent superstitious."

they had a quiet rest, and, though without food, began early in the morning to collect sticks for the raft; but the general debility, and want of proper tools and lashings, made their progress very slow, and it was sunset before they had enough brought together and lashed to float two persons. In the evening Mr. Avery and Strain obtained some hard nuts and a small quantity of palmetto, which was all the food they had eaten for two days.

Says Strain in his journal: "This was the second time during the expedition that I really felt voracious; and before obtaining the nuts and palmetto, I found myself casting my eyes around me to see if there was nothing that had been overlooked that could allay my hunger. Without a fire, which at this time we never lighted unless we had meat to cook, as we wished to economize our ammunition, we laid down and slept near our raft."

The next day Strain and Avery got on the raft, and the two floated slowly down the stream, while Golden and Wilson forced their way along the shore. Thus, two on the raft and two on shore, they proceeded day after day—an occasional halloo, to ascertain each other's whereabouts, alone relieving the monotony of the hours. In making the bends sharp paddling was necessary, which, in their debilitated condition, was very exhausting. The second day they found a dead iguana, with the head eaten off. This they cooked and divided among them. The two men roasted the skin and chewed that. This miserable raft consisted of six half-decayed, broken trunks of trees lashed together with monkey skins and vines. Strain, half-naked, and with his legs dangling in the water, sat on the forward end to steer, while his companion occupied the hinder part to assist. Now a tree in the distance chock-full of white cranes, and again a panther gazing on them with a bewildered stare, or young tigers, were the only objects that relieved the noiseless and apparently endless solitude. To pass away the time, Strain one day made Avery tell his history; at another time he would narrate from Don Quixotte some amusing story. At length starvation produced the same singular effect on them that it did on Truxton and Maury, and they would spend hours in describing all the good dinners they had ever eaten. For the last two or three days, when most reduced, Strain said that he occupied almost the whole time in arranging a magnificent dinner. Every luxuriant or curious dish that he had ever seen or heard of composed it, and he wore away the hours in going round his imaginary table, arranging and changing the several dishes. He could not force his mind from the contemplation of this, so wholly had one idea—food—taken possession of it. The animal nature, deprived of its support, was evidently closing with resistless force over the soul, and in a few days more would completely force it from its crumbling, falling tenement. On the 4th of March, however, as they sat on shore eating a portion of a dead, tainted lizard, Strain heard a sudden roaring behind, and on looking up stream saw a rapid which they had just passed in smooth water. He knew at once that they must have floated over it at high tide, which now ebbing revealed the rift. It was clear they had at last reached tide-water. This was Strain's birthday, and he was looking out for some good luck. He, however, did not mention his discovery to the men, lest there might be some mistake. But they soon discovered it themselves, and cried out in transport, "Oh, Captain, here is tide! here is tide!" That night Strain could not sleep until the time for flood-tide again arrived, and at eleven o'clock he took a fire-brand and went down to the shore to see how it was going. The doubt was over—they had reached the swellings of the Pacific, and hope was rekindled in every bosom.

The time after this passed wearily. When it was flood-tide they lashed to the shore, and as the ebb commenced cut loose and slowly drifted down stream. At every turn they strained eagerly forward, hoping to get some look-out, or see some signs of civilization; but the same unbroken wilderness shut them in. Having ascertained how high the tide rose, Avery would take the Hudson River as a gauge, and prove conclusively that there was no great occasion for hope, as they were yet probably at least a hundred and fifty miles from the sea.

Anxious to get forward, they could not spend time to hunt; and a half dozen kernels of the palm nut, hard as ivory, would often constitute a meal. At length, on the 9th, Strain saw that food must be obtained, or the men would sink and die without making farther progress. He therefore put Golden in his place with Avery on the raft, and taking Wilson with him struck into the woods to forage. Only four cartridges were left to them; and as Strain turned away with the rifle, Avery exclaimed, "For God's sake, Strain, don't shoot at any thing less than a turkey—remember there are only four cartridges left!" After beating about for some time and finding nothing, he came upon a partridge sitting on a limb. The temptation was too strong to be resisted, and he drew up and killed it. His conscience smote him the moment he had done so, as on that single cartridge might yet hang the lives of all the party. At length, however, he came upon a grove of palm nuts. By tightening his cartridge-belt around him, and filling his flannel shirt above it with nuts, he soon had all he could carry, and turned back to the river. But the two got entangled in a swamp, and were wholly exhausted before they could extricate themselves. Wilson then began to beg for the partridge; but Strain told him it was for the party, and must be divided equally. The man at length fell down, and said he could and would go no farther without that partridge. Strain then threw it to him, saying "Take it," and sat down on a log to see him devour it. The starving wretch tore it asunder; but still, feeling that his commander needed it as much as he did, said, "Captain, do you want the blood?" "No," replied the latter. "Do you want the entrails?" "No." He then flung him a piece of the bird, and gorged the rest. At length they reached the river, and kept down the bank. About three o'clock, Strain was startled by Wilson's exclaiming, "My God, Sir, there is the raft!" and sure enough, there it was, deserted and floating quietly in the middle of the river, awaiting the action of the tide (it was then slack water) to determine its course.

The sight of that abandoned structure at first struck like an ice-bolt to the heart of both, but a single glance showed Strain that the blankets, spare arms, etc., had been taken away, and another, that about eight feet of rope, which had been used to lash the logs, was left untouched, while one of the paddles still remained. He concluded at once that the party had either obtained assistance and left the raft—in which case they would not require, and would probably neglect, the lashings—or that they had been murdered by Indians, who had left the raft adrift for the purpose of entrapping the remainder. In answer to Wilson's anxious inquiries, he frankly told him his conjectures. "Well, Sir," replied Wilson, "if there be Indians about, you have three cartridges left, and are certain of three men, and I think with my machete I can give an account of two more." This was the ring of the true metal, and pleased Strain much. While awaiting the progress of the raft, which drifted slowly toward their side of the river, they passed their leisure time in eating nuts. Finally, seeing it foul of some drift-wood about one hundred yards below, they after some difficulty got upon it, and proceeded with the current down the river. Strain, however, first made a thorough examination, to see if there was any blood or other evidence of a struggle upon it, or a note from Mr. Avery which might unravel the mystery.

After drifting half an hour they saw a clearing on the left bank; and soon after, in passing the mouth of a small stream on the same side, discovered two canoes approaching rapidly from below.

Not feeling assured that the three paddlers were not Indians, who might prove hostile, as they were colored and spoke loudly in a dialect which, at a distance, he could not understand, Strain determined to keep them at arms' length until assured of their peaceable intentions. He accordingly hailed when they came within rifle-shot, and asked who they were and where they were going. They replied, in Spanish, that they were friends, had just taken off his companions, and brought a letter to himself. True to his naval principles, never to let an enemy approach too near without declaring his intentions, Strain sat across the log and hailed as though he trod the deck of a man-of-war. These two skeletons on a mass of drift-wood thus demanding explanations, were very much like a shipwrecked mariner lashed to a spar bidding a vessel stand off till she showed her colors. When convinced, however, of the peaceable intentions of the natives, they gladly abandoned the raft and entered the canoe. Finding that the boatmen had tobacco and a pipe, Strain immediately borrowed them, and, for the first time since the 4th of February, enjoyed the luxury of a smoke.

It was just dark when they reached the village of Yavisa. The excitement was over—the immediate necessity of effort past, and Strain's over-taxed nature gave way. He could no longer walk, and was helped by two men to the house of the Sub-Alcalde, where he met Mr. Avery and Golden. When the commander of the United States Darien Exploring Expedition entered the Alcalde's house, his uniform consisted of a blue flannel shirt, one boot, and a Panama hat, neither of which articles was in a very good condition.

Perhaps, in justice to Mr. Strain, I ought to say that he does not accept of my method of accounting for his inability to walk; declaring, by way of proof, that, having often heard of the effect of sudden unexpected deliverance from death after a long and painful suspense, he had the curiosity, when the canoes were approaching the raft to take him off, to feel of his pulse, and found it was not quickened by a beat! He therefore naturally enough concluded that it was his cramped position in the canoe that caused his weakness. I am not disposed to differ with a man who pursues knowledge under such difficulties; but he evidently labors under the hallucination that he had some blood to quicken. The fact is, he was drained dry—soul had taken the place of blood, and kept the body alive. The terrible demands on this were now partially released; and with the yielding of the will nature quietly sunk away.

Having obtained from the Alcalde a petticoat, Strain sat down to supper, and ate as a man will who had for forty days never but in one instance ceased to feel the pangs of hunger. But while Strain gave the reins to his own appetite, he cautiously restrained the men. Wilson yielded to his wishes; but poor Golden, after making most pathetic but vain appeals for more supper, then another glass of brandy, and finally for a cigar, sobbed himself to sleep in the corner where a bed had been prepared for him. He was exceedingly debilitated, and had become perfectly childish and almost idiotic from suffering, and Strain feared that bad effects might ensue if he was permitted to eat as much as he wished. But the latter probably could not perceive the propriety of this, especially when he saw his commander, after refusing him more food, turn from an enormous supply to refresh himself with five or six cups of chocolate.

Before Strain's arrival Mr. Avery had learned that Her Britannic Majesty's steam-sloop Virago was at Darien Harbor, but would sail in two or three days for Panama, and suggested the great importance of the former proceeding at once and obtaining from her the necessary supply of provisions and money, offering at the same time to return with the provisions and canoes for the main party.

As he supposed that the men and officers with Truxton had followed his instructions and continued their downward march, Strain believed they could not be far distant; and hence, though most anxious himself to relieve his party, assented to this proposal. Sending, therefore, for the Jefe Politico and Alcalde, he presented his passports, and requested that four canoes should be engaged as soon as possible, and that provisions, medicines, and all the minor luxuries of spirits, fruits, molasses, and tobacco, should be provided. Every thing was promised, though at such exorbitant prices as soon exhausted his limited means. Having done all he could that night, he was assisted by a Mr. Norriga to the house of his uncle, the priest who had offered beds to Mr. Avery and himself. Says the journal:

"Friday, March 10. At early daylight I was awakened by the crowing of numerous cocks which shared my apartment; and this pleasing evidence of civilization soon recalled me to a consciousness of my position and what yet remained to be done before my whole party could enjoy the same luxury. I arose at once, and went to visit the two men whom I had left at the Sub-Alcalde's, but soon found that I had yet a penalty to pay for outraging nature through my diet past and present."

He was seized with the most violent pains, and lay upon his hammock all day rolling in agony. Notwithstanding his severe sufferings, he still planned for his comrades, and aided by Mr. Avery, the Jefe Politico, and Mr. Norriga, managed to provision the party which was to return for the remainder. In the evening, somewhat relieved, though still exceedingly weak, Strain, assisted by the Padre, went down to the river, and took leave of Mr. Avery and Norriga, who, availing themselves of the coolness of the night and bright moonlight, soon after started up the river.

A canoe was to have been ready for himself at the same time, but could not be obtained, and he was forced to wait till morning. The following is from Mr. Strain's journal:

"March 11. At early daylight I was awake and prepared for a start; but hearing no intelligence of the canoes, I walked over to the Sub-Alcalde's to see how the men had passed the night. I then met a Mr. Lucre, who had recently returned from Panama, and who had arrived during the night from Santa Maria de Real, a village some distance below. He was the first really white man I had met, and by his conduct certainly supported the dignity of his caste, and presented a strong contrast to the grasping, avaricious negroes, and half breeds of Yavisa, who, availing themselves of our necessities, had imposed upon us at every turn.

"Finding it impossible to obtain a canoe in this village, he proposed to take me to Santa Maria in his own, which was very small, while the Jefe Politico, Mas Carinas, accompanied us in another small canoe, in which he carried my two men. Mas Carinas and Norriga were the only two men whom I could exclude from my heartfelt anathema, as I shook the dust from my feet and embarked at Yavisa, as the parish priest and his whole flock were the most arrant cheats I had ever met with in any part of the world.

"It is true that we have no right to expect ed them. They were of a crumbling sandstone, that broke away under the hands and feet; for we had often climbed the practicable parts, and knew that great masses would crumble and break under our grasp, like mere gravel heaps. Herbert and I stood for a short time close to the edge of the highest cliff; Haglin's Crag it was called; looking down at the sea, which was at high tide, and foaming wildly about the rocks. The wind was very strong, though the sky was almost cloudless; it roared round the cliffs, and lashed the waves into a surging foam, that beat furiously against the base, and brought down showers of earth and sand with each blow as it struck. The sight of all this life and fury of nature fevered my blood and excited my imagination to the highest. A strange desire seized me. I wanted to clamber down the face of the cliffs—to the very base—and dip myself in the white waves foaming round them. It was a wild fancy, but I could not conquer it, though I tried to do so; and I felt equal to its accomplishment.

"Herbert, I am going down the cliff," I said, throwing my cap on the ground.

"Nonsense, Paul!" said Herbert, laughing. He did not believe me; and thought I was only in jest.

When, however, he saw that I was serious, and that I did positively intend to attempt this danger, he opposed me in his old manner of gentleness and love; the manner which had hitherto subdued me like a magic spell. He told me that it was my certain death I was rushing into, and he asked me affectionately to desist.

I was annoyed at his opposition. For the first time his voice had no power over me; for the first time his entreaties fell dead on my ears. Scarcely hearing Herbert, scarcely seeing him, I leaned over the cliffs; the waves singing to me as with a human voice; when I was suddenly pulled back, Herbert saying to me, angrily,

"Paul, are you mad? Do you think I will stand by and see you kill yourself!"

He tore me from the cliff. It was a strain like physical anguish when I could no longer see the waters. I turned against him savagely, and tried to shake off his hand. But he threw his arms round me, and held me firmly, and the feeling of constraint, of imprisonment, overcame my love. I could not bear personal restraint even from him. His young slight arms seemed like leaden chains about me; he changed to the hideousness of a jailer; his opposing love, to the insolence of a tyrant. I called hoarsely to him to let me free; but he still clung round me. Again I called; again he withstood me; and then I struggled with him. My teeth were set fast—my hands clenched; the strength of a strong man was in me. I seized him by the waist as I would lift a young child, and hurled him from me. God help me!—I did not see in what direction.

It was as if a shadow had fallen between me and the sun, so that I could see nothing in its natural light. There was no light and there was no color. The sun was as bright overhead as before; the grass lay at my feet as gleaming as before; the waves flung up their sparkling showers; the wind tossed the branches full of leaves, like boughs of glittering gems, as it had tossed them ten minutes ago; but I saw them all indistinctly now, through the veil, the mist of this darkness. The shadow was upon me that has never left me since. Day and night it has followed me; day and night its chill lay on my heart. A voice sounded unceasingly within me, "Murder and a lost soul, forever and ever!"

I turned from the cliff resolutely, and went toward home. Not a limb failed me, not a moment's weakness was on me. I went home with the intention of denouncing myself as the murderer of my friend; and I was calm because I felt that his death would then be avenged. I hoped for the most patent degradation possible to humanity. My only desire was to avenge the murder of my friend on myself, his murderer; and I walked along quickly that I might overtake the slow hours, and gain the moment of expiation.

I went straight to the master's room. He spoke to me harshly, and ordered me out of his sight; as he did whenever I came before him. I told him authoritatively to listen to me; I had something to say to him; and my manner, I suppose, struck him: for he turned round to me again, and told me to speak. What had I to say?

I began by stating briefly that Herbert had fallen down Haglin's Crag; and then I was about to add that it was I who had flung him down, though unintentionally—when—whether it was mere faintness, to this day I do not know—I fell senseless to the earth. And for weeks I remained senseless with brain fever, from, it was believed, the terrible shock my system had undergone at seeing my dearest friend perish so miserably before my eyes. This belief helped much to soften men's hearts—and to give me a place in their sympathy, never given me before.

When I recovered, that dark shadow still clung silently to me; and whenever I attempted to speak the truth—and the secret always hung clogging on my tongue—the same scene was gone through as before; I was struck down by an invisible hand; and reduced perforce to silence. I knew then that I was shut out from expiation—as I had shut myself out from reparation in my terrible deed. Day and night, day and night! always haunted with a fierce thought of sin, and striving helplessly to express it.

I had come now to that time in my life when I must choose a profession. I resolved to become a physician from the feeling of making such reparation to humanity as I was able, for the life I had destroyed. I thought if I could save life, if I could alleviate suffering, and bring blessing instead of affliction, that I might somewhat atone for my guilt. If not to the individual, yet to humanity at large. No one ever clung to a profession with more ardor than I undertook the study of medicine; for it seemed to me my only way of salvation, if indeed that were yet possible—a salvation to be worked out not only by chastisement and control of my passions, but by active good among my fellow-men.

I shall never forget the first patient I attended. It was a painful case, where there was much suffering; and to the relations—to that poor mother above all—bitter anguish. The child had been given over by the doctors; and I was called in as the last untried, from despair, not from hope; I ordered a new remedy; one that few would have the courage to prescribe. The effect was almost miraculous, and, as the little one breathed freer, and that sweet soft sleep of healing crept over her, the thick darkness hanging round me lightened perceptibly. Had I solved the mystery of my future? By work and charity should I come out into the light again? and could deeds of reparation dispel that darkness which a mere objectless punishment—a mere mental repentance—could not touch?

This experience gave me renewed courage: I devoted myself more ardently to my profession, chiefly among the poor, and without remuneration. Had I ever accepted money, I believe that all my power would have gone. And as I saved more and more lives, and lightened more and more the heavy burden of human suffering, the dreadful shadow grew fainter.

I was called suddenly to a dying lady. No name was given me, neither was her station in life nor her condition told me. I hurried off without caring to ask questions: careful only to heal. When I reached the house, I was taken into a room where she lay in a fainting fit on the bed. Even before I ascertained her malady—with that almost second sight of a practiced physician—her wonderful beauty struck me. Not merely because it was beauty, but because it was a face strangely familiar to me, though new; strangely speaking of a former love: although, in all my practice, I had never loved man or woman individually.

I roused the lady from her faintness; but not without much trouble. It was more like death than swooning, and yielded to my treatment stubbornly. I remained with her for many hours; but when I left her she was better. I was obliged to leave her, to attend a poor work-house child.

I had not been gone long—carrying with me that fair face lying in its deathlike trance, with all its golden hair scattered wide over the pillow, and the blue lids weighing down the eyes, as one carries the remembrance of a sweet song lately sung—carrying it, too, as a talisman against that dread shadow which somehow hung closer on me to-night; the darkness, too, deepening into its original blackness, and the chill lying heavily on my heart again—when a messenger hurried after me, telling me the lady was dying, and I was to go back immediately. I wanted no second bidding. In a moment, as it seemed to me, I was in her room again. It was dark.

The lady was dying now, paralyzed from her feet upward. I saw the death-ring mount higher and higher; that faint, bluish ring with which death marries some of his brides. I bent every energy, every thought to the combat. I ordered remedies so strange to the ordinary rules of medicine, that it was with difficulty the chemist would prepare them. She opened her eyes full upon me, and the whole room was filled with the cry of "Murderer!" They thought the lady had spoken feverishly in her death-trance. I alone knew from whence that cry had come.

But I would not yield, and I never quailed, nor feared for the result. I knew the power I had to battle with, and I knew, too, the powers I wielded. They saved her. The blood circulated again through her veins, the faintness gradually dispersed, the smitten side flung off its paralysis, and the blue ring faded wholly from her limbs.

The lady recovered under my care. And care, such as mothers lavish on their children, I poured like life-blood on her. I knew that her pulses beat at my bidding, I knew that I had given her back her life, which else had been forfeit, and that I was her preserver. I almost worshiped her. It was the worship of my whole being—the tide into which the pent-up sentiment of my long years of unloving philanthropy poured like a boundless flood. It was my life that I gave her—my destiny that I saw in her, my deliverer from the curse of sin, as I had been hers from the power of death. I asked no more than to be near her, to see her, to hear her voice, to breathe the same air with her, to guard and protect her. I never asked myself whether I loved as other men or no; I never dreamed of her loving me again. I did not even know her name nor her condition; she was simply the Lady to me—the one and only woman of my world. I never cared to analyze more than this. My love was part of my innermost being, and I could as soon have imagined the earth without its sun as my life without the lady. Was this love such as other men feel? I know not. I only know there were no hopes such as other men have. I did not question my own heart of the future: I only knew of love—I did not ask for happiness.

One day I went to see her as usual. She was well now; but I still kept up my old habit of visiting her for her health. I sat by her for a long time this day, wondering, as I so often wondered, who it was that she resembled, and where I had met her before, and how; for I was certain that I had seen her some time in the past. She was lying back in an easy-chair—how well I remember it all!—enveloped in a cloud of white drapery. A sofa-table was drawn along the side of her chair, with one drawer partly open. Without any intention of looking, I saw that it was filled with letters, in two different handwritings, and that two miniature cases were lying among them. An open letter, in which lay a tress of sun-bright hair, was on her knee. It was written in a hand that made me start and quiver. I knew the writing, though at the moment I could not recognize the writer.

Strongly agitated, I took the letter in my hand. The hair fell across my fingers. The darkness gathered close and heavy, and there burst from me the self-accusing cry of "Murderer!"

"No, not murdered," said the lady, sorrowfully. "He was killed by accident. This letter is from him—my dear twin-brother Herbert—written the very day of his death. But what can outweigh the blessedness of death while we are innocent of sin!"

As she spoke, for some strange fancy she drew the gauzy drapery round her head. It fell about her soft and white as foam. I knew now where I had seen her before, lying as now with her sweet face turned upward to the sky; looking, as now, so full of purity and love: calling me then to innocence as now to reconciliation. Her angel in her likeness had once spoken to me through the waves, as Herbert's spirit now spoke to me in her.

The darkness gathered closer and closer. But I fought it off bravely, and kneeling humbly, for the first time I was able to make my confession. I told her all. My love for Herbert; but my fierce fury of temper: my sin, but also how unintentional; my atonement. And then, in the depth of my agony, I turned to implore her forgiveness.

"I do," she said, weeping. "It was a grievous crime—grievous, deadly—but you have expiated it. You have repented indeed by self-subjugation, and by unwearied labors of mercy and good among your fellow-men. I do forgive you, my friend, as Herbert's spirit would forgive you. And," in a gayer tone, "my beloved husband, who will return to me to-day, will bless you too for preserving his wife, as I bless you for preserving me to him."

The darkness fell from me as she kissed my hand. Yet it still shades my life; but as a warning, not as a curse—a mournful past, not a destroying present. Charity and active good among our fellow-men can destroy the power of sin within us; and repentance in deeds—not in tears, but in the life-long efforts of a resolute man—can lighten the blackness of a crime, and remove the curse of punishment from us. Work and love: by these may we win our pardon, and by these stand out again in the light.

IMPORTANT TO HUSBANDS.

I AM going to break ground in a totally new question, but with wonder that it has been reserved to me to do so. When I look along a fashionable business-street in one of our large cities, and observe the temptations presented by mercers and milliners to my friends of the softer sex, I feel that the Maine Liquor Law has at least the objectionable character of being a partial measure. I ask myself, Why should we endeavor to put down only one traffic of a seductive and mischievous kind? There is a Gin Palace, with its baleful attractions, at one corner; but here is a Muslin Palace, with equally bewraying, though not so deadly attractions, at another. Why should the latter be left to beguile the wits of the ladies, while Legislative Acts seek to save the somewhat poorer, but not less heedless, victims of the opposite establishment?

If I am wrong, may all concerned forgive me; but I can not help thinking that the Muslin Palace carries guilt on the very face of it. Given the weak female heart as the subject of experiment, and behold how well adapted is the apparatus brought to bear upon it! The lofty entrance, with plate-glass sides and flanking windows, displaying colored nothings of all sorts of inconceivable forms and incomprehensible purposes—the long retiring vista of counters and tables, attended, not by women, who are perfectly fit for the silly business, but by Young Men—the dazzling mirrors inviting the victims to self-worshipping trials of shawls and scarfs—the soft, winning manners, and insinuating talk of the shopmen, addressed to every whim of taste or tastelessness which they may detect in the votaries—an honest business could not require all this. Were the question only that women should have decent attire, less Circean spells would serve. The object manifestly is to tempt the poor sex into the purchase of habiliments beyond what they need, and of finer kinds than are meet for them; and hence the magnificence of the system and all its insinuating arrangements. The Muslin Palace betrays its character by being a Palace.

The husbands should look to it, engage a Mr. Gough, get up an Alliance, and establish an organ to make themselves heard by. It is very much their concern, both as it affects the solidity of character of their wives and daughters, and their own pockets. I am afraid they are far too insensible to their own woes. Men will pass a seductive bonnet-shop on their way to 'Change every day for a series of years, and no more regard it than if it were a mangling establishment. They reflect not on the tremendous interest which these gauzy, crapy, ribbonary bewilderments have for hundreds of the other sex; how their wives have dreamt for weeks of a certain specimen about the size of a tolerable butterfly; how their daughters never pass without snatching a fearful joy; and how these airy insignificances will tell upon their balances in January. There were witchcrafts and philters long ago for entangling the hearts of the fair; and some sages bore us now and then with their fears for the effect of novel-reading upon the female imagination. But charms, philters, chloroform, and ideal Lord Henries, take on, in my regard, an aspect of perfect innocence, in comparison with the fascinations of those rainbow-like windows into which we see our women gaze day by day, and wish and wish the soul away.

There is something disarming in the very triviality of the things whose subjects they are. To think—while we see men pursuing great honors and gains—of a woman led along in sweet illusion by a bit of lace, or a ribbon, or the half-imaginary thing called a bonnet, melts us like the lisp of a pretty child. Dear, amiable creature! how innocent of her to make all her happiness in life centre—say, in a new barège dress! How helpless, too, about the making and arranging of all those gewgaws upon her person! Half of them probably unsuitable for her in their hue and form—troublesome as encumbrances, rather than really ornamental—but all borne with so meek a submission to what the multitude has established as fashion! To be pleased with such trifles, and patient under such inappropriatenesses and superfluities, may be owned as most engaging. But we must not allow this feeling to carry us too far. We pity the abandoned dram-drinker, while we condemn the selfish taverner who supplies him with the materials of excess. So may we relent over this affecting susceptibility of our lady-friends, but at the same time denounce those who trade upon it. Nor may we look too lightly on the passion itself. The Turk, who is content with a bit of opium, may be said to be an easily-pleased man; but, viewing the consequences, we must at the same time proclaim war against the indulgence. A woman should be reminded that it is bad to give her heart to vanity, and not good to empty her husband's or father's pocket. It is believed in this country that women have souls: we should act accordingly, and try to induce them to think less of the decoration of the earthly tabernacle.

This brings me to the consideration of what many of my readers will by this time be inclined to say—namely, that a Maine Law is not the legitimate way to cure the evil. They will be for leaving Muslin Palaces alone, and trying to elevate women above their temptations. Well, I confess to a great wish to raise the female sex in almost all sorts of ways, as far as they can be raised; and nothing would gratify me more than to see them rendered so enlightened in their minds, and so advanced in their tastes, as to walk past a lace-shop without a sigh, and view an array of fresh spring bonnets with the indifference which the subject deserves. But, alas! my friend, it is a weariful thing to wait for all this. The horse starves while the corn grows. The Muslin Palace, too, is all the time working against your educational influences. It is like John Wilkes telling the gentleman who spoke of taking the sense of the ward upon a particular point, that he would take the non-sense of the ward against him, and carry it ten to one. I can see nothing for it but a good hearty persecution—not a restriction of Vanity Fair to particular days and hours, but a condemnation of Vanity Fair out and out—

“Exulting, crushin’ t’like a mussel, Or limpet-shell,”

as Burns says. It is rather a sore point to come to in a free country, where all people have hitherto enjoyed the privilege of ruining themselves at their own discretion. But what shall we say? We protect minors from premature marriage, and punish a good many eccentricities of the affections which don't much trouble us. Why should we not be allowed to protect the gentle partners of our bosoms from any particular danger or corrupting agency which we see besetting them? No, no; I am clear for a short-hand way of serving the fair: nothing but a Maine Law will do.

Is such a law workable? Obviously ten times more so than a Maine Liquor Law; for while the use of alcohol up to a certain point can be concealed, dress will not exist unless for being exhibited, and there can, therefore, be no difficulty in laying our fingers on the corpus delicti. A lady seen proceeding along the street in an immoderate style of dressing, can be arrested as contraband, and reduced to a rationality of exterior, scream as she may. Certain stuffs of more than a fair degree of simple elegance can be forbidden; any monstrous superfluity of flounce, or frill, or trimming, can be cut down. We shall have a law for introducing conciseness into the female figure, and making them convenient to themselves, even against their will. We need not fear much about their will, however, for it is odds that they would be rather glad of a law, however tyrannical, which would save them from the greater tyranny now existing. We must remember that the unfortunate creatures do not overdress themselves from a love of dress, but only because they must follow the fashion. Make Mrs. Black aware that Mrs. Brown, Mrs. White, and Mrs. Green are all henceforth to appear in neat black silk dresses with plain frills, and Mrs. Black will take to the black silk and plain frill with a peaceful and contented mind. Assure any one of the ladies of Dr. Rousem's congregation, that all the rest must appear next Sunday in some rational form of bonnet, and she will conform at once. It will be necessary, however, to execute the law with unrelenting rigor; for evidently, if one here and there were allowed to baffle herself overmuch, or hold by—say on pretense of wearing out—any of the proscribed stuffs, all her neighbors would immediately feel that, for their own protection, they must return to the old excesses too, and the whole benefit of the law would be lost. As to the number of dresses which should be permitted to any one lady, an easy-working clause is at our service. We have only to restrict them to dresses made by their own industry, in order to insure a sufficient moderation in this respect. Some, indeed, under such a restriction, might be in danger of something like a destitution of clothing —which, of course, might lead to exhibitions not desirable for the public. But I would meet such cases with a slight relaxation of the law, permitting a provedly handless lady, or one laboring under that fatal disease the vis inertia, to receive aid from her well-disposed friends, or from charitable societies.

Here, then, is launched the ball of a new agitation. Ye princes of the Land of Haberdashery, tremble on your thrones, for the beginning of your end has come! Husbands and fathers rally to the charge, if charges ye would escape. View in me your true friend and counselor. Do not think, however, of presenting me with any testimonial. Enough for me the glory of having raised the First Cry against one of the most oppressive tyrannies of the age!

PERSONAL MEMOIRS OF THE HOUSE OF ORLEANS.

"THE Duke of Orleans," said Odillon Barrot to the deputies and politicians who had assembled at Laffitte's on the 29th of July, 1830, and were wavering between the choice of a new king and the abolition of monarchy—"the Duke of Orleans is the best of Republics." Forty years previously, the Odillon Barrots of that day had lustily proclaimed that "the Duke of Orleans would be the best of kings;" and might have tried the experiment had their favorite been a man of talent or nerve. In precisely similar language, seventy-five years before, the nobles of France admitted, in private conclave, that "the Duke of Orleans would be the best of regents;" and this time, as in 1830, the Duke having the will and the courage to take what fortune threw in his way, the experiment was practically tested. Nor have these been the highest compliments paid to bearers of the name. During the dreadful winter of 1788, many a poor mechanic and many a starving family in Paris used to cry, in heartfelt gratitude for the bounties of the Palais Royal, "The Duke of Orleans is the best of men."

Romance and history have been searched in vain for a parallel to the fortunes of the house to which these men belonged. Vicissitudes, stranger than fancy ever pictured, have marked its career from its origin down to our times. Contrasts the most startling, reverses the most overwhelming, successes the most wonderful, follow each other with bewildering rapidity in its annals. Rare examples of virtue, coupled with such vices as can not even be named; dexterous cunning, and most egregious folly; inordinate ambition, and incredible carelessness of fortune; the meanest kind of selfishness, and large liberality; undaunted courage, and most pitiable pusillanimity—such are a few of the opposite qualities illustrated in the characters of the Dukes of Orleans. In one respect they resembled each other. All, from first to last, coveted the French throne. Even before the present house existed, Gaston of Orleans conspired against Louis XIII. Philippe, the first of the present line, was at least jealous of his brother. The Regent conspired against Louis XIV., and was accused of plotting mischief against his heir. Another Duke of Orleans was the acknowledged chief of the enemies of Louis XV. Philippe Egalité voted for the death of Louis XVI., and was openly nominated for the vacant throne. Louis Philippe, his son, associated with the conspirators who sought to overthrow Louis XVIII., and gained the throne by the downfall of Charles X. His sons are now secretly conspiring against Napoleon III. No family can be mentioned which has been so constant a foot-ball for fortune. An Orleans once reigned in France: the same man lived to want a single servant. An Orleans was richer than the British Croesus, the Duke of Sutherland: that man, in Philadelphia, was thankful for the loan of a few dollars. An Orleans proved that those whom the world calls vicious are only, comparatively speaking, moderately depraved: his son first directed the Bible to be studied in the original at Paris. Some of the most repulsive doctrines of despotism can be traced to an Orleans: democracy found a chief in his heir. Power and weakness, wealth and penury, intelligence and stolidity, vice and moderation, recur in the history of this family in regular succession, like the ebb and flow of the tide. In the space of seven generations all the extremes of fortune are exhibited. Nor is the book of Destiny closed. Marvels, yielding nothing in interest to the past, may be written on the pages time has yet to unfold.

On a gloomy night in September, 1640, the Louvre was in great commotion. Lights were hurrying to and fro, courtiers were arriving from all parts of Paris, eager faces were grouped in every corridor. Here and there a messenger looking wonderfully important, or a man in office, with anxious brow, bustled through the crowd, and moved toward the royal chambers. It had been announced that the Queen's accouchement might be hourly expected. Her husband, poor, helpless, imbecile Louis XIII., sat as composed as usual, in an easy chair, chatting lazily with his favorite chevalier; but her friend, Mazarin, was as much excited as a politician can be, and much more so than he ever appeared before. The courtiers talked in mysterious whispers. Remarks by no means complimentary to the Queen's virtue were bandied in the ante-chambers; and the physicians and ladies who hastened to her apartment, were greeted as they passed with significant smiles and shrugs of the shoulders. The friends of Cardinal Richelieu, secure in the impunity which his protection afforded, did not scruple to vent their wit or their spite against her Majesty in coarse jests at the very doors of her chamber.

The infant whose birth caused this unusual scene was not the first-born child of Anne of Austria. Two years previously, and twenty years after her marriage with Louis, she had given birth to a son, who became Louis XIV. Rumor afterward asserted that Louis had not been the only fruit of the Queen's pregnancy. Persons whose rank at court gave great weight to their statements, declared that she had been delivered of twins, of whom Louis was one, and the Man in the Iron Mask the other. These stories derived currency from the notorious character of Anne of Austria. Not only had she furnished a theme for scandal by her intimacy with Mazarin, but her connivance at the conspiracy of Gaston d'Orleans, the King's brother, had been so clearly established, that weak old Louis XIII., when pressed to receive her into his confidence shortly before his death, exclaimed bitterly, "Is it not enough that I have forgiven her, and does she expect me to believe her too?"

On the 21st September her second child—Philip, the founder of the house of Orleans—was born. Less than three years afterward her husband died. Her bitter enemy and most relentless persecutor, Richelieu, had preceded him to the tomb. Anne, immersed in the concerns of the regency, abandoned the education of the family to Mazarin, who shrewdly directed that the royal boys should learn little or nothing. The elder contrived, notwithstanding, to pick up some scraps of knowledge; but the younger, whose natural abilities were good, was allowed to grow up a perfect dolt. He could barely read and write; and his ignorance of history, literature, and art, were afterward peculiarly conspicuous at the polished court of his brother. As a boy, he was singularly unmanly and effeminate. He loved to spend his time in the ladies' apartments, and readily allowed them to dress him as a girl. While his brother was shooting or riding, he would shut himself up to enjoy a good dinner or a game at cards. He was fond of dancing, but wore high-heeled shoes to conceal his short stature, and consequently danced like a woman. There was nothing masculine or prepossessing in his face. Jet-black hair and eyebrows, large black eyes, a long narrow face, with a peaked nose, very small mouth, irregular teeth, and a sallow complexion; such is the description given of him by his wife. It does not increase our respect for the taste of the ladies of the court to learn that the owner of these features was a general favorite—more so than his brother, the chivalrous and manly Louis XIV.

Anne of Austria, who had escaped from the insulting tyranny of Richelieu to fall under the equally iron rule of Mazarin, resembled the other fair dames of Paris in this respect—she loved her younger son better than her first-born. At the death of Gaston d'Orleans, brother of Louis XIII., his title had reverted to young Philip, and with it estates which placed him on a level with the wealthiest nobles of Europe. Anne resolved to consolidate his position by a royal marriage. Though Mazarin believed in the permanence of the English republic, Anne felt confident of the restoration of the Stuarts, and fixed her choice on Henrietta, daughter of Charles I. This lady had nothing but her birth and a rather pretty face to recommend her. Even the latter has been a subject of dispute. Quaint Pepys says: "The Princess Henrietta is very pretty, but much below my expectations; and her dressing of herself with her hair frizzed short up her ears, did make her seem so much the less to me. But my wife standing near her, with two or three black patches on, and well dressed, did seem to me much handsomer than she." She had not a livre to bring her husband in the shape of dowry. Poverty had been her companion from her cradle. Born during the civil wars, she had been carried in her mother's arms to Paris, and had shared that period of privation, when the family of the late King of England "remained abed all day from the cold, having no fuel to make a fire." She was, however, not destitute of wit, and during her residence at Paris had acquired the courtly manners of the fashionable circles in that capital. The marriage took place a few months after the restoration of the bride's brother, Charles II.

Nothing paints the age better than the domestic life of the Duke and Duchess of Orleans. The latter had been escorted to Paris by the famous Duke of Buckingham, who made no secret of his love for his fair charge. Besides Buckingham, the Duke of Orleans himself presented to his young wife the Count of Guiche, the handsomest man at court and a notorious lady-killer. Scandal was rife on the subject, and not without cause. One day, as Madame and De Guiche were together in her apartments, the approach of the Duke was suddenly announced. The Count and the lady were paralyzed, for escape appeared impossible. "I can manage it," hurriedly exclaimed a valet, "place yourself against the door, M. le Comte." When the Duke reached the landing the valet ran out, and butted his head so violently against the Duke's face as almost to stun him, and make his nose bleed. In the confusion, the Count contrived to escape unperceived, with a handkerchief over his face. The King himself was for a time a marked admirer of Henrietta. At Fontainebleau Louis and his fair cousin were inseparable; and the only people who appear to have been annoyed at the flirtation were ladies who were jealous of the favor shown to the Duchess. Philip, who, according to his second wife, never loved any one in his life, was a model husband in point of forbearance. When his mother forced him to notice his wife's intrigue with De Guiche, he settled the matter with a mild reprimand. He claimed, by way of return, that the Duchess should receive his female friends at her soirées; and, as the character of these ladies excluded them even from the very indulgent society of Paris, he seems to have had the best of the bargain. Unfortunately for poor Henrietta, she did not extend her complaisance to the male friends of her husband. One of the most depraved and unprincipled men of the time was the Chevalier of Lorraine. His face was repulsive, his habits abominable, his reputation shocking. This man was the bosom friend of the Duke, who had actually withdrawn from court when the young King, disgusted by the stories that were told of Lorraine's vices, sent him into exile. He had made several attempts to gain the favor of the Duchess, but each time had been sternly repulsed. He resolved on such revenge as his nature prompted.

He had a creature in the Duke's household, a nobleman like himself, the Marquis d'Effiat. One day, while the Duchess was at mass, this Marquis opened her private closet, and took up the cup out of which she usually drank her succory-water. A servant immediately inquired what he did with Madame's cup? D'Effiat replied that being thirsty he had come to take a drink; and feigned great indignation at the vallet's remonstrance. That evening the Duchess called for a cup of succory-water, and lay down as usual in her apartment. Shortly afterward she awoke with a scream of pain. Medical attendance was procured; the Duke of Orleans displayed decent concern; the ladies of the household were in violent agitation. Henrietta declared she was poisoned, and could not recover. In the midst of her agonies, when her piteous cries drowned every other sound in the room, the King arrived, and was followed by the confessor and Montagu, the English ambassador. The dying woman mastered her pain for a few moments to convey her last wishes to her countryman. She bade him tell her brother that she had loved him above all things in the world; and was continuing to speak of him, when Montagu inquired whether she had been poisoned. The confessor instantly stepped forward and forbade her replying. Henrietta meekly obeyed. A meaning glance was her only answer to the question. The sacrament was hastily administered; Bossuet knelt by the bedside, but before the rites of the Church had been fully completed, Henrietta of England was a corpse.

The crime was fully brought home to D'Effiat and Lorraine, but neither was punished. The latter was struck with apoplexy many years after, while he was narrating an immoral tale, and died instantly. The evidence of the witnesses who were examined tended to exculpate Philip, though the murderers felt secure of his approval of the deed. "We did not tell your brother, Sire," said Purnon, who confessed his share in the murder to Louis XIV., "for he is unable to keep a secret, and would have ruined us all." An excellent reason, and worthy of the Duke of Orleans.

The pleasure of superintending his wife's funeral seems to have consoled him for her loss, if, indeed, he at all regretted it. Three years afterward his brother, who always treated him tyrannically, commanded him to marry Charlotte Elizabeth of Bavaria. The Duke was used to obedience. He had submitted without a murmur to deprivation of military rank and civil employment, insisting only on his right to lead a dissolute life. So he made no objection to the proposed marriage.

Charlotte had not been lucky in her parentage or her companions. Her mother had been sent back to her relations by her husband, who instantly replaced her by a lady of his court. Intrusted to the care of Sophia, the Electress of Hanover and the mother of George I. of England, the child had been familiar with scenes of coarse indulgence and vulgarity from her earliest years. One can readily imagine the sort of woman that might be expected from the court which produced the first two Georges. It was, perhaps, fortunate for her that nature had denied her beauty, and thus kept temptation out of her way. She had—as she says herself—"no features, small eyes, a snub nose, long and flat lips, large pendant cheeks, and a broad face. My stature is short, and my person large; both my body and my legs are short; altogether I am a fright. It would be necessary to examine my eyes with a microscope to discover whether they announce intelligence. It would probably be impossible to find on earth more hideous hands than mine." The truth of the portrait is confirmed by the conduct of two princes to whom her family offered her in marriage; both entertained the project for a time, but instantly drew back when they saw the lady. The Duke of Orleans was less fastidious. "I saw I did not please him, which did not surprise me," says the Duchess, quietly. But he kept his feelings to himself, and lived with his wife about three years. He ruled her household without consulting her wishes in the least; and though he was the richest man in the kingdom, only allowed her a hundred Louis a year as pin-money. Their tastes were wholly dissimilar. He was stupid and illiterate; she was witty and less ignorant than might have been expected from her early education. He was incurably prejudiced against every thing that was not French; she was as obstinately attached to every thing that was German. Gourmandise was his ruling characteristic; his cuisine was French and elaborate. She describes her own habits in this respect with crude frankness: "I take neither chocolate, tea, nor coffee, not being able to endure those foreign drugs. I adhere to our German fashion, and find nothing good in eating or drinking that is not in conformity with our customs. I can not eat soup unless it be made of milk, beer, or wine. I can not endure soup made with boiled beef. Whenever I partake of a dish of which it is an ingredient, I am subject to colic. Ham and sausages are the only things that suit my stomach." There was as much of the man in her as of the woman in him. When a girl she used to play with swords and guns; and having been told by a friend that girls who were addicted to jumping were turned into boys, she spent all her leisure in taking the most prodigious leaps. This was about the time that her husband was dressing himself in female clothes, and dancing in high-heeled shoes.

After the birth of their second child they separated, as the memoirs say, à l'amiable. In other words, the Duke spent the whole instead of a part of his time with worthless friends and still more worthless women; and the Duchess, who was virtuous from necessity, amused herself by quarreling with her neighbors. Madame de Maintenon, whose reign was then beginning, was her chief foe. "The old hag," as she calls her in her memoirs, found her match in the ugly German Princess. One of their quarrels is characteristic. Madame de Maintenon had brought over two ladies from Germany, whom she called Palatine-countesses, and placed them as attendants on her nieces. All the pride of the Duchess of Orleans was roused. "Having seen from my window," she says, "one of the nieces walking with the German girl, I went into the garden, and took care to meet them. I called one of the girls and asked her who she was. She told me to my face that she was a Countess of the Lutzelstein family. 'By the left hand?' 'No,' she replied, 'I am no bastard; the young Count Palatine married my mother, who is of the house of Gehlen.' 'In that case,' said I, 'you can not be a Countess Palatine; with persons of that rank a mésalliance counts for nothing. I will tell you more; you lie when you say that the Count Palatine married your mother. I know who her real husband is; he is a musician. If you again attempt to pass yourself off as a Countess Palatine I will expose you; but if you follow my advice, and take your real name, I will never reproach you. So take your choice.' The girl," adds the Duchess, coolly, "took this so much to heart, that she died a few days after." It might have been expected that some notice would have been taken of the Duchess's unfeeling conduct; but the only allusion we find is a remark of the King to her after the poor girl's death: "Madame, one risks one's life in jesting with you on pedigree." To which Charlotte coldly replied: "Sire, I can not endure lies."

Quarrels of this nature with "the old hag" occupied the Duchess's time till her children grew up. When her son—the Duke of Chartres—was seventeen, the King resolved to marry him to Mademoiselle de Blois, one of his illegitimate daughters. Father and son were easily won over; but the German pride of the Duchess was a more formidable obstacle. Saint Simon describes her, after the proposal had been made to her, "marching rapidly, with great strides, through the galleries, waving her handkerchief, crying audibly, gesticulating violently, and looking like Ceres when Proserpine was taken from her." Her son she turned out of doors; on her husband she heaped abuse; and when the King himself bowed to her, she whirled round so rapidly that, by the time Louis raised his head, he saw nothing but her back. So little restraint did she place on her passion, that before the whole Court, when her son came to kiss her hand, she gave him a smart box on the ear. These outbursts of fury were, however, unavailing; "the old hag" had set her heart upon the match, and it was duly celebrated. In her Memoirs the Duchess says that her son was threatened with imprisonment in case of non-compliance with the wishes of Madame de Maintenon. Saint Simon tells a more credible story. He says that Louis summoned the young Duke into his presence, where, surrounded by all his courtiers, he delivered a pompous harangue, in his usual imposing way, to the embarrassed youth, and concluded by asking what he thought of the proposed alliance. In a faltering voice the boy muttered something about consulting his parents. "Quite right," replied the monarch, with a dignified air; "but neither your father nor your mother will oppose my wishes." The Duke of Orleans, who was standing by, bowed assent; and his son who, like the rest of the courtiers, could not withstand the commanding manner of the great monarch, was thus bullied into a marriage with a woman for whom he did not care a straw.

Ten years afterward the career of the first Duke of Orleans was brought to a close. He had lived a grossly sensual life; and though the only brother of one of the most active kings that ever lived, had not coupled his name with one single public act. Louis, remembering the lessons he had been taught of the conspiracies of Gaston of Orleans, his uncle, and warned that Philip's friends were planning similar schemes, resolved to anticipate their action; he made a point of excluding Philip from public affairs, and accomplished his task the more easily as both talent and inclination to engage in politics were wanting in the Duke. Latterly, some symptoms of reformation in his private life had been noticed. The Père du Trévoux, his confessor, said to him bluntly: "Sir, I am not going to be damned to please you;" and bade the Duke choose between him and his profligate companions. Philip made an attempt to be virtuous; said his prayers; allowed du Trévoux to talk sermons to him; and parted with one or two of his most infamous associates. But the effort was too late; his constitution was gone. A dispute with the King his brother hastened the crisis. At dinner, on the same day, the Duke ate as largely as usual; and in the evening took his accustomed place at his supper-table at St. Cloud. Wine was flowing freely; indelicate jests were not wanting, and the whole party were in the highest spirits, when the Duke began to speak thick, and a moment afterward fell into the arms of his son. He never recovered consciousness, and died in a few hours surrounded by the King and the royal family. Early next morning, before the body was cold, the King and Madame de Maintenon were found rehearsing the overture of an opera; and that evening the royal saloons were filled with a lively party who played cards and chatted as gayly as usual. Even the widow thought of nothing but escaping a convent, and obtaining permission to spend the rest of her life at court. The only tears shed for the first Duke of Orleans fell from the eyes of persons whose testimony goes for nothing in courts of justice.

The Dowager Duchess lived to condole with "the old hag" on the death of Louis XIV.; and to drive her granddaughters distracted by her meddling, captious disposition. She was even less regretted than her husband when she died; and the memoirs and letters she left behind her fully explain the circumstances. The publisher says that decency compelled him to expurgate certain passages from her correspondence: at the rate prudery is advancing, there will not be a page of what he did print that will be read a century hence.

Philip of Orleans had had two children by each of his wives. Anna Maria, who married the Duke of Savoy, and Charlotte Elizabeth, who became Duchess of Lorraine, lived quiet lives, and history has no concern with them. The career of Maria Louisa, the eldest daughter of Henrietta, is quite in the Orleans style. Her mother never kissed her: when the little girl came to pay her respects, the utmost favor granted to her was to be allowed to press her infant lips to Henrietta's hand. She was just blooming into womanhood, and promised to surpass her mother in beauty and liveliness, when she was abruptly told, without a word of previous notice, or the smallest inquiry as to her sentiments, that the King had affianced her to Carlos, King of Spain—a wretched, broken-down debauchee—and that she must set out for Madrid. The poor girl fainted, and was taken seriously ill. The moment she recovered she was ordered to proceed on her journey: the will of Louis knew of no delay, and the Spanish alliance was essential to his dynastic projects. To add to the misery of Maria Louisa, the man who escorted her through France was the Chevalier of Lorraine, and the bearer of her future husband's first letter was the Marquis d'Effiat—both murderers of her mother. She produced a favorable impression at Madrid. "The young Queen," says Madame de Villars, who visited her at her palace, "dressed in the Spanish fashion, and wore some of those beautiful stuffs which she brought from France: her hair well-dressed, brushed across her forehead in front, and the rest flowing on her shoulders. She has an admirable complexion, beautiful eyes, and a very agreeable mouth when she laughs. What a delightful thing it is to laugh in Spain!" The Spanish grandees did not think so; they saw with positive dislike the young Queen's tendency to gayety, and resolved that "she should at once commence the course of life to which etiquette doomed her for life. They would not grant her the slightest relaxation; and from her arrival she was subject to a positive slavery, which was rendered more oppressive by the rigid disposition of the camerara mayor." Etiquette was then in its prime at Madrid. When the Queen fell from her horse, and two gentlemen sprang forward and saved her life by extricating her foot from the stirrup, it needed all Maria Louisa's influence to procure their pardon, which was only granted on condition of their leaving Madrid forever. The whole court seemed bent on persecuting the poor girl. The Duchess of Terra Nova wrung the necks of her parrots because they spoke a few words of French; the King turned her servants out of doors; and her Spanish waiting-women shocked her delicacy by attempting to smooth her hair with saliva. Greater troubles than these were in store. After ten years' marriage Maria Louisa was not a mother. The court of Spain and the kinsmen of Carlos at Vienna were terrified at the prospect of a disputed succession; yet, without crime, the evil was inevitable. Who could propose such a thing to the virtuous Queen?

Olympia de Mancini, the Countess of Soissons, and niece of Cardinal Mazarin, had been at some pains to earn the reputation of the most depraved woman in France. Her uncle had rejected the offers of Charles II. of England, who wanted to marry her before his restoration; and when Charles regained his throne, he in his turn contemptuously refused to renew the negotiation. Olympia consoled herself by educating young Louis XIV. in vice. Poisoning was her next pastime: among her victims are counted her husband, her mother-in-law, the Marshal of Luxembourg, and several other eminent persons. Detection at length forced the Countess to fly to Brussels, where she was living in obscurity when the Spanish grandees and the royal family of Hapsburg found themselves in want of an agent to undertake a business which could be proposed to no decent person. The Countess possessed undoubted qualifications for the post: she cheerfully consented to go to Madrid. That she earned her reward, and bade the Queen choose between infidelity to her husband and Spanish vengeance, we have Madame d'Aunay's word for asserting. So skillfully was the odious insinuation thrown out that the failure of the scheme did not involve the disgrace of the negotiator: in spite of the well-founded prejudice of the King and the French ambassador, Maria Louisa continued to allow Madame de Soissons to visit her. The die was cast. One sultry afternoon the Queen asked for milk; the Countess hastily offered to procure her some. A few moments afterward she entered the room with a glass of iced milk, of which Maria Louisa drank. That night the Queen died in excruciating agonies. Like her mother, she at first declared that she was poisoned; but, like her mother, retracted the statement by the advice of her confessor. The Countess of Soissons, of course, escaped unharmed.

The only son of the first Duke of Orleans, of the present line, was named Philip, like his father. He was, like him, delicate in youth; but was as ardent in the pursuit of learning as his father had been slothful. Knowledge of all kinds was welcome to him. He read history and science; became a connoisseur in wines; practiced chemistry, and judged horse-flesh; studied languages, and read Aretino in the original; patronized the drama, and gave his support to the vilest haunts of profligates. At seventeen his society was courted by men of letters; at the same age, his mother notes that he "hated innocent amusements." He was, in fact, the type of the young nobleman of that fast age.

His marriage with Mademoiselle de Blois has been mentioned. It was as splendid an affair as the nuptials of a king's daughter and his nephew ought to be. The young couple disliked each other; but a Queen undressed the bride, and a King—rather the worse, it is true, for the revolution which drove him from his kingdom, but as proud as ever—condescended to hand the groom his night-shirt. Mademoiselle de Blois was graceful, witty, and as haughty as her father. After her marriage she never condescended to notice her mother, Madame de Montespan; and was compared to Minerva, who, according to poets, sprang from Jove's brain without the aid of a mother. When her son was born her pride rose still higher; she refused to visit any one that was not of royal blood. Deficiencies in her early education frequently made her the jest of her husband and the ladies of the court; and her constitutional laziness precluded all attempt at improvement. "She is so indolent," said her amiable mother-in-law, "that she will hardly walk two yards; larks ought to fly ready cooked into her mouth. Though her appetite is enormous, she is too idle to eat fast. She goes to bed early, in order to sleep the longer. Reading she detests, but her ladies are directed to read her to sleep every evening." Partly from indolence, and partly from pride, she never attempted to win her husband's heart. She was not jealous, and seemed satisfied provided he behaved respectfully to her in public. When accounts of his infidelities reached her she treated them with contempt.

Louis XIV. gave the following comprehensive view of his nephew's character: "Philip of Orleans is as bad as he can be represented; and moreover, he boasts of vices which he does not possess." His profligacy and impiety were such that we can find no one to compare him with but himself as Regent. The restraints imposed on him by the religious court of Louis worried him beyond measure; though he carried Rabelais in his pocket to read during mass, and took care to choose his friends among people who were unknown at court, he complained bitterly that the English nobles were freer than he. Whether the court which affected so much more piety was in fact any better than the Duke himself may be questioned. The story of the ladies rushing in full dress to midnight mass on Christmas Eve because they had heard the King was to be there, and returning as precipitately to their revels on a report that he was not coming, is well known. A very pretty guerrilla warfare was kept up between Louis's three daughters, the Duchesses of Orleans and Bourbon, and the Princess of Conti. The two former, the children of Montespan, used to drink pretty freely; and their sister affectionately christened them "wine-sacks." The Princess herself had been smitten with a young officer named Clermont, to whom she wrote letters breathing the most violent love. Clermont, hearing that the Dauphin had begun to pay attention to a Mademoiselle de Chonin, immediately transferred his court to that lady, and to please her, sent her the Princess's letters, with a humorous commentary of his own. "I had rather," said the amiable Duchess of Orleans, when the story reached her, "be a wine-sack than a bundle of cast off clothes." These refined ladies, who ate olives to whet their thirst, smoked pipes in the palace, and had closets in their rooms provisioned like fortresses for the concealment of their lovers, were the leaders of fashion and the rulers of the court. Even the King's religion was little better than sectarianism. When Louis was told that the Duke of Orleans had appointed M. de Fontpertuis on his staff, he cried with much earnestness: "What! my dear nephew, the son of that foolish woman who is always running after Arnauld—a Jansenist! I never can consent to such an appointment." "By my faith, sire," replied the Duke, "I know nothing of the mother; but as for the son, so far from being a Jansenist, I do not think he even believes in a God." "Oh, in that case," said the King, "if you are sure of that, there is no harm in him; you may take him with you."

After serving a couple of campaigns in Italy and Spain, not without credit to himself, and contriving a very neat conspiracy against his nephew's throne, the Duke of Orleans returned to Paris to find himself in great disgrace at court. A new danger menaced him. The Dauphin suddenly died; the Duchess of Orleans says of small-pox; but the surgeons who made a post-mortem examination of the body, declared that they had not found any natural cause of death. The title descended to the Duke of Burgundy. He and his wife both died a few months after, and the faculty reported that they had been poisoned. Next, their eldest son fell a victim to a disease which no one understood. A sudden illness carried off the Duc de Berri. The only life that remained between the Duke of Orleans and the throne was the Duke of Anjou, a frail sickly child in the cradle. It was singularly suspicious. People remembered how the first Duke's wife, Henrietta of England, had been poisoned by D'Effiat, and began to remind each other that the first four governors of the present Duke had all died in a mysterious way. Philip's love of chemistry—which was then an occult science—gave strength to the awful suspicions. He had openly given it out that he was a necromancer; did not that imply sorcery, witchcraft, and every diabolical art? Such were the questions asked at every street corner by the idle Parisians. Soon the fury of the mob burst forth. Crowds surrounded the Palais Royal, and called for the head of the "poisoner." Imprecations were showered upon him when he appeared in the streets. Even the women followed his carriage and fought furiously with the guards to "tear in pieces," as they said, "the murderer of his family." The King himself shared the popular belief so far as to turn his back upon his nephew. If Philip of Orleans was innocent he was the most ill-used man in Europe; unhappily, his private life justified almost any imputations. His fondness for his daughter the Duchess of Berri had given rise to most horrible scandal: his glaring impiety shocked even the frivolous courtiers of Versailles. He begged, in abject terror, to be imprisoned for safety in the Bastille; but the King dryly answered that he saw no necessity for any thing of the kind.

He still led the life of a pariah when Louis XIV. died. A change in the Orleans style was at hand. Long before breakfast-time on the 2d September, 1715, crowds thronged the narrow street which runs past the Palais de Justice on the Isle de Paris. By seven o'clock liveried coachmen drove blazoned carriages to the door of the edifice, and the highest nobility and magistracy of France began to assemble in the Hall of the Parliament of Paris to hear the will of Louis XIV. read, and to settle the regency. The will had been deposited in the wall of the building, and the place covered with a slab, sealed at the edges. At the command of the Duke of Orleans, first prince of the blood, the seals were broken, the slab removed, and the parchment, which was mildewed, and dripping with wet, was read by the secretaries. It declared that during the minority of the King's grandson, the kingdom should be governed by a council of regency; and distributed the principal posts of authority among the members of the royal family. The Duke of Orleans rose, and in a speech of much ability claimed the regency for himself in virtue of the law. The assembly hesitated. To set aside thus flippantly the written command of a monarch whose word had been law forty-eight hours before, seemed a bold enterprise. But Philip had concerted his measures skillfully. The army was devoted to his interests. A large party among the nobility had been persuaded or bought over to his side. The law officers of the crown were pledged to sustain him. The latter being called upon to expound the law of the question, opined that Philip was legally entitled to the regency. Saint Simon and other nobles availed themselves of this show of right to win over several supporters of the will. A timely message from the commanding officer of the Guards, stating that in case of difficulty he would answer for the success of the Regent, settled the question. To the astonishment of every one, and while the Duke of Maine was still asserting his right to command the garrison, as provided in the will, the meeting unanimously voted the regency, without restrictions, to Philip of Orleans. More than this, the people, who had followed his carriage shouting, "Poisoner! Assassin!" only a few months before, and who still sang songs in which he was compared to the most infamous characters in history, were so delighted at the assertion of the Parliament's supremacy over the King's will, that they celebrated the Duke's victory as a popular triumph.

Philip was forty-two years of age when he became Regent. His manners were pleasant, and as his information was extensive, and his taste in matters of art generally correct, his conversation was much admired. No change had taken place in his habits. "His suppers at the Palais Royal," says his friend, Saint Simon, "were eaten in strange company. His mistresses, sometimes an opera-girl, often his daughter, the Duchess of Berri, and a dozen men, his depraved companions, whom he called roués, meaning that they deserved to be broken on the wheel, were his usual guests. To these were added ladies of high rank, but faded reputation, and some persons of the lower rank distinguished for their wit or their depravity. The supper, consisting of the most exquisite viands, was dressed in a place prepared for the purpose, all the utensils being of silver; the guests themselves often shared the work of the cooks. At these parties all drank deeply, and as the wine warmed them, uttered the most depraved sentiments, and vied with each other in blasphemies. When they had made noise enough and were all intoxicated, they reeled to bed to repeat the same scene the next day." It took the Regent the whole morning to recover the effects of these debauches: he would never listen to business till after he had taken his chocolate at noon.

The presiding deity at many of these orgies was the Duchess of Berri, his daughter. She was one of the women whose character is stamped on the age. Attacked by a dangerous disease at the age of seven, she was abandoned by the faculty to be cured by the science of her father. Thenceforth she was the only being he loved. He educated her himself, and placed in her hands the infidel and licentious books from which her principles were derived. The great point among the courtiers of the day was to secure the favor of the King and the Dauphin. To attain this end, the pretty Mademoiselle d'Orleans agreed to marry the Dauphin's son, the Duke of Berri, an honest, stupid fellow, whose head she contrived to turn. The Duke was rather given to piety, and was fine sport for the smart Duke of Orleans and his infidel daughter. He bore it all patiently, till one day coming home early he found his wife in the arms of his chamberlain. To kick the Lothario down stairs, and beat the Duchess severely was the work of a moment for the wrathful Duke; but it only confirmed the impetuous woman in her wild habits. The Duke's death freed her from all restraint; and the mad licentiousness into which she plunged scandalized the city and provoked doubts of her sanity. Half her time she spent in a convent; the other half in revels at the Luxembourg and orgies at the Palais Royal. Passionately fond of display, she sought regal honors from her visitors, and affected the airs of a Semiramis with the habits of an Aspasia. Her mother she snubbed; her cousins she defied; over her father she exercised complete control; and the chosen gallants who were permitted to share the splendors of her caprice at the Luxembourg found themselves little better than slaves. They were at last avenged by a young provincial named Riom, who gained the heart of the beautiful Duchess, and adroitly contrived to subjugate her to his will. Subjected to a tyranny not less galling than her own, she became as submissive as she had formerly been haughty, and bore in patience the harsh treatment, the cruel suspicions, the pettish violence of her lover; beginning in the prime of her beauty and at the summit of her power to taste the penalty of a life of pleasure. Seized with the pains of childbirth, the doctors pronounced her in serious danger. The parish curé was sent for, but the conscientious man refused to administer the sacrament unless Riom were turned out of the house. The Duchess fired with rage at the very mention of such a thing; the attendants stormed; even the Regent condescended to argue with the priest; but all to no purpose. The ecclesiastic was immovable, and for four days it seemed that the Regent's daughter would die without making her peace with the Church. After a dreadful struggle she gave birth to a daughter, and before her strength allowed her to rise from bed was married to Riom. Such a mesalliance could not be tolerated; Riom was instantly sent to a distant province. The Duchess dragged herself to her father, and adjured him, in a voice often interrupted by a fatal cough, to allow her to see her dear husband once more; but for once the Regent withstood her, and the unfortunate woman, in the twenty-sixth year of her age, went to die broken-hearted at La Muette.

Though the Regent possessed undeniable ability and quick perception, it is clear that a man who spent the evening in feasting and debauchery, and the best part of the day in recovering from their effects, could not do much for his dominions. Occasionally we find him taking an active part in public affairs, as, for instance, in the negotiations with Spain, and the renewal of the Dragonnades against the Huguenots. But the bulk of the business of State fell on the shoulders of the Abbé Dubois. The career of this man illustrates the fallacy of the proposition—so often repeated by liberal monarchists—that, under kings, the real power generally falls into the same hands as in republics.

Guillaume Dubois was the son of an apothecary at the little town of Prives, and spent his youth in carrying pill-boxes and clysters to his father's patients. Having studied for the Church, he was about to receive holy orders, when he ran away with a servant girl, and apparently destroyed his prospects for life. After a year or two of connubial felicity, however, he grew tired of his wife, left her, and went to Paris, where he was fortunate enough to fall in with M. St. Laurent, the tutor of the Regent—then

Duke of Chartres. By this gentleman young Dubois—who styled himself the Abbé Dubois—was employed to give lessons to his pupil, and St. Laurent dying soon after, the apothecary's son obtained the vacant post. He was well suited to the young Duke. Possessed of vast learning, he was a still greater proficient in vice; nothing came amiss to him, from a discussion on the merits of Cicero and Corneille to a petit souper à quatre in the faubourg. The Duchess of Orleans admitted that, at first, he "assumed the tone of an honest man so well that she took him for one," but soon corrected her opinion. "The fellow," says this penetrating woman, "believes in nothing; he is a rogue and a scoundrel; he has the appearance of a fox creeping from its hole to steal a chicken." He was fox enough to see through and through the Duke, and soon mastered him completely. Through life Philip never withdrew his confidence from the unprincipled Abbé. When the former became Regent, the latter took office as confidential minister, and soon controlled the whole administration. His public labors were prodigious: full twelve hours a day he was in his cabinet, receiving secretaries and ambassadors, dictating dispatches, digesting the day's business for the Regent, and exercising a minute superintendence over every branch of the public service. The reward he sought for his unparalleled devotion to his master's interests was rank. Cardinals took precedence of the highest nobles at court: Dubois resolved to be a Cardinal. There were some trifling difficulties in the way. Though nominally an Abbé, he had never taken holy orders; he had a wife living; he was an avowed infidel; and he had openly led a life of glaring profligacy. It must not be supposed that all the dignitaries of the Church of that day were profligates, or infidels, or married men, or laymen; there were several orthodox Christians and respectable men among them; but certain it is that Dubois had no trouble in obtaining, in the course of a few days, the several orders of sub-deacon, deacon, priest, bishop, and archbishop. The next step was more difficult. Though half a dozen kings supported Dubois's claims, the Pope refused to send him the hat, and the ambitious schemer was forced to wait till Clement died. When the Conclave met to choose his successor, Dubois managed matters just as our political leaders do at primary elections. With all the money that could be raised by the French treasury, the Abbé de Tencin, a young man whose sister enjoyed Dubois's protection, was sent to Rome to buy up the votes. He succeeded so well that Cardinal Conti, having given a written pledge to bestow the next vacant hat on Dubois, was elected Pope. But when the time came to fulfill his bargain, his Holiness demanded more money. Dubois indignantly referred to his written promise; the Pope replied by sending the hat to his brother. Dubois was finally compelled to accede to his avaricious demands, and a few thousand Louis secured the long-coveted rank.

Having attained the highest pinnacle of power and consideration, Cardinal Dubois began to retaliate on the nobility for the slights he had formerly suffered at their hands. He took delight in insulting the whole body of the peers; and even shoved a lady of rank out of his room because she addressed him as "Monsieur" instead of "Votre Eminence." His temper was ungovernable, and his language so coarse and profane, that he was ironically advised by his secretary to take an additional clerk, and give him, for sole employment, the duty of scolding and swearing at people. Notwithstanding these faults, he was so indefatigable in his office, that he was retained by Louis XV., and during the early reign of that monarch wielded supreme sway over France. The severity of his toils, added to the effects of dissipation, at length told upon his frame. Disease attacked him. Fearful of losing power, he concealed it; and the pain made him more morose and passionate than ever. On his death-bed he swore at his doctors, ordered the priests to be turned out of the room, and died raving and cursing every one around him.

Under the regency of Philip of Orleans, and the ministry of Cardinal Dubois, the people of France endured miseries hardly to be described. The notorious swindle of the Scotchman Law which owed its success to the Regent's patronage, beggared the whole country. When we call to mind that the amount of money in circulation was much less than it is now, and was consequently more valuable in proportion to other commodities, we can form some conception of the extent of disaster that must have been produced by the total failure of a bank which had issued paper to the amount of nine hundred millions of dollars. Reckless speculation had produced its usual fruits. Crowds of adventurers had flocked to Paris. Merchants, professional men, mechanics, deserted their business to dabble in shares. Everyday-life was at an end. While the bank lasted, the scenes that were witnessed resembled the ancient Saturnalia. When it fell, a despair that can not be pictured overwhelmed the people. Robbers and assassins walked the streets in broad daylight. Men were murdered and thrown into the Seine, and no one seemed to notice it. In the general calamity life seemed to have lost its value. To complete the horrors of that awful period, the plague suddenly appeared in Provence and Languedoc, and swept away the population by thousands. Those who fled died by the roadside; those who staid died in their bed, on their chair, in their office. Famine followed; and those who escaped the pestilence perished of hunger. It seemed as though a righteous Providence was smiting the nation for the crimes it tolerated in its rulers.

While the people were overwhelmed beneath the combined weight of general bankruptcy, plague, and famine, the Duke of Orleans had his troubles. He had exhausted pleasure; and complained bitterly that even the Palais Royal suppers bored him. Though the State was bankrupt, he and his friends had speculated in Law's shares and in produce, and made money; one of them, the Duke of Bourbon, not less than ten millions of francs. But wealth had no charms for the Duke of Orleans. He sent to the East and imported a Circassian harem, which diverted him barely a few weeks. Now and then he tried the effect of courting popularity as a change, but the people had not forgotten the stories of poison, or the monstrous suspicions which had led them to identify the Duke with the Œdipus of tragedy, and his daughter, the Duchess of Berri, with Jocasta. When he resigned the regency he fell into the lowest stage of dissipation. His palate required the fierce stimulus of raw brandy, his mind the feverish excitement of the gambling-table. Soon sleepless nights and sluggish days, during which his intellect was sometimes so obscured that he could not recognize his friends, betokened his coming end. Great red blotches on his face told a meaning tale. He had no wife or children to comfort him in his moments of despondency, no religion to strengthen him when the doctors bade him prepare for a stroke of apoplexy.

His death is vividly described by Dr. Taylor, in his admirable "House of Orleans." "One day, after dinner, he retired into a saloon which he had recently furnished most sumptuously for the Duchess of Phalaris. On entering the apartment he found the beautiful Duchess preparing for a ball, her curling locks hanging loose on her shoulders, and her dressing-gown not laid aside. He sat down upon a sofa, and she, taking a low stool, placed herself at his feet, her head reposing upon his knees. After a short pause he said to her, 'My fair friend, I am quite worn out with fatigue this afternoon, and have a stupefying headache; tell me one of those lively stories you relate so well.' The young lady, looking up into his face with childish coquetry, and assuming a mocking smile, began: 'There lived, once upon a time, a king and a queen—' She had scarcely uttered the words when the Duke's head sank suddenly on his breast, and he fell sideways on her shoulder. As he was sometimes accustomed to take a brief nap in this position, the lady for a second or two felt no alarm; but when she saw his limbs grow stiff after quivering in convulsions, she sprang to the bell, and rang it violently. No one replied. She rushed into the outer apartments; they were deserted; and it was not till she reached the court-yard that her cries attracted the attention of a few domestics. It was more than half an hour before any medical man made his appearance, and by that time the Duke was quite dead."

So bad was his character that no clergyman could be found to pronounce his funeral oration. The market-women—whose opinion has always had great weight in Paris—said that he had taken by mistake a cup of poisoned coffee which he had intended for the King. Similar stories had been current during his regency; and though it is quite clear they were without foundation, the nobles attached sufficient importance to them to turn their backs on his son when he came to court.

The Regent Orleans left four daughters and one son. The Duchess of Berri was the eldest. The second, Mademoiselle de Chartres, fell in love with an opera-singer, and was sent into a convent, where she led a disorderly life, and humbly imitated her elder sister. The third, Mademoiselle de Valois, was torn from the arms of the Duke of Richelieu to be married to the Duke of Modena. On parting, her aunt gave her the following advice: "Go, my child, and follow my example; have one or two children, and then behave in such a way as to force your husband to send you back to Paris. This is the only place that is fit for ladies like us." She obeyed to the letter, and died in Paris. The fourth daughter of the Regent, Mademoiselle de Montpensier, married Luis, Prince of Asturias, Her levity of conduct so shocked the court of Spain that her husband, when King, had her arrested and sent to prison. He died shortly afterward, and she returned to France, where for eighteen years she led a morose, secluded life, disliked by every one. Her death was hardly noticed.

While the Regent was scandalizing Paris by the profanity of his language and the corruption of his morals, a pale, ill-shaped youth was wandering gloomily through the Palais Royal, evidently ill at ease in that abode of gayety and sin. Female society had no charms for him; he was slow of speech, and shy in manner. Though the courtly crowds that haunted the ducal palace always addressed him with respect, he seldom entered into conversation, and promptly repulsed any overtures of friendship from his neighbors. He had one friend, the Abbé Manguin, a religious terrorist, whose mind was always dwelling on the last punishment of the damned, and who was one of the few steadfast believers in the exploded delusion of spiritual manifestations. With this cheerful companion the young man buried himself in the study of the Christian Fathers and the Rosicrucian philosophers. He intended, he said, to build up for the Church a rampart against infidelity. This was Louis Philip, son of the Regent.

His father naturally despised him. He had neither ambition nor wit, and these were the only qualities of which the Regent could boast. "How can people be such fools as to imagine," said the latter, when accused of seeking the death of Louis XV., "that I would conspire against such a fine young man as the Prince, for the sake of that dunderhead of a son of mine?" His mother, the haughty daughter of Montespan, ruled him as if he had been a child. He fell in love, or rather—for there was not much love in him—he felt a profound esteem for the Princess Mary Lecinska, daughter of the King of Poland, and would have married her; but Madame d'Orleans preferred the Princess of Baden-Baden, and her son dutifully led her to the altar, while the lady of his own choice espoused the King.

Louis Philip had no sympathy for his wife or any one else. The Jacobin fathers, and the works of Thomas Aquinas, absorbed his whole attention; theological disputes dried up the fount of humanity in his breast. He was scrupulously attentive to his religious duties, and did good service in the Jansenist ranks; but took no part in State affairs, and was equally a stranger to the intrigues of his own family. He wrote several polemical pamphlets against the Jesuits, some of which were printed; and founded a professorship of Hebrew at the Sorbonne, in order, as he said, that heretics should not be the only people who read the Bible in the original. Having done this, he died in the arms of the monks of St. Genevieve.

The next of the Orleans—who was also named Louis Philippe—is a new type; as different from the brilliant profligate his grandfather, as from the ascetic theologian his father. Educated in the camp, he served several campaigns under the able generals of Louis XV., and gained laurels which were sure to cost him the royal favor. After the battle of Hastenbeck, the King informed the Duke that the State had no further need of his services. Louis Philippe submitted without a murmur: energy was not a part of his character. He married a princess of that inconceivably depraved family, the Bourbon-Contis, and, as might have been expected, was soon the most injured of husbands. He bore the disgrace of his wife's conduct as long as it was possible, and when common decency compelled him to notice her enormities, he separated quietly, and without a word of reproach. The fact was, Louis Philippe never could meet an enemy face to face except on the battle-field; when he had sheathed his sword his pluck vanished, and he sought to gain his ends by tortuous intrigue. Not that nature had endowed him with cunning; any child could out-manoeuvre him; but he naturally preferred intrigue where candor might have answered as well. Thus, when a series of disreputable tricks had elevated Madame de Pompadour to the highest rank at court, the Duke of Orleans was her most obsequious follower. He was conspicuous at her levers, ate her dinners, and, as he was intimate with Collé, Favard, and other dramatic writers, helped her to get up theatricals for the King's amusement. The lady recompensed him by countenancing the fables which charged him with being the accomplice of the assassin Damien.

He aimed at popularity, and therefore always lived at Paris instead of Versailles. When bread was dear, loaves were distributed at the Palais Royal to the poor; sick persons were attended by the Duke's physicians, and houses hired for their use. No one applied unsuccessfully at his door for relief. These bounties procured him the title of the "King of Paris." 'Twas but a name. "Our cousin," said Louis XV., "is not likely to be dangerous; let him amuse himself with the comédie."

The monarch was quite right. The Duke might inspire gratitude, esteem never. The Duc de Penthièvre, son of one of Montespan's children, and the richest man in France, offered his daughter to Orleans as a wife for his son, the Duke of Chartres. The offer was haughtily declined. "The House of Orleans would not intermarry with the bastard line." Scarcely had the refusal been dispatched, when M. de Lamballe, the only brother of the rejected lady, fell dangerously ill. His death would swell his sister's fortune to over half a million of dollars. The Duke instantly reconsidered his reply, and sent to say that he consented to the marriage. M. de Penthièvre was delighted at the turn affairs had taken; the notaries were drawing the contract, and Orleans was haggling about the settlement, when M. de Lamballe unexpectedly recovered. Without a moment's hesitation the Duke broke off the match. He could not bear the thought, he said, of disgracing his name by allowing his son to marry a descendant of a natural child of Louis XIV. M. de Penthièvre raved with fury; Choiseul, the nobleman who filled the honorable part of match-maker, invoked vengeance on such perfidy; the whole court was indignant. Mademoiselle de Penthièvre herself, who had so far forgotten her station as to fall in love with the Duke of Chartres, would hear of no other husband. All which rather amused the impassible Duke of Orleans. Of a sudden the news rushed through the city that M. de Lamballe had had a relapse and died. The Duke instantly hastened to Choiseul, and, with tears in his eyes, confessed that he had not the heart to make two young people unhappy: let them marry, and they should have his blessing. The quarrels were soon mended, and the marriage took place.

When this mean, quibbling, foolish man succumbed to an attack of gout, in his sixtieth year, much sensation was caused by the funeral sermon preached over his body. Instead of dilating on the good qualities of the deceased, as usual on such occasions, the preacher sharply reproved his faults, and could find nothing to praise but an illicit connection formed by the Duke, shortly before his death, with a beautiful widow. The King tried to suppress the sermon; but many people heard it, and Grimm made notes of its tenor. One can hardly tell which to admire most, the boldness or the singular standard of morality adopted by the priest.

After a lapse of two generations, the Regent Orleans was reproduced in his great-grandson, Louis Philippe Joseph, whose marriage to Mademoiselle de Penthièvre has been mentioned. He was a handsome, dashing, open-hearted, wild young fellow; of course, without any morals or religion—but affable to all, and a great favorite with the ladies. We can readily picture him jumping over his wife's train at his marriage, to the speechless horror of the staid old courtiers; and driving his wife and other ladies incognito to a rather fast ball in the public gardens, himself mounted on postillon, and the Princess de Lamballe on the box. When Voltaire came to Paris, and all the world went mad about the philosopher of Ferney, the Duc de Chartres received him at the Palais Royal, and presented him to his family. "This pretty boy," said the old man, patting the Duke's eldest son, Louis Philippe, on the head, "reminds me of the Regent." Buffon and Franklin were likewise frequent guests at the Palais Royal. After a morning spent in horse-racing with the Count d'Artois and other scamps, the Duke would gather these great men around him, and affect the Alcibiades: when evening came, he would be seen at the feet of Madame de Genlis, or in the midst of some wild revel with less reputable associates. In his youth he had been sent to sea, and had served—some say with credit—at Ushant; had become vastly popular with the sailors, and made hosts of friends both in the navy and at the sea-port towns. This was enough for the King. The Duke was recalled to Paris. He begged hard to be allowed to serve under Rochambeau in the American expedition; but Louis would not hear of it. The incurable stupidity of these Bourbons forced every bold spirit into the ranks of their enemies.

Here was a young man, full of energy and intellect; wild as his companions, but vigorous even in his follies; imbued with the new lights of the age, and sympathising heartily with the people, while closely connected with the throne and the nobility—just such a man, in short, as might, if any could, have guided the monarch through the perilous struggle that was at hand; and Louis could find nothing better to do than to write him unjust and cutting letters about his conduct at Ushant, while the Queen insulted his friend Madame de Genlis. What wonder that we find him banded with the enemies of the court?

At that time the very air of Paris was revolutionary. Every thing seemed to require a change. The old world—government, church, laws, literature, science, society, manners—was mouldy, and only wanted a broom to sweep it away altogether. It rained reformers; from the finance minister to the gamins in the streets, every one had some abuse to correct. For his share the Duke of Orleans set the fashion of wearing pantaloons instead of breeches, and boots instead of pumps with buckles—"just like a common man;" took a stand against hair-powder, drove his own phaeton, and actually rode his own horses at races. The agony of the court at these disgracefully plebeian practices was dreadful. Worse was to follow. At the meeting of Parliament the Duke openly protested against the registration of the royal edict for raising a loan, and bearded the King in the most audacious manner. The old Bourbon pride rose, and the Duke was exiled. Parliament remonstrated, and was snubbed. Parliarian blood was up, however, and there was no talk of yielding: the King was peremptorily summoned to bring the Duke of Orleans to trial or to release him; and, with his usual inconsistency, he recalled the exile within a week. The Duke returned a thorough republican.

He threw down the gauntlet to the court, in his "Instructions to Constituencies electing Deputies to the States-general"—a production of remarkable merit. This profession of political faith demanded the recognition of individual liberty; the abolition of lettres de cachet, and other arbitrary processes; the establishment of the habeas corpus; the liberty of the press; the inviolability of property; the responsibility of ministers; the consolidation of the public debt; and the transfer of the right of taxation from the Crown to the States-general. This circular placed the Duke of Orleans in the van of the revolutionary party. His generous relief of the poor, during the severe winter of 1788-9, still further augmented his popularity; it soon rose to such a height that, when he appeared in public, crowds followed him blessing him, and the performance at theatres was interrupted by the boisterous acclamations of the audience when he entered. He took his seat in the States-general as a deputy of the third estate. The King summoned him to his place among the Princes of the blood: "Sire," said the Duke, "my birth gives the right to be near you; but my duty bids me stay where I am." When the schism divided the nobles and the third estate, the Duke joined the latter, and was elected President of the National Assembly.

This was the climax of his fame and power; he seems to have lacked ambition to push his advantages, and possibly feared while he encouraged the revolutionary tide. Politicians were not wanting to propose the dethronement of Louis XVI., to make room for the Duke of Orleans; but if he was a party to these schemes—which he always denied—he abandoned the whole responsibility of their success to others. He was a passive spectator of the fitful contests which preceded the King's removal to Paris; and when Louis tried to get him out of the way by dispatching him as ambassador to London, he obeyed without a murmur, and seemed to forget, in the jovial company of the Prince of Wales and his sporting friends, the awful trials through which his country was passing. When he returned to Paris his chances were gone. A periodical or an orator, here and there, proposed his name for the regency; but he had tact enough to avoid the danger, whatever his real wishes may have been. Soon—as happened to all the other revolutionary leaders—the sword he had helped sharpen was pointed to his own breast. It was proposed that princes of the royal family should be incapable of exercising rights as citizens. The Duke defended himself and his rights manfully; but the act of proscription was carried. He resigned all his hereditary privileges, titles, and rank by a solemn act; and was allowed to sit in the Assembly. But the personal sacrifice did him little good: he had lost his foothold among the leaders of the Revolution, and was soon far in the rear.

He was foolish enough to believe in the monarchy still. When the war broke out, he offered his services to the King, and sought a personal interview. It was granted; but the courtiers combined to insult him, and when he approached the table on which supper was laid, several cried out, "Let no one touch the dishes!" The Duke understood the calumnious insinuation, and left the palace, a more bitter foe than ever to the court.

Disasters fell thickly upon his head. His fortune melted away in the revolutionary furnace. A lawsuit with his wife rendered the breach between them irreparable. Madame de Genlis and his daughter were in England. His elder sons disapproved his political course. The old nobles treated him like a dog. The constitutional monarchists feared him as an ambitious intriguer. The republicans distrusted him as a prince. He resolved to make one more effort to regain his lost position among the revolutionary leaders. A petition he presented on behalf of his daughter brought him in contact with Manuel, a red-hot republican.

"What name is this?"—gruffly asked the Procureur Syndic, glancing at the signature to the petition—"Louis Philippe Joseph d'Orleans? There are no longer any Bourbons in France nor Orleans either; the 10th of August abolished the whole of them. The petition can not be received."

"But, citizen, my name is Orleans still."

"Take a new one."

The Duke was paralyzed by this unexpected difficulty.

"There," continued Manuel, pointing to the statues of Liberty and Equality which stood in the room, "are two capital godmothers for a revolutionary baptism. Choose one of them, and honor her name."

The Duke acquiesced, and was christened with mock solemnity Philippe Egalité.

Egalité, as he was always called, was returned to the National Convention by the city of Paris. Desperate were the efforts he made to ingratiate himself with the republican leaders, but to no purpose. Murat proclaimed that "a patriotic prince was as obvious a chimera as a virtuous scoundrel." Buzot proposed his banishment; even Robespierre, who esteemed him personally, avowed himself in favor of the exile of the whole family. The wretched man sold his soul to save himself. When the King's punishment was before the Assembly, and the President called on Philippe Egalité for his vote, he answered in an unfaltering voice:

"Acting under a sense of duty alone, and persuaded that those who have conspired or may conspire against the sovereignty of the people deserve death, I vote for death."

The horrible act did not gain him a single friend. Even the democrats shrank from contact with the man who could, with a lie on his lips, doom his relation and the head of his family to the scaffold. Broken by disappointment, and shunned by every one, the wretched creature ran to hide himself in the country.

Meanwhile his son, Louis Philippe, had fled with his commanding officer, General Dumouriez. The fury of the Convention knew no bounds when they ascertained the treason of the latter and the escape of the former. Their vengeance sought a victim. On 7th April—ten weeks after the execution of Louis XVI.—Philippe Egalité was arrested in his house. The Convention voted that it had always been intended to include him in the sentence against the Bourbons; and with his young son, the Count of Beaujolais, he was sent to Marseilles. There he met his second son, the Duke of Montpensier, who was likewise in prison. The Duchess of Orleans had been allowed to remain at Vernon in consequence of her ill-health. A few weeks were spent by the captives in terrible suspense; till, in October, orders came for the removal of Egalité to Paris for trial. The separation—which was most painful to his sons—he bore with fortitude: indeed, from the time of his imprisonment to his death, his courage was worthy of all praise.

Four days after his arrival in Paris, he was brought to trial before a jury. No witnesses were called: the President of the Court addressed several interrogatories to the prisoner, and his replies constituted the whole case. We can judge of its legal value from a few samples. After the usual inquiries as to name, age, occupation, etc., the examination proceeded as follows:

"Have you not had private interviews at Sillery's house with Lacroix, Brissot, and others?"

"No."

"Have you not assisted at meetings held at Petion's?"

"No."

"How could you consent to deliver your daughter into the hands of that traitor, and Genlis, that clever and designing woman, who has since emigrated?"

"I did certainly consent to deliver my daughter to the woman Sillery, who did not deserve my confidence, as she was associated with Petion: I allowed him to accompany her to England."

"But ought you not to have known that Sillery was an intriguing woman?"

"I was absolutely ignorant of it."

"Did you not one day say to a Deputy whom you met, 'What will you ask of me when I am King?'"

"I never said any thing of the kind."

"Was it not to Poulletier that you said so, and did he not reply, 'I will ask you for a pistol to blow your brains out?'"

"No."

"Were you acquainted with the plans of Dumouriez before he became an open traitor?"

"No."

"How do you think you will make these sworn citizens believe that you were ignorant of the designs of that wretch who was your creature, when you placed your son under his orders to fly with him and share his treason, intrusted your daughter to his care, and even corresponded with him yourself?"

"I only received two or three letters from him, and they were on indifferent subjects."

"Why did you permit yourself to be called Prince under the republic?"

"I have tried every means of preventing it; even fastening a notice to my door, to warn people that those who used the title should be expected to pay a fine to the poor."

The whole examination was of this character. The interrogatories were leading questions, predicated upon the presumed treason of the prisoner; and the replies were categorical denials of the facts imputed. Yet the jury had no hesitation in finding a verdict of guilty. "Since you had resolved beforehand," said Egalité, in a firm voice, "to put me to death, you ought to have devised some more plausible pretext than this trial. You can never make the world believe that you thought me guilty of the crimes of which you have convicted me; and, least of all, you," he added, addressing the foreman of the jury, whom he had known previously. "However, since my lot is cast, I demand that I be led to death instantly." The public prosecutor politely observed that he would do all in his power to gratify him.

Led back to prison, Egalité breakfasted—for the trial had occupied but a small portion of the morning—and spent some time with his confessor. At half past three the executioner's cart called for him. Having dressed himself with peculiar care, in green frock-coat, white waistcoat, and doeskin breeches, and powdered his hair, he was led out by a small body of gendarmes. "His tread was so firm, and his mien so noble, that he looked more like a general leading his troops than a prisoner conducted to the scaffold." The cart rattled over the stones, and the populace gazed with their usual curiosity, but Egalité's face did not change a muscle till he reached that part of the Rue St. Honoré on which the Palais Royal stands. There the words "National Property," inscribed on the door of his family mansion, caught his eye, and for a moment his nature gave way; memories of his early home crowded on his mind, and his frame shook with emotion. It was but for a moment. The Place Louis XV. was soon reached, and they stood at the foot of the scaffold. The wheels cut deep ruts in the ground, moistened with the blood of so many victims. Lightly Egalité leaped from the cart. With experienced hand the executioners bound him to the plank. One fellow, more gluttonous of plunder than the rest, tried to pull off his boots. "Patience, my friend," said Egalité, quietly; "they will come off easier in a moment." At that instant the signal was given, the knife fell, and the head of Louis Philippe Joseph of Orleans rolled into the basket placed to receive it.

At this time his two younger sons, Montpensier and Beaujolais, were still in prison at Marseilles. The elder of the two was but eighteen, the younger fourteen years of age. Both were ingenuous, manly youths. Their tender years, and the troublous times in which they had lived, had kept them aloof from courtly vices—all that we know of them is to their credit. The coldest breast could not refuse sympathy to their sufferings. Immured in a comfortless prison at the age when youth stands most in need of freedom, they underwent their full share of the horrors of the period. Now savage Jacobins would brutally warn them of their approaching fate; now the news of the execution of their father, or some other dear relation, would inflict a pang far keener than their own sufferings. A fierce contest was being waged between the Jacobins and their enemies, the "Children of the Sun." One night in June, 1795, the latter burst into the prison, and began to break open the cells of the prisoners. They sought Jacobin victims, but as they were infuriated by passion and liquor, it was impossible for any of the captives to count upon safety. On all sides were heard the piteous groans of the dying. The rioters performed their work so thoroughly that few escaped. Grape-shot, the sword, and fire destroyed eighty defenseless prisoners in the course of an hour or two, and the next day the fortress presented the appearance of a field of battle—corpses strewed in every direction, and dying wretches, some of them half burned, shrieking madly for water. The sons of Orleans were spared.

After a time, they resolved to attempt an escape. Passages were hired for them in a Tuscan vessel, and at nightfall the younger of the brothers succeeded in passing the drawbridge at the entrance of the fort. Montpensier followed him a few minutes after, but was met and recognized by the commandant, who ordered him to his room. No time was to be lost. But one mode of escape was left. By means of a rope attached to the window, the young prisoner began to lower himself down. The window looked out upon the Mediterranean, and it had been arranged that in case Montpensier did not follow his brother in a given time, the latter was to hire a boat and meet him under the walls of the fort. Beaujolais had had ample time to fulfill his promise, and Montpensier began his descent full of hope. When half way to the water the rope broke, and the prisoner fell heavily, stunning himself against the bottom. "I lay," he says, "nearly a quarter of an hour senseless. When I opened my eyes, I was struck by the light of the moon, and I found myself up to my middle in the sea. I suffered dreadfully from bruises. . . . Having waited some time for the boat Beaujolais was to have brought me, I determined to swim across the harbor. It was then I discovered, by the excessive pain I endured, that my leg was broken. My strength completely failed me; it was with the greatest difficulty that I dragged myself five or six fathoms, to grasp the chain of the harbor, in order to rest upon it. . . . I hoped that some boat might pass and take me off. But for two mortal hours no such good fortune awaited me." Seven boats passed. I implored each to come to my assistance, but in vain. 'Who are you?' they cried, 'and what are you doing there?' 'I am dying. If you will have the goodness to take me on board your boat, you will not regret the trouble, and I will pay you handsomely.' 'Oh! we have not time.' Others said, 'Tis some malefactor; for what would an honest man be doing there at this time of night?' All this time I was in agony. The pain I suffered had thrown me into a violent fever, and my teeth chattered incessantly. I was up to my waist in water in the middle of November. Every time I heard a boat my hopes revived, but the atrocious cruelty of the sailors soon plunged me again into despair. I began to lose consciousness, when the eighth boat arrived. I collected the little strength I had to address my prayer to the crew. 'We can not take you at present,' they said, 'for we must first land at home; but we will come back directly.' 'Oh, my friends,' I cried, 'make haste, or you will come too late, for I am dying.' I could scarcely articulate these last words, and sank at once into a fainting fit. I was roused from it by the return of the boat. The crew raised me on board; but I was in such pain, and so exhausted, that the embarkation was the worst agony of all."

The unfortunate youth reached land, to be retaken, with his brother, by his jailers, and confined a second time, under closer restrictions. Finally, after a captivity of three years and a half, the sons of Orleans were released, on condition of their going to America. For some years they traveled with their elder brother, sharing his privations and vicissitudes; but the damp prison of Marseilles had done its work. Their health never recovered the blow, and, in the prime of manhood, both died of consumption within a year of each other.

The eldest son of Philippe Egalité—Louis Philippe d'Orleans—is the first of the family whom it is possible to admire and esteem. His education had been influenced in no slight degree by the revolutionary character of the age. His tutor—for she insisted on this masculine title—was Madame de Genlis, a lady whose qualities of mind were very remarkable, though hardly compensating for the defects of her heart and the laxity of her principles. But whatever judgment we may form of her as a woman or an authoress, her success as an instructress of youth is indisputable. She was in some respects a convert to the doctrines of Rousseau's Emile; had her pupils learn the trade of a carpenter as well as the modern languages, and took care to imbue their minds with liberal principles, while she compelled them to undergo the severest bodily hardships. From her hands young Louis Philippe, then Duke of Chartres, passed into the army, and distinguished himself at Valmy and Jemappes. He was, according to all accounts, a brave and skillful soldier, and a humane and enlightened man—a startling contrast to his ancestry.

When Dumouriez fled from France, after failing in his attempt to persuade his army to raise the standard of revolt against the Convention, he was accompanied by the Duke of Chartres. To the lasting honor of the latter be it said, that he peremptorily refused to serve in the army which the royalist emigrants, aided by foreign tyrants, were raising to crush the young liberties of France.

His wanderings through Europe are familiar to every one. He lived so near to our times, and his destiny was so marvelous, that boys at school remember the stories of his travels through Germany and Switzerland—how he entered an academy as mathematical teacher, and earned a testimonial of good conduct from the principal—how he endured insult, privation, and hardships of every kind; recognized one day by an émigré, rudely repulsed the next by some churlish landlord—how he vainly schemed, and planned, and hoped against hope for the day which should witness the reunion of his scattered family—how, finally, pressed by want, and sick of European conflicts in which he could take no share, he accepted a generous offer made by Mr. Gouverneur Morris, United States Minister to France, and set sail for Philadelphia. In the following spring he was joined by his brothers, Montpensier and Beaujolais, and all three, with very scanty means, undertook to travel over the United States. Kindness awaited them on every side, President Washington setting the example; and loans from generous friends, with an occasional remittance from their mother, enabled them to fulfill their design.

Many years afterward, their mother published a book called "Vindication of the Duke of Orleans," which contains some curious statements relative to these travels. While at Boston, the "princes" heard of the decree which sentenced their mother to be transported. "They supposed," says this work, "that she would be sent to the French colony at Cayenne, and resolved, if possible, to be there before her. They immediately proceeded (from Boston be it remembered) to Connecticut by Philadelphia and New York. On their way they learned that the Duchess had been sent to Spain." With a view of joining her, they resolved to sail for Havana; but "the ice on the Delaware prevented their taking ship from Philadelphia." They then thought of Charleston, but abandoned the idea from a still stranger motive, according to the "Vindication," viz., "because the neutrality of the United States was becoming very suspicious." Finally they set out for Pittsburg, Ohio, and sailed down the Ohio and Mississippi to New Orleans. On the way they met with very singular adventures. At one time the boatmen were overcome by fatigue, and the "princes" were obliged to "take the oars and row." At another "they could procure no boatmen who knew the river, or even understood how to steer the vessel;" and thus the "princes" were obliged to act as pilots and keep watch by turns. They "were constantly exposed to the greatest dangers from the ice" on the Mississippi. Dr. Taylor remarks, that "this narrative will be read with amazement," and it certainly is very surprising.

They embarked for Cuba, at last, and were captured by an English frigate. Fortunately, however, the captain, Lord Dundonald, kindly consented to land them at Havana; and they fancied themselves safe in the Spanish dominions. They were mistaken. The Prince of Peace could not afford to give a refuge to such exiles; and they were civilly required to leave the island. This drove them to a British colony. They visited in succession the Bahamas and Nova Scotia; made a second attempt, as unsuccessful as the first, to enter Spain, where their mother was; and returned for a time in England, where Montpensier died. His brother's death followed soon after at Malta, and the only surviving male representative of the Orleans accepted a home from the King of Sicily at Messina.

There were at this time on the continent of Europe three persons—the Duke of Orleans, his mother, and his sister—whose sole concern for many years had been to meet each other, and yet whom fate seemed resolved to keep apart. The dutiful, though singular, journeys of the first in search of his mother have already been noticed. Mademoiselle Adelaide, his sister, was as anxious to find him. They had parted fifteen years before in Switzerland, and for some time each had been absorbed in seeking safety. But when the Duke returned to England from America, the chief dangers were past, and his sister traveled thither to meet him. He had left for the Mediterranean before she arrived; and the affectionate girl at once took ship for Malta. When she reached Palermo, she was informed that her brother had gone to Gibraltar; she followed him thither, but was again told that he had returned to England. At length, after journeys which would be scouted as impossible in a romance, she arrived at Portsmouth, just as Louis Philippe was about to start for Sicily; they met accidentally, and recognized each other with an emotion which can easily be conceived. From their mother they had been separated nearly twenty years. To see her was now their sole aim. Spain was closed against them; but by great interest they succeeded in sending her a letter, appointing the island of Minorca as a place of meeting. The Duchess, who during these twenty years had endured all manner of suffering from illness, privation, and mental anxiety, did not recognize her children when they appeared in her presence; the horrors she had witnessed since they had parted had obliterated their features from her memory.

Louis Philippe married the Princess Amelia, the daughter of the King of Naples—"a mild and pleasing woman"—and lived quietly in Sicily till Napoleon's overthrow and exile to Elba. The news reached him accidentally. The next morning he was en route for Paris. Instantly on his arrival he flew to his boyhood's home—the Palais Royal; but was stopped by a burly official, who notified him that strangers were not allowed to enter the private apartments. Louis Philippe burst into tears, and kissed the stairs of his ancestral palace. His father, who had scoffed at danger and met death with a smile, had likewise wept at the sight of his much-beloved Palais Royal.

When Louis XVIII. began to restore the monarchy on the old Bourbon footing, it is said that Louis Philippe felt and expressed loud indignation. Certain it is that both previous and subsequently to Napoleon's return from Elba the Duke of Orleans was in bad odor at court. When the Emperor landed at Cannes, the Duke took the command of the forces in the north; but like the other partisans of the Bourbons, he was overwhelmed by the popularity of Napoleon, and without attempting to strike a blow, fled to Twickenham. After the hundred days, he returned to Paris, and lived as quietly as any bourgeois. That he nurtured designs upon the throne there can be no question; he had been indicated by Alexander, by Napoleon himself, and by the British press as the man for the occasion; and a large party in France openly sought his elevation. But his circumspection was too large to permit him to take any steps which might have jeopardized his safety. He contented himself with gaining popularity by extensive charities; sending his son to a public school, and drawing round him the élite of French literary and political society. He was not received at court, and was known to be intimate with the most bitter opponents of the Bourbons; but he remained perfectly quiet, watching events. He led the same life during the reign of the imbecile Charles X.; with this trivial difference that the monarch admitted his ambitious cousin to his society, and even condescended to attend the fêtes of the Palais Royal. Louis Philippe was a giant in intellect in comparison with the Bourbons; he bided his time.

On the 27th July, 1830, a crowd was assembled in the Rue Richelieu, opposite the printing-office of "Le Temps" newspaper. The proprietor stood, with calm face, before his own door; his workmen, gathered in small knots around him, showed by the agitation of their gestures that some strong excitement was at work. The by-standers, many of whom appeared intelligent, respectable men, gazed intently on the group. About noon a small body of gens-d'armes, headed by a commissary of police, made way through the unresisting crowd toward the office of Le Temps. The proprietor, M. Baude, challenged them. The commissary replied that he had come, in virtue of his office, to execute an ordinance of his Majesty, Charles the Tenth, dated the day before, which suspended the liberty of the press, and enjoined upon the police to destroy the presses and type of all newspapers which presumed to violate its provisions. M. Baude replied that the ordinance in question was unconstitutional, null and void, and that he would neither obey it, nor open his door to the police. The commissary sent for a blacksmith to break open the door. When the man came M. Baude calmly opened the penal code which he held in his hand, and read the article on breaking into private dwellings: the blacksmith, menaced with a criminal prosecution, drew back, and refused to use the tools he had brought. Another was procured, but he, too, dared not risk the penalties the intrepid Baude thundered in his ears. The commissary was at last compelled to send for a workman employed by the government to rivet the irons on convicts: he had no compunctions of conscience; the door was broken open, and the presses and types partly confiscated and partly destroyed.

That night a shot from the musket of a soldier killed a woman. Her body was carried in procession—it became the standard of the Revolution. For two days the Swiss and a few French regiments did battle with the insurgents: on the 29th the victory was won. During the whole of the conflict, and indeed for some days previously, constant communications had taken place between the banker Lafitte and his friend the Duke of Orleans. When the overthrow of the monarchy became a fixed fact, Lafitte assembled the leading Deputies at his residence, and laid before them the project of raising the Duke of Orleans to the throne. They agreed upon the following proclamation, which was posted on all the walls of Paris:

"FRENCHMEN!

"Charles X. can return no more to Paris. He has shed the people's blood.

"A republic would involve us in civil discord and foreign wars.

"The Duke of Orleans is devoted to the revolutionary cause.

"The Duke of Orleans never fought against us.

"The Duke of Orleans fought at Jemappes.

"The Duke of Orleans would be a citizen King.

"The Duke of Orleans carried the tricolor flag against our enemies' cannon.

"The Duke of Orleans can alone carry it again. We will have no other flag.

"The Duke of Orleans does not declare himself. He waits our orders. If we proclaim them, he will accept the Charter as we have always understood and desired it. He will hold the crown as the free gift of the French people."

This skillful proclamation had a wonderful effect. The bourgeoisie rallied round Lafitte to a man. As the Bourbons were crushed, there only remained the Republicans to conciliate. To these it was that Odillon Barrot spoke the famous words: "The Duke of Orleans is the best of Republics." 'Twas well said; but a fine speech did not convince the mob assembled before the Hotel de Ville. Had they been Americans or Englishmen, they would have required explicit pledges, frankly given by the proposed monarch, and guaranteed by well-known popular leaders; being Frenchmen, the road to their convictions lay in a different direction. The Duke of Orleans, who had hastily arrived at Paris from Neuilly, appeared on the balcony of the Hotel de Ville, arm-in-arm with Lafayette, waving a tricolor flag over his head. This proved every thing. The mob shouted, "Vive le Duc d'Orleans!" and all was settled. The Deputies elected him king by a vote of 219 to 38; and in presence of the assembled Chambers he was duly crowned.

At length the hereditary ambition of the Orleans dynasty was gratified. The prize for which the Regent and Philippe Egalité—not to speak of the more insignificant members of the family—had striven in vain, had fallen into the grasp of their descendant. The family feud between the Orleans and the Bourbons had lasted till the dishonor of the latter and the triumph of the former.

The Duchess of Orleans, bred in profound respect for hereditary rights, had seen her husband's elevation with pain. On the other hand, his sister, Madame Adelaïde, the same whose energy has been already noted, a woman of masculine mind though questionable virtue, had entered warmly into his ambitious schemes, and advised him throughout the crisis of July. His sons shared his feelings in every respect. The best men in France, led by Lafitte, Lafayette, and Dupont de l'Eure, felt fully satisfied with the Revolution, and sanguinely hoped great things from Louis Philippe.

They had miscalculated their man. No sooner had he reaped the fruit of forty years of prudence, than he forgot all the lessons of experience, and gave way to the blindest selfishness. To turn round upon those to whom he owed his elevation was his first act. Under his directions, the office held by Lafayette as commander of the National Guard, was abolished; and the venerable patriot died in mortification and disappointment, deeply bewailing with his last breath that he had been instrumental in raising Louis Philippe to the throne. To Lafitte, the banker, the king owed still more than to Lafayette. It was Lafitte who swayed the council on the 27th July, in favor of the Duke of Orleans: his influence first brought round the leaders of the republican party, and procured the vote in the Chamber. After the revolution Lafitte, in common with other mercantile men, became embarrassed in his private business: a short respite would probably have enabled him to re-establish his credit; but at the very moment his creditors were pressing him, Louis Philippe called for the repayment of an old loan, and the banker failed. Dupont de l'Eure, the friend of Lafitte and Lafayette, tendered his resignation as minister: it was gladly accepted, and Louis Philippe felt that he had shaken off the load of obligation he owed them.

He made the same mistake as Napoleon III.:

he forgot that he was nothing more than a popular chief, and aimed at consolidating a dynasty. Louis XIV. himself was less ambitious for his children than "the Citizen King." His eldest son, an amiable and enlightened man, was, he thought, secure of the French throne. For the second, the Duke of Nemours, he tried hard to obtain a Belgian crown, and even induced the Belgian statesmen, partly by argument and partly by corruption, to invite the Duke to rule over them. But England had not forgotten her jealousy of the royal house of France: she vetoed the arrangement, forced the Belgians to bestow the crown on Prince Leopold, son-in-law of George IV., and Louis Philippe, too weak at that time to risk a contest with his powerful neighbor, contented himself with marrying one of his daughters to the successful rival of his son.

No throne offering for his third son, the Duc d'Anmale, he sought to compensate him by securing him unrivaled riches. The last member of the great families of Bourbon and Condé, and the sole possessor of their enormous wealth, was an old dotard, the Duke of Bourbon, Prince of Condé, who was living in a wretched way in the country, in complete subjection to an imperious English actress named Dawes. With this woman Louis Philippe did not disdain to open a private correspondence, not only placing her on a footing of equality with his own family, but actually stooping to cajole and flatter her. By her machinations the old Duke was induced to make a will, in which, after several rich bequests to herself, the Duc d'Anmale was named heir to the bulk of the Condé property. A short while afterward, one morning, the Duke's servants entered his room and found him hanging by a handkerchief to the window-sash, quite dead. Medical men declared that the handkerchief, tied as it was, could not have produced strangulation, and as the Duke's feet touched the ground, the fact may be regarded as beyond question. The public mind in Paris was violently agitated by the news. People called loudly for the trial of the woman Dawes, and confidently expected to see her condemned for murder. But, to the amazement of every one, the King stepped forward, took her under his protection, forbade any prosecution, hushed up the affair, and quietly assisted D'Anmale to enter into possession of the property. Louis Philippe never recovered the effects of this act.

When M. Thiers resigned office, in 1836, he left a minute for the instruction of Count Molé, his successor, which contained the following sentence: "The Duke of Orleans must be married. Two ladies are proposed: the Duchess Helena of Mecklenberg Schwerin, and the Princess of Coburg. The former is the most intellectual, but the plainest; the latter is pretty, but has not ceased playing with her doll." The dispute between the two was settled by the marriage of the Duke of Orleans to the former, and the Duke of Nemours to the latter. The marriage of Louis Philippe's youngest son, the Duke of Montpensier, was more difficult to conclude. The Queen of Spain, Isabella, was unmarried; all the Sovereigns of Europe set to match-making for her benefit. Knowing Louis Philippe's propensities, foreign statesmen expected him to put forward Montpensier as a suitor—the cunning old fox knew better. She had a sister, a pretty little girl, named Louise, who was just budding into womanhood. Her the French King—solemnly protesting that his regard for his allies prevented his seeking her sister's hand for his son—selected for his daughter-in-law. England saw through the scheme, and vehemently opposed it; but the Spanish Queen-Mother, Christina, was induced to give her support to the project. Her object was to marry her daughter to her nephew by marriage, Don Francisco d'Assis, who was an imbecile in mind, and effeminate and weakly in body; and this was precisely what Louis Philippe desired. Availing herself of a fit of ill-temper, to which Isabella was subject, Christina proposed the marriage, extorted a reluctant assent from her daughter, and had it celebrated that very night. Within an hour, Don Francisco became the Queen's husband, and the Duke of Montpensier the consort of her sister.

Thus far all had gone well with Louis Philippe. He had lost his eldest son, it was true; but the Duke had lived at open variance with his father, and, however deeply the King's paternal affection felt the shock, his policy was a gainer by the bereavement. The Duc de Nemours had married the first cousin of the Queen of England. D'Anmale was the richest man in France. Montpensier stood a fair chance of succeeding to the Spanish throne. His daughter ruled her husband, the King of the Belgians. Even Joinville had contrived, by artfully pandering to the French prejudice against England, to gain considerable popularity in France. The King's authority seemed secure. A compact majority sustained his Ministers in the House. Severe laws curbed the press. An active police force crushed sedition. To a superficial observer no dynasty in Europe seemed so fair or so prosperous as the house of Orleans in October, 1846.

Sixteen months afterward the rottenness of the basis on which it rested became apparent. The nation demanded electoral reform: the King—obedient to the invariable law that reformers in office are the most obstinate of conservatives—refused to yield an inch. Banquets all over France menaced the throne. On 22d February, 1848, a banquet was to be held at Paris. Two days before, the walls were placarded with notices prohibiting assemblages on that day; and on the morning of the 22d the Place de la Concorde and the boulevards were filled with soldiers, among whom the uniform of the mounted municipal guards was conspicuous. Crowds thronged the streets, wandering to and fro, apparently without a motive; but every now and then a gamin threw a stone at a soldier, and the crowd applauded the act. Retaliation on the part of the military roused the anger of the populace. A woman—street-fays always begin with the killing of women—was thrust through the back by a brutal horseman. Hundreds of men rushed to avenge the dead. Every straw showed how the wind blew.

On the night of the 23d barricades rose. Next day the National Guards appeared in the streets, and marched round the city calling for Reform! Bugeaud, who commanded the garrison, advised energetic resistance and the argument of "infallible artillery;" but Louis Philippe had lost his presence of mind, and would consent to nothing. When he heard that the troops on the boulevards had fraternized with the insurgents, he agreed to dismiss his Ministers, and appoint popular men in their stead; but it was too late. All Paris was in commotion. Hard fighting was going on at the Palais Royal. Emile de Girardin—who is said to be the illegitimate son of Adelaide, the King's sister—thrust a pen into his hand, and forced him to sign an act of abdication in favor of his grandson, the Count of Paris. With this he hurried to the Chamber of Deputies, where the Duchess of Orleans, accompanied by her children and her brothers-in-law, Nemours and Montpensier, soon made their appearance. The House was in confusion. A desultory debate on forms began, when a body of armed insurgents burst open the doors and dissolved the sitting at the point of the bayonet. To seize the chair which M. Sauzet, more from stupidity than cowardice, had just vacated, to place in it M. Dupont de l'Eure, and to vote a Provisional Government, was the work of an instant. The monarchy was overthrown.

Louis Philippe, paralyzed by the rapidity of events, remained in a state of abject imbecility while his throne was falling. To Bugeaud's prayers that the cannon of the Carrousel might be used he would not listen; his ear was closed to every manly proposal. While he was wringing his hands at the thought of the abdication which had been extorted from him, the mob invaded the Tuilleries, and the King, with his wife, fled precipitately to St. Cloud. There again, some of his officers proposed resistance; but Louis Philippe thought of nothing but flight. Having borrowed a couple of hundred francs he posted to Versailles, and thence to Dreux. There he learned the proclamation of the republic, which completely prostrated him. He shaved his whiskers, called himself Mr. Smith, and hastened to the sea-coast. Over and over again he was recognized, and might have been seized, had the agents of the republic sought to secure his person. Though profoundly terrified, he could not avoid betraying himself by his language, and constantly muttered, "Like Charles the Tenth! Like Charles the Tenth!" At length, after several days of agony he embarked on board an English steamer, and landed, broken-hearted and penniless, in a foreign land.

At Claremont House, which belonged to his son-in-law, the King of the Belgians, he spent the brief remainder of his life in comparative poverty, under the name of the Count de Neuilly. Repose was the only benefit misfortune had brought him; all his manhood and his philosophy had departed. The British nobility and the royal family visited him in his retirement; but there was nothing in his demeanor of the calm resignation and noble fortitude which might have been expected from his checkered fortunes. On becoming a king, Louis Philippe had ceased to be an uncommon man. He died a very ordinary one.

None of his sons have earned celebrity. Ne-mours and Montpensier are involved in the disgrace of having allowed the Government to be overset in 1848 without a struggle to maintain their father. The Duchess of Orleans lives in retirement, educating her son. Of Joinville and D'Aumale the world hears nothing. It is said that the family have agreed to waive their claims on the throne in favor of Henri V., the Bourbon heir; if any such bargain has been made, it was intended as a blind to the world. If Napoleon falls, and a monarchy succeeds him, the sceptre will belong to him who has nerve and power to grasp it.

MARY RANKIN, A PHYSICIAN'S STORY.

I HAD been the medical attendant of Mr. Rankin for many years. On coming to the place to start in my profession, I had been accidentally called in to his family, and was so fortunate as to establish a confidence which never deserted me. He continued my warm friend through all the struggles of my early years, and it was perhaps mainly owing to his influence that I gathered about me an amount of business, and that in the best families of the place, in a few months, which most men are glad to reach in as many years. Of course I was warmly attached to him and his family, which at the time of which I write consisted of two daughters, Ellen and Mary.

In Mr. Rankin, I am free to say, few men found any thing to like. He was a stern, proud old man, and eminently aristocratic in his notions and feelings, and so distant in his manners from those at all below him, that he had few friends among them. Among those he chose to consider his equals he was respected for his wealth, for he was rich, and this gave him influence among all classes. He had lost his wife about a year after the birth of his daughter Mary. She was a woman whose character was in strange and striking contrast with his. Every body loved and esteemed her.

The same difference existed between his daughters. Ellen was like her father—the same dark, flashing eye, the same erect form and high bearing and distant manners—while Mary grew up to be one of the gentlest of womankind. Her mild face, and calm blue eyes, and gentle ways, all spoke of the kindest feelings of a heart that was ready always to spread gladness around her.

It always seemed to me a singular feature in the character of the father, that he would occasionally take a fancy to some individual who was struggling on in the world against the tide, and making little progress, and use all his influence to raise him up. He was never known, I believe, to use his money for this purpose. It may have been only the pride of feeling how much influence he had, more than any real satisfaction he took in such acts. I have already said that I had the benefit of this. Another was a young artist, who, like very many of his profession, had a large share of talent in the way of his art, but no tact at attracting the notice of the world. He was poor and ambitious, two qualities in general most unfit to go side by side in the same person. Mr. Rankin encouraged him—spoke of him in terms of praise to his friends—called often to see him, and stimulated his ambition; and finally—it must have been in a fit of absence of mind—very foolishly invited him to his house.

He might have known better. He might have known that Ellen would treat him with the proudest scorn and contempt, and, more than all, he ought to have known that Mary would pity and love him. There are hearts that run together as the streams of water—hearts that God made to beat side by side, and for each other. And such were those of Philip Fellows and Mary Rankin, and it was only the old story over again. The father discovered it too late, and drove him from the house. He was no deeper read in romance than he was in the human heart, or he would have known how useless that was. Mary had never known, before she met Philip, what it was to have the sympathy of another heart to lean on; and when he was gone, and she met nothing but the stern, cold looks of her father and sister—as stern, and cold, and pitiless as the icebergs of the polar sea—she felt ready to do any thing, and the very first opportunity she ran away with Philip and became his wife.

All attempts at reconciliation were vain. They did not seek for it. But all her friends did, and were met with relentless denial. Mr. Rankin's influence was exerted now to ruin his son-in-law. At first he found it no easy matter, for Philip had become a general favorite. But by perseverance he finally succeeded in drawing away his friends from his support. Mary's name seemed forgotten in her father's house. At least it was never suffered to be mentioned there.

I have found it necessary to say so much, that the reader may be prepared for the following narrative, which I shall give mostly from my diary:

"July 1. As I was stepping into my carriage this morning, I was stopped by a voice calling my name. It was my young friend, Philip Fellows, a young artist who had married Mary Rankin, three years ago, and whom I had not seen for more than a year.

(Here follows the substance of what I have stated above.)

"I was shocked at his appearance, and took him at once into my office.

"Why, what is the matter, Philip?" I inquired. "Are you sick?"

"No, Doctor, I am not sick, but Mary—" and he brushed away a tear that rose to his eye, and his words were choked in his throat.

"Sit down, my dear fellow. I have always a few minutes to spare with you, you know, and especially now, after not having seen you in so long a time. Now tell me all about yourself, where you have been, and what you have been doing. But first, where is Mary?"

"We are stopping at Mr. A.'s, where we arrived last night. I have been in New York for a few months, doing little or nothing but fighting a desperate battle with destiny, and seeing her waste away by my side, till I fear she is dying—and he covered his face this time, and wept like a child.

"We found a good friend in Doctor G——y, who knows you, and he has sent us up here again to try what the change may do for her. You will come and see her, Doctor."

"This very moment, Philip. But, cheer up! It may not be so bad as you fear."

"It can not be worse, at all events."

"We drove at once to Mr. A.'s. Mary was lying on the sofa, and I saw that, though very much altered, the change was not as great in her as in her husband. She received me with one of her old-fashioned smiles, which perhaps was a little saddened, and for some time she talked cheerfully and hopefully about herself. But it was for Philip that she manifested the most anxiety; and I began to think, before my visit was over, that he might in reality be the one who needed my services most. I made no prescription for her, and only gave some general advice as to her care of herself, promising to call every day and see her.

"Evening.—I have just returned from seeing her again. I was summoned in great haste, and found her just recovering from a sort of swoon, in which she had lain so long that they feared she was dead. Her husband was sitting on the side of the bed, holding her hand, and watching with a look of the most utter despair every breath as she slowly revived. At length she opened her eyes, and looked around on our anxious faces, and then on him.

"I thought I was dying," she said, "and the songs of the other world were sounding in my ears. But I am glad for your sake, dear Phil, that I have come back. You would miss me so—wouldn't you? And those dreary nights—how terribly dark they would be to you without me!—and then you would be thinking of the darker grave where your wife was sleeping. I am not afraid to die; but I want to live for your sake, Phil—and she wound her slender, white arm around his neck, and drew him down till his cheek rested on hers.

"He was weeping bitterly while she was calm, and every word was uttered in the plainest but most touching tones of the true and earnest affection that flowed out from her gentle heart. She seemed separated only by a breath from heaven, yet bound to earth, or rather to her husband, by a tie that was stronger than death. There was an awful stillness around them in the dimly-lighted room, and we stood looking at them as if both had been dead.

"Soon she spoke again.

"Do not weep so, dear Phil. I am here with you. I shall not die yet. I can not leave you now to struggle on alone in this hard world. Look at me—speak to me, Phil. It will make me feel stronger to hear your voice."

"He loosened her arm gently from his neck, and rising up, looked in her face with a calm smile, and she smiled as she said,

"There, that is right. We shall be happy again. In a few days I shall be well and strong and by your side again. We will walk out in the green fields, and in the woods where we used to wander years ago, when we first loved each other, but no better than we do now. God has not deserted us yet, Phil, dark and dreary as much of the past has been to you. I have seen the light all the way, and it is shining on us now."

"She knew not what, nor how far off, the light was; but the strong faith and hope of her fond heart saw it, and never lost sight of it. Many and many a time, as Philip told me to-night, in the cloudiest and dreariest days of their sorrow, had she thus cheered and strengthened his faltering heart, who saw it only with the eye of her faith; and yet encouraged by her promise, believed and hoped it might yet shine on them, or on her; for he could have borne all his misery alone, but for the ever-recurring reflection that he had brought the shadow over her.

"It is a terrible thing to witness the contest of a strong mind against adversity; to see care, and anxiety, and watchfulness, and labor—hard, steady, unremitting labor, unrewarded by success; to see a noble-hearted man toiling and mowing on in the fierce battle of life—now cast down, and almost given up to despair; and now, encouraged by some faintest ray of light, rising up again to fight on; to see and know that day and night are spent in the same unremitting and vain contest; that the body is wasting away, and the eye growing sunken and dim, and the face haggard and wan with the strife of the mind against circumstances. But such are the very men, who, if the tide should turn in their favor, would be the admiration of the world. I have a great respect for such men.

"After making such prescription as was necessary, and advising that she should be kept quiet through the night, I beckoned Philip into the next room, and told him I wanted to know all about him since he had been absent. He told me a sad tale of his struggles and poverty, and how his heart would have failed him long ago if it had not been for his wife.

"And why did you not come to me, Philip?"

"Why, to tell the truth, my desertion by all my friends here has made me suspicious and proud, and I was determined to fight my battle alone."

"That was all nonsense. But now cheer up! I have no doubt Mary speaks the truth. She will not die now, and there are brighter days ahead. You must believe it, and let her see that you believe it; for there is nothing the matter with her but her anxiety for you. Every thing depends upon you. Trust in God, and keep a strong heart."

"I try, Doctor; but my heart accuses me so much for making her the sharer of my hard fate, that I can not bear to look her in the face, she is so patient and resigned. I have even thought of suicide, so that she might have a chance of being restored to what she was. God bless her! She is too good for me, or for this world!"

"Not a bit of it, Philip. If it were not for the few like her in the world, I would hardly blame men for cutting their throats. But for you, who have got one of the capital prizes in this grand lottery, why, man, you ought to be content to be poor!"

"So I would be, if it were not for her sake. I can not bear to see her suffer. Do you remember her as she was when we were married, Doctor? Look here—"

"And he showed me a miniature of his wife taken at that time. It was one of the most exquisite paintings of his pencil. It was Mary herself in all but life, sitting in an attitude which she often assumed—her elbow resting on the arm of her chair, and her hand supporting her head, with her fingers partly hidden by the smooth and glossy hair under which they lay, and her thoughtful eye just elevated enough to look into yours with an expression of unutterable fondness; for she was looking at her husband when it was taken."

"It is a perfect gem, Philip," said I.

"Do you think so? You shall have it if she gets well; for I believe you would value it most, next to me."

"Then I'll take it now, for I consider it mine," and I put it into my pocket.

"He did not oppose it; and I saw that this little act went far to establish his confidence in my opinion, for he parted from me with a more cheerful face than I had seen him wear before."

"Good-night, Philip. Now keep up your courage, and especially before Mary."

"God bless you, Doctor!" and his eye glistened with something like a tear.

"July 2. 'What did you say to Philip last night, Doctor, that has made him so cheerful?' Mary asked me as I entered her room this morning."

"Oh, I only made a little bargain with him, by which he has transferred part of his property in you to me."

"She looked puzzled, and I showed her the picture."

"The consideration is, that you are to get well, which I assured him of. Now, you must do your best to help me; for I am to give it back if my promise fails."

"He is a noble man, Doctor; and I feel that it is more my constant concern for him that is wearing away my health than any actual disease."

"I have discovered that already, my dear girl, and you must set your mind at rest on that subject. I am glad he has come back here, for he will find warm friends, I know. We must make another effort to reconcile your father, Mary."

"Oh, Doctor!" she exclaimed, and her eyes filled with tears, 'if it could be done, it would take a terrible load off this poor heart. I do not feel that I did wrong, but it is very hard to live so estranged from him and Ellen. I do not care for the loss of the comforts his wealth would bring; but I want to know that he is reconciled to us, and does not hate us.'"

It was astonishing with what inveterate rancor her father persisted in his hostility. All Philip's old friends gathered around him again, and took a deep interest in him. I believe many of them were heartily ashamed that they had ever been led by Mr. Rankin to withdraw their support and countenance from Philip, and now exhibited a disposition to atone for it, by extra efforts in his behalf. Not a few called on him, and candidly told him the reason of their conduct, and expressed their regret. This did much to restore his self-confidence, and give him new courage; and his new cheerfulness did for Mary what all the medicine in the world could not do. She improved rapidly in strength, and soon became unaffectedly cheerful. Philip resumed his work, and once more fortune began to smile.

I called on her father, and told him all I had learned from Philip, and that they had returned here on account of Mary's health. He sneered at this, as if he regarded it only as a pretense to excite his pity, which he saw through at once. I was a little disposed to be angry, but swallowed my spite, and urged every consideration I could to induce him to relent, and was astonished at his firm and unwavering determination to have nothing to do with them.

"Will you not at least see her?" I finally asked.

"I will not," he replied; "and I will do nothing for her so long as she lives with that man." This qualification looked like a very dim ray of hope, and yet a ray that might brighten.

"Shall I tell her this, Mr. Rankin?"

"Yes; and tell her if she will leave him, and come back to my house, she shall have a home as long as she lives. . . But with him—never."

I returned at once with the message, and communicated it to Mary, for I did not fear its effect upon her. At first a tear rose to her eye, and seemed ready to fall; but almost instantly it gave place to a smile of calm resignation, as she looked up into my face, as if to ask what I thought.

"Be patient, Mary," I replied to her look, "and trust in God. Stick to Philip, at all events."

At this moment he entered.

"Have you seen him, Doctor?" he asked.

"Yes," said his wife, before I could reply; "and he offers to take me back if I will leave you."

I saw a cloud gathering on his brow, which, however, vanished at once as he caught my eye, and taking her hand in his, he looked for a moment in her face before he said:

"And had you not better accept it, Mary?"

"And leave you—live without you, Phil? No—we should both die then, and now we are going to live and be happy."

There is a world of the best and truest feeling in the heart of that girl—or woman, I must call her now.

"July 15. Ellen is to be married. This, it seems, is still a secret among her friends, but has transpired in rather a curious way. A gentleman called to-day at Philip's rooms, and wished him to paint his miniature. He desired Philip to say nothing about it, as he intended it for a lady he was about to marry, and wished to surprise her with it. The artist happened to be in one of his best humors, and soon charmed the stranger with his conversation and manner, for when in such a mood, he exerts all his powers to bring out and keep up the full expression of his sitter's face. Just before the sitting closed, the gentleman referred to Mr. Rankin, and asked Philip if he knew him. His face was instantly clouded. There was something in the way in which the question was asked, that at once aroused his suspicions that the stranger was some way connected with Mr. Rankin; and he laid down his pencil and said he should do no more to-day.

"The change was not unnoticed by his companion, who instantly ran up, and approaching Philip, said, with a kind, apologizing voice and manner:

"I fear I have made some sad mistake."

"If you are a friend of Mr. Rankin," replied Philip, coldly, "you have certainly made a very great mistake."

"Firm and distant as Philip had grown under his misfortunes and neglect, he was not proof against kindness; and in half an hour more the stranger had his whole story.

"Why, this ought not to be," said he. "Perhaps you was rash and foolish. But if I am to marry the other daughter—there, I have told you now, in spite of all my caution—but if I am to marry Ellen, there must be no discord in the family. You have suffered enough; and if your wife is what you describe her, I do not think but any man would have been tempted to do the same thing."

"Come and see her for yourself," said Philip, all his good-humor restored at the stranger's kind frankness; and putting on his hat, he led the way at once to his house.

"It happened to be there when they arrived.

"Just like you, dear Phil," said Mary, laughing, when Mr. Allen had been introduced, and Philip had told what had passed between them.

"We have thus found a new, and, I hope, powerful ally, in this man. He seems one of the most generous-hearted men I ever met; and when we had talked over the whole history of our young friends, he entered warmly into all our plans for bringing about a reunion. We left the house together, and when we parted he said:

"It must be done, Doctor. They are as noble a pair of beings as I ever knew. Mr. Rankin does not know him, or he would not treat him so."

"I shook my head, for I must confess I am not at all sanguine in my hope of reconciling them. Allen left me with his face very thoughtful. It is no light thing to discover such a feature in the character of those we love as he has this day found in Ellen."

As the summer advanced Mary's health was entirely restored. Her husband, encouraged by the return of his old friends and patrons, but especially by the unremitting friendship and encouragement of Allen, became himself again. But no progress was made toward softening the obduracy of his father-in-law. No direct attempts, indeed, were made, after my unsuccessful one, for some considerable time, for all seemed to think it would be better to wait till a favorable opportunity should present itself, when circumstances might aid us.

Allen was one day walking with Ellen, when they suddenly encountered Mary. Allen bowed with a cordial smile as they met, but his companion did not recognize her, or change a feature as they passed. The next day he called at my office and mentioned the circumstance, and expressed his surprise at it. It showed him how firm was the determination of the Rankins to disown Mary, and he did not seem to feel at all easy at the state things were in.

"I have never yet said any thing to them about my acquaintance with Fellows," said he, "because no opportunity has seemed to be just right for it. But the moment the proper one occurs, I shall improve it, whatever may be the consequences."

And it did occur that very evening. At a large and brilliant party at Mrs. T——'s, the whole company was electrified by a sudden and unexpected remark from Allen. Mr. Rankin and a number of others were discussing, in their way, the merits of a large painting on one side of the room, when Allen joined them, and made some criticism in his peculiarly clear and distinct voice. It drew the attention of the whole assembly, when he continued:

"But I met a young artist in your place, some time since, by the name of Fellows, who, I think, is one of the noblest persons I ever saw. I was no more impressed with his taste and skill than with his great intelligence. While I was at his rooms one day, a gentleman was sitting for his picture, and I was surprised at the ease with which he discovered, almost instinctively, the leading traits of his mind, and then kept him so constantly engaged in conversation, that the man forgot he was sitting for his portrait, and lost all the restraint and stiffness one involuntarily assumes at such a time. Do you know him, Mr. Rankin?"

I was astonished at the inimitable coolness with which he turned to him as he asked the question. Rankin looked him in the face with a searching glance, but met only the calm look of inquiry which Allen had put on, and which did not desert him for an instant.

"No," was his only reply.

"You ought to know him—though it is often the fate of such men to live and die unknown. The place ought to be proud of him, though it affords too mean a field for his powers. If he had lived in ancient Greece he would have been honored by the whole nation. He would rise rapidly in the world with proper encouragement, and leave his mark when he dies. You must some of you know him, gentlemen."

The whole company was fairly and skillfully cornered, and driven into a candid acknowledgment of the merits of the young artist, in the very presence of his bitterest enemy. But Rankin and his daughter were cold and impassible, and took their leave directly after supper. The next day Allen received a note from Mr. Rankin, saying that circumstances had occurred which would make it desirable that his engagement with his daughter should be recalled. He evidently saw that Philip was regaining his former position among his friends, and that his own influence could no longer hinder it. But, in spite of this, his pride was determined not to give way, and he was fortifying himself to withstand all interference.

And thus months passed on—months of hard study and toil, but cheered and encouraged by success, and the warm attachment of friends, and the smiles of his angelic wife, so that Philip was himself again, when I was summoned one evening to see Mary. She had taken a severe cold, and had some fever. Philip was alarmed—as he always was at the slightest illness of his wife—but I soon quieted his fears, and made my prescriptions without any apprehension of danger. Two hours later I found her in a ravelling delirium. All that night we sat by her side, and for days after we watched her with the intensest anxiety, till life seemed on the verge of death. Hope there seemed none.

It was at this juncture that our good minister proposed that her father should be informed of her state, and volunteered to see him. The interview was one which for a long time threw a cloud over the heart of the worthy old man, who had been for nearly half a century the universally esteemed minister of the parish. Upon announcing his errand, Mr. Rankin replied:

"The same thing has been tried before, Sir; but it will not have any more effect now than then."

"But she is really apparently dying. She has not known any of us for days. The Doctor says he can not give us the slightest hope. Let me beg of you to think better of it, Mr. Rankin, and not let the cold grave close over your hate."

"My dear Sir," said Mr. Rankin, looking coldly and unmoved in the face of the minister, and evidently not believing him, "I presume she will get well. But it does not look well for such men as you and Doctor P. to be lending yourselves to this little kind of trickery, to cheat a man like me into an act he has resolved not to commit. But did I believe that she was as sick as you say she is, it would not alter my determination, which has grown stronger for years. I shall make my will to-morrow, Sir, and she shall not have a shilling of my property. I was never sick a day in my life, and I am far from being an old man yet. But I will secure myself, in this point, against all contingencies. Neither she nor her husband shall ever inherit a cent from me. No, Sir—not another word on this subject. I shall make my will to-morrow, and do as I have said."

"May God forgive you!" said the good man.

It apparently made little difference in the case of Mary what course her father chose to pursue; for we looked upon her every hour as dying. The attendants moved noiselessly about the room, and we scarcely breathed aloud, for it seemed as if a rude breath might break the slender tie that bound her to us. I remember well the night when, after days had passed in the wild and furious delirium of her fever, that we saw it gradually subside, and she slept. Philip asked me if she was dying, and I could not answer him. I saw the moisture gathering on her lip and on her forehead, and her pulse was winding threadlike and quiet under my finger, and her breath came slowly while the crimson flush that had covered her face gave place to a deadly paleness, and all seemed to bear the air of speedy dissolution. Yet it might be a change for the better. It was just as we were watching her that the minister returned from his fruitless errand. He saw in our faces the fears that were agitating our hearts; and only saying, "Let us pray," he knelt and poured forth an earnest prayer for the dying girl. He prayed for Philip—the heart-stricken and weary husband—and his words breathed calmness and consolation into all our breasts. He prayed for her father—the hard-hearted and vindictive old man—that he might be forgiven, though he himself was relentless as death; and that his heart might be turned, though it should be only to the memory of his child when the grave had closed over her in its cold gloom and darkness; and though to her ear the long wished-for sound of his forgiveness might not reach, yet that he might not die before his heart should be melted. And we all said "Amen!" for the soul of every one present went up with the prayer of the good old man. And then we sat down by the bedside and prepared to keep our anxious vigils over Mary, hardly hoping that her eye would ever open again upon the coming day.

I find in my journal the following entry made the next morning:

"How strange the mutations of life! How mysterious the ways of God. I was called from the side of Mary this morning to the house of Mr. Rankin. The message was urgent, and the servant said that Miss Ellen begged that I would not delay a moment, for her father was very ill. Day was just breaking as I reached the house. All was confusion and disorder, and every face showed that something terrible had happened. I hastened to the bedroom of Mr. Rankin, and as I entered I met a most agonizing sight. He was sitting upright in his chair—his hands clenching the arms as if they would crush the solid wood in their grasp—his face bloated and purple, and the large veins distended all over it as if they would burst—his eyes wild and almost protruding from their sockets, and his chest rapidly heaving and struggling for the breath which he was gasping for almost in vain. He could hardly be said to breathe, but it was a rapid panting, like a horse that had been over-driven, each effort failing to fill his lungs. I saw at a glance that he was laboring under a severe attack of congestion of that organ. His wild and despairing eye was fixed upon me the moment I entered the room, and never left me for an instant. He could not speak, but his look seemed to ask most emphatically, 'Am I dying?'"

"Ellen stood by his side, absorbed in grief. Her feeling was all aroused now. She loved her father. They had for years been mutually dependent upon each other for society at home—they were beings of the same spirit, and now she saw him about to be taken from her side, and her grief was without restraint.

"I at once opened a vein, and as the blood flowed in a large full stream, he seemed to be relieved, and in a few moments the most alarming symptoms had passed away. Having made such prescriptions as were necessary, and enjoined the utmost quiet, and that he should not be disturbed or agitated in any way, I left, promising to be in again about nine o'clock.

"It was nearly ten when I returned, and I was surprised to find a lawyer by his side preparing to write his will. Mr. Rankin was not able to speak so as to be understood, and the lawyer was asking his questions, which he answered by signs. I of course urged them to desist, and assured Mr. Rankin that he now stood a very fair chance to recover, and that the agitation might bring on another attack. But he shook his head and motioned to the lawyer to go on.

"Do I understand you to mean, that you wish to give all your property to this daughter?" he asked.

"Mr. Rankin nodded an affirmative.

"And you give nothing to the other?"

"He shook his head.

"But Mr. Rankin—"

"The old man interrupted him with a look. I then attempted to speak, but he cut me short in the same way. I did not wish to agitate him by persisting, and turned away with a heavy heart while the lawyer wrote the will. When he had finished the paper which required but few words, Mr. Rankin by a sign indicated his wish to have it read. After the usual formal preliminaries were read, the lawyer continued: "I give and bequeath to my daughter Mary."

"Mr. Rankin started as if he would spring from his seat—his face became intensely purple, as if the blood was ready to break through every pore—he clutched the arms of his chair with a convulsive grasp—gasped a few times rapidly, and with a strong effort for breath—and was dead!"

By some strange mistake the lawyer had inserted the wrong name in the will, and hence the excitement which caused the sudden event. Mary was now equal heir with her sister to the immense property of her father.

As soon as decency would permit I left the house and hastened to the side of Mary. To my gratification I found her just awaking from the sleep of hours, and she was evidently better. She continued from this time slowly to recover, but weeks had passed before we judged it proper to communicate to her the intelligence of her father's death.

HOW WE STAND AND HOW WE WALK.

HELPLESS and joyless lies the stone where the terrible force of a volcano or the playful hand of an infant has thrown it. Longing and yearning sees the beautiful flower its own shadow pass, as in bitter mockery, around its foot and mark the passing hour. For Motion is Life—it is the first, the only source of earthly joy. Hence there is no conscious, organic being on earth that does not rejoice, by some free and voluntary motion, in the full control over its own body. The microscopic dweller in a drop of water moves in exuberant joy through his minute world; the gigantic whale throws sportively his huge body high into the air, and plunges, with strange delight, back again into the dark world beneath the waves. Some are, like Prometheus, bound to the immovable rock, or condemned, polyp-like, from the day of their birth to build their own grave; but even these captives play merrily with fibre and fringe. How much more the happier hosts to whom it is given to roam in full freedom through the wide realms of air and water!

Human ingenuity never even imagined such a variety of truly wonderful means as Nature has bestowed upon her children on earth, merely for the purpose of endowing them with this power of motion. Here an apparently poor and neglected step-child is made to carry its own heavy house wherever it goes, and yet doomed to live not on land but in the water. But a small, long, unobserved air-bubble lies far in the innermost chambers of its dark dwelling; and when it wishes to sink to the bottom of its little realm, it draws back into its shell, compresses the air, thus increasing its own weight, and is soon seen gently to glide downward. Then again, creeping out of its hut, and leaving behind it a vacant space, void of air, it rises once more to the surface, as with a well-filled balloon. Helpless beings, without bone or substance, mere minute masses of transparent jelly, have still most delicate fringes and feathers, which serve them as oar and paddle, and convey them, quick as the rushing wave, from place to place. How oddly the clumsy leech looks when it first, with grave deliberation, and slow, sluggish effort, fixes its sucking mouth to a suitable place, and then, as slowly and sluggishly, draws its long, unwieldy body forward!

The footless worm contracts and expands its countless rings, and hooks itself with tiny, hardly visible prickles to the uneven surface: thus it toils over the rough earth and grating sand, yet moving smoothly and silently, without apparent effort, in whatever direction its fancy may lead it. The fish bends its elastic spine from side to side, and shoots, like a meteor, through the soft, yielding element. Beetles and grasshoppers have springs of vast power and size, by means of which they leap high into the air, and yet never fail to alight on the precise spot of their choice; while birds beat with equal wing the elastic air and sail unhindered through the wide heaven. Animals with closed hoofs, even the gigantic elephant, walk upon the points of their toes; cloven-footed beasts step upon two; cats and dogs upon five. The bear and the ape put down but a part of their sole, and the heel only occasionally. Man alone walks upon the whole sole of his foot.

The mark of the foot in the soft soil betrays the animal to the skillful hunter; the same faint imprint tells, at a glance, to the naturalist, the form of the leg and the structure of the whole body. He sees, in an instant, before his mind's eye, the owner in its true existence; in its foot he reads its teeth, in its teeth the food it subsists on and the enemies that pursue it. For, small or great, all things work together. The manner of life is not the result of the structure, nor the structure the effect of the mode of life. Both were long predetermined in the great plan of the Almighty when he created heaven and earth. There alone must we look for the "secret law" that rules the universe, for the "sacred enigma" that Science endeavors to solve in Nature.

Far more striking yet is the incredible variety which Nature displays in adapting the given means of motion to the different elements in which animals are destined to live. The great simplicity and astounding beauty of her mechanics strike and amaze even the careless observer, and impress the more serious student with a deep and renewed conviction that God's works are truly wondrous and far beyond chance or human conception. But the great master of the ancients, Galen, has already said: "The contrivances of Nature are so various, and consummately skillful, that the wisest of mankind, in endeavoring to search them out, have not yet been able to discover them all." So said the wisest of men, even Solomon. So it is now.

Much is still unknown—seen indeed, but seen through a glass, darkly. Not many years ago, the sloth was still pitied in nurseries and universities, because its strange shape and enormous claws did not allow it to move except with extreme slowness and great pain. Destined, however, to live in the close jungle of impenetrable forests, where walking is out of question, it is now found to be admirably adapted to its home. Clinging with its claws to the branches of trees, on whose foliage it lives, it moves, head downward, with great rapidity and in perfectly painless enjoyment.

But would we be happier if we knew more? Is the wisdom of the Creator any where more strikingly illustrated than in the rich treasures of knowledge which are still held out as glorious prizes to be won by eager students? What we know fills us with overflowing gratitude and boundless admiration; what we do not know shows us the majesty of the Most High, and spurs us on, not to seek rest and repose, but new wonders and new blessings in the world around us.

It is with such an aim that the well-known Bridgewater Treatises were written; it is for a special purpose of this kind that Paley's masterly effort described the wondrous structure of the human body. For thus only Nature ought to be studied; thus only science becomes truly useful, and knowledge begins to tend toward the skies. Even the humblest attempt in this direction may bring forth some new aspect, may suggest some new thought, or awaken new feelings; and with such hopes only shall we approach in these notes some parts of the human frame.

Its great characteristics, those features that most essentially, if not alone, distinguish it from those of other animals, are the Foot and the Hand.

The human foot—which some great masters of our day consider even a more striking evidence of man's superiority than his hand—is certainly a structure full of long unsuspected wonders. Its part and duty in the whole frame at once separate man from the rest of creation; it leads him into an entirely different sphere of life and action. Standing upright upon his feet, man gains, by this simple act, a more noble and imposing carriage than the highest being that lives upon earth. He looks around him upon beast and herb, as he to whom all were given by the Lord himself; like the true master of the house, he overlooks his vast domain. He is raised—for a while—high above the dust from which he was taken; and thus typifies, by his position, that he belongs not to earth only but also to heaven.

His feet, and the upright carriage which they produce, affect and alter the whole formation of his body. The intestines, which, in animals, lie horizontally, are, with him, arranged perpendicularly; and the blood that, in their bodies, runs first lengthways, and then only up and down, courses through his veins but in one direction, from the heart downward and back again. Hence an attempt to walk on all-fours makes it rush to the head, and proves at once, that, as man has not, like the apes, four hands, because he is not destined to live with them upon trees, so he was not fashioned to use, like quadrupeds, both hands and feet for the purpose of walking. He can not do it. The child, it is true, in its first year, moves with arms and legs at the same time; but it crawls upon its knees only, and not upon its feet. The thigh bones of man are so long that the knees, if they were drawn up as in the walking of animals, would come close before and alongside of the elbows. To move thus is, if not absolutely impossible, at least very painful, especially if the face is not to look downward. For to bend back his neck in that position, man would have to exert muscles of his neck which are not accustomed to such a task, and would soon refuse to render the service. Quadrupeds have for that special purpose what man lacks, because he needs it not—a most powerful, elastic band running alongside of the head and braided to the back. It aids them in holding up the heavy head, whose weight is increased by its place at the end of a long neck, and thus enables them to look around as freely as man does in his upright position.

They, on the other hand, can as little walk upright, because with them also it brings heart, intestines, and blood-vessels into an unnatural position. Their horizontal spine has to be supported at both ends by feet, so that, in walking, they move mostly the opposite hind and fore-foot at the same time. Men and birds alone need but one point to support themselves, and can, therefore, move one foot freely while the other supports the body. Hence mainly the laughable resemblance of a bird without his feather-dress and the human body. It is well known how already Plato had made a comparison between the two, and how Diogenes played him the trick, unworthy of both philosophers, of thrusting a plucked fowl into the crowd of eagerly listening students, with the words: "Here is Plato's man!"

Nature, however, is a liberal mistress; she gives not only the means of motion, but teaches her children also to use them with success and safety. Her spider spins without the distaff; her bee builds without a rule; and her tailor-bird sews without a needle. Thus she teaches us all to place, standing or walking, the centre of gravity so that it not only secures the safety of our movements, but also enables us to concentrate the whole power of our body upon one point. Hence heart and stomach lie always near the centre, sometimes before, sometimes behind it, but invariably more toward the front, because head and neck are too light in comparison with the lower limbs. For the sake of greater security some animals have regular balancing-poles, with which they regulate all possible defects and protect themselves in emergencies. The fish has fins below and at the sides, which allow him to glide swiftly and safely through the waters, or to bask in the warm sunlight, calmly suspended in his transparent home. Is he benumbed or dead? these fins cease to be active, and he turns immediately with his belly upward. Deprive him of either fin, and his motion becomes uncertain—he reels, as if drunken, from side to side. Mussels and snails have air-chambers; birds a long, flexible neck; quadrupeds, besides necks, tails, and occasionally horns, for the same purpose. Man, at last, balances himself with his arms in walking and running. It is not accident that raises the horse's bushy tail high into the air, when it races about in frisky, youthful exuberance; nor does chance teach it to bend head and neck low when it drags, slowly and painfully, heavy loads up steep mountain-sides. The squirrel is balanced and aided by his long feathery tail; and when the cat springs with fierce precision upon its unsuspecting prey, it also is guided through the air by its stiffly-extended tail. The untought boy already moves his outstretched arms instinctively up and down, as he first attempts to walk a narrow plank, or to cross a brook on a single log. The rope-dancer but adds to the length of his armady his pole, and thus walks the more safely on his perilous path.

The whole process of walking, however, is a constant balancing of the human body. Standing still, it rests upon the two column-shaped legs, so that the centre of gravity falls between the two heels. As soon as we begin to walk we transfer the body from one foot to the other, during which transfer the legs at the same time change places with each other and move forward. One leg supports the body, the other glides to its next resting-place. Slightly bent, so as not to touch the ground, it swings like a pendulum, held up by neither bone nor sinew, but merely by the pressure of the air, while the supporting leg bends likewise, and the body thus literally falls forward. But before it actually falls the swinging leg has accomplished its movement, and, resting upon the ground, it supports, in its turn, the body. In running quickly there is, therefore, a moment when the body really hangs in the air without any support whatever.

But while Nature thus furnishes means of motion with that admirable, mechanical perfection which always obtains the largest results by the smallest means, she yet leaves to the happy possessor the pure enjoyment of using them, not instinctively merely, but subject to his own will and effort. The bird may fly rapidly or slowly; he may rise, like the skylark, to the very clouds, singing joyous anthems to his Maker, or he may fall with incredible rapidity from on high, and, in an instant, hide from his enemy in the dense jungle of the prairie. The eagle soars in vast and solemn circles; the swift swallow shoots about in lively zigzags, wherever its light-winged prey may tempt it, and yet each motion requires the most accurate calculation, the most careful use of the various instruments given for such purpose. Hence, he who was wisest among men said, that among three things which were too wonderful for him—which he knew not—was the way of the eagle in the air. Look at the sea-eagle when he falls like a meteor from the bright sky upon the unlucky fishing-hawk, who moves in lines that cross his own path at right angles. How well he must measure his flight thus to catch the fish that drops from the bill of the frightened bird before it returns to its native element, and yet so to moderate his swoop that he fall not himself into the river below him! Quick as a flash of lightning darts the gorgeous humming-bird from bush to bush, and yet, in an instant, he turns and hangs in a rapture of motion upon his restless wings right over the honey-laden flower! The eye can not follow the flight of the swift through the pure air, and yet it never misses, by the width of a line, the narrow entrance to its nest, where its young await it with anxious twittering!

So it is with the tiny bubble of air that enables the fish to rise and sink at will in his element, like a beauteous, life-endowed balloon. The sidelong motion of his spine, formed like an elastic rod, which powerful muscles at the sides now draw to one and now to the other side, aided in some varieties by the paddling of the tail, propels him forward. Fins and tails balance him and steer his course, but the air in his innermost chambers alone supports him, and enables him to rise to the surface or to descend to the depths of the ocean. Commonly the fish has two of these air-bladders, which a narrow tube connects with each other. By means of powerful muscles he compresses them, and thus, increasing his weight in proportion to his bulk, he sinks; or he allows, by like means, the compressed air once more to expand his little balloon; his weight is by so much diminished, and he remains stationary, or rises to breathe the pure air of heaven. If he merely compresses the forward bladder, the fore part of his body grows heavier than the rest, and he falls headlong down to the bottom; a pressure upon the other bladder produces a sidelong or straight ascent.

But the mechanism in fishes is more complicated yet than it appears at first sight, and far surpasses that of birds in beauty and ingenuity of device. The great difficulty which it has to overcome is the enormous pressure of a mass of water at any greater depth. There the fish need no longer compress the air, because the weight of the water itself will keep him down; perhaps half way on his descent he has, therefore, again to expand the air in his bladder, if he will not suddenly strike against the hard bottom, or reach a depth from which no effort on his part would ever enable him again to rise. So, in rising, he expands the air, to grow lighter, and thus to make his way upward; but as the pressure of the water on his body diminishes at every inch he rises, he has to compress his bladder again in time, or he would, of a sudden, be hurled out of the water, high into the air, and there meet with a miserable death. Most varieties of fish are, moreover, strictly bound to a certain depth of the ocean, and neither above nor below that would they find the means of life provided for them as in their own sphere. Fishes destined to live in the upper regions, near the surface, would, at a depth of some fathoms, be as much out of their element, and as unable to support life, as a palm of the tropics in the ice-clad regions of Norway, or a northern pine in the burning desert.

Hence the importance and exquisite nicety of their airy instruments. The fish swims with a precaution and a foresight that would excite the admiration of man, were not his movements mostly hidden to our eye. As the master of the sailing vessel watches with restless eye the slightest change in the wind, and its pressure upon his towering sails, as the machinist stands vigilant by the mighty engine, ready to add fuel or to open a valve, as the aeronaut, high in the air, now pulls a string and now throws out his ballast, so the fish also uses his spine and his fins, his tail and his air-bladders, with ever-careful and ever-certain precision. That the pressure of the water itself, relaxing his muscles at one time and then again pressing upon them, compels them to act so as to produce the proper effect upon the other instruments of his wonderful mechanism, is neither, as yet, fully established, nor would it, if ascertained, in the least diminish the marvelous beauty and ingenuity of his structure.

Greater freedom in motion, as in quadrupeds, requires by no means less nicety of control—on the contrary, the freer the motion, the greater the necessity of rightly employing the mechanism. The stag and the dog calculate to an inch the width of a water across which they leap. The intelligent horse knows full well that he must hold his feet differently when he jumps over a fence and when he crosses a ditch. A careful hunter first gallops up to the brook so that the horse may measure its width with the eye and gather the force he has to employ. Even the humble cockchafer, when he wishes to rise on his wings, breathes several times to fill the air-tubes of his buoyant little body.

The birds of heaven move incessantly through their wide, unlimited realm. Have not some kinds of gull been suspected of never resting, though they sleep on the heaving ocean? and do not mariners in our day still believe that they breed in the air and carry their young on their wings, until they can fly without aid? Hence their whole structure is made to answer that one, main purpose. However varied their mode of life may be, whether they be blood-thirsty birds of prey or defenseless idyllic songsters, whether they restlessly climb up the rough bark of trees or swim in majestic repose on the calm waters, every thing that flies under heaven is made after the same great type. The gigantic wings of the condor, that bear him, though laden with heavy prey, swiftly to the snow-capped mountain top, and those of the dwarf humming bird, whom many a moth surpasses in size, are still alike in form and texture.

Large or small, their powerful motion requires powerful instruments, and we find, therefore, that their breast-bone has a higher comb than all other animals, to support the unusually strong sinews of their arms. Birds that fly but little, have a low comb. Eagles and falcons have the largest, for their flight is the strongest. The ostrich is almost without one, for he is a swift runner in the desert; he outstrips with ease the fleetest courser, and "scorneth the horse and the rider"—but he flies not. Other-wise birds are, as they needs must be to live in thin transparent air, the lightest of all beings. There are large hollows in their bones, which little tubes from the lungs supply at will with air; there are vacant spaces in their skin and even in the quills of their feathers. To lighten their head, it also has wide, empty chambers in skull and bill, and is, moreover, not encumbered with heavy teeth. To replace their agency, it is well known birds have a gizzard, which lies near the centre of gravity. The bill serves merely to seize the grain, the gizzard grinds it with its hard, rough plains as between millstones, and thus prepares it for final digestion. The spine of birds is firm and inflexible, grown together into one piece, so that it may serve to direct, during flight, the whole light body, which the neck balances carefully in the air. The bird steers mainly by the long, stiff feathers of his tail, a duty which is, in some varieties, performed by their long, outstretched legs. The latter serve, thus, two great purposes: they enable the bird to wade in his own peculiar dominion, swamps and estuaries, and in his flight to supply the want of an inconvenient tail, and to furnish, here as in grasshoppers, the needed rudder. Without such means the bird would be at the mercy of every wind of heaven, and hence, where they are not needed for aerial flight, as in the peacock and domestic fowls, they serve only as a glorious, but useless and cumbersome ornament.

Far simpler and much freer is the walking of quadrupeds, because they always rest the weight of their body on two supports, standing, at least, upon alternate feet. But when they trot, their motion resembles much more that of man. It is, with them also, a constant falling forward, which, however, the quickly-advanced foot each time prevents at the right moment. The swift racer rests, thus, only upon two toes; the running dog upon the middle part of his foot. What art and what skill would it require to invent a machine, with its countless bands and wheels, levers and gearings, that should move this year after year without ever losing its balance!

But the foot of man is after all the wonder of wonders. Destined to support the huge column of the human body, crowned, like the graceful palm-tree, with its well-formed head, and at the same time to move it from place to place, it is one of the most perfect mechanisms in nature, that reveal to us the wondrous wisdom of our Maker. But it corresponds, not the less, with the spiritual character of man. Inferior in many a point to the foot of despised insects, not unlike, and as many think even less well endowed than that of the ape, it has a form and a power of its own, as it becomes the foot of man, made after the image of God. Its shape is peculiar, among all things created, to man only. While he has the hand in common with others, the foot is the distinguishing feature in the structure of the human body. By the close connection of the toes, by the arch-like junction of the middle bones, and the unusual arrangement of the ankle-joint, man alone is enabled to support the whole weight of his massive body on so small a space, to stand upright and to walk upright.

The human foot has the character of humanity in form, outline, and power. It is full of beauty; well rounded, built in unsurpassed symmetry, free and graceful in its motions, so that the beautiful form, and the smooth white skin, with its fine bluish veins, hide and make us forget its mechanical perfection. There is no column on earth so gloriously shaped as that for which it serves as pedestal. A glance at the square, hard, and angular foot of even the highest among animals, reveals in an instant its vast superiority. Even the sole of the foot is soft and well rounded. There are no sharp edges here, no salient angles. The instep—that fabled mark of lofty lineage, which the Arab even now measures with practiced eye, to read in it the stranger's claim to noble blood—forms a gentle, swelling arch, above and below displaying lines of greater beauty than human mind has ever conceived.

The free, unfettered foot of Eastern nations, shows the surprising agility of which the toes are capable. What in more civilized lands the unfortunate cripple only is painfully compelled to learn, in the Orient numbers acquire freely from early childhood. The East Indian calls them with truth his toe-fingers. With them the tailor twists his thread, and the cook holds his knife, while his hands are employed above. In many a branch of mechanics all artisans use them, even for tasks apparently hopeless—as the picking up of a pin and the threading of a needle.

But even hid in coverings, thick and clumsy, the whole bearing of the foot still preserves an air as if it possessed a life and a will of its own. No animal can move it so gracefully, none can vary walk and carriage as man does even when acting, untaught and untutored, merely from instinct. All gaits of animals are alike. One cat steps and leaps like another; its movements show but, over and over again, the vile nature of its kind—full of sly cunning and fierce malignity. But every man has a walk of his own. The Indian tells, with never-failing accuracy, even in the faintest imprint, the footstep of the white from that of the red man. The hunter in the far West reads in your track your age, your occupation, and your temper. The European walks not like the American, the Northerner not like the son of the South. "A wicked man speakeeth with his feet," says Solomon. For the shape of the foot and the nature of the walk speak the more loudly and safely of character and mode of life, as man is unconscious of being betrayed, and careful and skillful, perhaps, to say in word, gesture, and expression, only what he wishes us to know, he forgets the safer and clearer witness beneath him.

We know that to uncover one's feet is a sign of reverence and adoration all over the East. The faithful believer in the Prophet bares his feet, and not his head, as he enters the house of God, for he thinks of Moses, who put off his shoes, because the place where he stood was holy ground. But why did the Lord order Ezekiel to cover his feet, and thus "to make no mourning for the dead?" Surely we are fearfully and wonderfully made; and marvelous are God's works, and that our soul knows full well.

THE NEWCOMES.*

MEMOIRS OF A MOST RESPECTABLE FAMILY.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER LV.

BARNES'S SKELETON CLOSET.

THE demise of Lady Kew of course put a stop to a while to the matrimonial projects so interesting to the house of Newcome. Hymen blew his torch out, put it into the cupboard for use on a future day, and exchanged his garish saffron-colored robe for decent temporary mourning. Charles Honeyman improved the occasion at Lady Whittlesea's chapel hard by; and "Death at the Festival" was one of his most thrilling sermons; reprinted at the request of some of the congregation. There were those of his flock, especially a pair whose quarter of the fold was the organ-loft, who were always charmed with the piping of that melodious pastor.

Shall we too, while the coffin yet rests on the outer earth's surface, enter the chapel whither these void remains of our dear sister departed are borne by the smug undertaker's gentlemen, and pronounce an elegy over that bedizened box of corruption? When the young are stricken down, and their roses nipped in an hour by the destroying blight, even the stranger can sympathize, who counts the scant years on the gravestone, or reads the notice in the newspaper corner. The contrast forces itself on you. A fair young creature, bright and blooming yesterday, distributing smiles, levying homage, inspiring desire, conscious of her power to charm, and gay with the natural enjoyment of her conquests—who in his walk through the world, has not looked on many such a one; and, at the notion of her sudden call away from beauty, triumph, pleasure; her helpless outcries during her short pain; her vain pleas for a little respite; her sentence, and its execution; has not felt a shock of pity? When the days of a long life come to its close, and a white head sinks to rise no more, we bow our own with respect as the mourning train passes, and salute the heraldry and devices of yonder pomp, as symbols of age, wisdom, deserved respect, and merited honor; long experience of suffering and action. The wealth he may have achieved is the harvest which he sowed; the titles on his hearse, fruits of the field he bravely and laboriously wrought in. But to live to fourscore years, and be found dancing among the idle virgins! to have had near a century of allotted time, and then be called away from the giddy notes of a Mayfair fiddle! To have to yield your roses too, and then drop out of the bony clutch of your old fingers a wreath that came from a Parisian band-box! One fancies around some graves unseen troops of mourners waiting; many and many a poor pensioner trooping to the place; many weeping charities; many kind actions; many dear friends beloved and deplored, rising up at the toll of that bell to follow the honored hearse; dead parents waiting above, and calling, "Come, daughter!" lost children, heaven's foundlings, hovering round like cherubim, and whispering, "Welcome, mother!" Here is one who reposes after a long feast where no love has been; after girlhood without kindly maternal nurture; marriage without affection; matronhood without its precious griefs and joys; after fourscore years of lonely vanity. Let us us take off our hats to that procession too as it passes, admiring the different lots awarded to the children of men, and the various usages to which Heaven puts its creatures.

Leave ye yonder velvet-palled box, spangled with fantastic heraldry, and containing within the aged slough and envelope of a soul gone to render its account. Look rather at the living audience standing round the shell; the deep grief on Barnes Newcome's fine countenance; the sadness depicted in the face of the most noble the Marquis of Farintosh; the sympathy of her ladyship's medical man (who came in the third mourning carriage); better than these, the awe, and reverence, and emotion, exhibited in the kind face of one of the witnesses of this scene, as he listens to those words which the priest rehearses over our dead. What magnificent words! what a burning faith, what a glorious triumph; what a heroic life, death, hope, they record! They are read over all of us alike; as the sun shines on just and unjust. We have all of us heard them; and I have fancied for my part, that they fell and smote like the sods on the coffin.

The ceremony over, the undertaker's gentlemen clamber on the roof of the vacant hearse, into which palls, tressels, trays of feathers, are inserted, and the horses break out into a trot, and the empty carriages, expressing the deep grief of the deceased lady's friends, depart homeward. It is remarked that Lord Kew hardly has any communication with his cousin, Sir Barnes Newcome. His lordship jumps into a cab, and goes to the railroad. Issuing from the cemetery, the Marquis of Farintosh hastily orders that thing to be taken off his hat, and returns to town in his brougham, smoking a cigar. Sir Barnes Newcome rides in the brougham beside Lord Farintosh as far as Oxford Street, where he gets a cab, and goes to the City. For business is business, and must be attended to, though grief be ever so severe.

A very short time previous to her demise, Mr. Rood (that was Mr. Rood—that other little gentleman in black, who shared the third mourning coach along with her ladyship's medical man) had executed a will by which almost all the Countess's property was devised to her granddaughter, Ethel Newcome. Lady Kew's decease of course delayed the marriage projects for a while. The young heiress returned to her mother's house in Park Lane. I daresay the deep mourning habiliments in which the domestic of that establishment appeared, were purchased out of the funds left in his hands, which Ethel's banker and brother had at her disposal.

Sir Barnes Newcome, who was one of the trustees of his sister's property, grumbled no doubt because his grandmother had bequeathed to him but a paltry recompense of five hundred pounds for his pains and trouble of trusteeship; but his manner to Ethel was extremely bland and respectful: an heiress now, and to be marriageable in a few months, Sir Barnes treated her with a very different regard to that which he was accustomed to show to other members of his family. For while this worthy baronet would contradict his mother at every word she uttered, and take no pains to disguise his opinion that Lady Ann's intellect was of the very poorest order, he would listen deferentially to Ethel's smallest observations, exert himself to amuse her under her grief, which he chose to take for granted was very severe, visit her constantly, and show the most charming solicitude for her general comfort and welfare.

During this time my wife received constant notes from Ethel Newcome, and the intimacy between the two ladies much increased. Laura was so unlike the women of Ethel's circle, the young lady was pleased to say, that to be with her was Ethel's greatest comfort. Miss Newcome was now her own mistress, had her carriage, and would drive day after day to our cottage at Richmond. The frigid society of Lord Farintosh's sisters, the conversation of his mother, did not amuse Ethel, and she escaped from both with her usual impatience of control. She was at home every day dutifully to receive my Lord's visits, but though she did not open her mind to Laura as freely regarding the young gentleman as she did when the character and disposition of her future mother and sisters-in-law was the subject of their talk, I could see, from the grave look of commiseration which my wife's face bore after her young friend's visits, that Mrs. Pendennis augured rather ill of the future happiness of this betrothed pair. Once, at Miss Newcome's special request, I took my wife to see her in Park Lane, where the Marquis of Farintosh found us. His Lordship and I had already a half acquaintance, which was not, however, improved after my regular presentation to him by Miss Newcome: he scowled at me with a countenance indicative of anything but welcome, and did not seem in the least more pleased when Ethel entreated her friend Laura not to take her bonnet, not to think of going away so soon. She came to see us the very next day, staid much longer with us than usual, and returned to town quite late in the evening, in spite of the entreaties of the inhospitable Laura, who would have had her leave us long before. "I am sure," says clear-sighted Mrs. Laura, "she is come out of bravado, and after we went away yesterday that there were words between her and Lord Farintosh on our account."

"Confound the young man," breaks out Mr. Pendennis in a fume; "what does he mean by his insolent airs?"

"He may think we are partisans de l'autre," says Mrs. Pendennis, with a smile first, and a sigh afterward, as she said "poor Clive!"

"Do you ever talk about Clive?" asks the husband.

"Never. Once, twice perhaps, in the most natural manner in the world, we mentioned where he is; but nothing further passes. The subject is a sealed one between us. She often looks at his drawings in my album (Clive had drawn our baby there and its mother in a great variety of attitudes), and gazes at his sketch of his dear old father: but of him she never says a word."

"So it is best," says Mr. Pendennis.

"Yes—best," echoes Laura with a sigh.

"You think, Laura," continues the husband,

"You think she—"

"She what?" What did Mr. Pendennis mean? Laura his wife certainly understood him, though upon my conscience the sentence went no further—for she answered at once.

"Yes—I think she certainly did, poor boy. But that, of course, is over now: and Ethel, though she can not help being a worldly woman, has such firmness and resolution of character, that if she has once determined to conquer any inclination of that sort I am sure she will master it, and make Lord Farintosh a very good wife."

"Since the Colonel's quarrel with Sir Barnes," cries Mr. Pendennis, adverting by a natural transition from Ethel to her amiable brother, "our banking friend does not invite us any more: Lady Clara sends you no cards. I have a great mind to withdraw my account."

Laura, who understands nothing about accounts, did not perceive the fine irony of this remark; but her face straightway put on the severe expression which it chose to assume whenever Sir Barnes's family was mentioned, and she said, "My dear Arthur, I am very glad indeed that Lady Clara sends us no more of her invitations. You know very well why I disliked them."

"Why?"

"I hear baby crying," says Laura. O Laura, Laura! how could you tell your husband such a fib?—and she quits the room without deigning to give any answer to that "Why."

Let us pay a brief visit to Newcome in the North of England, and there we may get some answer to the question of which Mr. Pendennis had just in vain asked a reply from his wife. My design does not include a description of that great and flourishing town of Newcome, and of the manufactures which caused its prosperity; but only admits of the introduction of those Newcomites who are concerned in the affairs of the family which has given its respectable name to these volumes.

Thus in previous pages we have said nothing about the Mayor and Corporation of Newcome, the magnificent bankers and manufacturers who had their places of business in the town, and their splendid villas outside its smoky precincts; people who would give their thousand guineas for a picture or a statue, and write you off a check for ten times the amount any day; people who, if there was talk of a statue to the Queen or the Duke, would come down to the Town All and subscribe their one, two, three undred apiece (especially if in the neighboring city of Stowcome they were putting up a statue to the Duke or the Queen)—not of such men have I spoken, the magnates of the place; but of the humble Sarah Mason in Jubilee Row—of the Reverend Dr. Bulders the vicar, Mr. Vidler the apothecary, Mr. Puff the baker—of Tom Potts the jolly reporter of the "Newcome Independent," and — Batters, Esq., the proprietor of that journal—persons with whom our friends have had already, or will be found presently to have, some connection. And it is from these that we shall arrive at some particulars regarding the Newcome family, which will show us that they have a skeleton or two in their closets, as well as their neighbors.

Now, how will you have the story? Worthy mammas of families—if you do not like to have your daughters told that bad husbands will make bad wives; that marriages begun in indifference make homes unhappy; that men whom girls are brought to swear to love and honor, are sometimes false, selfish, and cruel, and that women forget the oaths which they have been made to swear—if you will not hear of this, ladies, close the book, and send for some other. Banish the newspaper out of your houses, and shut your eyes to the truth, the awful truth, of life and sin. Is the world made of Jennies and Jessamies, and passion the play of school-boys and school-girls, scribbling valentines and interchanging lollipops? Is life all over when Jenny and Jessamy are married; and are there no subsequent trials, griefs, wars, bitter heart-pangs, dreadful temptations, defeats, remorsees, sufferings to bear, and dangers to overcome? As you and I, friend, kneel with our children round about us, prostrate before the Father of us all, and asking mercy for miserable sinners, are the young ones to suppose the words are mere form, and don't apply to us?—to some outcasts in the free seats probably, or those naughty boys playing in the church-yard? Are they not to know that we err too, and pray with all our hearts to be rescued from temptation? If such a knowledge is wrong for them, send them to church apart. Go you and worship in private; or if not too proud, kneel humbly in the midst of them, owning your wrong, and praying Heaven to be merciful to you a sinner.

When Barnes Newcome became the reigning Prince of the Newcome family, and after the first agonies of grief for his father's death had subsided, he made strong attempts to conciliate the principal persons in the neighborhood, and to render himself popular in the borough. He gave handsome entertainments to the townfolk and to the country gentry; he tried even to bring those two warring classes together. He endeavored to be civil to the "Newcome Independent," the Opposition paper, as well as to the "Newcome Sentinel," that true old Uncompromising Blue. He asked the dissenting clergyman to dinner, and the Low Church clergyman, as well as the orthodox Doctor Bulders and his curates. He gave a lecture at the Newcome Athenæum, which every body said was very amusing, and which "Sentinel" and "Independent" both agreed in praising. Of course he subscribed to that statue which the Newcomites were raising; to the philanthropic missions which the Reverend Low Church gentlemen were engaged in; to the races (for the young Newcomeite manufacturers are as sporting gents as any in the North), to the hospital, the People's Library, the restoration of the rood screen, and the great painted window in Newcome Old Church (Rev. J. Bulders), and he had to pay in fine a most awful price for his privilege of sitting in Parliament as representative of his native place—as he called it in his speeches "the cradle of his forefathers, the home of his race," etc., though Barnes was in fact born at Clapham.

Lady Clara could not in the least help this young statesman in his designs upon Newcome and the Newcomites. After she came into Barnes's hands, a dreadful weight fell upon her. She would smile and simper, and talk kindly and gayly enough at first, during Sir Brian's life; and among women, when Barnes was not present. But as soon as he joined the company, it was remarked that his wife became silent, and looked eagerly toward him whenever she ventured to speak. She blundered, her eyes filled with tears; the little wit she had left her in her husband's presence: he grew angry, and tried to hide his anger with a sneer, or broke out with a gibe and an oath, when he lost patience, and Clara, whimpering, would leave the room. Every body at Newcome knew that Barnes bullied his wife.

People had worse charges against Barnes than wife-bullying. Do you suppose that little interruption which occurred at Barnes's marriage was not known in Newcome? His victim had been a Newcome girl, the man to whom she was betrothed was in a Newcome factory. When Barnes was a young man, and in his occasional visits to Newcome, lived along with those dashing young blades Sam Jollyman (Jollyman, Brothers, and Bowcher), Bob Homer, Cross Country Bill, Al. Rucker (for whom his father had to pay eighteen thousand pounds after the Leger, the year Toggerly won it), and that wild lot, all sorts of stories were told of them, and of Barnes especially. Most of them were settled, and steady business men by this time. Al. it was known had become very serious, besides making his fortune in cotton. Bob Homer managed the Bank; and as for S. Jollyman, Mrs. S. J. took uncommon good care that he didn't break out of bounds any more; why, he was not even allowed to play a game at billiards, or to dine out without her. . . . I could go on giving you interesting particulars of a hundred members of the Newcome aristocracy, were not our attention especially directed to one respectable family.

All Barnes's endeavors at popularity were vain, partly from his own fault, and partly from the nature of mankind, and of the Newcome folks especially, whom no single person could possibly conciliate. Thus, suppose he gave the advertisements to the "Independent;" the old Blue paper, the "Sentinel," was very angry: suppose he asked Mr. Hunch, the dissenting minister, to bless the table-cloth after dinner, as he had begged Doctor Bulders to utter a benediction on the first course; Hunch and Bulders were both angry. He subscribed to the races—what heathenism! to the missionaries—what sanctimonious humbug! And the worst was that Barnes being young at that time, and not able to keep his tongue in order, could not help saying not to but of such and such a man, that he was an infernal ass, or a confounded old idiot, and so forth—peevish phrases, which undid in a moment the works of a dozen dinners, countless compliments, and months of grinning good-humor.

Now he is wiser. He is very proud of being Newcome of Newcome, and quite believes that the place is his hereditary principality. But still, he says, his father was a fool for ever representing the borough. "Dammy, Sir," cries Sir Barnes, "never sit for a place that lies at your park-gates, and above all never try to conciliate 'em. Curse 'em! Hate 'em well, Sir. Take a line, and flog the fellows on the other side. Since I have sate in Parliament for another place, I have saved myself I don't know how much a year. I never go to High Church or Low; don't give a shillin' to the confounded races, or the infernal soup-tickets, or to the miserable missionaries; and at last live in quiet."

So, in spite of all his subscriptions, and his coaxing of the various orders of Newcomites, Sir Barnes Newcome was not popular among them; and while he had enemies on all sides, had sturdy friends not even on his own. Scarce a man but felt Barnes was laughing at him; Bulders, in his pulpit, Holder, who seconded him in his election, the Newcome society, and the ladies, even more than the men, were uneasy under his ominous familiarity, and recovered their good-humor when he left them. People felt as if it was a truce only, and not an alliance with him, and always speculated on the possibility of war: when he turned his back on them in the market, men felt relieved, and, as they passed his gate, looked with no friendly glances over his park wall.

What happened within was perfectly familiar to many persons. Our friend was insolent to all his servants; and of course very well served, but very much disliked in consequence. The butler was familiar with Taplow—the house-keeper had a friend at Newcome; Mrs. Taplow, in fact, of the King's Arms—one of the grooms at Newcome Park kept company with Mrs. Bulder's maid: the incomings and outgoings, the quarrels and tears, the company from London, and all the doings of the folks at Newcome Park were thus known to the neighborhood round about. The apothecary brought an awful story back from Newcome. He had been called to Lady Clara in strong hysterical fits. He found her ladyship with a bruise on her face. When Sir Barnes approached her (he would not allow the medical man to see her except in his presence) she screamed, and bade him not come near her. These things did Mr. Vidler weakly impart to Mrs. Vidler: these, under solemn vows of secrecy, Mrs. Vidler told to one or two friends. Sir Barnes and Lady Clara were seen shopping together very graciously in Newcome a short time afterward; persons who dined at the Park said the Baronet and his wife seemed on very good terms; but—but that story of the bruised cheek remained in the minds of certain people, and lay by at common interest as such stories will.

Now, say people quarrel and make it up; or don't make it up, but wear a smirking face to society, and call each other "my dear" and "my love," and smooth over their countenances before John, who enters with the coals as they are barking and biting, or who announces the dinner as they are tearing each other's eyes out? Suppose a woman is ever so miserable, and yet smiles, and doesn't show her grief? "Quite right," say her prudent friends, and her husband's relations above all. "My dear, you have too much propriety to exhibit your grief before the world, or above all before the darling children." So to lie is your duty, to lie to your friends, to yourself if you can, to your children.

Does this discipline of hypocrisy improve any mortal woman? Say she learns to smile after a blow, do you suppose in this matter alone she will be a hypocrite? Poor Lady Clara! I fancy a better lot for you than that to which fate handed you over. I fancy there need have been no deceit in your fond simple little heart, could it but have been given into other keeping. But you were consigned to a master, whose scorn and cruelty terrified you; under whose sardonic glances your scared eyes were afraid to look up, and before whose gloomy coldness you dared not be happy. Suppose a little plant, very frail and delicate from the first, but that might have bloomed sweetly and borne fair flowers, had it received warm shelter and kindly nurture; suppose a young creature taken out of her home, and given over to a hard master whose caresses are as insulting as his neglect; consigned to cruel usage; to weary loneliness; to bitter, bitter recollections of the past; suppose her schooled into hypocrisy by tyranny—and then, quick, let us hire an advocate to roar out to a British jury the wrongs of her injured husband, to paint the agonies of his bleeding heart (if Mr. Advocate gets plaintiff's brief in time, and before defendant's attorney has retained him), and to show Society injured through him. Let us console that martyr, I say, with thumping damages; and as for the woman—the guilty wretch!—let us lead her out and stone her.

CHAPTER LVI.

ROSA QUO LOCORUM SERA MORATUR.

CLIVE NEWCOME bore his defeat with such a courage and resolution, as those who knew the young fellow's character were sure he would display. It was while he had a little lingering hope still that the poor lad was in the worst condition; as a gambler is restless and unhappy while his last few guineas remain with him, and he is venturing them against the overpowering chances of the bank. His last piece, however, gone, our friend rises up from that unlucky table—beaten at the contest but not broken in spirit. He goes back into the world again and withdraws from that dangerous excitement; sometimes when he is alone or wakeful, tossing in his bed at nights, he may recall the fatal game, and think how he might have won it—think what a fool he was ever to have played it at all—but these cogitations Clive kept for himself. He was magnanimous enough not even to blame Ethel much, and to take her side against his father, who it must be confessed now exhibited a violent hostility against that young lady and her belongings. Slow to anger and utterly beyond deceit himself, when Thomas Newcome was once roused, or at length believed that he was cheated, woe to the offender! From that day forth, Thomas believed no good of him. Every thought or action of his enemy's life seemed treason to the worthy Colonel. If Barnes gave a dinner-party, his uncle was ready to fancy that the banker wanted to poison somebody; if he made a little speech in the House of Commons (Barnes did make little speeches in the House of Commons), the Colonel was sure some infernal conspiracy lay under the villain's words. The whole of that branch of the Newcomes fared little better at their kinsman's hands—they were all deceitful, sordid, heartless, worldly: Ethel herself no better now than the people who had bred her up. People hate, as they love, unreasonably. Whether it is the more mortifying to us, to feel that we are disliked or liked undeservedly?

Clive was not easy until he had the sea between him and his misfortune; and now Thomas Newcome had the chance of making that tour with his son, which in early days had been such a favorite project with the good man. They traveled Rhineland and Switzerland together—they crossed into Italy—went from Milan to Venice (where Clive saluted the greatest painting in the world—the glorious "Assumption" of Titian)—they went to Trieste, and over the beautiful Styrian Alps to Vienna—they beheld the Danube, and the plain where the Turk and Sobieski fought. They traveled at a prodigious fast pace. They did not speak much to one another. They were a pattern pair of English travelers. I daresay many persons whom they met smiled to observe them; and shrugged their shoulders at the aspect of ces Anglais. They did not know the care in the young traveler's mind; and the deep tenderness and solicitude of the elder. Clive wrote to say it was a very pleasant tour, but I think I should not have liked to join it. Let us dismiss it in this single sentence. Other gentlemen have taken the same journey, and with sorrow perhaps as their silent fellow-traveler. How you remember the places afterward, and the thoughts which pursued you! If in after days, when your grief is dead and buried, you revisit the scenes in which it was your companion, how its ghost rises and shows itself again! Suppose this part of Mr. Clive's life were to be described at length in several chapters, and not in a single brief sentence, what dreary pages they would be! In two or three months our friends saw a number of men, cities, mountains, rivers, and what not. It was yet early autumn when they were back in France again, and September found them at Brussels, where James Binnie, Esq., and his family were established in comfortable quarters, and where we may be sure Clive and his father were very welcome.

Dragged abroad at first sorely against his will, James Binnie had found the continental life pretty much to his liking. He had passed a winter at Pau, a summer at Vichy, where the waters had done him good. His ladies had made several charming foreign acquaintances. Mrs. Mackenzie had quite a list of Counts and Marchionesses among her friends. The excellent Captain Goby wandered about the country with them. Was it to Rosey, was it to her mother, the Captain was most attached? Rosey received him as a god-papa; Mrs. Mackenzie as a wicked, odious, good-for-nothing, dangerous, delightful creature. Is it humiliating, is it consolatory, to remark, with what small wit some of our friends are amused? The jovial sallies of Goby appeared exquisite to Rosey's mother, and to the girl probably; though that young Bahawder of a Clive Newcome chose to wear a grave face (confound his insolent airs!) at the very best of the Goby jokes.

In Goby's train was his fervent admirer and inseparable young friend, Clarence Hoby. Captain Hoby and Captain Goby traveled the world together, visited Hombourg and Baden, Cheltenham and Leamington, Paris and Brussels, in company, belonged to the same club in London—the centre of all pleasure, fashion, and joy, for the young officer and the older campaigner. The jokes at the Flag, the dinners at the Flag, the committee of the Flag, were the theme of their constant conversation. Goby fifty years old, unattached, and with dyed mustaches, was the affable comrade of the youngest member of his club: when absent, a friend wrote him the last riddle from the smoking-room; when present, his knowledge of horses, of cookery, wines, and cigars, and military history, rendered him a most acceptable companion. He knew the history and achievements of every regiment in the army; of every general and commanding officer. He was known to have been "out" more than once himself, and had made up a hundred quarrels. He was certainly not a man of an ascetic life or a profound intellectual culture; but though poor, he was known to be most honorable; though more than middle-aged he was cheerful, busy, and kindly; and though the youngsters called him Old Goby, he bore his years very gayly and handsomely, and I daresay numbers of ladies besides Mrs. Mackenzie thought him delightful. Goby's talk and rattle perhaps somewhat bored James Binnie, but Thomas Newcome found the Captain excellent company; and Goby did justice to the good qualities of the Colonel.

Clive's father liked Brussels very well. He and his son occupied very handsome quarters, near the spacious apartments in the Park which James Binnie's family inhabited. Waterloo was not far off, to which the Indian officer paid several visits with Captain Goby for a guide; and many of Marlborough's battle-fields were near, in which Goby certainly took but a minor interest—but, on the other hand, Clive beheld these with the greatest pleasure, and painted more than one dashing piece, in which Churchill and Eugene, Cutts and Cadogan, were the heroes; whose flowing periwigs, huge boots, and thundering Flemish chargers were, he thought, more novel and picturesque than the Duke's surtout, and the French Grenadiers' hairy caps, which so many English and French artists have portrayed.

Mr. and Mrs. Pendennis were invited by our kind Colonel to pass a month—six months if they chose—at Brussels, and were most splendidly entertained by our friends in that city. A suite of handsome rooms was set apart for us. My study communicated with Clive's atelier. Many an hour did we pass, and many a ride and walk did we take together. I observed that Clive never mentioned Miss Newcome's name, and Laura and I agreed that it was as well not to recall it. Only once, when we read the death of Lady Glenlivat, Lord Farintosh's mother, in the newspaper, I remember to have said, "I suppose that marriage will be put off again."

"Qu'est ce que cela me fait?" says Mr. Clive, gloomily, over his picture—a cheerful piece representing Count Egmont going to execution; in which I have the honor to figure as a halberdier, Captain Hoby as the Count, and Captain Goby as the Duke of Alva, looking out of window.

Mrs. Mackenzie was in a state of great happiness and glory during this winter. She had a carriage and worked that vehicle most indefatigably. She knew a great deal of good company at Brussels. She had an evening for receiving. She herself went to countless evening parties, and had the joy of being invited to a couple of court balls, at which I am bound to say her daughter and herself both looked very handsome. The Colonel brushed up his old uniform and attended these entertainments. M. Newcome fils, as I should judge, was not the worst-looking man in the room; and, as these young people waltzed together (in which accomplishment Clive was very much more skillful than Captain Goby), I daresay many people thought he and Rosey made a pretty couple.

Most persons, my wife included, difficult as that lady is to please, were pleased with the pretty little Rosey. She sang charmingly now, and looked so while singing. If her mother would but have omitted that chorus, which she cackled perseveringly behind her daughter's pretty back; about Rosey's angelic temper; about the compliments Signor Polonini paid her; about Sir Horace Dash, our minister, insisting upon her singing Batti Batti over again, and the Archduke clapping his hands and saying, "Oh, yes!" about Count Vander-slaapen's attentions to her, etc., etc.; but for these constant remarks of Mrs. Mack's, I am sure no one would have been better pleased with Miss Rosey's singing and behavior than myself. As for Captain Hoby, it was easy to see how he was affected toward Miss Rosalind's music and person.

And, indeed, few things could be pleasanter than to watch the behavior of this pretty little maid with her Uncle James and his old chum the Colonel. The latter was soon as fond of her as James Binnie himself, whose face used to lighten with pleasure whenever it turned toward hers. She seemed to divine his wants, as she would trip across the room to fulfill them. She skipped into the carriage and covered his feet with a shawl. James was lazy and chilly now, when he took his drive. She sat opposite to him and smiled on him; and, if he dozed, quick, another handkerchief was round his neck. I do not know whether she understood his jokes, but she saluted them always with a sweet kind smile. How she kissed him, and how delighted she was if he bought her a bouquet for her ball that night! One day, upon occasion of one of these balls, James and Thomas, those two old boys, absolutely came into Mrs. Mackenzie's drawing-room with a bouquet apiece for Miss Rosey; and there was a fine laughing.

"Oh, you little Susanna!" says James, after taking his usual payment; "now go and pay t'other elder." Rosey did not quite understand at first, being, you see, more ready to laugh at jokes than to comprehend them; but when she did, I promise you she looked uncommonly pretty as she advanced to Colonel Newcome and put that pretty fresh cheek of hers up to his grizzled mustache.

"I protest I don't know which of you blushes the most," chuckles James Binnie—and the truth is, the old man and the young girl had both hung out those signals of amiable distress.

On this day, and as Miss Rosey was to be overpowered by flowers, who should come pre-ently to dinner but Captain Hoby, with another bouquet? on which Uncle James said Rosey should go to the ball like an American Indian, with her scalps at her belt.

"Scalps!" cries Mrs. Mackenzie.

"Scalps! Oh, law, uncle!" exclaims Miss Rosey. "What can you mean by any thing so horrid?"

Goby recalls to Mrs. Mack, Hook-ee-ma-goosh, the Indian chief, whom she must have seen when the Hundred and Fiftieth were at Quebec, and who had his lodge full of them; and who used to lie about the barracks so drunk, and who used to beat his poor little European wife: and presently Mr. Clive Newcome joins this company, when the chirping, tittering, joking, laughing, cease somehow.

Has Clive brought a bouquet too? No. He has never thought about a bouquet. He is dressed in black, with long hair, a long mustache, and melancholy imperial. He looks very handsome, but as glum as an undertaker. And James Binnie says, "Egad, Tom, they used to call you the knight of the woeful countenance, and Clive has just inherited the paternal mug." Then James calls out in a cheery voice, "Dinner, dinner!" and trots off with Mrs. Pendennis under his arm; Rosey nestles up against the Colonel; Goby and Mrs. Mack walk away arm-in-arm very contentedly; and I don't know with which of her three nose-gays pretty Rosey appears at the ball.

Our stay with our friends at Brussels could not be prolonged beyond a month, for at the end of that period we were under an engagement to other friends in England, who were good enough to desire the presence of Mrs. Pendennis and her suite of baby, nurse, and husband. So we presently took leave of Rosey and the Campaigner, of the two stout elders, and our melancholy young Clive, who bore us company to Antwerp, and who won Laura's heart by the neat way in which he took her child on board ship. Poor fellow! how sad he looked as he bowed to us and took off his hat! His eyes did not seem to be looking at us, though: they and his thoughts were turned another way. He moved off immediately, with his head down, puffing his eternal cigar, and lost in his own meditations; our going or our staying was of very little importance to the lugubrious youth.

"I think it was a great pity they came to Brussels," says Laura, as we sat on the deck, while her unconscious infant was cheerful, and while the water of the lazy Scheld as yet was smooth.

"Who? The Colonel and Clive? They are very handsomely lodged. They have a good maitre-d'hotel. Their dinners, I am sure, are excellent; and your child, madam, is as healthy as it possibly can be."

"Blessed darling! Yes!" (Blessed darling crows, moos, jumps in his nurse's arms, and holds out a little mottled hand for a biscuit of Savoy, which mamma supplies.) "I can't help thinking, Arthur, that Rosey would have been much happier as Mrs. Hoby than she will be as Mrs. Newcome."

"Who thinks of her being Mrs. Newcome?"

"Her mother, her uncle, and Clive's father. Since the Colonel has been so rich, I think Mrs. Mackenzie sees a great deal of merit in Clive. Rosey will do any thing her mother bids her. If Clive can be brought to the same obedience, Uncle James and the Colonel will be delighted. Uncle James has set his heart on this marriage. (He and his sister agree upon this point.) He told me, last night, that he would sing 'Nunc dimittis,' could he but see the two children happy; and that he should lie easier in purgatory if that could be brought about."

"And what did you say, Laura?"

"I laughed, and told Uncle James I was of the Hoby faction. He is very good-natured, frank, honest, and gentlemanlike, Mr. Hoby. But Uncle James said he thought Mr. Hoby was so—well, so stupid—that his Rosey would be thrown away upon the poor Captain. So I did not tell Uncle James that, before Clive's arrival, Rosey had found Captain Hoby far from stupid. He used to sing duets with her; he used to ride with her before Clive came. Last winter, when they were at Pau, I feel certain Miss Rosey thought Captain Hoby very pleasant indeed. She thinks she was attached to Clive formerly, and now she admires him, and is dreadfully afraid of him. He is taller and handsomer, and richer and cleverer than Captain Hoby, certainly."

"I should think so, indeed!" breaks out Mr. Pendennis. "Why, my dear, Clive is as fine a fellow as one can see on a summer's day. It does one good to look at him. What a pair of frank bright blue eyes he has, or used to have, till this mishap overclouded them! What a pleasant laugh he has! What a well-built, agile figure it is—what pluck, and spirit, and honor, there is about my young chap! I don't say he is a genius of the highest order, but he is the stanchest, the bravest, the cheeriest, the most truth-telling, the kindest heart. Compare him and Hoby! Why, Clive is an eagle, and yonder little creature a mousing owl!"

"I like to hear you speak so," cries Mrs. Laura, very tenderly. "People say that you are always sneering, Arthur; but I know my husband better. We know papa better, don't we, baby?" (Here my wife kisses the infant Pendennis with great effusion, who has come up dancing on his nurse's arms.) "But," says she, coming back, and snuggling by her husband's side again—"But suppose your favorite Clive is an eagle, Arthur, don't you think he had better have an eagle for a mate? If he were to marry little Rosey, I daresay he would be very good to her; but I think neither he nor she would be very happy. My dear, she does not care for his pursuits; she does not understand him when he talks. The two captains, and Rosey and I, and the Campaigner, as you call her, laugh and talk, and prattle, and have the merriest little jokes with one another, and we all are as quiet as mice when you and Clive come in."

"What, am I an eagle too? I have no aquiline pretensions at all, Mrs. Pendennis."

"No. Well, we are not afraid of you. We are not afraid of papa, are we, darling?" this young woman now calls out to the other member of her family; who, if you will calculate, has just had time to be walked twice up and down the deck of the steamer, while Laura has been making her speech about eagles. And soon the mother, child, and attendant, descend into the lower cabins: and then dinner is announced: and Captain Jackson treats us to Champagne from his end of the table: and yet a short while, and we are at sea, and conversation becomes impossible: and morning sees us under the gray London sky, and amidst the million of masts in the Thames.

CHAPTER LVII. ROSEBURY AND NEWCOME.

THE friends to whom we were engaged in England were Florac and his wife, Madame la Princesse de Moncontour, who were determined to spend the Christmas holidays at the Princess's country-seat. It was for the first time since their reconciliation, that the Prince and Princess dispensed their hospitalities at the latter's chateau. It is situated, as the reader has already been informed, at some five miles from the town of Newcome; away from the chimneys and smoky atmosphere of that place, in a sweet country of rural woodlands; over which quiet villages, gray church spires, and ancient gabled farm-houses are scattered: still wearing the peaceful aspect which belonged to them when Newcome was as yet but an antiquated country town, before mills were erected on its river banks, and dyes and cinders blackened its stream. Twenty years since Newcome Park was the only great house in that district; now scores of fine villas have sprung up in the suburb lying between the town and park. Newcome New Town, as every body knows, has grown round the park gates, and the New Town Hotel (where the railway station is) is a splendid structure in the Tudor style, more ancient in appearance than the park itself; surrounded by little antique villas with spiked gables, stacks of crooked chimneys, and plate-glass windows looking upon trim lawns; with glistening hedges of evergreens, spotless gravel walks, and Elizabethan gighouses. Under the great railway viaduct of the New Town goes the old tranquil winding London high-road, once busy with a score of gay coaches, and ground by innumerable wheels: but at a few miles from the New Town Station, the road has become so mouldy that the grass actually grows on it; and Rosebury, Madame de Moncontour's house, stands at one end of a village-green, which is even more quiet now than it was a hundred years ago.

When first Madame de Florac bought the place, it scarcely ranked among the county houses; and she, the sister of manufacturers at Newcome and Manchester, did not of course visit the county families. A homely little body, married to a Frenchman from whom she was separated, may or may not have done a great deal of good in her village, have had pretty gardens, and won prizes at the Newcome flower and fruit shows; but, of course, she was nobody in such an aristocratic county as we all know—shire is. She had her friends and relatives from Newcome. Many of them were Quakers—many were retail shop-keepers. She even frequented the little branch Ebenezer, on Rosebury Green; and it was only by her charities and kindness at Christmas time, that the Rev. Dr. Potter, the rector at Rosebury, knew her. The old clergy, you see, live with the county families. Good little Madame de Florac was pitied and patronized by the Doctor; treated with no little superciliousness by Mrs. Potter, and the young ladies, who only kept the first society. Even when her rich brother died, and she got her share of all that money, Mrs. Potter said poor Madame de Florac did well in not trying to move out of her natural sphere (Mrs. P. was the daughter of a bankrupt hatter in London, and had herself been governess in a noble family, out of which she married Mr. P., who was private tutor). Madame de Florac did well, we say, not to endeavor to leave her natural sphere, and that The County never would receive her. Tom Potter, the rector's son, with whom I had the good fortune to be a fellow-student at Saint Boniface College, Oxbridge—a rattling, forward, and it must be owned, vulgar youth—asked me whether Florac was not a billiard-marker by profession? and was even so kind as to caution his sisters not to speak of billiards before the lady of Rosebury. Tom was surprised to learn that Monsieur Paul de Florac was a gentleman of lineage, incomparably better than that of any, except two or three families in England (including your own, my dear and respected reader, of course, if you hold to your pedigree). But the truth is, heraldically speaking, that union with the Higgs of Manchester was the first misalliance which the Florac family had made for long, long years. Not that I would wish for a moment to insinuate that any nobleman is equal to an English nobleman; say, that an English snob, with a coat of arms bought yesterday, or stolen out of Edmonton, or a pedigree purchased from a peerage maker, has not a right to look down upon any of your paltry foreign nobility.

One day the carriage-and-four came in state from Newcome Park, with the well-known chaste liveries of the Newcomes, and drove up Rosebury Green, toward the parsonage-gate, where Mrs. and the Miss Potters happened to be standing, cheapening fish from a donkey-man, with whom they were in the habit of dealing. The ladies were in their pokiest old head-gear and most dingy gowns, when they perceived the carriage approaching; and considering, of course, that the visit of the Park People was intended for them, dashed into the rectory to change their clothes, leaving Rowkins, the costermonger, in the very midst of the negotiation about the three mackerel. Mamma got that new bonnet out of the band-box; Lizzy and Liddy skipped up to their bed-room, and brought out those dresses which they wore at the déjeuner at the Newcome Athenaeum, when Lord Leveret came down to lecture; into which they no sooner had hooked their lovely shoulders, than they reflected with terror that mamma had been altering one of papa's flannel waistcoats and had left it in the drawing-room, when they were called out by the song of Rowkins, and the appearance of his donkey's ears over the green gate of the rectory. To think of the Park People coming, and the drawing-room in that dreadful state!

But when they came down stairs the Park People were not in the room—the woolen garment was still on the table (how they plunged it into the chiffonier!)—and the only visitor was Rowkins, the costermonger, grinning at the open French windows, with the three mackerel, and crying, "Make it sixpence, Miss—don't say fip-pens, Ma'am, to a pore fellow that has a wife and family." So that the young ladies had to cry—"Impudence!" "Get away you vulgar, insolent creature!—Go round, Sir, to the back door." "How dare you?" and the like; fearing lest Lady Ann Newcome, and young Ethel, and Barnes should enter in the midst of this ignoble controversy.

They never came at all—those Park People. How very odd! They passed the rectory-gate; they drove on to Madame de Florac's lodge. They went in. They staid for half-an-hour; the horses driving round and round the gravel-road before the house; and Mrs. Potter and the girls speedily going to the upper chambers, and looking out of the room where the maids slept, saw Lady Ann, Ethel, and Barnes walking with Madame de Florac, going into the conservatories, issuing thence with MacWhirter, the gardener, bearing huge bunches of grapes and large fascies of flowers; they saw Barnes talking in the most respectful manner to Madame de Florac: and when they went down stairs and had their work before them—Liddy her gilt music-book, Lizzy her embroidered altar-cloth, Mamma her scarlet cloak for one of the old women—they had the agony of seeing the barouche over the railings whisk by, with the Park People inside, and Barnes driving the four horses.

It was on that day when Barnes had determined to take up Madame de Florac; when he was bent upon reconciling her to her husband. In spite of all Mrs. Potter's predictions, the county families did come and visit the manufacturer's daughter; and when Madame de Florac became Madame la Princesse de Moncontour, when it was announced that she was coming to stay at Rosebury for Christmas, I leave you to imagine whether the circumstance was or was not mentioned in the "Newcome Sentinel" and the Newcome Independent; and whether Rev. G. Potter, D.D., and Mrs. Potter did or did not call on the Prince and Princess. I leave you to imagine whether the lady did or did not inspect all the alterations which Vineer's people from Newcome were making at Rosebury House—the chaste yellow satin and gold of the drawing-room—the carved oak for the dining-room—the chints for the bed-rooms—the Princess's apartment—the Prince's apartment—the guests' apartments—the smoking-room, gracious goodness!—the stables (these were under Tom Potter's superintendence), “and I'm dashed,” says he one day, “if here doesn't come a billiard-table!”

The house was most comfortably and snugly appointed from top to bottom; and thus it will be seen that Mr. and Mrs. Pendennis were likely to be in very good quarters for their Christmas of 184—.

Tom Potter was so kind as to call on me two days after our arrival; and to greet me in the princess's pew at church on the previous day. Before desiring to be introduced to my wife, he requested me to present him to my friend the prince. He called him your Highness. His Highness, who had behaved with exemplary gravity, save once when he shrieked an “ah!” as Miss Liddy led off the children in the organ-loft in a hymn, and the whole pack went woe-fully out of tune, complimented Monsieur Tom on the sermon of Monsieur his father. Tom walked back with us to Rosebury Lodge gate. “Will you not come in, and make a party of billiard with me?” says his Highness. “Ah, pardon! I forgot, you do not play the billiard the Sunday!” “Any other day, Prince, I shall be delighted,” says Tom; and squeezed his Highness's hand tenderly at parting. “Your comrade of college was he?” asks Florac. “My dear, what men are these comrades of college! What men are you English! My word of honor, there are some of them here—if I were to say to them wax my boots, they would take them and wax them! Didst thou see how the Révérend eyed us during the sermon? He regarded us over his book, my word of honor!”

Madame de Florac said simply, she wished the Prince would go and hear Mr. Jacob at the Ebenezer. Mr. Potter was not a good preacher certainly.

“Savez-vous qu'elle est furieusement belle la fille du Révérend?” whispered his Highness to me. “I have made eyes at her during the sermon. They will be of pretty neighbors these Mees!” and Paul looked unutterably roguish and victorious as he spoke. To my wife, I am bound to say, Monsieur de Moncontour showed a courtesy, a respect and kindness, that could not be exceeded. He admired her. He paid her compliments innumerable, and gave me, I am sure, sincere congratulations at possessing such a treasure. I do not think he doubted about his power of conquering her, or any other of the daughters of women. But I was the friend of his misfortunes—his guest; and he spared me.

I have seen nothing more amusing, odd, and pleasant than Florac at this time of his prosperity. We arrived, as this voracious chronicle has already asserted, on a Saturday evening. We were conducted to our most comfortable apartments; with crackling fires blazing on the hearths, and every warmth of welcome. Florac expanded and beamed with good-nature. He shook me many times by the hand; he patted me; he called me his good—his brave. He cried to his maitre-d'hôtel, “Frédéric, remember Monsieur is master here! Run before his orders. Prostrate thyself to him. He was good to me in the days of my misfortune. Hearst thou, Frédéric? See that every thing be done for Monsieur Pendennis—for Madame sa charmante lady—for her angelic infant, and the bonne. None of thy garrison tricks with that young person, Frédéric! vieux scélérat. Garde toi de la, Frédéric, si non, je t'envoie à Botani Bay; je te traduis devant le Lord Maire!”

“En Angleterre je me fais Anglais, vois tu, mon ami,” continued the Prince. “Demain c'est Sunday, et tu vas voir! I hear the bell, dress thyself for the dinner—my friend!” Here there was another squeeze of both hands from the good-natured fellow. “It do good to my art to ave you in my ouse! Heuh!” He hugged his guest; he had tears in his eyes as he performed this droll, this kind embrace. Not less kind in her way, though less expansive and embrative, was Madame de Moncontour to my wife, as I found on comparing notes with that young woman, when the day's hospitalities were ended. The little Princess trotted from bed-chamber to nursery to see that every thing was made comfortable for her guests. She sate and saw the child washed and put to bed. She had never beheld such a little angel. She brought it a fine toy to play with. She and her grim old maid frightened the little creature at first, but it was very speedily reconciled to their countenances. She was in the nursery almost as early as the child's mother. “Ah!” sighed the poor little woman, “how happy you must be to have one!” In fine, my wife was quite overcome by her goodness and welcome.

Sunday morning arrived in the course of time, and then Florac appeared as the most wonderful Briton indeed! He wore top-boots and buckskins; and after breakfast, when we went to church, a white great-coat with a little cape, in which garment he felt that his similarity to an English gentleman was perfect. In conversation with his grooms and servants he swore freely—not that he was accustomed to employ oaths in his own private talk, but he thought the employment of these expletives necessary as an English country gentleman. He never dined without a roast beef, and insisted that the piece of meat should be bleeding, “as you love it, you others.” He got up boxing matches; and kept birds for combats of cock. He assumed the sporting language with admirable enthusiasm—drove over to cover with a steppère—rode across countri like a good one—was splendid in the hunting-field in his velvet cap and Napoleon boots, and made the Hunt welcome at Rosebury, where his good-natured little wife was as kind to the gentlemen in scarlet, as she used to be of old to the stout dissenting gentlemen in black, who sang hymns and spake sermons on her lawn. These folks, scared at the change which had taken place in the little Princess's habits of life, lamented her falling away: but in the county she and her husband got a great popularity, and in Newcome town itself they were not less liked, for her benefactions were unceasing, and Paul's affability the theme of all praise. The "Newcome Independent," and the "Newcome Sentinel," both paid him compliments; the former journal contrasting his behavior with that of Sir Barnes, their member. Florac's pleasure was to drive his Princess with four horses into Newcome. He called his carriage his "trappe," his "drague." The street boys cheered and hurraed the Prince as he passed through the town. One haberdasher had a yellow stock called "The Moncontour" displayed in his windows; another had a pink one marked "The Princely," and as such recommended it to the young Newcome gens.

The drague conveyed us once to the neighboring house of Newcome, whither my wife accompanied Madame de Moncontour at that lady's own request, to whom Laura very properly did not think fit to confide her antipathy for Lady Clara Newcome. Coming away from a great house, how often she and I, egotistical philosophers, thanked our fates that our own home was a small one! How long will great houses last in this world? Do not their owners now prefer a lodging at Brighton, or a little entresol on the Boulevard, to the solitary ancestral palace in a park barred round with snow? We were as glad to get out of Newcome as out of a prison. My wife and our hostess skipped into the carriage, and began to talk freely as the lodge gates closed after us. Would we be lords of such a place under the penalty of living in it? We agreed that the little angle of earth called Fair Oaks was dearer to us than the clumsy Newcome pile of Tudor masonry. The house had been fitted up in the time of George IV. and the quasi-Gothic revival. We were made to pass through Gothic dining-rooms, where there was now no hospitality—Gothic drawing-rooms shrouded in brown holland, to one little room at the end of the dusky suite, where Lady Clara sat alone, or in the company of the nurses and children. The blank gloom of the place had fallen upon the poor lady. Even when my wife talked about children (good-natured Madame de Moncontour vaunting ours as a prodigy) Lady Clara did not brighten up. Her pair of young ones was exhibited and withdrawn. A something weighed upon the woman. We talked about Ethel's marriage. She said it was fixed for the new year, she believed. She did not know whether Glenlivat had been very handsomely fitted up. She had not seen Lord Farintosh's house in London. Sir Barnes came down once—twice—of a Saturday sometimes, for three or four days to hunt, to amuse himself, as all men do, she supposed. She did not know when he was coming again. She rang languidly when we rose to take leave, and sank back on her sofa, where lay a heap of French novels. "She has chosen some pretty books," says Paul, as we drove through the sombre avenues through the gray park, mists lying about the melancholy ornamental waters, dingy herds of huddled sheep speckling the grass here and there; no smoke rising up from the great stacks of chimneys of the building we were leaving behind us, save one little feeble thread of white which we knew came from the fire by which the lonely mistress of Newcome was seated. "Ouf!" cries Florac, playing his whip, as the lodge-gates closed on us, and his team of horses rattled merrily along the road, "what a blessing it is to be out of that vault of a place! There is something fatal in this house—in this woman. One smells misfortune there."

The hotel which our friend Florac patronized on occasion of his visits to Newcome was the King's Arms, and it happened, one day, as we entered that place of entertainment in company, that a visitor of the house was issuing through the hall, to whom Florac seemed as if he would administer one of his customary embraces, and to whom the Prince called out "Jack," with great warmth and kindness as he ran toward the stranger.

Jack did not appear to be particularly well pleased on beholding us; he rather retreated from before the Frenchman's advances.

"My dear Jack, my good, my brave Ighgate! I am delighted to see you!" Florac continues, regardless of the stranger's reception, or of the landlord's looks toward us, who was bowing the Prince into his very best room.

"How do you do, Monsieur de Florac?" growls the new comer, surlily; and was for moving on after this brief salutation; but having a second thought seemingly, turned back and followed Florac into the apartment whither our host conducted us. A la bonne heure! Florac renewed his cordial greetings to Lord Highgate. "I knew not, mon bon, what fly had stung you," says he to my lord. The landlord, rubbing his hands, smirking and bowing, was anxious to know whether the Prince would take any thing after his drive. As the Prince's attendant and friend, the lustre of his reception partially illuminated me. When the chief was not by, I was treated with great attention (mingled with a certain degree of familiarity) by my landlord.

Lord Highgate waited until Mr. Taplow was out of the room; and then said to Florac, "Don't call me by my name here, please, Florac, I am here incog."

"Plait-il?" asks Florac. "Where is incog?" He laughed when the word was interpreted to him. Lord Highgate had turned to me. "There was no rudeness you understand intended, Mr. Pendennis, but I am down here on some business, and don't care to wear the handle to my name. Fellows work it so, don't you understand? never leave you at rest in a country town—that sort of thing. Heard of our friend Clive lately?"

"Whether you ave andle or no andle, Jack, you are always the bien venu to me. What is thy affair? Old monster! I wager . . ."

"No, no; no such nonsense," says Jack, rather eagerly. "I give you my honor, I—I want to—to raise a sum of money—that is, to invest some in a speculation down here—denuded good the speculations down here; and, by the way, if the landlord asks you, I'm Mr. Harris—I'm a civil engineer—I'm waiting for the arrival of the 'Canada' at Liverpool from America, and very uneasy about my brother who is on board."

"What does he recount to us there? Keep these stories for the landlord, Jack; to us 'tis not the pain to lie. My good Mr. Harris, why have we not seen you at Rosebury? The Princess will scold me if you do not come; and you must bring your dear brother when he arrive too. Do you hear?" The last part of this sentence was uttered for Mr. Taplow's benefit, who had re-entered the George bearing a tray of wine and biscuit.

The Master of Rosebury and Mr. Harris went out presently to look at a horse which was waiting the former's inspection in the stable-yard of the hotel. The landlord took advantage of his business, to hear a bell which never was rung, and to ask me questions about the guest who had been staying at his house for a week past. Did I know that party? Mr. Pendennis said, "Yes, he knew that party."

"Most respectable party, I have no doubt," continues Boniface.

"Do you suppose the Prince of Moncontour knows any but respectable parties?" asks Mr. Pendennis—a query of which the force was so great as to discomfit and silence our landlord, who retreated to ask questions concerning Mr. Harris of Florac's grooms.

What was Highgate's business here? Was it mine to know? I might have suspicions, but should I entertain them, or communicate them, and had I not best keep them to myself? I exchanged not a word on the subject of Highgate with Florac, as we drove home: though from the way in which we looked at one another, each saw that the other was acquainted with that unhappy gentleman's secret. We fell to talking about Madame la Duchesse d'Ivry as we trotted on; and then of English manners by way of contrast, of intrigues, elopements, Gretna Grin, etc., etc. "You are a droll nation!" says Florac. "To make love well, you must absolutely have a chaise-de-poste, and a scandal afterward. If our affairs of this kind made themselves on the grand route, what armies of postillions we should need!"

I held my peace. In that vision of Jack Belsize I saw misery, guilt, children dishonored, homes deserted—ruin for all the actors and victims of the wretched conspiracy. Laura marked my disturbance when we reached home. She even divined the cause of it, and charged me with it at night, when we sat alone by our dressing-room fire, and had taken leave of our kind entertainers. Then, under her cross-examination, I own that I told what I had seen—Lord Highgate, under a feigned name, staying at Newcome. It might be nothing. Nothing! Gracious Heavens! Could not this crime and misery be stopped? "It might be too late," Laura's husband said sadly, bending down his head into the fire.

She was silent too for a while. I could see she was engaged where pious women ever will betake themselves in moments of doubt, of grief, of pain, of separation, of joy even, or whatsoever other trial. They have but to will, and as it were an invisible temple rises round them; their hearts can kneel down there; and they have an audience of the great, the merciful, untiring Counselor and Consoler. She would not have been frightened at Death near at hand. I have known her to tend the poor round about us, or to bear pain—not her own merely, but even her children's and mine, with a surprising outward constancy and calm. But the idea of this crime being enacted close at hand, and no help for it—quite overcame her. I believe she lay awake all that night; and rose quite haggard and pale after the bitter thoughts which had deprived her of rest.

She embraced her own child with extraordinary tenderness that morning, and even wept over it, calling it by a thousand fond names of maternal endearment. "Would I leave you, my darling—could I ever, ever, ever quit you, my blessing, and treasure!" The unconscious little thing, hugged to his mother's bosom, and scared at her tones and tragic face, clung frightened and weeping round Laura's neck. Would you ask what the husband's feelings were as he looked at that sweet love, that sublime tenderness, that pure Saint blessing the life of him unworthy? Of all the gifts of Heaven to us below, that felicity is the sum and the chief. I tremble as I hold it lest I should lose it, and be left alone in the blank world without it; again, I feel humiliated to think that I possess it; as hastening home to a warm fireside and a plentiful table, I feel ashamed sometimes before the poor outcast beggar shivering in the street.

Breakfast was scarcely over when Laura asked for a pony carriage, and said she was bent on a private visit. She took her baby and nurse with her. She refused our company, and would not even say whither she was bound until she had passed the lodge-gate. I may have suspected what the object was of her journey. Florac and I did not talk of it. We rode out to meet the hounds of a cheery winter morning: on another day I might have been amused with my host—the splendor of his raiment, the neatness of his velvet cap, the gloss of his hunting boots; the cheers, shouts, salutations, to dog and man; the oaths and outcries of this Nimrod, who shouted louder than the whole field and the whole pack too—but on this morning I was thinking of the tragedy yonder enacting, and came away early from the hunting-field, and found my wife already returned to Rosebury.

Laura had been, as I suspected, to Lady Clara. She did not know why, indeed. She scarce knew what she should say when she arrived—how she could say what she had in her mind. "I hoped, Arthur, that I should have something—something told me to say," whispered Laura, with her head on my shoulder; "and as I lay awake last night thinking of her, prayed—that is, hoped, I might find a word of consolation for that poor lady. Do you know I think she has hardly ever heard a kind word? She said so; she was very much affected after we had talked together a little.

"At first she was very indifferent; cold and haughty in her manner; asked what had caused the pleasure of this visit, for I would go in, though at the lodge they told me her ladyship was unwell, and they thought received no company. I said I wanted to show our boy to her —that the children ought to be acquainted—I don't know what I said. She seemed more and more surprised—then all of a sudden—I don't know how—I said, 'Lady Clara, I have had a dream about you and your children, and I was so frightened that I came over to you to speak about it.' And I had the dream, Pen; it came to me absolutely as I was speaking to her.

"She looked a little scared, and I went on telling her the dream. 'My dear,' I said, 'I dreamed that I saw you happy with those children.'

"'Happy!' says she—the three were playing in the conservatory, into which her sitting-room opens.

"'And that a bad spirit came and tore them from you; and drove you out into the darkness; and I saw you wandering about quite lonely and wretched, and looking back into the garden where the children were playing. And you asked and implored to see them; and the Keeper at the gate said, 'No, never!' And then—then I thought they passed by you, and they did not know you.

"'Ah!' said Lady Clara.

"'And then I thought, as we do in dreams, you know, that it was my child who was separated from me, and who would not know me: and oh, what a pang that was! Fancy that. Let us pray God it was only a dream. And worse than that, when you, when I implored to come to the child, and the man said 'No, never!' I thought there came a spirit—an angel that fetched the child to heaven, and you said, 'Let me come too; oh, let me come too, I am so miserable!' And the angel said, 'No, never, never!'

"By this time Lady Clara was looking very pale. 'What do you mean?' she asked of me, Laura continued.

"'Oh, dear lady, for the sake of the little ones, and Him who calls them to Him, go you with them. Never, never part from them! Cling to His knees, and take shelter there.' I took her hands, and I said more to her in this way, Arthur, that I need not, that I ought not to speak again. But she was touched at length when I kissed her; and she said I was very kind to her, and no one had ever been so, and that she was quite alone in the world, and had no friend to fly to; and would I go and stay with her? and I said 'Yes,' and we must go, my dear. And I think you should see that person at Newcome—see him, and warn him," cried Laura, warming as she spoke, "and pray God to enlighten and strengthen him, and to keep him from this temptation, and implore him to leave this poor, weak, frightened, trembling creature; if he has the heart of a gentleman and the courage of a man, he will—I know he will."

"I think he would, my dearest," I said, "if he but heard the petitioner." Laura's cheeks were blushing, her eyes brightened, her voice rang with a sweet pathos of love that vibrates through my whole being sometimes. It seems to me as if evil must give way, and bad thoughts retire before that purest creature.

"Why has she not some of her family with her, poor thing!" my wife continued. "She perishes in that solitude. Her husband prevents her, I think—and—oh—I knew enough of him to know what his life is. I shudder, Arthur, to see you take the hand of that wicked, selfish man. You must break with him, do you hear, Sir?"

"Before or after going to stay at his house, my love?" asks Mr. Pendennis.

"Poor thing! she lighted up at the idea of any one coming. She ran and showed me the rooms we were to have. It will be very stupid; and you don't like that. But you can write your book, and still hunt and shoot with our friends here. And Lady Ann Newcome must be made to come back again. Sir Barnes quarreled with his mother, and drove her out of the house on her last visit—think of that! The servants here know it. Martha brought me the whole story from the housekeeper's room. This Sir Barnes Newcome is a dreadful creature, Arthur. I am so glad I loathed him from the very first moment I saw him."

"And into this ogre's den you propose to put me and my family, madam!" says the husband. "Indeed, where won't I go if you order me? Oh, who will pack my portmanteau?"

Florac and the Princess were both in desolation when, at dinner, we announced our resolution to go away—and to our neighbors at Newcome! that was more extraordinary. "Que diable goest thou to do in this galley?" asks our host as we sat alone over our wine.

But Laura's intended visit to Lady Clara was never to have a fulfillment, for on this same evening, as we sat at our dessert, comes a messenger from Newcome, with a note for my wife from the lady there.

"Dearest, kindest, Mrs. Pendennis," Lady Clara wrote, with many italics, and evidently in much distress of mind. "Your visit is not to be. I spoke about it to Sir B., who arrived this afternoon, and who has already begun to treat me in his usual way. Oh, I am so unhappy! Pray, pray do not be angry at this rudeness—though, indeed, it is only a kindness to keep you from this wretched place! I feel as if I can not bear this much longer. But, whatever happens, I shall always remember your beautiful goodness and kindness; and shall worship you as an angel deserves to be worshiped. Oh, why had I not such a friend earlier? But alas! I have none—only this odious family thrust upon me for companions to the wretched, lonely, C. N.

"P.S.—He does not know of my writing. Do not be surprised if you get another note from me in the morning, written in a ceremonious style, and regretting that we can not have the pleasure of receiving Mr. and Mrs. Pendennis for the present at Newcome.

"P.S.—The hypocrite!"

This letter was handed to my wife at dinner-time, and she gave it to me as she passed out of the room with the other ladies.

I told Florac that the Newcomes could not receive us, and that we would remain, if he willed it, his guests for a little longer. The kind fellow was only too glad to keep us. "My wife would die without Bébi," he said. "She becomes quite dangerous about Bébi." It was gratifying that the good old lady was not to be parted as yet from the innocent object of her love.

My host knew as well as I the terms upon which Sir Barnes and his wife were living. Their quarrels were the talk of the whole country; one side brought forward his treatment of her, and his conduct elsewhere, and said that he was so bad that honest people should not know him. The other party laid the blame upon her, and declared that Lady Clara was a languid, silly, weak, frivolous creature; always crying out of season; who had notoriously taken Sir Barnes for his money, and who as certainly had had an attachment elsewhere. Yes, the accusations were true on both sides. A bad, selfish husband had married a woman for her rank: a weak, thoughtless girl had been sold to a man for his money; and the union, which might have ended in a comfortable indifference, had taken an ill turn and resulted in misery, cruelty, fierce mutual recriminations, bitter tears shed in private, husband's curses and maledictions, and open scenes of wrath and violence for servants to witness and the world to sneer at. We arrange such matches every day; we sell or buy beauty, or rank, or wealth; we inaugurate the bargain in churches with sacramental services, in which the parties engaged call upon Heaven to witness their vows—we know them to be lies, and we seal them with God's name. "I, Barnes, promise to take you, Clara, to love and honor till death do us part." "I, Clara, promise to take you, Barnes," etc., etc. Who has not heard the ancient words? and how many of us have uttered them, knowing them to be untrue? and is there a bishop on the bench that has not amen'd the humbug in his lawn-sleeves, and called a blessing over the kneeling pair of perjurers?

"Does Mr. Harris know of Newcome's return?" Florac asked, when I acquainted him with this intelligence. "Ce scélérat de Highgate—Va!"

"Does Newcome know that Lord Highgate is here?" I thought within myself, admiring my wife's faithfulness and simplicity, and trying to believe with that pure and guileless creature that it was not yet too late to save the unhappy Lady Clara.

"Mr. Harris had best be warned," I said to Florac; "will you write him a word, and let us send a messenger to Newcome?"

At first Florac said, "Parbleu! No;" the affair was none of his, he attended himself always to this result of Lady Clara's marriage. He had even complimented Jack upon it years before at Baden, when scenes enough tragic, enough comical, ma foi, had taken place apropos of this affair. Why should he meddle with it now?

"Children dishonored," said I, "honest families made miserable; for Heaven's sake, Florac, let us stay this catastrophe if we can." I spoke with much warmth, eagerly desirous to avert this calamity if possible, and very strongly moved by the tale which I had heard only just before dinner from that noble and innocent creature, whose pure heart had already prompted her to plead the cause of right and truth, and to try and rescue an unhappy desperate sister trembling on the verge of ruin.

"If you will not write to him," said I, in some heat—"if your grooms don't like to go out of a night (this was one of the objections which Florac had raised), I will walk." We were talking over the affair rather late in the evening, the ladies having retreated to their sleeping apartments, and some guests having taken leave, whom our hospitable host and hostess had entertained that night, and before whom I naturally did not care to speak upon a subject so dangerous.

"Parbleu, what virtue, my friend! what a Joseph!" cries Florac, puffing his cigar. "One sees well that your wife had made you the sermon. My poor Pendennis! You are henpecked, my pauvre bon! You become the husband model. It is true my mother writes that thy wife is an angel!"

"I do not object to obey such a woman when she bids me do right," I said; and would, indeed, at that woman's request have gone out upon the errand, but that we here found another messenger. On days when dinner-parties were held at Rosebury, certain auxiliary waiters used to attend from Newcome whom the landlord of the King's Arms was accustomed to supply; indeed, it was to secure these, and make other necessary arrangements respecting fish, game, etc., that the Prince de Moncontour had ridden over to Newcome on the day when we met Lord Highgate, alias Mr. Harris, before the bar of the hotel. While we were engaged in the above conversation a servant enters, and says, "My lord, Jenkins and the other man is going back to Newcome in their cart, and is there any thing wanted?"

"It is the Heaven which sends him," says Florac, turning round to me with a laugh; "make Jenkins to wait five minutes, Robert; I have to write to a gentleman at the King's Arms." And so saying, Florac wrote a line which he showed me, and having sealed the note, directed it to Mr. Harris at the King's Arms. The cart, the note, and the assistant waiters departed on their way to Newcome. Florac bade me go to rest with a clear conscience. In truth, the warning was better given in that way than any other, and a word from Florac was more likely to be effectual than an expostulation from me. I had never thought of making it, perhaps; except at the expressed desire of a lady whose counsel, in all the difficult circumstances of life, I own I am disposed to take.

Mr. Jenkins's horse no doubt trotted at a very brisk pace, as gentlemen's horses will of a frosty night, after their masters have been regaled with plentiful supplies of wine and ale. I remember in my bachelor days that my horses always trotted quicker after I had had a good dinner; the Champagne used to communicate itself to them somehow, and the claret get into their heels. Before midnight the letter for Mr. Harris was in Mr. Harris's hands in the King's Arms.

It has been said, that in the Boscawen Room at the Arms, some of the jolly fellows of Newcome had a club, of which Parrot the auctioneer, Tom Potts the talented reporter, now Editor of the "Independent," Vidler the apothecary, and other gentlemen, were members.

When we first had occasion to mention that society, it was at an early stage of this history, long before Clive Newcome's fine mustache had grown. If Vidler the apothecary was old and infirm then, he is near ten years older now; he has had various assistants, of course, and one of them of late years had become his partner, though the firm continues to be known by Vidler's ancient and respectable name. A jovial fellow was this partner—a capital convivial member of the Jolly Britons, where he used to sit very late, so as to be in readiness for any nightwork that might come in.

So the Britons were all sitting, smoking, drinking, and making merry, in the Boscawen Room, when Jenkins enters with a note, which he straightway delivers to Mr. Vidler's partner. "From Rosebury? The Princess ill again, I suppose," says the surgeon, not sorry to let the company know that he attends her. "I wish the old girl would be ill in the day-time. Confound it," says he, "what's this!" and he reads out, "Sir Newcome est de retour. Bon voyage, mon ami. F." What does this mean?

"I thought you knew French, Jack Harris," says Tom Potts; "you're always bothering us with your French songs."

"Of course I know French," says the other; "but what's the meaning of this?"

"Screwcome came back by the five o'clock train. I was in it, and his royal highness would scarcely speak to me. Took Brown's fly from the station. Brown won't enrich his family much by the operation," says Mr. Potts.

"But what do I care?" cries Jack Harris; "we don't attend him, and we don't lose much by that. Howell attends him, ever since Vidler and he had that row."

"Hulloh! I say it's a mistake," cries Mr. Taplow, smoking in his chair. "This letter is for the party in the Benbow. The gent which the Prince spoke to him, and called him Jack the other day when he was here. Here's a nice business, and the seal broke, and all. Is the Benbow party gone to bed? John, you must carry him in this here note." John, quite innocent of the note and its contents—for he that moment had entered the club-room with Mr. Potts's supper—took the note to the Benbow, from which he presently returned to his master with a very scared countenance. He said the gent in the Benbow was a most harbitrary gent. He had almost choked John after reading the letter, and John wouldn't stand it; and when John said he supposed that Mr. Harris in the Boscawen—that Mr. Jack Harris, had opened the letter, the other gent cursed and swore awful.

"Potts," said Taplow, who was only too communicative on some occasions after he had imbibed too much of his own brandy-and-water, "it's my belief that that party's name is no more Harris than mine is. I have sent his linen to the wash, and there was two white pocket-handkerchiefs with H. and a coronet."

On the next day we drove over to Newcome, hoping perhaps to find that Lord Highgate had taken the warning sent to him and quitted the place. But we were disappointed. He was walking in front of the hotel, where a thousand persons might see him as well as ourselves.

We entered into his private apartment with him, and there expostulated upon his appearance in the public street, where Barnes Newcome or any passer-by might recognize him. He then told us of the mishap which had befallen Florac's letter on the previous night.

"I can't go away now, whatever might have happened previously: by this time that villain knows that I am here. If I go, he will say I was afraid of him, and ran away. Oh! how I wish he would come and find me." He broke out with a savage laugh.

"It is best to run away," one of us interposed sadly.

"Pendennis," he said, with a tone of great softness, "your wife is a good woman. God bless her! God bless her for all she has said and done—would have done, if that villain had let her. Do you know the poor thing hasn't a single friend in the world—not one, one—except me, and that girl they are selling to Farintosh, and who does not count for much. He has driven away all her friends from her; one and all turn upon her. Her relations of course; when did they ever fail to hit a poor fellow or a poor girl when she was down? The poor angel! The mother who sold her comes and preaches at her; Kew's wife turns up her little cursed nose and scorns her; Rooster, forsooth, must ride the high horse, now he is married and lives at Chanticlere, and give her warning to avoid my company or his! Do you know the only friend she ever had was that old woman with the stick—old Kew; the old witch whom they buried four months ago after nobbling her money for the beauty of the family? She used to protect her—that old woman; Heaven bless her for it, wherever she is now, the old hag—a good word won't do her any harm. Ha! ha!" His laughter was cruel to hear.

"Why did I come down?" he continued, in reply to our sad queries. "Why did I come down, do you ask? Because she was wretched, and sent for me. Because if I was at the end of the world, and she was to say, 'Jack, come!' I'd come."

"And if she bade you go?" asked his friends.

"I would go; and I have gone. If she told me to jump into the sea, do you think I would not do it? But I go; and when she is alone with him, do you know what he does? He strikes her. Strikes that poor little thing! He has owned to it. She fled from him and sheltered with the old woman who's dead. He may be doing it now! Why did I ever shake hands with him? that's humiliation sufficient, isn't it? But she wished it; and I'd black his boots, curse him, if she told me. And because he wanted to keep my money in his confounded bank, and because he knew he might rely upon my honor and hers, poor dear child! he chooses to shake hands with me—me, whom he hates worse than a thousand devils—and quite right, too. Why isn't there a place where we can go and meet, like man to man, and have it over! If I had a ball through my brains I shouldn't mind, I tell you. I've a mind to do it for myself, Pendennis. You don't understand me, Viscount?"

"Il est vrai," said Florac, with a shrug, "I comprehend neither the suicide nor the chaise-de-poste. What will you? I am not yet enough English, my friend. We make marriages of convenience in our country, que diable, and what follows follows; but no scandal afterward! Do not adopt our institutions a demi, my friend. Vous ne me comprenez pas non plus, mon pauvre Jack!"

"There is one way still, I think," said the third of the speakers in this scene. "Let Lord Highgate come to Rosebury in his own name, leaving that of Mr. Harris behind him. If Sir Barnes Newcome wants you, he can seek you there. If you will go, as go you should, and God speed you; you can go, and in your own name, too."

"Parbleu c'est ça," cries Florac, "he speaks like a book—the Romancier!" I confess, for my part, I thought that a good woman might plead with him, and touch that manly not disloyal heart now trembling on the awful balance between evil and good.

"Allons! let us make to come the drague!" cries Florac. "Jack, thou returnest with us, my friend! Madame Pendennis, an angel, my friend, a quatre the most charming, shall roucoule to thee the sweetest sermons. My wife shall tend thee like a mother—a grandmother. Go make thy packet!"

Lord Highgate was very much pleased and relieved seemingly. He shook our hands, he said he should never forget our kindness, never! In truth the didactic part of our conversation was carried on at much greater length than as here noted down: and he would come that evening, but not with us, thank you; he had a particular engagement, some letters he must write. Those done, he would not fail us, and would be at Rosebury by dinner-time.

THE LAMPLIGHTER: A MODEL STORY FOR YOUNG AUTHORS.

CHAPTER I

IT was late on a beautiful summer evening about the middle of the present century, when a Lamplighter, bearing on his shoulder that distinctive badge of his craft familiarly known as a ladder, and in his hand a lantern of simple but efficient construction, turned the corner of a street leading out of the Commercial Road, at the east end of the great metropolis of that great commercial country, whose fleets sweep the seas of the world, and whose downfall, though anticipated by Ledru Rollin, and the author of the well-known work on prophetic interpretation, entitled "A Warning Voice to Britain, or the Coming Crash," is still postponed.

The Lamplighter turned the corner.

As he turned, he paused: a shade of reflection stole across his handsome, and even aristocratic features; then, curling his manly lip with an expression of ineffable scorn, he proceeded on his way humming an air.

An attentive listener might have observed that the air was from Beethoven.

The street in question was one of the humblest order. It did not consist of residences inhabited by those whom the callous and Calvinistic Cowper has called "Tenants of life's middle state, Securely placed betwixt the small and great;"

but of edifices one story high, the maximum number of apartments being four, the minimum number of family establishments in each house being two. Slatternly females conversing in pairs at street-doors about "my old man," "that Bill," "that Bob," "my Mary Anne," and recent occurrences before "the Beak;" rival pot-boys, on opposite sides of the way, shouting the nine o'clock beer without any amicable adjustment of respective time or tune; children and adolescent lads, in ragged pinafores and shirt-sleeves, playing, whooping, plunging, starting, and swearing; the fierce Lascar, swart child of the sun; the nasal Israelite; and the ever-with-rhubarb-perambulating Moslem; the inebricated athlete challenging to pugilistic combat some brother of feebleness mould belonging to the same workshop, and equally inebricated; the loud-voiced daughter of misfortune, with reddened nose, obtrusive shoulder, and hair unkempt; all, all were here—only the policeman was absent!

Blame him not, for he was human! In other neighborhoods, where were areas, housemaids, and possible legs of mutton, he whiled away the tedious minutes.

In this street, then, where wives were smashed nightly, and policemen came not until the smashing was over and done—in this street, from open windows issued sounds and scents illustrative of the household economy of the inhabitants. Outside was noise, was confusion; inside was supper! The savory, but suspected sausage; the tasteful, toothsome tripe; the juicy, neverpalling steak, with its garnish of odorous onion; the lean liver of the lamb, and the pinguiferous slice from the salted swine—were all undergoing necessary culinary processes in hot and smoky rooms in the street of which we write.

And over the simmering of the tripe, and the hissing of the sausage, and the breathing of the onion, came out the everlasting stars, calmly—oh, so calmly!

With equal (if not superior) calmness, the Lamplighter pursued his illuminating way.

He was followed by a youth.

Poeta nascitur, non fit.

The youth was a poet. His hair was long, and his collar turned down. His gait was slow, and his air was abstracted. As he went along he was assailed by opprobrious epithets from the ribald denizens of the place.

Martyrdom is ever the lot of Genius.

Ask not, Sneerer, what Genius wanted down a back street in the Commercial Road! Genius is at home every where; it hath a latch-key to every door; a microscope for the small; a telescope for the distant; an alchemy for meanness in back streets. This youthful poet's errand was the study of the human heart. Judge by the sequel if his errand was a successful one!

Before a house near the farther end of the street—a house which presented nothing externally remarkable—the Lamplighter and the youthful poet paused simultaneously; both, as it would seem, entranced and spell-bound by a strain of melody which, mingled with the soft tinkling of a piano, evidently fitted up with the latest improvements, regardless of expense, came warbled forth from an inexpressibly rich female voice, singing "Ah! non gémme. The window was opened at the top, and there were dwarf Venetian blinds.

The Lamplighter, who had stood with raised eyes and clasped hands, suddenly turned, and saw the youth in an attitude of delighted wonder. He eyed him with a malicious smile.

"Man!" said the youth.

"Sir?" said the Lamplighter, while the mantling color flushed his lordly face.

"Lamplighter! Being! What would you? Individual! a silver shilling to climb you ladder, and light the lamp opposite that window!"

"A shilling, youth? Ha, ha!" The Lamplighter laughed in scorn.

"Half-a-crown—half-a-sovereign—my earthly stock and store—all, all, all—only let me see that face!" The youth drew out a purse, and exposed a five-pound note, and some gold and silver coins.

"Keep, keep thy gold, youth! See here! Mount the ladder heedfully—so—so—take the lantern—now!"

With suspended breath the young poet stood at that dizzy height, and looking into the room with one eye, and at his ostensible task with the other, he succeeded in lighting the lamp, at the cost of smashing one side of glass. A mob was speedily gathered around the lamp-post, but the youth heeded neither their laughter nor their execrations. He saw—oh, pity! what saw he not?

The furniture of the room was excessively mean, but on one side stood a cottage piano of gorgeous workmanship, before which sat a maiden of perfect beauty—the beauty of rich golden hair, pearl-white skin of softest vermillion shade, eyes of dewy violet, and form of gazelle-like lightness. Oh, but she was lovely!

As the sound of the smashed glass she naturally turned round and looked up.

A youth with long hair, turn-down collar, and poetic eye, at the top of a lamplighter's ladder, is not an ordinary object. Isabel gazed wonderingly. An elderly female, of majestic port, entered the room.

"Look there, chère maman!" said Isabel.

"What, ma chère!"

But before another word was spoken, the youthful bard rapidly retraced his steps down the ladder, and clasped the arm of the friendly Lamplighter in a half-swoon of delicious emotion. There was an interval of silence.

"Friend!" said the Lamplighter, "if thy look betray me not, thou art noble—thou art gifted."

"I write for the 'Hearthrug Excruciator,'" murmured the youth with ill-concealed pride.

"I knew it! I knew it! Enough. Would you know the maiden—sit at her side—speak to her—press her hand—"

"Oh, heaven!" interrupted the young poet.

"Speak!"

"I would!"

"No more! We meet again—give me your card—good—farewell!"

The Lamplighter disappeared hastily round the corner. Uncertain whether he was awake or dreaming, Edward (for his name was Edward) stood

"Like one that hath been stunned,

And is of sense forlorn."

till the taunts of the hustling mob around him suggested his moving on.

Still, the lamps shone, and the stars twinkled, while the rattle of an engine and the cry of fire in the main street diverted the crowd.

When they were gone, Edward returned and lingered by the charmed spot. The voice was silent, but it was now late, and there was a light in the front room up stairs.

"Ah!" said he, "she sleeps!"

He was mistaken. It was the room of a lodger who played in the orchestra of the "Royal Pavilion Theatre." Isabel slept in the back parlor with her mother.

Still, the stars and lamps shone on!

CHAPTER II.

Joy comes and goes.

The next morning, as Edward was bewailing his empty purse—for his pocket had been ruthlessly picked on the previous evening—a letter arrived for him. It was in a disguised hand, and contained these words:

"Be there at eight to-night, and ask for Isabel.

Be bold, and fear not! Your destiny is in your own hands.

THE LAMPLIGHTER."

How the youthful poet passed through that day; how he performed its dreary, monotonous duties; how he endured his agony of suspense; how he found his way to the Commercial Road in the evening—are all among the things that may not be written; save that, with respect to the last point, it is definitely known that he went in a fourpenny omnibus, having borrowed a small sum of his landlady.

A mist swam before his eyes. He said, faintly, "Isabel? I was told to ask for Isabel—"

"Edward?" said the beautiful maiden, advancing with a smile and a blush.

"All right?" inquired Edward.

"Quite," said Isabel, meaningly.

There was a sweet, soft moan of tender unrest, and she flung herself upon his bosom.

The old lady looked smilingly on, having just slipped in unperceived, after witnessing the scene through a crack in the door. For the house was in bad condition, though the rent was twenty pounds a year, without taxes.

"Bless you, my children!" said she, when the youthful poet and the enamored maiden took breath, after their embrace—"Bless you!"

Without, the stars looked down (as before!)

Isabel seated herself at the piano, and again warbled forth strains of unearthly sweetness.

"Do you like music, Edward?" said she.

Edward replied in the affirmative.

"Oh, I'm so glad! Ma and I sometimes go to the Effingham Saloon, in the Whitechapel Road; Ma's fond of music too—n'est-ce pas, Maman? We should be so glad, you know, if you would take us, now and then—it's three-pence to the boxes. Ma and I never venture any where else. The singing is so good."

At this moment Edward heard a slight clicking noise outside, and turning his head, caught a glimpse of the Lamplighter at his nightly occupation! . . . Was there not something Satanic in his half-suppressed smile? . . . Gracious powers! Could it be that he was—No, no! The thought was too wild. But, in spite of himself, a tremor seized his limbs, a cold sweat bedewed his brow, his hair stood almost on end. . . . He was roused by the clatter of plates on the little round table.

Supper! The cloth was laid, and the humble and circular cheese of Holland, bread, salt, and mustard, with three delf mugs, knives, and one fork, were all the furniture of the entertainment—except a single finger-glass. Isabel saw Edward glance at it with some curiosity.

"My Ma always has a finger-glass at meals," said she, with a quiet smile. "She always has a savaloy for supper, and I'm going to fetch it, and the beer."

"Let me accompany you," said Edward.

The matron watched their retreating figures with a pride which illumined her graceful countenance as with a sunbeam. Beautiful it was to see that youth and maiden returning, Edward bearing the foaming jug of threepenny ale, Isabel, a small German. So potent is female loveliness, that the rudest natures, they who had hooted the young poet only the evening before, because, forsooth, his collar lay down, and his hair grew free, were silent and reverent, as he walked arm-in-arm with the golden-tressed creature who now carried the savaloy for her mother in a piece of old newspaper!

O Beauty! O Life! O Love! Many and many an evening did that youthful couple meet and mingle caresses and loving words, and sigh, and sup, and go to the Effingham Saloon along with the old lady, and bring in the savaloy and the beer; and so their lives swept on together, two currents meeting in one stream of bliss and beauty!

Once only did Edward name the Lamplighter, and ask if Isabel knew him.

"We know no one about here," was Isabel's reply, given with a countenance of amused surprise. Edward did not dare to press the question farther; and the more he reflected upon that mysterious being's influence in bringing about his present position, the more he didn't understand it. But what matter? In the love of Isabel he was too supremely blest to care for aught besides; and so, in tenderest intercourse, the sweet, long summer passed away, and still, still—Edward and Isabel were happy!

When Edward received his quarter's salary at the end of September, he found a good deal of it pre-mortgaged to pay for fourpenny rides to the Commercial Road, and admissions to the Effingham Saloon.

CHAPTER III.

AUTUMN—yellow, mellow Autumn. There were vegetable marrows in the greengrocers' windows in the Commercial Road, and, as the air grew chiller and damper, Old Tom and Cream of the Valley were in increasing request.

But no chill came upon the love of the poet and the maiden. For them it was unceasing Summer.

One evening, when they had been sitting silently locked in each other's arms for an hour or more, and the good matron had fallen asleep in her chair with her gold spectacles (she always wore gold spectacles) toppling down upon her nose, Edward broke the stillness by whispering—

"Isabel!"

"Yes, Edward?"

"Isabel—do we love one another?"

"Oh, Edward!"

This succeeded by a passionate embrace.

"Do we understand one another?"

"Oh, Edward!"

And the lovers' glances met in a flash of mutual intelligence; the encounter of looks struck fire—celestial fire!

"Isabel, why should souls like ours heed the conventional forms of society? We have wooed and loved for three long months; we love—we understand one another—we know how to be happy—let me put up the banns at Limehouse Church!"

"Oh, Edward, spare me!"

The blushing maid hid her face in her hands.

"My means are small—but my salary is to be raised next January to eighty pounds a year."

"Eighty pounds!" said Isabel, looking up with a smile.

"Eighty pounds! and my contributions to the 'Hearthrug Excruciator' must speedily bring me into notice, which will yield both fame and profit!"

"Ah, Edward! your genius I know full well—I am proud of it, Edward!"

"I'll toast you Welsh rabbits—"

"Dearest!"

"I'll fetch you beer!"

"Angel!"

"I'll rock the cradle!"

"Oh, Edward!"

"You must be mine!" As Edward spoke, he pressed her to his side with such fervor as to provoke a slight scream from Isabel, which disturbed her mother, who rose hastily, to ask what was the matter.

"Edward has asked me to let him put up the banns, Ma, and says he's to have eighty pounds a year in January."

"Bless the boy!" cried the matron, with a sudden astonishment of manner; but, quickly correcting herself, she said, "Yes, ma chère; yes; bless you, bless you both!"

Without, the stars were looking down, and the gas-lamps twinkling (as on the previous occasion).

Then a great calm of joy deluged the spirit of unrest in the bosom of the youthful poet. He had asked Isabel—Isabel had asked her mother—and her mother had blest them. It was enough—almost too much!

That night the evening meal was prolonged, and Edward went three times for ale. It was near midnight when he left the humble roof where he had wooed and won his Isabel, and as he turned into the Commercial Road he heard the church clocks strike twelve.

A hand was laid upon his arm.

He was thinking that in all his intercourse with Isabel and her mother, he had never, never, heard their name! He murmured aloud, "How can I put up the banns without knowing her name?"

"Impossible!" said a voice at his ear.

It was the Lamplighter. His countenance wore a strange smile.

"I will tell you her name—all in good time," said the Lamplighter. "But, in the meantime, step under that lamp, and sign your name—and address—to this paper. I require it, as the price of the happiness in store for you!"

"But—" gasped Edward.

"No hesitation! Sign—or renounce Isabel!"

"There's no ink," said the youthful betrothed, with agitation.

"Pencil will do," replied the Lamplighter.

"I haven't got one," suggested Edward.

"I have," was the Being's reply. "Sign!"

Thus urged, Edward signed—name and address in full.

"Enough!" said the Lamplighter. "Isabel is yours."

So saying, he disappeared, like an arrow lost in the clouds.

"Fiend!" said Edward, between his clenched teeth, as a mocking ha-ha reached his ears upon the cool night-wind.

"At least, I will not sell my soul in vain—let me make all sure!"

He strode hastily and gloomily through several turnings, until he stopped before the residence of the Clerk of Limehouse parish. All was dark and silent. He knocked and rang several times. At last, a head, enveloped in the conventional cap of night, appeared from an upper window, and presumed that the house was on fire!

The youthful and ardent lover explained that his business was merely to announce his intention of calling to-morrow to get the clerk to register the banns for himself and his affianced bride.

The head was speedily withdrawn, after uttering an unclerical execration.

Walking moodily away, Edward reflected that, after all, the Lamplighter had not told him Isabel's name.

"Ten thousand curses! But I can call to-morrow morning on my way, and ask her."

Once more, that mocking laugh! His steps were dogged then: he turned—there was only silence and the black night.

The lamps shone as usual, but not the stars.

CHAPTER IV.

WINTER, winter every where; and winter in the youthful poet's bosom—cold, joyless, frozen winter! On calling at Isabel's the next morning, he found she was gone away, with her mother, and no tidings of them could be gained. Dumb, crushed, heart-numbed, he staggered forth. His dream was over. Gone, gone, gone! And the Lamplighter, and the signed paper? . . . Oh, powers of mercy! for what had he sold himself to the powers of darkness? . . .

A ray of hope flashed across his mind—could a lamplighter be considered a power of darkness?

His only consolation was in song. He ate his bread in sadness, or, to speak more accurately, he dipped his captain's biscuit in weak brandy and water, and poured out his sorrows, once a week, in the "Hearthrug Excruciator." On such a restricted diet, and with such small means of comfort, no wonder Edward grew pale and thin. His youth was blighted!

* * * * *

What could the Earl of Bradclyffe want to say to him? There was the invitation as large as life—"The Earl of Bradclyffe requests the pleasure of Mr. Green's company at dinner on Tuesday next, at seven o'clock. The Earl Bradclyffe has an important communication to make." Well; life was all a mockery to a torn and bleeding heart, and he would go.

Reader, he went. As his humble cab—the humble cab he had engaged to convey him to Eaton Place—drew up before the door, he was abashed at the string of magnificent equipages in waiting, and found his way to the presence of Lord and Lady Bradclyffe, more dead than alive, and the shadow of what he was. He fancied he had an instantaneous recollection of his Lordship's face, and a still stronger one of her Ladyship's—but help!—he swoons! who, who is that?

"Isabel!"

When he came to, Isabel was bathing his forehead with Eau-de-Cologne.

"My dear Edward," said the Earl, "Isabel is yours! she has been yours from the hour when I allowed you to mount my ladder. Know, my dear boy, that I love my species. As a man, as a senator and hereditary legislator of this great realm, I longed to learn somewhat of the people—of their daily toils and trials, in fact, of their lives. I thought it behoved me to acquire that knowledge, and feigning a journey to Italy, and bribing my servants to keep my secret, I became a humble lamplighter at the East end of London—and in that vocation I came to know the people of England! Yes, Edward, and more than that. I determined that Lady Bradclyffe, and this dear girl too, should partake my knowledge, and they heroically shared my lot. You yourself have seen them eat Dutch cheese—drink threepenny ale—and you have accompanied Isabel when she has gone out for her mamma's evening savaloy. You know it all. But the dear old lady would have her finger-glass at meals, and retain the gold spectacles, and Isabel pleaded hard for a cottage-piano. In the sphere in which we move she was surrounded by "hollow hearts which wore a mask"—if I may use the language of a popular poet; but I know that in you I have found a companion for her, whose heart is true and fond—true, I say, for have I not tried it?"

"The paper that I signed in the street?" said Edward, interrogatively.

"Oh, ah! I had mislaid your card, and forgotten your address, and determined to amuse myself at your expense."

"Cruel papa!" murmured Isabel, as she hung fondly on the shoulder of the young bard.

"Isabel, my beloved, my own! This moment repays me for all!"

As he imprinted a rapturous kiss upon her brow, amidst loud applause from the assembled élite of our venerable aristocracy, a richly-carparisoned servitor, of almost Titanic stature, but moulded like an Apollo, entered, and, in a voice of thrilling music, said,

"Dinner is ready, my Lord!"

The Earl of Bradclyffe winked at our poor Edward. Was he aware of his restricted diet-table during the last few months? Perhaps.

CHAPTER V.

This will be a brief chapter!

When is pleasure long? . . .

Early in the spring, Isabel and Edward were united at St. George's, Hanover Square, by the Bishop of —, assisted by the venerable Incumbent of Bradclyffe-cum-Toadintehole, who was brought to town, carriage paid, by the excited and elegant-minded Earl. Wedding-cards were sent to the Clerk of Limehouse parish, as some atonement for his being rung up in the night by the impetuous Edward. The good old man wept when he received them.

Edward continues to court the Muses with brilliant success.

He and his bride immediately purchased the house in the turning out of the Commercial Road, and the Earl bargained with the lamplighter of the district to be permitted to light the lamps of the street once a year. On that night, there is annually a family party of the Greens and Bradclyffes at the old house, and the beauteous Isabel and the handsome Edward may be seen arm-in-arm turning the corner, at about nine o'clock p.m.; she with a savaloy, he with a can of threepenny ale. After supper, Isabel invariably sings "Ah, non giunge!" The Earl of Bradclyffe always takes the side of the people in the peers' assembly, and never forgets the lessons he learned when he was

THE LAMPLIGHTER.

THE INCONSTANT DAGUERREOTYPE.

"What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue."

IT is scarcely to be wondered at that two daguerreotypes, placed directly opposite each other in a small and pretty boudoir, should fall desperately in love with one another.

Affairs of this kind are very frequent among this class of the human species. Of such a susceptible nature, an impression is easily made; and if the details of the contents of a daguerreotype saloon could be made known, they would display such instances of romance as would make the fortune of a G. P. R. James or a Miss Pickering.

There is something touching in the fact that the subjects of such romance are merely shadows, which gives to their fragile loves an unwonted hue.

With daguerreotypes there is no such phrase as "a mere shadow," for with them the shadow is the substance; and the sad history of Peter Schlemihl, without his shadow, lies among their records as an almost unnecessary warning, displaying to the human race the importance of this appendage.

There is a tradition among them that all shadows live again in the moon—perhaps from her occasionally receiving the shadow of the earth in her arms, or from her telling her own topography by the shadows that her mountains cast over her valleys. Be that as it may, this strong hope exists among them, to give permanence to the superficial daguerreotype, and to add a gleam to its mercurial disposition.

The hero and heroine of our tale, daguerreotypes of the finest metal, did not, as we have hinted, pass their lives in the crowded precincts of a daguerreotype saloon, nor were their charms blazoned to the passer-by at the corners of the public streets. What home could be more agreeable than theirs in Minna Bertrand's boudoir, and when did it look more inviting than on the very morning we would speak of it?

The velvet folds of the green curtains hung heavily on the moss-green carpet. The soft, flickering flame from the soft coal fire sent out a cheerful crackling sound into the room. A crayon-sketch was lying unfinished on the drawing-table, with its drawing implements about it. Just two inviting-looking lounges showed how exclusive was the nature of the apartment.

In one of these lounges sat, expectingly, the owner of the boudoir, Minna Bertrand. She is no heroine of ours, for she was neither a daguerreotype, nor had she ever sat for a daguerreotype likeness. But to her belonged the two that hung upon the walls of her room. One was a portrait of her brother Ferdinand, a young officer away in the service of his country. He, the original, was her beau-ideal of all that was manly and heroic. No wonder that Ferdinand, the daguerreotype, should receive somewhat of the admiration that Lieutenant Bertrand, the original, was wont to awaken when at home. But the half of her affection Minna bestowed upon Cecilia. This was the daguerreotype that hung on the wall directly opposite.

It represented her best friend, Miss Vernon, who had just returned from a European tour; whom she had greeted once, but whose first visit in her own boudoir she was now awaiting.

Minna looks alternately from Ferdinand to Cecilia, who represents, in a calm, slightly-stiffened aspect, after the manner of daguerreotypes, only one phase of the expressions of her volatile friend. If Minna had ever indulged in any visions of match-making, it had been with regard to her brother and her friend. But the fates had hitherto been against the meeting of these two. Miss Vernon's European tour had kept her abroad during Ferdinand's last visit home, and since her return, Minna had been vainly wishing for some sudden orders that would bring her brother back again, to see how charming and irresistible her friend had become since her stay in Paris. She little knew that with the two presentments that she had placed so near each other, affairs had already advanced marvelously. Ferdinand was wonderfully gifted with the language of the eyes, while Cecilia possessed what is called a truly speaking countenance.

At the moment of which we speak, the original, Miss Vernon, entered the room. At first came the renewal of the welcome home from Minna; the delight expressed by Miss Vernon that she was herself home again. Then followed expressions of the deepest enthusiasm about her enjoyment abroad, which she feared she could never impart to her best friend, Minna. But Miss Vernon could not be one moment quiet. There was the dear old view from the window: "I declare, Mrs. Grimes has not washed her blinds since I went away! I'm glad of it; I should have never known the dear old house if she had taken away a speck of dust! Is that Annie Hudson in that shabby bonnet? How old she has grown! Do you know, Minna dear, every body's bonnet looks—not exactly what you call shabby; but that reminds me of my old daguerreotype—isn't it frightful? And the bonnet must be so out of style! Pray, let me see it! Why, you have hung up that little water-color sketch I sent you. You must have done that out of pure affection, and have planged your artist-feelings into oblivion. But if you could have seen the lake as I saw it, and under such auspices! You wouldn't have wondered at my using up all my blue paint in my efforts to retain it and the sky. But our charming companions! I could never have painted them! I wish you could have heard Herbert Schuyler's flute on the water. His flute was the best part of him; as for his face— But who is this—this daguerreotype? Is this Ferdinand—Lieutenant Bertrand? You have always talked about him, but I never imagined him looking so!"

Ferdinand, the daguerreotype, had found himself deeply interested in watching the points of resemblance and of difference between the actual Miss Vernon and his beloved. And now he finds her studying and examining his own features.

If daguerreotypes could blush deeper than the color that is laid upon them, surely now was his time; but Ferdinand could do no more than return a glance as penetrating as he could render it.

"What a love of a picture!" exclaimed Miss Vernon. "I don't know what ever will become of me when I see the original! That mustache! It is exactly the face that should wear a mustache. It is like the dark line that edged the spars of the vessel we came out in when they stood against the sunset! Oh, no; it is like the dark cloud behind the Jungfrau that day we saw it, when the rest of the sky was so clear! Minna, it is quite safe for me to rave about the daguerreotype when the original is so far away! I declare it really seems to me it smiles!—the real smile must be excessively dangerous!"

So rattled on Miss Vernon, not only at her first visit, but whenever afterward she came into the room. As she sat with her work, she would draw her chair into full view of the daguerreotype, and give it as many glances as some ladies would a mirror in the same position.

She was not aware what mischief she was bringing in between two loving hearts. Ferdinand's head and heart, a little shallow perhaps, were beginning to be turned and touched. He began to compare Miss Vernon's face with that of his own Cecilia, the daguerreotype. He forgot the charm of that constancy of expression of which daguerreotypes are fond of boasting, and began to praise the variety of which Miss Vernon's face was capable, and her smile, which was never the same.

Cecilia herself was at first deeply interested in watching the movements of her own original. She loved, among the lively varied gleams of Miss Vernon's countenance, suddenly to detect the pensive air which she herself always assumed.

As often as she saw this well-known expression stealing over Miss Vernon's face, she would earnestly glance at Ferdinand to see if he were not pleased to detect its likeness. But she too often found him occupied in watching for some new movement in the lively Miss Vernon's features, and saw in his face, which she had learned to read so easily, a pleasure in their change of expression.

When the daguerreotypes were alone, in the absence of Miss Vernon, Ferdinand was fond of dwelling upon her charms; in the praise of which, Cecilia at first modestly joined, feeling almost as if it were herself that was under discussion. But in time this subject became wearisome to her, especially when at length Ferdinand began to indulge in reflections upon the sad doom to which daguerreotypes were submitted, which forced them into one expression, and restrained them to a passive life. These quite aroused Cecilia's indignation.

"Wasn't constancy the pride of all the daguerreotype tribe? And what greater happiness was there than to preserve for a friend the same unchanging smile, the same freshness of cheek! As for mortals, they must fade and grow old; but a daguerreotype, if only of the true temper, was indestructible in its nature, and might exist for ages!"

"I would not give a fig for the ages," answered Ferdinand, "full of dates as they may be! What is life without liveliness? what are emotions without motion? I tell you, Cecilia, I would willingly give up the promised future in the moon, with all its vaporous charms, for one good flesh-and-blood walk up and down Broadway!"

"How can you be so commonplace!" exclaimed Cecilia. "I remember as I came here—that was two years ago—I saw a number of our race bound together in a most conspicuous position on Broadway itself, exposed to the public gaze, and to the admiration of the lowest class of people. I remember quite shuddering with terror lest my destiny should be similar. And then, how I thanked my happy fate that placed me in the midst of elegance and a home of refinement!"

"Refinement!" said Ferdinand, "that is always the talk of daguerreotypes. I sometimes wish I had some sharp edge left! There is nothing so uninteresting to me as your smooth, refined characters!"

"You forget," answered Cecilia, "that they take the best impressions."

"But I want something that will give expression," said Ferdinand. "Miss Vernon has given me more ideas in the last few days than have entered my head for a year!"

Cecilia sighed and was silent.

After this conversation she examined her original more and more critically. She could not deny to herself that Miss Vernon was irresistibly charming. Yet, with her own passion for quiet grace, she could not help feeling that Miss Vernon's few passive moments were to her the most attractive. Her ideas of future happiness had always been connected with the romantic atmosphere of the moon. She had stored in her retentive memory all the sentimental passages of poetry she had ever heard her mistress, Minna, repeat; and constancy, and eternity, and the pole-star, and an undying love, were the only changes she could sing in her thoughts and words. No wonder, then, she was occasionally shocked at the apparently flippant remarks of her own original.

Poor Cecilia! With no depth herself more than a pin could measure, she began to criticize the profundity of Miss Vernon's character. Often, in sounding other people, because we constantly strike upon a shallow place, we pronounce them utterly shallow, forgetting there may be depths we have not been permitted to penetrate. This is a partial kind of judgment, worthy only of a daguerreotype that has to do with mere outside.

Into such a judgment was Cecilia led, though perhaps she was not utterly wrong. She had the good fortune to represent the most earnest expression Miss Vernon had ever given way to. The daguerreotype had been taken for her friend Minna just before her departure for Europe. At that moment had crossed her mind a shade of deep feeling. An instant before she had been laughing over the probable adventures which would occur in the course of a tour in Europe. A moment after, on looking into the unflattering mirror of the daguerreotype room, she had occupied herself with wondering if violet really were becoming to her complexion. But just at the moment when the likeness was being seized by the instrument, a shade of thought had come over her face. There was a ray of intelligence there, bright as the gleam of a summer landscape which memory sometimes brings unexpectedly into the winter-prisoned thoughts.

It was a moment's fond thought of home, a regret, for just one instant, at leaving the friends behind. It was this that had given character to the face of Cecilia the daguerreotype.

She passed her life in a dream of sad regret, of gentle longing. There was a pensive constancy in her whole expression, which, being a daguerreotype, was of course her whole self.

Miss Vernon was fond of talking of constancy. "How absurd to rate it so highly!" she would say, "or rather, what do we mean by constancy? Does not every body change thoroughly once in seven years? Since my return, how many people are there that I can greet with the same cordiality that we met with before I went away? They have been going off in different directions, some perhaps higher up than I, some lower down. How absurd of me to attempt to keep up an intimacy with one person with whom I sympathized when I went away, but who is inclined to look cold at me because she heard I polkaed in Paris!—or with another, who is thoroughly disgusted because I enjoyed the Opera more than the Vatican! Don't look distressed, Minna; you and I are patterns of constancy, I know. But what would have become of our constancy if it had not happened that I passed the winter with your Aunt Emily in beloved Paris, and that you have the advantage of the Paris dresses she sends out, to give you that air which gives friendship its highest tone? How I do love to disgust you! But I declare my magnificent Ferdinand here actually smiles at my talk. I do believe Whipple will give daguerreotypes the power of speech next. I often fancy the lips are moving; there is truly something sympathizing about their expression. I should think you would be afraid to sit at midnight in the room with him. I have no doubt he would speak then!"

Minna was indeed a little distressed at her friend's talk. She knew that half she said was for the mere sake of talking and creating a wonderment; but Minna did not like this incessant slight upon constancy.

It was not unnatural that, living under the influence of such a daguerreotype as Cecilia, she should be affected by that refinement of feeling that it always presented to her. During two years, the ideal Cecilia had been taking her character from the daguerreotype Cecilia. Miss Vernon was right when she spoke of their separation having led herself and her friends into different directions. Minna and herself were further apart than either were aware. Minna had been growing contemplative; in her quiet boudoir she had been refining and cultivating her own mind. The pensive Cecilia looked down upon her occupations, and seemed to sympathize in their results. So she fancied the real Miss Vernon had been with her in her progress. Because Miss Vernon was traveling in Italy, Minna, out of friendship, had studied Italian. Miss Vernon could just manage to turn a few phrases in that language for the benefit and convenience of her friends in traveling, while Minna had made higher acquaintances among its poets through her intimacy with its beautiful formation.

She followed Miss Vernon in this way through the different countries she visited; but she was always above Miss Vernon, and never in the same place. But while Cecilia's cheek—the faintly-colored cheek of the daguerreotype—seemed to glow with some of her own enthusiasm, and her eye to dilate with sensibility, Minna fancied that so Miss Vernon would have sympathized with her had she been sitting by her side, and that her favorite authors and occupations would kindle the same warmth that Cecilia's features appeared to express.

The prospect of Lieutenant Bertrand's sudden return at length awakened all parties. Ferdinand was perhaps the most disturbed. He directly saw his rival was coming upon the field. Whatever claims his vanity had led him to presume upon must now indeed be laid aside. What hope could he now have with regard to the object of his dearest affections—for such he now was conscious Miss Vernon had become to him—when his own original should appear? Miss Vernon had so plainly spoken her sentiments upon constancy and upon her love of variety, that there could not be a moment's doubt that she would prefer a gay young lieutenant himself to the representation, to the expression of even one of his best moods.

Ferdinand's despondency could not be concealed from Cecilia. She could read too well all that those features expressed. But she read there another thought that caused her greater sorrow.

A sudden fancy came to Ferdinand as he looked at his Cecilia saddened and deserted; for his conscience (daguerreotypes have a consciousness which answers for a conscience) told him that he had indeed been faithless to her. He would fain give her something to hope for; and he was directly revived by the idea that Lieutenant Bertrand might win that love he no longer sought for himself.

This was very clumsy of Ferdinand; but he had never read any old-fashioned novels. What Cecilia had taught him of eternal affection, Miss Vernon had taught him to forget. And indeed her talk had often been of the modern novels of the present day, where the poor authors, who are obliged to bring some novelty to rouse the cloyed appetites of their readers, are fond of presenting inconstancy as the rule, and constancy the exception.

As for Cecilia, though the first thought of Lieutenant Bertrand's return, as one who would at last carry away her rival, had been welcome to her, yet the feeling was but transitory. She felt that Ferdinand was estranged from her. Her own misery was sure, and she believed that Ferdinand's happiness was utterly wrecked. And so in her generosity she suffered doubly both for herself and him.

If for an instant she was visited by a gleam of hope, and, remembering the former happy days, thought for a moment they might return, it was directly checked by the idea that Ferdinand was changed! Yes, in this thought she must needs be confirmed when she saw in him the hateful idea that it was possible for her, for Cecilia, to love another! Indeed then, Ferdinand must be changed! A daguerreotype change! Yes, she fancied she could trace upon that plate, once so highly polished, spots and stains. She remembered hearing that if the air were allowed to penetrate to the plate of a daguerreotype it was destructive to its impression. Yes, the air must have penetrated to Ferdinand—the air of the world! It was that which had stained his purity, and impaired his refinement! She loved him still. Yes! as long as a trace of his beloved shadow remained upon the plate he was still her Ferdinand. And even then, should she be doomed to live on, his figure would still exist for her. The glass that protected her had occasionally, in certain lights, reflected his image; and there she believed it would still linger, as firmly as if Daguerre himself had fixed it.

The prospect of her brother's return had caused also some uneasiness to Minna. She was beginning to doubt if Miss Vernon could be every thing to Lieutenant Bertrand. She had been unable to detect any of that warmth and depth of feeling which she was willing to imagine in Miss Vernon. Could it be possible she could have changed so in two years! Was she no longer the old Cecilia!

Miss Bertrand did not know that Miss Vernon had never been the Cecilia of her imagination, and but for one moment the Cecilia that adorned the wall of the boudoir.

Miss Vernon was a little agitated too. She was involving herself more than she dared confess, in her flirtation with Ferdinand the daguerreotype. She had rather not yield to the original at a moment's notice. She was not unwilling to enter into Minna's visions, but she had rather not be a puppet in them. As for any thing serious with Lieutenant Bertrand, she never knew what seriousness was, on such subjects, except in some few moments when Ferdinand the daguerreotype had been unusually effective.

But Lieutenant Bertrand came home. He visited Minna's boudoir when she was there without her friend. He was to Minna the same brother he had always been. He praised her Italian and Spanish accent, when she timidly attempted a conversation with him in those languages. He tossed aside a little contemptuously the volume of Tennyson which was lying where he wanted to rest his elbow; and wondered why roses were always blue and violets red on ladies' tapestry work. He applauded the color and style of Minna's morning dress; he ridiculed the wings on her favorite cherub, and wondered what its brother cherub was carrying in his cheek.

At last he roused himself from his luxurious position in one of the comfortable lounges, to stand before his own daguerreotype. As he examined it, he smoothed with his glove—not the raven-down, his mustache was not black—the eider-down upon his upper lip. Next he adjusted his cravat in the mirror which was conveniently formed, in his present position, by the daguerreotype.

"Well, Minna, how does this wear, this picture of me? You must be tired enough of it by this time."

Minna answered that Cecilia Vernon had been quite charmed by it.

"Miss Vernon! You promised to show me her picture. This is it? That is a beautiful face; it has a fine expression, a little too sedate, perhaps. I think you have a fancy that way, Minna. Don't turn into a nun, pray! And Miss Vernon; you tell me she has passed a season in Paris; has she carried her head all the time in this downcast way, and have not the gayeties of the world once turned it?"

Minna would not commit herself to a description of Miss Vernon. She would very soon portray herself.

"Of course, a daguerreotype never conveys an idea of the original. I hope Miss Vernon was convinced of that fact when you displayed to her this stick that is supposed to represent me."

As he said this, Lieutenant Bertrand looked contemptuously at Ferdinand. How gladly would not Ferdinand have leaped from his frame, snatched his sword from its scabbard, and defied his own original, who had ventured to take Miss Vernon's name upon his lips. But alas! his scabbard was but a shadow, and there never was a sword beneath it! Besides, he himself was but a shadow, and his only life consisted in his existence on that same spot. The expression of manly honor, which his original had granted to him, could only chafe and goad him now. And now he began to grow hopeful. He was convinced Miss Vernon could never see in Lieutenant Bertrand what she had admired in Ferdinand. He was very sure she would never find in Lieutenant Bertrand the embodiment of her ideal.

Of vanity and conceit Lieutenant Bertrand did not have more than his allowable share. But it can be pardoned him if, at the moment the daguerreotype Ferdinand was taken, he had an unusual access of these two qualities. Perhaps as he was leaving his shadow upon the daguerreotype plate, he laid aside with it some superabundant good opinion of his personal appearance; and afterward, in active life, he may have developed more praiseworthy qualities which had been latent in the warm noon of a daguerreotype apartment.

Any how, Ferdinand had more than the full share of vanity, and as Lieutenant Bertrand left the room, he felt a glow of self-satisfaction and a consciousness of being uplifted above whatever fate might bring him. In this he was confirmed by the expression he traced in Cecilia's face. He saw plainly that for her, Lieutenant Bertrand bore no comparison with Ferdinand. Her faithfulness was gratifying to his self-love, and for a moment they seemed to be drawn nearer each other than they had been for months.

A part of the day Cecilia passed almost in rapture. The constant comparison she was fond of drawing between Lieutenant Bertrand and her beloved, renewed the old glow of her affection for him. Her expressions were exceedingly agreeable to Ferdinand. He had not seen Cecilia appear so lovely for a long time; and together they agreed most heartily in the feeling that Lieutenant Bertrand had nothing in him that was manly, and that it would be impossible for him to win any woman's affections.

Night closed upon these interchanges of feeling. Cecilia could no longer see Ferdinand, but she believed that the quiet of night might bring him a deeper kind of reflection than the light of day.

The morning dawned, and before it passed away brought a scene of intense agitation.

After Minna had left her boudoir, and, indeed, had left the house, an agitated hand opened the door of the room. It was Miss Vernon who entered, and under great excitement. At first she did not utter any words, but walked up and down the room distractedly. Her eyes sometimes fell upon Ferdinand, but they were turned away again directly.

After a long time, she seemed to be able to control herself, and almost inclined to laugh at her own enthusiasm. Once, when she stopped before Ferdinand, she exclaimed, "Why did not Minna tell me his hair and mustache were colorless! and that he never had any style or air! I forgot that daguerreotypes could not betray the real colors; and I fancied the stiffness was all owing to one of these things daguerreotypists will insist on cramping the head of the victim with."

It seemed as if Miss Vernon's words were always meant to carry off the very lightest and most frothy part of her nature; but that she could not give utterance to her real agitation was very evident.

Again she walked the room, and then seated herself at the writing-table. She filled a whole sheet of paper with hastily written sentences, and then threw it beneath the grate. Then more composedly, and with a firm smile upon her lips, she took a sheet of delicately-tinted note-paper, and wrote a few words. This she placed in an envelope, and sealed it carefully. Then she went toward Ferdinand, took the daguerreotype from where it hung, concealed it under her mantle, and left the room!

Cecilia, who had been watching her movements with an interest and a sympathy she would have liked to express, beheld this last act of Miss Vernon's with a stunned helplessness. She would have uttered a scream of agony if shadows had ever a voice; her eyes were strained toward the spot where, from the fluttering of Miss Vernon's mantle, she could catch one glimpse of Ferdinand's eyes. They seemed to gaze back upon her with a wondrous longing, and yet with a half-defined triumph. Cecilia knew only too well they were looking at her for the last time.

Minna soon came into her boudoir, and directly saw the note of her friend. In some surprise she read it aloud:

"Minna dear, I am going to Washington this afternoon. I carry off your brother's daguerreotype to see if I can match its frame. I could not describe it to Jones to-day. What a shame I miss seeing you. Farewell."

As Minna seated herself to read this note, she saw a sheet of paper under the grate. It was a little burnt in some places, but she could make out a number of the sentences written upon it.

"So I fell in love with an ideal! Born in the woods to be scared at an owl! Brought up utterly scorning any thing but what I saw and touch, and now I am quite upset because I have fallen in love with an idea, a spirit, a something that there is not! I saw you come into Mail-lard's with a gentleman. 'Who is that with Minna Bertrand?' I asked Mrs. Liston. 'Don't you know Minna's brother?' she answered. While she chattered of his history, and raved about chocolate and crème, I discovered that Lieutenant Bertrand was not my Ferdinand, that he never was and never could be. I hastened away, and I take refuge here. I am going to take away the only object I ever loved, and Minna, I shall never see you again!"

Minna took this fragment as the true reading of Miss Vernon's little note. It was translated out of pale buffs into blotted white. But the little note she showed to Lieutenant Bertrand. He went on to Washington directly, but returned the very next day; said nothing of Miss Vernon, and plunged eagerly into the society around him.

Ferdinand was never restored to Minna. She had but one note more from Miss Vernon. This was when she announced to Minna that she was to be married the next week. She was going to marry a man twice as old as herself, with one leg, cross-eyed, and nothing handsome about him but his fortune.

The night after she received this last note, Minna sat in her boudoir. She had placed herself by her desk to look over her letters; and she had made a resolution to burn all Miss Vernon's. But there were some letters she found she must read before she destroyed them, and the task became a long one.

Late at night she was startled by a sound behind her. The daguerreotype of Cecilia had fallen to the ground; the cord that had suspended it was worn away, and the picture had fallen upon its face. When she raised it, Minna discovered that the glass was broken, and presently she found, to her great regret, that in moving it she had effaced the impression of the daguerreotype.

There was nothing left of the figure of Cecilia but one corner of the lace of her embroidered pocket-handkerchief.

At midnight there was a halo round the moon. Its shadowy circle took color and lost it again; wreathed fantastically around its silver centre, then drew quite away, leaving a clear circle of unclouded sky around the moon itself. Across this cloudless space a faint shadowy figure might have been seen to glide, and then become lost within that silver light, as if it were welcomed by something of its own nature.

The next day Minna was interrupted in her boudoir by the entrance of her younger sister Fanny.

"Minna dear, oh! could you give me this frame that was upon that old daguerreotype of you. Honora Percival and I are going to exchange daguerreotypes, and I want to put hers in the very prettiest frame I can find. We mean to keep them forever!"

Minna assented, sighingly and smilingly, and closed the door as quickly as possible upon Fanny and the handsomely carved frame. As she did so, she said:

"Is it so? I was thinking

'There are no birds in last year's nest!'"

THE FATE OF THE FIRST AERONAUT.

THE church-yard of the village of Wimille, about four miles north of Boulogne-sur-Mer, skirts the imperial road to Calais. Just at the middle of the boundary-wall a stone tablet rises, inscribed with small capitals, and surmounted at the top with something which is very like a petrified cauliflower. It is meant to represent a balloon on fire. The inscription (in French) runs to the following effect: "In this cemetery are interred Francois Pilâtre de Rosier and Pierre Ange Romain, who, desiring to pass over to England in an air-balloon, in which they had combined the agency of fire and of inflammable air, by an accident, whose veritable cause will always remain unknown, the fire having caught the upper part of the balloon, they fell from the height of more than five thousand feet between Wimereux and the sea." The inscription is repeated in a Latin duplicate, for the benefit of traveling strangers who do not understand French. The said travelers are also apostrophized: "Passers-by, mourn their lot, and pray God for the repose of their souls!" Annual masses for their souls' repose, at the date corresponding to their rapid descent, were founded in the parish church of Wimille; whether or not the ninety-three revolution swept away the masses, I can not say. The Curé would give an answer to those who wish to know. Their lot was mournful; but even stronger than our pity is the feeling which urges us to find out how the deuce it happened. I resolved to try what could be done to that effect, and at last made out a theory which may, or may not, be the true one.

The church-yard memorial was not the only one that was raised to mark the horrible catastrophe. In the camp of Wimereux, just behind the Café du Petit Caporal, which is next door to the Estaminet du Ballon, a small obelisk of marble from the neighboring quarries of Ferques, built without any, or with the least possible mortar, and not more than eight or nine feet high, rises on the spot where the aeronauts were dashed to the ground. When I first knew it, it stood in solitude in the midst of a grassy, down-like waste, half undermined by moles, and almost pushed off its pedestal by the cattle, who used it as a rubbing-post. The parties that seemed to favor it with the longest notice were the mushrooms who peeped above-ground from time to time, some singly, some in little family groups of three or four, but all apparently considering, under their broad-brimmed hats, whether it would not be an act of charity to the memory of the deceased, to surround their half-ruined monument with a railing. That also bears its record, in French, supplying a few additional particulars: "Here fell from the height of more than five thousand feet, at thirty-five minutes past seven in the morning, the unfortunate aeronauts Pilâtre de Rosier and Romain the elder, who started from Boulogne at five minutes after seven, in the morning of the fifteenth of June, seventeen hundred and eighty-five. The first was found dead upon the spot; the second gave a few signs of life during one or two minutes."

The best means, I thought, of solving the problem of their fall, was to find up any persons who had witnessed it. I was more fortunate than might have been expected, with an event occurring sixty years ago. In a hamlet to the north of Wimereux, I found an old woman more than a hundred years old, who had seen the balloon ascend from Boulogne. She was dozing and dreaming over a fire of dry furze, staring at the sparks with her filmy eyes. I wonder whether she could see with those eyes, even after she turned them on me as I entered her hovel.

"What do you want with me?" she said, in a voice that belonged to the other world. "You don't know me, and I don't know you. I'm of no use to any body, now."

"But I know you," my companion said. And then he began to talk about their acquaintance, and then about the obelisk, and then about Pilâtre de Rosier.

"I saw him and his friend go up," she said, suddenly waking, as if inspired. "I was close to them. He was a handsome man, and looked so smiling. As the balloon rose, he saluted and bowed to all the people, and waved his flags continually in this way, so, until he had mounted quite high in the sky." And then she suited the action to the word, waving her arms in imitation of poor De Rosier. "My arms then were not like this," she continued, pulling the skin which hung loosely about them. "I had handsome arms once. Yes; he waved his arms so." And then she fell again into her dreamy state, the precursor of the long sleep of death, from which nothing could rouse her. All the further information we could extract was, that he waved his arms, comme ça, and that hers were once handsome arms.

It struck me that the excellent Museum at Boulogne might contain some relics of this tragical tumble. I found them there, and better than them. Monsieur Duburquois, senior, an intelligent old man, the father of the present well-informed curator of the museum, was at Wimereux when the aeronauts fell, and helped to lift them from the ground. He was thirteen years of age at the time. He told me that De Rosier, quite dead, had one of his legs broken, and that the bone pierced through the tight-fitting trowsers; and that Romain heaved three or four deep sighs, and then expired. He picked up a piece of bread, partially eaten, that fell with them. A bottle of wine, that had been uncorked, and had had a glass or two drunk from it, accompanied them in their fall, and most extraordinarily was not broken.

The museum has the portrait of De Rosier in powdered wig and frilled shirt, besides a colored medalion in wax. He is styled "the first aeronaut of the universe;" to which title there would be nothing to object, if we were but perfectly cognizant of the atmospherical conditions of every other sun, planet, and satellite in the universe. There are besides, his barometer, thermometer, speaking-trumpet, and the wand in which his little waving flag was attached. There is the painted cloth which surrounded the gallery of the Montgolfière, or flying fire-place, which helped him to ascend; there is a little piece of the taffetas, or oiled-silk, covered with gold-beater's skin, which contained his float of hydrogen gas; and that is all the material evidence to be found.

Our readers may remember that Pilâtre de Rosier was ambitious to be the first to cross the English channel in a balloon. He had already the honor of being the first man who ascended in the earth's atmosphere, in a captive balloon as a first experiment, and afterward in one at liberty to rise and wander whither it would, in which bold excursion he was accompanied by the Marquis d'Arlandes. The first living creatures that made a balloon ascent, were a sheep, a cock, and a duck, conjointly travelers through the region of clouds. Since then, equestrian ascents have been made by terrified horses, mounted by fool-hardy men. In all these latter cases, it may be believed that an ass made one of the party.

In crossing the channel, De Rosier was forestalled by his countryman (Blanchard) and our compatriot (Jefferies), who started from Dover, and landed in the forest of Guines, on the seventh of January, seventeen hundred and eighty-five. Nevertheless, he had drawn upon government funds; and he still adhered to his purpose of passing in a balloon from France to England, as his more fortunate rival had done from England to France. The latter feat has been several times repeated, the former has never yet been accomplished. De Rosier had given the Controller-General of Finances to understand that, if he would pay the expense of the expedition, he (Pilâtre) would execute it. His request was granted; he received forty-two thousand francs (about $8000) as a first installment, which was afterward said to be increased till it amounted to the enormous sum of a hundred and fifty thousand francs. Romain, who then enjoyed a great repute for manufacturing balloons, made an agreement with Pilâtre, by which he bound himself to construct one of thirty feet diameter, or thereabouts, for the sum of three hundred louis-d'ors. Pilâtre, whose business was to find the work-room, obtained from the governor of the Tuileries the Salle des Gardes and another apartment. The work, begun at the end of August, seventeen hundred and eighty-four, was completed six weeks afterward. Six hundred ells of white taffeta were employed in fabricating this ill-starred machine.

Romain had strictly kept to himself the secret of rendering taffeta impermeable to gas. He was careful beyond measure to conceal his mode of preparation. He worked in solitude, like an alchemist, and was only known to have one single companion of his studies, who aided him gratuitously in the construction of his balloon. The whole secret consisted in covering the taffeta with a coat of linseed oil made capable of drying by sugar of lead, and in pressing in till it only felt greasy in the hand. Every strip was then covered with gold-beater's skin, that was made to adhere by ordinary size, in which was incorporated a mixture of honey and linseed oil. These ingredients gave suppleness to the size, and prevented the united superficies from cracking. A second and third layer of gold-beater's skin were added; and the balloon, when finished, thirty-three and a half French feet in diameter, and ornamented with tinsel in different parts, weighed three hundred and twenty pounds, including the cylindrical apparatus that helped to fill it. So impermeable was it, that it remained distended with atmospheric air for two months, without showing a single wrinkle. If De Rosier had then ascended from Paris, it would have carried him almost whither-soever he would. At the end of two months, the balloon, carefully packed, was transported to Boulogne, which Pilâtre had chosen as his starting-point. Of course, the packing and transport for so long a distance by land carriage, rendered it still more difficult to preserve uninjured so perishable an article as a balloon, with the little previous experience of managing it that had been acquired. A montgolfière also traveled with it, twenty feet high, whose cupola was formed of chamois leather. It was tested before its departure for the coast, and its success corresponded to the care that had been bestowed upon it.

The montgolfière, or fire-balloon, was, either accidentally or purposely, directly or indirectly, the immediate cause of Pilâtre's fearful end. He had announced some new combination of the means of ascent, which he shrouded as far as he could in mystery. It seems to have been his idea, that the gas-balloon would be sufficient to carry him, while the fire-balloon would give him great command of equilibrium, by increasing or diminishing the fire in it, so as almost to render him independent of ballast. His confidence in the long-sustaining power of his machine was one means of procuring him pecuniary aid from the government. Whatever might be the ærostatic advantages gained, the danger was increased enormously. Either a gas-balloon or a fire-balloon, alone, was infinitely safer than the two united. To crown the whole rash scheme, the hydrogen gas must necessarily float above the montgolfière. As his friend, Professor Charles, remonstrated with him, "You are putting a chafing-dish under a barrel of gunpowder."

Pilâtre arrived at Boulogne on the twentieth of December, seventeen hundred and eighty-four, followed by the anxious wishes of the subscribers to his scientific Lyceum, and also of numerous ladies of the court, who had requested him to bring back innumerable small articles from England to serve as New Year's Day presents. Two days after his arrival he was informed of the preparations which Blanchard was making in England for a voyage which should compete with his own. He became alarmed. He went to Dover; saw Blanchard; and, for a moment, entertained the hope (on account of the dilapidated condition of the balloon, from which the gas oozed in many places) that the rival ascent could not take place. His anxious fears soon resumed their power; he returned to Boulogne; left there Romain and his brother, who had accompanied him, and went to Paris in a feverish state of mental torture.

Meanwhile, Blanchard and Jefferies ascended from Dover, and reached the Forest of Gaines safe and sound. Pilâtre's pride received a mortal wound at failing to be the first to cross the sea. He entreated to be excused attempting the voyage. Some say that the Controller of Finances consented, merely claiming the surplus of what had not been disbursed about the balloon. But the wretched Pilâtre, sure of success, had already spent it in enriching the experimental department of his Lyceum. Others state that when he explained his doubts and apprehensions to M. de Calonne, the minister, he met with a cold and even rough reception.

"We have not spent a hundred and fifty thousand francs," he said, "merely to help you to make an inland trip. You must turn the balloon to some useful account, and cross the channel with it."

However, in the impossibility of fulfilling the first conditions, and under the necessity of at least attempting the second, he returned to Boulogne, prepared for, and evidently expecting, the worst.

It may appear strange that a minister of the crown should be so anxious about the accomplishment of a mere scientific whim—as the balloon passage from France to England would seem to be—and should advance so large a sum of money to further it. But there was more than a scientific result in the background, and De Rosier was probably well aware of it. It was the common report of that day, that the grand object of Pilâtre's attempt was to effect the escape of Louis the Sixteenth and his family to Great Britain, by an aerial route, since terrestrial ways, it was instinctively felt, were already closed against their departure. It was already foreseen by acute observers of the signs of the times, that the royal family of France was already doomed. The King's want of energy, Egalité's profligacy, Necker's vanity, the obstinate pride of the aristocracy, and the wrongs and sufferings of the people, all tended to one inevitable catastrophe. The King, even then, had not a will of his own; his house was not his castle, nor his actions free. He was drifting down the stream with that increased rapidity which denotes unmistakably that a cataract is near. No person of ordinary penetration would be surprised to find him not long afterward a prisoner in the Tuileries, walking in the gardens with six grenadiers of the milice bourgeoise about him, with the garden gates shut in consequence of his presence, to be opened to the public as soon as he entered the palace. He might order a little railed-off garden for his son, the Dauphin, to amuse himself in; but the poor boy could not be permitted to work with his little hoe and rake without a guard of two grenadiers. Louis's most attached friends, as well as his most implacable enemies, foresaw all this, and what followed it. A balloon was one of the schemes to rescue him; and Pilâtre de Rosier was the man pitched upon to manage it.

It was a desperate chance, the most sanguine will admit. Even had they been launched precipitously with a favorable wind, a sudden change of that fickle element might have swept them hopelessly toward the arctic horrors of the North Sea, or to the interminable waves of the Atlantic Ocean. We shudder to imagine such a dreadful fate as possibly awaiting a delicately-nurtured king with his wife and children; we reflect, however, that such a speedy termination to their sufferings, arriving at last in the course of a few days, would have been mercy in comparison to what they were afterward really made to endure.

Pilâtre, then, seriously prepared for his departure. He sent off numerous pilot balloons, which were constantly driven back to the continent by adverse west and northwest winds. All this caused considerable delay, during which the balloon, exposed to the wear and tear of the elements, was considerably damaged; it was even nibbled by rats. Henceforward, the machine on which such care and expense had been bestowed, became leaky and worthless, in consequence of ill-treatment and want of shelter.

A better prospect opened at last; and as the wind was favorable, blowing from the southeast, the departure was fixed for the fifteenth of June. As the weather was exceedingly hot, preparations were commenced at daybreak, and all was ready by seven o'clock. A salute of artillery announced the launch into air. The ascent was majestic. The balloon rose perpendicularly to its greatest elevation; it then sailed in a northerly direction, over the top of the cliff of La Crèche, when a current from the upper regions of the atmosphere, which had been foreseen by sailors best acquainted with Channel navigation, wafted it gently toward the continent. Twenty-three minutes had elapsed since the ropes were loosed which held the machine captive; the acclamations of the spectators had not ceased; every eye was strained to gaze after the aerial voyagers, when, just as the wind drove them back to France, cries of alarm from the united crowd announced the fearful calamity which it witnessed. A bright light burst from the upper balloon; a volume of smoke succeeded it; and then commenced the rapid fall which filled all present with consternation. The scene was frightful; the crowd shuddered with apprehension of what was immediately to follow, and swung backward and forward like tempest-tossed waves. After the first shock of terror, a great number of people rushed to Wimersreux, in the vain hope of rendering some assistance. They arrived only to find the adventurers past all human aid.

I can not help entertaining a suspicion that Pilâtre de Rosier perished by suicide; that he willfully set fire to the balloon when he found there was an end of all his hopes. It is true that the almost fulminating arrangement of his apparatus might have caused the explosion to result from accident or indiscretion; and therefore no more than a suspicion ought to be suggested. But persons who watched the progress of the balloon with telescopes, assert that the valve of the hydrogen balloon was not secured. Pilâtre, too, was a doubly ruined man; ruined in money, and ruined in prestige. Blanchard had robbed him of his crowning ambition; and now an envious puff of wind forbade his ever being allowed to attempt the transportation of the royal family. Pilâtre's coolness, presence of mind, and faculty of avoiding impending danger, were notorious; so also were his vanity, pride, violence, and recklessness of life. A man who, in prosperity, could fill his mouth with hydrogen gas, and set fire to it there, and who could expose himself repeatedly to be struck dead in hazardous electrical experiments, was not likely to hesitate when he had to choose between disgrace and despair. His friend Charles had threatened to blow his brains out, if the timid king persisted in forbidding him to make an ascent that threatened danger, and which, wisely on his part, was his first and last ascent, or rather two consecutive first and last ascents on one day. We know, too, the immense interest which the court (the queen particularly) felt in Pilâtre's success. These, and numerous other minor scraps of evidence, all lead to the inference that De Rosier's death was even more tragical than has been currently believed. If there be the slightest truth in the notion, Romain is even more greatly to be pitied. He had refused the Marquis of Maisonfort's offer of two hundred louis-d'ors to resign his place.

The spot where they fell is a very, very little way from the sea. The conflagration must have taken place almost immediately after the direction of their course was altered. I have several times asked, of people competent to judge, whether, if they had fallen into the sea, instead of upon the land, they could by any possibility have escaped with life. The answer has been that perhaps they might. Conceive the idea of talking face to face with a man who had fallen from the height of more than five thousand feet!

Monthly Record of Current Events.

THE UNITED STATES.

THE recent State elections have resulted unfavorably to the National Administration. The candidates presented by the "Know Nothing" or "American" party have to a great extent formed a centre around which all the elements of opposition to the Administration have gathered. In New Hampshire, the vote for Governor, stated in round numbers, was as follows:

|------------------------------------|--------|
| Metcalf, Know Nothing | 33,000 |
| Baker, Democrat | 27,000 |
| Bell, Whig | 8,500 |
| Fowler, Free Soil | 1,100 | leaving a majority for Metcalf, over all others, of about 1400. At the last election, the Administration candidate had a clear majority, over all others, of 1748. The three Members of Congress chosen from this State are all opposed to the Administration; their aggregate majority over their Democratic opponents is about 12,000. The Legislature, in both branches, is Anti-Administration by very large majorities. This is of more importance from the fact that upon this Legislature will devolve the choice of two United States Senators in place of Messrs. Williams and Wells.—The result of the gubernatorial election in Connecticut is nearly as follows:

|----------------------------------|--------|
| Miner, Know Nothing | 28,000 |
| Ingham, Democrat | 27,000 |
| Dutton, Whig | 8,700 |

VOL. X.—No. 60.—3 G

No choice of State officers was made by the people; but the Legislature, upon whom the election will therefore devolve, is Opposition by a decided majority. The four Members of Congress chosen were supported by the Know Nothings and the Whigs. They are opposed to the Administration and to the Nebraska Bill.—In Rhode Island the vote was very light, the Democrats, to a considerable extent, absenting themselves from the polls. The vote for Governor stood:

|-----------------------------------|--------|
| Hopkin, Know Nothing | 10,500 |
| Potter, Democrat | 3,800 |

The Opposition candidates for Members of the Legislature and for Congress were elected by large majorities. In a great number of local and municipal elections, held in different sections of the country, the new political element of opposition to foreigners has been made prominent, and with comparatively few exceptions its introduction has been attended with marked success. There can be no doubt that for some time to come this element will enter largely into all elections throughout the country. As an illustration of the extent of this feeling, we place upon permanent record the outlines of an event which would otherwise have been of slight importance: In New York, on Sunday morning, February 24, a notorious bruiser named Poole, the leader of a gang of political bullies, was attacked by a rival gang of bullies, desperadoes, and gamblers, and mortally wounded. He lived, however, nearly a fortnight after receiving the wound. After his death it appeared upon a post-mortem examination that a pistol-ball had pierced his heart, and had remained imbedded in its substance. It happened that a portion of the gang by which he was murdered were of foreign birth, while Poole was an American. This, added to the fact that the murder was committed under circumstances of extreme brutality, occasioned great excitement. Associations were formed to do honor to his memory; and his remains were followed to the grave by a procession probably larger than was ever before formed in the city. A public oration in his honor was subsequently delivered, with the intention of repeating it elsewhere. The actual perpetrator of the murder having made his escape, as was supposed in a merchantman for the Cape de Verde Islands, a swift-sailing vessel was chartered and sent in pursuit. A large number of persons are implicated in the murder, either as principals or as accessories before or after the fact; among the number is one member of the City Council.—In Cincinnati, upon occasion of the municipal election, held April 2, the feeling of hostility between the "natives" and the "foreigners" broke out into a violent riot, which continued at intervals for a number of days, in the course of which some lives were lost.—An election for Members of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas was held, pursuant to the Governor's proclamation, on the 30th of March. The candidates in favor of the introduction of slavery into the Territory received a decided majority of the votes cast. By the terms of the proclamation ordering the election the right of voting was restricted to those who had taken up a residence in the Territory with the intention of making it permanent. It is alleged by the defeated party that this restriction was wholly disregarded, and that a large number of votes were cast by citizens of Missouri, who had entered the Territory merely for the purpose of voting.—The Legislature of New York has passed a very stringent law for the prevention of intemperance, pauperism, and crime. It provides that no intoxicating liquors shall be kept for sale or deposited except in a warehouse, dwelling house, church, or establishment where it is used for medicinal, sacramental, mechanical, or chemical purposes. Any citizen of good moral character, who is not a keeper of a house of entertainment, or place of amusements, or an employee on board a vessel, may keep liquors for sale for the above purposes, upon filing a declaration of his intention with the county clerk, and giving adequate securities against the infringement of the law. He can only sell to persons of the age of twenty-one years, of good character, whom he believes to wish it for legal purposes. He is prohibited from selling any liquor which he knows to be adulterated. He must keep an accurate account of his sales and purchases of liquor, which account must be filed monthly with the collector of the town or city, and the account must be open to the examination of any resident of the place where he resides. Violations of the provisions of the law are to be punished by fine and imprisonment. Provision is made for the search of any house in which liquor is suspected, upon good grounds, to be illegally kept. Liquor forfeited under this law is to be destroyed. Intoxication in any store, tavern, or public place is to be punished by a fine of ten dollars; and any person found intoxicated is compelled to testify against the person from whom he obtained the liquor. Intoxicating liquors are defined to include "alcohol, distilled and malt liquors, and all liquors that can intoxicate, and all drugged liquors, and mixed liquors, part of which is alcohol, distilled or malt liquor." The law is not to be construed to prohibit the sale of cider, in quantities of not less than ten gallons, not to be drunk on the premises where sold; or to prevent the manufacturers of alcohol or of pure wine from disposing of them, or the importers of foreign liquors from keeping or disposing of the same, in the original packages, to those authorized by the law to sell liquors. Nor does it extend to articles composed in part of alcohol or spirituous liquors which from their nature are not adapted to be used as beverages. The law contains very minute directions as to the manner in which suits are to be brought against those charged with its infraction. After a long and animated debate the bill passed in the Senate by a vote of 21 to 11, and in the House by 80 to 45. It has received the sanction of the Governor, and goes into full force on the 4th of July. Since 1851, acts of this general character have been passed by the Legislatures of Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Ohio, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota. In four of the above States they have been pronounced unconstitutional by the judicial authorities. In New Hampshire, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey similar bills have passed in one branch of the Legislature, but failed in the other.—An attempt has been made in Philadelphia and New York, under the authority of the Government of Nova Scotia, to procure men to embark for Halifax with the design of enlisting in a regiment to be sent to the Crimea. This being brought to the notice of the proper authorities, it was pronounced an infraction of the Neutrality Act of 1819, and the attempt was abandoned.

From California we have intelligence of a financial crash which resulted in the failure of the banking houses of Adams and Co. and Page, Bacon, and Co., concerns most largely engaged in the transaction of business between California and the Atlantic States. The excitement was very great, and a general rush was made upon other banking establishments. These, however, sustained themselves with the exception of two or three of very doubtful character. The two large houses show, upon paper, an excess of assets over liabilities; but in the case of one it is considered certain, and in that of the other probable, that total bankruptcy is inevitable, the assets being in such shape that they can realize but a small proportion of their nominal value. This, together with the scarcity of water, which has greatly impeded mining operations, has caused the shipments of gold to be unusually small. A new mining district, reported to be of great richness, has been discovered in the neighborhood of Kern River.

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

From Mexico it is impossible to obtain any perfectly reliable information in respect to the insurrection, undertaken by General Alvarez. Some accounts place the insurgents in the immediate vicinity of the capital, with every prospect of success; while others state that Santa Anna has defeated them, and forced the main body to fall back in total confusion. The latest accounts from the capital are that Santa Anna had returned in triumph from his expedition against Alvarez, and had met with an enthusiastic reception in the city of Mexico. In Yucatan the war of races is carried on with the utmost virulence, and the government has been wholly unable to interpose any adequate check or protection.

Central America presents its wonted aspect of confusion and petty warfare. Honduras has been invaded by an army from Guatemala, the commander of which issued a proclamation denouncing the government of Honduras for its grant in favor of the Inter-Oceanic Railway Company.

Cuba has been for months in a state of alarm from apprehensions of another invasion from the United States, supported by an insurrection upon the island. An extensive conspiracy had been detected, and many arrests had been made of the alleged conspirators, a number of whom had been condemned and executed. Among these is Señor Estrampes, who is represented to be a citizen of the United States. He was garoted on the 80th of March, in spite of the protest of the American Consul, who asserted that his trial was conducted in a manner contrary to the treaty between the United States and Spain. The naval and military forces on the island have been greatly augmented, and hints have been flung out that the Spanish government were determined, in case of a formidable insurrection, to emancipate and arm the slaves. This intention has, however, been positively disclaimed by the Spanish Prime Minister. In reply to a question in the Cortes, he said that "the government entertained the profoundest conviction that slavery is a necessity and an indispensable condition to the maintenance of the territorial property of the island of Cuba; and the proprietors are assured that there is no intention of touching that principle." The United States steamers have been brought to on their passage by the Spanish armed vessels, under circumstances of very questionable character. Our government has dispatched a strong squadron to the Gulf, with orders, as it is understood, to prevent or punish any indignity offered to our flag.

GREAT BRITAIN.

In our last Record we announced the fact of the withdrawal of several members of the Palmerston Cabinet, in consequence of a vote of the House of Commons to appoint a Committee to inquire into the conduct of the war. Sir James Graham said, in explanation of this step, that he had hoped the recent changes in the Cabinet, and the measures of reform already instituted, would have been accepted as a sufficient guarantee for better management in future. But the House had persisted in the appointment of a committee of inquiry, a measure which he could not sanction, as he considered it to be unnecessary, inexpedient, and unjust. Mr. Sidney Herbert admitted the right of the House to appoint such a committee, and was ready to lay before it every word he had spoken, and every letter he had written. He had understood, however, that the ordering of this committee was to be considered as a vote of censure upon the former Ministry, and that upon the formation of a new Ministry it would not be persisted in. If such a committee were not a mere sham, it could not be other than a source of great injury. Mr. Gladstone assigned as his reason for quitting the government that he considered the ordering of the committee a fatal measure. By it the House wrested from the Executive the powers of government, and conferred them upon a portion of its own members. Lord Palmerston declared that he had no intention of resigning in consequence of the appointment of the Committee, and such he believed had been the determination of his colleagues. In reply to Mr. Bright, who urged that measures should be taken to bring about a peace, he said that the Government adhered to the proposition made at Vienna, as the basis for negotiations, and that these were prosecuted in perfect good faith. But while they would endeavor to effect a treaty, no terms should be accepted which did not afford full security for the repose and independence of Europe. In the House of Peers Lord Lyndhurst inveighed in strong terms against the conduct of Prussia, as manifesting a degree of servility and vacillation which destroyed all possibility of putting faith in her. If Prussia were allowed to take part in the Vienna conference, she would act merely as the tool of Russia. The Earl of Clarendon acknowledged that there were good grounds for making these charges against Prussia; but said that there was now reason to hope that she would be induced to join the alliance against Russia. In reply to a question in regard to Hungary and Poland, Lord Palmerston said that the Austrian government had long known that the government of Great Britain would consider it a great misfortune to the world if Hungary should cease to form a portion of the Austrian Empire; since Austria, as a great State in the centre of Europe, was essential to the balance of power. Poland, however, as now constituted, was a standing menace to Germany, and it would be for the German powers, in the event of a general war, to determine how far the condition of Poland should be changed. This question, however, formed no part of the negotiations now in progress. The evidence of numerous and competent witnesses before the Parliamentary committee of inquiry substantiates the worst features of the accounts heretofore given of the mismanagement of the war. The expedition to the Crimea was undertaken in utter ignorance of the obstacles to be encountered. The arrangements for the sustenance and comfort of the troops were every way defective; and owing to the most trivial defects in routine, the forces were deprived of the benefit of supplies which had been forwarded. The evidence is very voluminous, but all tends in one direction. A bitter controversy has sprung up between Lord Raglan and Lord Lucan, each endeavoring to throw upon the other the responsibility of the fatal Light Cavalry charge at Balaklava.

THE CONTINENT.

The Emperor of Russia died at St. Petersburg on the 2d of March, in the fifty-ninth year of his age. He succeeded his brother Alexander, who died at Taganrog, on the shores of the Black Sea, on the 1st of December, 1825. The Grand Duke Constantine, as the elder surviving brother, was the proper heir to the throne. But this prince, whose violent temper fell little short of absolute insanity, had some years before renounced his right of succession in favor of Nicholas. This renunciation was supposed to have been the price paid for the consent of the Emperor to his marriage with a Polish lady for whom he had conceived a violent attachment. But whether it had been voluntary or enforced, the Grand Duke adhered to his pledge, and as soon as the tidings of the death of Alexander reached Warsaw, he took the oath of fealty to his younger brother Nicholas. Nicholas in the meanwhile refused to recognize his brother's renunciation in his favor, and caused Constantine to be proclaimed Emperor at St. Petersburg. The contest between the two brothers, each endeavoring to secure the accession of the other, lasted some weeks. The firmness of Constantine at length prevailed, and Nicholas ascended the throne. During the interregnum a conspiracy, which had been for a long time forming, broke out into open insurrection. A portion of the troops were persuaded that the resignation of Constantine was fabricated, and they took up arms in his favor. The intrepidity and presence of mind of Nicholas soon put down the insurrection, and those who had taken part in it were punished with unsparing severity. The subsequent history of the reign of Nicholas links itself with the whole course of European history, and he succeeded in raising his country to a position among the European nations far higher than it had ever before occupied. The predominant characteristics of the Emperor were indefatigable energy and indomitable will. For the last four or five years his health has been gradually giving way. His violent temper wore upon a physical system weakened by constant labor. In order to counteract a constitutional tendency to obesity, he had recourse to strict regimen and violent means of repression. About the middle of February he was attacked by a violent influenza, which became so severe that, on the 22d, his physician endeavored to persuade him to keep his room, assuring him that no physician in the army would allow a common soldier in his condition to leave the hospital. The Emperor disregarded this advice, and attended a review of a body of troops. This was his last appearance in public, though he transacted business for two or three days longer. On the 28th his case assumed a serious aspect, and paralysis of the lungs was apprehended. On the 1st of March it was announced to him that his case was hopeless. He received the intelligence with the utmost calmness, bade his family farewell, and partook of the Sacrament. He expired on the next day, about noon. Almost his last words were devoted to a message to his brother-in-law, the King of Prussia, exhorting him to remain faithful to his alliance with Russia. Some suspicions have been expressed that his death was occasioned by poison, but they appear to rest on no adequate grounds. His age, and the state of his health for some time previous, taken in conjunction with the harassing condition of public affairs, rendered his sudden death an event in the highest degree probable. He was quietly succeeded by his eldest son, the Grand Duke Alexander, born in 1818. The new Emperor has always borne the reputation of having a mild and pacific disposition, and it has been supposed that his father was desirous of diverting the succession from him to his more impetuous brother Constantine. The accession of Alexander was at first considered to augur favorably for the establishment of peace; but there seems no good reason for believing that Alexander can or will depart from the hereditary policy of his family. He has in fact, in various public documents, proclaimed his adherence to this policy. In his manifesto upon taking possession of the throne, he says, "May Providence so aid us that we may be able to strengthen Russia in the highest degree of power and glory; that by us may be accomplished the views and designs of our illustrious predecessors, Peter, Catherine, Alexander, and our august father of imperishable memory." His speech to the diplomatic corps breathes a warlike spirit. "If," said he, "the conferences which are about to open at Vienna do not lead to a result honorable to us, then at the head of my faithful Russia, I will combat, and I will perish sooner than yield."

The Vienna Conference has commenced its sessions. Prussia is not represented. The first of the four points, placing the Principalities under the joint protection of the five great Powers, has been acceded to. The stipulation as to the free navigation of the Danube will probably cause but little difficulty. The main obstacle to peace, which will probably be found insuperable, will be the third point, which looks to the dismantling of Sebastopol, and the reduction of the Russian fleet in the Black Sea.—Sardinia has joined the alliance against Russia, and is about to send an auxiliary force of 15,000 men to the seat of war. Russia has formally declared war against Sardinia.—It is now considered certain that the Emperor of France is about to set off in person for the scene of hostilities. Preparatory to this expedition large reinforcements are on the point of being sent to the French army. A pamphlet, purporting to be by a French General Officer, sharply criticising the conduct of the war and the character of the Emperor, has been published. It excited some attention at first, as it was supposed to be the production of Prince Napoleon. Its publication was suppressed in France, and it made its appearance in Belgium.

THE EASTERN WAR.

Vigorous and effective measures have been taken to alleviate the condition of the English forces before Sebastopol. Abundant supplies of food and clothing are now provided: a railway has been pushed from Balaklava toward the lines, by which the exhausting labor of the troops has been much diminished. The sickness that has carried off such numbers is rapidly decreasing, and a general air of hope pervades the allied armies. But the Russian preparations for defense fully keep pace with those of the Allies for attack. Every assailable point in the fortifications has been strengthened by new works, which, according to the acknowledgment of the enemy, are admirably planned. They have even pushed forward their works in such a manner as seriously to threaten some important portions of the entrenchments of the Allies. On the 23d of February the French made an attack upon a new redoubt which the Russians had flung up the previous night in a commanding position. The attack was unsuccessful, and involved a heavy loss on the part of the French. The Russians, up to the 12th of March, which is the date of the latest intelligence, remained in quiet possession of their new position. Large convoys are continually observed entering the city. It may be considered a matter of doubt whether the fortifications of Sebastopol are as seriously threatened by the works of the Allies, as these are by the Russian defenses. Every thing, however, seems to indicate that it is the intention of the Allies to hazard a desperate assault upon the town at no very distant day. On the 17th of February the Russians made an attack upon Eupatoria, where the Turks, under Omer Pacha, are entrenched. The attack was apparently made by way of reconnaissance, rather than with any serious expectations of success. After some hours' fighting the Russians withdrew with considerable loss, but the Turks were unable to follow them.

Editor's Cable.

HISTORY, said Charles James Fox, occupies the second place in the court of Letters. Poetry comes first; then history; and lastly oratory. If rarity constitute any test of excellence, history might contend for the first place. The world has produced many more perfect poems than perfect histories. Nor could it be otherwise. The great historian must be a poet as well, under penalty of failing in an essential requisite. He must be gifted with a poetic mind, or half that is great and noble in history will escape him: who but a poet could realize Joan of Arc? The poet, on the other hand, need not be an historian. Historic precision would only clog his rapid strains; even Homer is heavy when he furnishes lists of killed and wounded. Tariffs and telegraphs, patents and police, congressional debates and city charters, steam-plows and exports are beyond the reach of any poet except, perhaps, Mr. Martin Farquhar Tupper. They are, however, strictly within the domain of history: essentials of it, in fact, not by any means to be overlooked. While Poetry can not invade this territory, her own is shared with History. She can not claim an incident, a passion, a character, as exclusively her own. Hence, perhaps, a necessity for a rarer combination of qualities to form a great historian than a great poet. The true master of history must command the glowing imagery of the bard with the close exactness of the statistician. He must be able to strike the lyre with Tyrtæus, and calculate the product of a tariff with De Bow. When Freedom's bands march to death or victory, his lines must ring with clarion sound; when Senator Smith moves to admit a new State, he must weigh the language of the Constitution with the nicety of a Supreme Court Judge.

It is hardly necessary to add that these qualifications are about as rare as some of those new elements which, as Berzelius eloquently laments, the eye of man hath never seen in a pure state. Mr. Allison, in one of his essays, his mind reverting no doubt to his own able but prejudiced history, declares that the world has only produced fourteen historians, six ancients and eight moderns. It may be questioned whether the learned sheriff has not been too liberal to his fellow-craftsmen. He has not mentioned the ancients to whom he allots niches in the temple of Clío; but if the six were Herodotus, Xenophon, Thucydides, Livy, Sallust, and Tacitus, his sentence will hardly escape criticism. The single defect of the speeches these writers have uniformly put in the mouths of their heroes disqualifies them from holding the front rank among historians. All possessed undoubted merit. Herodotus was a lecturer, a sort of Greek Silk Buckingham or Thackeray, who romanced to a fearful degree; not by any means intending to tell the truth, but aiming solely at narrating a pleasant story to the refined and polished audience assembled to hear him. Livy was, in some respects, the counterpart of Herodotus, though he addressed readers, not hearers. It has only been within the last few years, since Niebuhr in fact, that we have known how much of Livy was novel, and how much history. Like Herodotus, he was a charming narrator; told a story almost as well as Alexandre Dumas; and wrote in a far more correct and elegant style than the amusing author of Monte Christo. One of the ablest of modern critics has styled Sallust's performance a political pamphlet, written for the purpose of damning Catiline. It bears a strong resemblance to something of the kind, and as such stands on a par with some of the writings of Jefferson, or the political essays of Hamilton, which, it is gravely to be feared, will only be known to antiquaries a few centuries hence. Xenophon kept a journal and published it: it is valuable as the only authentic record of an important military operation, written by a man of correct taste and unusual learning. His other works are meritorious but prosy. The two ancients who remain, Thucydides and Tacitus, are undoubtedly the best of the batch. The descriptions of the former, and the philosophical narrative of the latter, are still unsurpassed; and, imperfectly as we can judge of so foreign a matter to us as the style of each, it appears admirable and almost perfect. Tacitus will always be favorite reading with men of vigorous minds. But when the first rank as historians is claimed for either of them, there are other matters to be considered. In the first place, as we said, nothing can palliate the supposititious speeches. It may be true that the persons in whose mouths they are put did in reality make speeches of the same tenor on the occasions referred to; but we know quite enough of the age at which they lived to be perfectly certain that the speeches spoken were not the speeches recorded in the histories. They are a perversion of fact which nothing can wholly excuse. Passing over this fatal defect—which, strange to say, is common also to the best historian of our Revolution—we find, in the midst of the admiration elicited by their many excellences, a hankering after something that is wanting in both. Neither has described to us the people of the day, or the manners of the age. Characters and particular events are done with an art which can never be surpassed. Both were gifted with wonderful dramatic skill. But Tacitus, having introduced us to a few groups of ambitious and reprobate Romans, wholly omits the nation at large; and Thucydides had no hesitation in expressing too much contempt for the masses to be at the trouble to describe them. There is more of the real history of Greece and Rome to be learnt from Aristophanes and Plautus, than from either.

Of the eight moderns classed as great historians by Mr. Allison, four are not designated by name. Which of the German writers are meant, whether it was intended to admit Mr. Prescott or Mr. Bancroft to the select historical octumvirate, we are left to conjecture. Both of the latter are better entitled to the honor than Robertson, and as well as Hume, who, with Gibbon, are said to be England's representatives. The recent discovery of the papers of Charles the Fifth, has well-nigh killed Dr. Robertson's chances of immortality. Posterity will never forgive him for having been ignorant of the best materials for his hero's biography. Nor will the philosophy of his very valuable work, or the eminent merits of his other contributions to the historical fund rescue him from ultimate oblivion. Others have taken his principles (which, indeed, he borrowed himself from Bacon and Machiavel), and building on his superstructure, have carried them farther than he dared; and yet, another class of writers, appropriating his generalizations, have issued, so to say, new editions of them, enlarged, corrected, and improved. His race is run. Hume has a better chance of enduring. There are parts of his history which approach very nearly to perfection. At times he is dull, at times disingenuous; but he had the historical secret, and as a whole, considering its extent and its date, his work will stand a severer test than any we have mentioned. All critics concur, however, in conceding the first place, among the historians of the old school, to Gibbon. Brilliancy of style, richness of color, dramatic skill, poetic fancy, business-like judgment, and extensive research, all are combined in the history of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." One needs only to compare his work with that of Montesquieu—himself a giant intellect—on the same subject, to perceive how great he was, and how near he approaches to the model historian. Here again, however, we discover, on the very surface, a blemish of most fatal hue. If truth be an essential of history, can a Christian public crown with laurel the insidious satirist of Christianity? A man may lie, says the dramatist, with a wink or a smile without opening his lips. However accurately facts are related by Gibbon, there can be no question of the falsity of a vast proportion of his innuendoes and inferences. The fourth great modern historian mentioned by Alison is Sismondi, who has written thirty volumes about the French, and sixteen about the Italian republics. In point of vigor, descriptive talent, extent of research and philosophical acumen, Sismondi stands second to no one. In some respects he may be considered as the founder of modern history—the first man who really wrote histories of nations and not sketches of cliques. But threescore years and ten are a very short term to read histories in thirty volumes. The boldest mind recoils from such a task. The most infinite skill could hardly protect the reader from growing weary before the thirtieth volume is reached. Sismondi tacitly owned the defect when he prepared abridgments of his works; but, as was to be expected, the fire of the originals was not transferred to the miniature copies, and it were better for his fame they had not been published.

Without stopping to inquire whether Mr. Alison has done better justice to the historians he has omitted than to those he includes in his select list, or to discuss the very respectable claims of Voltaire, Karamsin, and a whole host of Germans, we may say without fear that, whatever be the rank of other branches of letters, the art of writing history is better understood and practiced at the present day than it ever was. Epic poetry may be defunct; men may decry Tennyson or Poe; the drama may have seen its best days; the mantle of Patrick Henry may be without a wearer; all these evidences of intellectual decline may be manifest, but the superiority of modern historians over their predecessors is not less so. In one respect it could not be otherwise. Political science is fixed like chemistry; each student makes a discovery which adds to the store, and thus the man who comes last of necessity excels all former workers in extent of knowledge. But the progress of the moderns is not confined to this accumulation of precedents and principles. It is as obvious in their manner as their matter; in their art as their materials; in their true appreciation of their duty as in the enlarged sphere of their judgment. Many valid excuses may be made for the ancients. Until quite recently, oligarchies were every thing, the people nothing; even well-meaning writers might fancy they had described a nation when they had drawn a picture of a great man's household. Most authors, indeed, either belonged to the favored class themselves, like Voltaire and Clarendon, and knew nothing beneath it; or they were parasites of that class, and wrote in payment of their board. The declaration of 1776 and the French revolution put an end to this régime, and reduced at a blow nearly all antecedent French and English history to the rank of memoirs of reigning families, or records of military operations.

It was not till after the fall of Napoleon that history revived in Europe. A new school of historical writers then made its appearance with Augustin Thierry, Guizot, Mignet, and Michelet at its head. The first of these astonished the literary world by asserting that among historians the first place was due to the author of Ivanhoe. He had struck the right chord. The revolution had demolished the old palace style of history. Common sense had done justice on Rollin and other bores. Sismondi, thoroughly imbued with the modern spirit, began the first real history of the French. In a short time the profound generalizations of Guizot, the eagle glance of Mignet, the philosophic reasonings of Michelet, prepared the world for an entirely new mode of historical thought. Napoleon had said, "Mankind is led by the imagination." Thierry applied the truth to historical science, and the results were those splendid annals of the Normans, which have earned for him immortal fame. Though the nature of his subject may deprive the author of as large an audience on this side the ocean as he commands on the European continent, the historical student in every land must acknowledge him master. The picture he has drawn of his own studies is enough to fire any imagination. "By dint of devouring long folio pages," says he, "to extract a word or a phrase from among a thousand, my eyes acquired a faculty which astonished me, and for which to this day I can not account. I read by intuition, so to speak; my eye fell at once on the passage I was in search of. My whole vital energy seemed concentrated on one point. In the species of ecstasy in which I was plunged, while my hand turned over leaves and made notes, I was totally unconscious of surrounding events. People sat down or moved away from the table at which I wrought; the library officials and visitors came and went: I saw nothing, I heard nothing but the apparitions evoked by what I read. I can well recall the feeling. Never since that first period of study have I had so vivid a perception of the personages of my drama, of those men so different in race, in manners, in physiognomy, in destiny, who were marshaled before my fancy; some chanting to the Celtic harp the never-ending hymn of Arthur's return, others dashing through the storm, as reckless of their own safety as the swan on the placid lake; some, in the intoxication of victory, heaping together the spoils of the vanquished, measuring the earth with a string to divide it, counting over and over again families like heads of cattle; others, again, stripped by defeat of all that life is precious for, sternly resigned to see a stranger sit down a master at their own hearths, or frantic in despair, rushing to the woods to live, like the wolves, on rapine, murder, and independence." Alas! the very faculty to which he owed so much, and for which he could not account, was, in the end, his worst misfortune. Nature, cheated of her rights, revenged herself by condemning him to blindness.

But he had completed his monument. Scores of disciples in France were fully prepared to continue his work. Philosophic history had been awakened in Germany. Leading minds in England were applauding the reform, and pronouncing the epitaph of past history. Even countrymen of Guicciardini and Davila, in the intellectual movement awakened by Alfieri and Monti, made fresh attempts to write one good historical work in Italian. Alison's splendid performance almost excused the folly of Waterloo. In Thiers' brilliant battle-pieces one almost forgets that Napoleon had trampled liberty under foot. Hallam's stately annals are a fitting mausoleum for the rude, giant minds of the middle ages. As years roll on, the necessity of re-writing history becomes more apparent. Cortés first obtains justice in the glowing pages of Prescott. Bancroft sings the praises of the heroes of America in strains sometimes turgid, but always lofty and eloquent. Macaulay puts the finishing hand to a historical picture unrivaled in literature. In every land the first minds are intent upon reproducing the past in accordance with the formulas which Thierry deduced and Guizot elaborated.

What are those formulas? Facts, says Macaulay, who has accumulated more in his history than any other historian ever knew, facts are the dross of history. The sentence is only partially just. Undoubtedly, the writer who abandons the living principle of history to dwell upon accidental and fortuitous events, fails in his mission. In this age above all others we require that the historian shall not delegate to us, his readers, the laborious duty of extracting the essence of history from its substance. But this is a rare fault among first-class minds. A thorough blockhead may be conscious of his infirmity, and restrain himself; a man of talent will rarely lose an opportunity of haranguing. Every leading mind is overloaded with principles, which their author is dying to discharge. He is much more likely to moralize on Washington's flying into a passion than to leave us in darkness as to the secret agencies which produced the Stamp Act. If it were absolutely true that facts are the dross of history, nothing could be wiser than this course of proceeding. Unhappily, though averse to severe labor, few of us desire our beef-steak to be cut up into edible morsels by strange hands: a man must be dull indeed to require to be told that Arnold's heart was bad when he sold his soul.

A large proportion of the modern French school of historians—seeking, doubtless, to guard against the national tendency toward generalization and philosophical analysis—have run into the opposite extreme, and flooded their pages with minute facts and sayings of their personages. By this plan vividness and reality are gained; but it is at the expense of unity, and not unfrequently of truth. Contemporaneous witnesses are by no means always the best judges even of facts. There is always a great deal in the evidence of the most conscientious person which must be set aside by a discriminating judge as the fruit of local bias, or unconscious prejudice. Which of us to-day could write a review of the year that would answer for posterity? The class of French writers to which we have made allusion have fulfilled the office which the material-men discharge toward the builder. They have carted the stuff to the edge of the foundation. Bricks, stones, mortar, sashes, doors, slates, every thing is there; nothing is wanting but the hand of the workman to combine the whole. And as the builder's skill is shown in the concealment of certain portions of his work in order to give due prominence and beauty to others, so the historian can not expect to attain his great end until each separate element is reduced to its proper proportions, fitted into its proper place, thrust conspicuously forward or prudently withdrawn to the background, according to its relation to the main thread of the narrative. It may be very well in a biography of Father Jogues to discuss the tenets of the Jesuits; but in a history of the United States it is carrying admiration for the martyr a little too far to allow him to expound his views on the Jansenist question.

Demosthenes summed up the science of oratory in one word—Delivery. The aim of history might in a similar manner be comprehended under the single word—Reality. We desire that the man who undertakes to describe past ages to us shall so order his materials that we shall see the people, stand on the spots, be present at the scenes he depicts. He must paint his heroes as Raphael painted his portraits. Not only must we have their face, figure, dress, air, in order to carry about with us in our mind a tangible likeness; we must have their mind as well, and their heart, sketched with a few broad lines, the fewer the better, for clearness' sake. Places must be dealt with in like manner. Not the least of the faults of the old historians, is the carelessness with which they dealt with topography. In the hands of the artist, every stone may be gifted with a voice. What a world of historic information is contained in the old plans of the city of New York, with the King's Farm and the Collect marked in clumsy old letters, and little blots all over three-fourths of Manhattan Island to signify trees! It is, we think, a grave fault in the best of our historians, that they have cared so little about sketching the local background of their pictures. It is hardly possible to realize sturdy Peter Stuyvesant shaking his staff in the face of his craven councilors, unless we can at the same time discern the gable-ends of the Dutch houses behind him, follow him into his old-fashioned parlor, and listen to the tramp of his wooden leg on the sanded floor. In their anxiety to deal with topics of a grander cast, too many writers have despised these details as too trivial for history; whence it comes, as Thierry said of English history, that it is chiefly to be found in novels.

Men are not all politicians or all soldiers. As a general rule, these classes have never constituted more than a mere fraction of each civilized community. Yet until quite recently, history has exclusively occupied itself with their doings. According to the old plan, the historian of Mr. Pierce's administration would give a full and particular account of the destruction of Greytown, and the Japan expedition; but of the wages paid to carpenters, and the style of living in Fifth Avenue, he would say nothing. Yet how much more truly fitting materials for history the latter than the former! Mr. Macaulay stands out in bold contrast to his rivals in this respect. Compare him for instance with Lord Mahon, whose opportunities were as happy, whose industry as great, whose experience hardly less extensive; the latter, notwithstanding his numerous excellences, seems a mere clerk beside him. Macaulay had a difficult task to perform. Setting out with the resolute purpose of becoming the historiographer of the great Whig party of England, he was bound to shape his materials to suit his theory, to controvert the growing belief that the British Revolution of 1688 was a fraud. Almost every historian who has set out with a similar partisan object in view, has achieved at best a powerful pamphlet; failing altogether in producing a history. It was left for Macaulay to conceal his purpose with such exquisite skill that its discovery is an after-thought with the reader. While he reads, he is so irresistibly dragged along with the narrator, planted so firmly among the personages of the story, thinking, speaking, living, moving, even eating and drinking with them, that he had as soon suspected a daguerreotype of flattery as Macaulay of perversion of fact. This triumph of art is mainly due to the minute attention bestowed on details too often deemed trivial. In his grandest pictures, each figure, each shadow is finished with wonderful care; however bold the main outlines, no detail is blurred. Kings are there, and statesmen, soldiers, and demagogues, conquests and Parliamentary debates; but besides all this, which every other history contains, Macaulay presents the real nation—the people who had little or nothing to do with government, laws, or wars—in quite as clear a light. He tells how parsons lived, how weavers pursued their calling; sketches an eating-house as vividly as a separate chamber; leads us into the homes of laborers with as firm a tread as into the palace of the Stadtholder. This is true history.

It is probable that, if all the works that have been written about America were collected together, no private library could contain them. Each of the thirteen original States could fill a vast bookcase with the materials for its annals. Yet how few that can for a moment pretend to the title of history! Here a mass of undigested facts, there a few unsupported opinions; here a virulent party pamphlet, there an innocent record in the almanac style; a bit of history now and then flashing out of a heap of rubbish, just to show that the artist, not the subject, is wanting. We would speak respectfully of those great works of American history which represent the nation in the Congress of letters. Dull indeed must be the man who could fail to appreciate the admirable skill, the high poetic talent, the prodigious research of which some recent histories published in the United States bear evidence. But the more profound the sense of their high merits, the deeper conviction that better is yet to come. History is not oratory, nor yet philosophy. A man may be a profound thinker and an elegant, manly writer, without being any thing but an indifferent historian. It does not even follow that, because one can paint a historical scene with truth and vigor, a continuous history is therefore to be undertaken with confidence. Many a general can draw a perfect plan for a battle, who could not conduct a single campaign without ruin. The connection of events, the link of dullness which binds two interesting scenes together, is to the mere anecdotalist a Bridge of Asses never to be crossed. It will not do to ignore it altogether, for it can not possibly be without influence on succeeding events; nor can it be handled freely by any but a master of the craft without marring the interest of the rest.

The modern historian enjoys advantages such as Tacitus and Gibbon never dreamed of. In the United States especially, the materials that each day is amassing will wholly relieve the future historian of the mechanical portion of his task, and will leave him nothing to care for but its artistic execution. It is not too much to say that if every book in the world were destroyed, and nothing of our present printed matter preserved but a file of a leading daily New York Journal, a judicious mind might compile from it a perfectly full and accurate history of the present age. No such appalling disaster being within the range of possibility, to what perfection may we not expect history to be hereafter carried? Fancy the task of the historian who shall sit down in the year 1955 to write the annals of the nineteenth century. Compare his surfeit over a dozen newspaper files with the fierce hunger for facts which gave Gibbon courage to complete his great work. Politics and religion; foreign affairs and domestic legislation; commerce, industry, agriculture, labor, literature, the arts; social life, etiquette, tone of the public mind at various times, revolutions in taste, in dress, in manners; all lie open before him almost without research. A dozen daily daguerreotypes, taken by different artists and from different points of view, would not transmit a more faithful likeness of an individual than the press does of the world. It will be as easy a hundred years hence to describe the way in which shoemakers lived at the present day, what they got for their shoes, how they enjoyed themselves, and what their opinions were, as it is for us to sketch the history of the Bonaparte family. Error will be willful, if it exist at all; with so much light, nothing short of closing the eyelids could produce dimness of vision. The cosmopolitan tendency of modern times will obviously go a long way toward effacing national prejudices, and bringing the institutions of each country nearer a common standard; an arrangement pregnant, for the historian, with rich materials of philosophic comparison. Nor is there any serious reason to apprehend that the future historian will be likely to fall below former writers in point of artistic skill. There can be no question that the historical science is progressive in every branch; that Tacitus excelled Thucydides, Hume Tacitus, Mignet Hume, Macaulay Mignet; and it is quite reasonable to suppose that the future historian on whom shall devolve the duty of painting New York in the nineteenth century, will surpass Macaulay, as well in the arrangement and coloring as in the extent of his materials.

The older we grow the more doubtful it appears whether, if we all of us had a doctor like Don Quixote's to drag half our old books into the yard and make a bonfire of them, the catastrophe would be a loss or a gain.

Editor's Easy Chair.

WITH May-day comes moving in the city, and plans for moving out of the city. Not more sure are the winds of March than the confusion of May-day; and all the old, time-hallowed associations with the season are utterly routed and destroyed. In our quiet Chair we sit and survey the tumult, and can only see in it the typical day of the year for America and Americans. We have nothing old, and it seems that we are determined never to have any thing old. We pull down our barns and build greater, when the old are quite sufficient for the purpose, and were gradually getting to be ornaments of the estate. Time has the magic touch of romance. Time is the alchemist that slowly changes the heavy coarse stones into a poetic material more precious than gold.

But we do not think so.

The same restlessness that constantly changes the house also invades the interior, and the visitor longs to see a sofa which is not in the last mode, and a table that has not just arrived from Paris, and a carpet and curtains which are not of the newest pattern. It occurs to some respectable citizen that he must have a bay-window to illuminate his dining-room. Bay-windows instantly become an epidemic. All the houses in the street are infected, and burst out into bay-windows. The whole city is eruptive in the same way. The subtle virus penetrates the country. The rural districts catch the contagion, and in all sequestered and romantic places the houses are seized with the affection, and bay-windows appear at every possible point.

But how much charm there is in fitness! Grandmama Doldrum was a quaint, respectable, dignified, and agreeable old lady, while she wore her gray hair and the costume which harmonized with them. But when she came out one morning in a cluster of chestnut curls, and a cap all arch and adroit with brilliant ribbons, we children were ready to forswear all relationship with Grandmother Doldrum. Now this fitness is just as beautiful in houses, and their arrangements and furnishings, as it is in people and the proprieties of dress. Suppose you should suddenly come in to see us—suppose either of the correspondents whose letters we sometimes publish should enter our room, and you or they should find us in patent leather boots and a foppish cravat tie, and carefully-considered trowsers, with a coat short in the waist, and with large flowing sleeves, carefully displaying emerald wrist-buttons, instead of the loose garments, a trifle seedy, and the capacious shoes, with strings, and the rumpled white cravat, which properly become our years, and which we always wear—you would justly say to yourselves, "What an absurd and fantastic old Easy Chair, aping youth!"

For our own part, we love the great leather chair in which Grandfather Doldrum sat, and the little oval screen which, in the long-vanished years when there were roses upon Grandmother Doldrum's cheeks, protected them from the fire. We like the Doldrum sideboard, the Doldrum china, and glass, and silver. They are quaint, indeed; but, for that very reason, they are full of tender and pleasing associations.

Aunt Jane Doldrum, when she was a belle of twenty, married her present husband, and they move, every few years, on the first of May. My aunt, Mrs. Jane Doldrum Ruggs, is toward seventy, and if you should call at her house this morning, you would swear (or affirm) that she came home, a bride, yesterday. Every thing is new, and new in the last mode. The window curtains, and the furniture, and the carpets, and the clocks, and gas-fixtures, are fearfully new. Aunt Ruggs's house has as much interest as an upholsterer's wareroom, and not a bit more. It is only the wareroom moved up-town.

But if, when we went to take our Sunday's tea with Aunt Jane, we could see something that recalled the days when she was young—when Bleecker Street was out of town—when a brook ran through Canal Street, and pretty maids spread clothes to dry in the fields where now Broome

Street roars and rattles—how like an old picture, or song, or pleasant chapter from history, would our Sunday tea-drinkings be. But as it is, we are afraid of dropping tea upon the table, and preserves upon the new satin-damask sofa, and we sit very carefully lest the delicate chair should give way beneath us; and all is so elegant, and rich, and splendid, and dismal, in Aunt Jane's drawing-rooms, that positively old Mum Phillis's parlor, down in Avenue B, is pleasanter.

This dreary propriety and chilly splendor are all part of the restlessness that begets such a custom as May-day moving. We are not content with the old home nor the old furniture; and yet it would be worth while to remember that while we cling to the old things endeared by association, we also so far cling to the youth with which they were contemporary. Aunt Jane's new furniture only makes her old age more evident; and as she sits and gazes at it, it suggests to her only the upholsterer's and the cabinet-maker's skill; while, if her eye could rest upon the chair where the friends sat who will come no more, or upon the table where her father bent in writing, or the side-board where his wine sparkled, she would feel truly at home. Even the sadness of such associations and remembrances would be sweeter than the consciousness that she could not tell her sofa from her neighbor's, nor know that she was in her own house except from the audible snore of Uncle Ruggs, who has fallen asleep with his head upon the sumptuous back of the handsomest lounge. Poor Aunt Doldrum Ruggs is dreadfully distressed, for if he turns his head there will be an eternal memorial of the movement upon the soiled back of the lounge.

Think of these things, gentle friends, aunts and uncles of every name, when you move on the first of May, and repair the old table and the old bureau rather than buy a new.

But when May-day is over, and June days come, and the summer solstice reminds us all of the sea, and the Tropics be upon us, then where shall we go, whither shall we flee?

A distinguished diplomatic friend of this Easy Chair, whose friend, Mr. J. Smythe, Jr., has occasionally made our pages the medium of his communications to the public, the Spanish Ambassador, in fact, Don Fandango Bobtail, informs us that he means to devote the summer to the watering-places, at which resorts, he contends, American society is best studied, and will sometimes send us a line of his experiences there.

To say the truth, this "study of Society" has been of late a good deal overdone. All the literary youths about town have fired their little squibs through newspaper columns or magazines, and nothing has been more ruthlessly satirized and scolded than the mysterious existence or institution called "Society." The Home Journal, indeed, the laureate and organ of that mystic power, has brandished its cudgels valiantly in defense of the ways and means of "Society," and weekly parades the treasures of wit, experience, and sagacity it has discovered within that much-abused circle. They who doubt the existence of such treasures, have but to look at the proof and be confounded. For ourselves, who only occasionally let fly a shot at the great and awful enemy, there is consolation in the faith that society will survive these assaults; and we can not but indulge the private belief that it will benefit by them. The bee that stings also makes the honey. As certain follies and extravagances become notorious and stigmatized under some fictitious name, the irresistible fear of ridicule will persuade all sensible men and women to avoid any exposure to the chance of receiving such a name.

When the terrible portrait is drawn, they will shrink as Addison shrank from Pope's splendid satire, and they will not have the comfort of his closing assurance:

"Who would not smile if such a man there be?
Who would not weep if Attions were he?"

We have, with some curiosity, asked Don Bob about the effect of this incessant fire of criticism upon its victim. He smiles diplomatically, and says, with a shrug, that the world is too old to reform, and that nobody enjoys the blow more than those who are hit. He declares he doesn't see that women dress or dance any less extravagantly or that the men are wittier, for all the fine things that have been said.

"Society is the same all the world over, my dear old Easy Chair," says Don Bob, "and has always been about the same, so far as I can perceive. People dress, and dance, and make love, and marry for money, and drive a neat turn-out, and squander, and swindle, and smile, in the earliest romances as they do in Mrs. Gore's and Mr. James's latest. Do you suppose Ivanhoe really loved Rowena better than Rebecca, or did he refrain from offering himself to Rebecca because she was of the despised race, and Mrs. Front-de-Bœuf and the rest of the Grundy family of the period would have made such a dreadful rout about it? You may believe that he didn't marry Rowena because it was a good match; but I shall live and die in the faith that old Ivanhoe, in the musty centuries of romance and tradition, did just what young Thomas Noddy, in the next street, did. They both wanted to marry well; to please the family; to have yellow linings to the carriage, and a well-set table, and plenty of servants. They wanted to shut the mouth of the gossiping old world, and go gently down to oblivion in the last fashion. Mr. and Mrs. Noddy will laugh over the 'Potiphar Papers' or the 'Fudge Doings' a great deal more merrily than the sardonic cousin in the country, who rails at the city she is longing to live in, and preaches long sermons upon the sinfulness of fashions which she would obsequiously follow if she could.

"And when any gentleman takes up his pen and says in print just what I am saying to you, he is abused as if he had picked everybody's pocket. However, my dear Easy Chair, I don't believe Mr. Thackeray, for instance, will see any less clearly the melancholy absurdities of social life because people clamor that society is not all so corrupt; and I have great faith in the fact that he will continue to serve them up, not for our smiles and self-gratulation only, but our very earnest and serious reproof.

"Whether he and the rest of them are going to do any good by their brilliant and incessant thrusts, I do not know. But the year 2855 will, I sincerely believe, find our remote posterity all laying out in May where they shall pass the summer; still dancing and flirting and marrying, making money and breaking hearts, doing good and doing ill, while sly and sagacious observers go gravely about, and occasionally make a study from life, and exasperate a few of the subjects.

"But whatever they do in the May of 2855, in this May we ought to consider where to go."

We asked Don Bob where he intended to go.

"My learned friend, I can not precisely say; I should like to see Niagara again, also Sharon, Saratoga, Nahant, and Newport. The Virginia Springs I hear well mentioned; nay, Cordelia herself told me she was going there. Then Cape May has charms; for it may be said of Baltimore and its balles, as was said by the English poet Browning—

'Where I find her not, beauties vanish:
Whither I follow her, beauties flee;'

so wherever I find Baltimore summering, there I shall rest and bask in beauty.

"But I hear of a great rally to be made at Nahant. Boston goes to that rock to breathe the breezes from Cape Cod. They are Puritan breezes, I think. They have a rough edge, and come shrouded in sharp eastern fogs. I have thought sometimes of that bleak December landing of the Pilgrims, when, even on summer days, I have felt the wind sifting through to my very marrow. But Nahant is a lovely spot, and many a treasure of memory is labeled with its name, and the Hotel, my Easy Chair, is unsurpassed. The traveler is well-housed at Niagara in the Cataract, and at Saratoga in the United States; but not at the Falls nor the Springs is he more comfortably lodged and sumptuously served than at the Nahant Hotel. It is new, you understand. It is no longer the old house, where, if you have ever been, you have vowed vows never to go again. But if you have tasted the hospitalities of the Tremont and the Revere in Boston, then you have had a foretaste of the Nahant Hotel. It is a gentleman's house; and, if you have undergone Newport hotels, you will understand distinctly what I mean.

"There are other magnets on that promontory, of which I can not whisper even to a discreet Easy Chair. If you go there, as I sincerely advise you to do, you will find them; you will know that they are there by your inability to get away; you will know that you have been there by the rosy light that will linger in remembrance about your Nahant hours.

"Positively," said Don Bob, "here is a tear!"

Newport, we learn, will be more thronged than ever. We do not wonder. There is a magic in the air that allures like the singing of syrens. But why should there not be a tolerable hotel in Newport? There was a long and careful sketch of Newport life and history in our August number of last year; but there was nothing truer in the paper than its opening remarks upon Newport hotels. We understand that a Newport journal, noted for its sagacity and independence, discovered that the article was written by an unfortunate wight who, having no means to pay his bills at the hotels, compromised the matter by abusing them. It is good logic; and, if that journal insists upon it, we suppose it must be considered true. Now we distinctly desire our correspondents to pay their bills: or, in case they can not perform such a task, we beg them not to malign their creditors.

In this case, however, our own experience only confirms that of our August contributor; and if the journal insists (which we are sure it will not), we will produce our bills receipted. There is not a good hotel in Newport; a clean and comfortable house, we mean, like that at Nahant, and the others we have mentioned. And yet Newport is the great watering-place of the country. If it is impossible for so short a season to support a good house, how is it supported at Nahant? and how much prolonged the season would be, if we, unhappy visitors, who would gladly see September and October by the sea, only had some proper place to inhabit! We humbly suggest that a good hotel upon the Cliff, well-organized and well-kept, would draw the permanent summer population as well as the transitory visitors. And we say this, with all deference in proper quarters, not because our purse, but our stomach, gave out. Nowhere in the world is there a watering-place of finer facilities than Newport. Nowhere in the world ought they to be so carefully improved.

MR. N. P. WILLIS, when he was in England, and soon after beginning his literary career, wrote home letters about foreign life and society, for which he was as well abused as any author we remember. It is generally understood that he was cast out of English good opinion altogether. But it happens that we owe probably more to Mr. Willis than to any other American traveler, that gossip knowledge of literary and fashionable society which we now enjoy. We do not judge the extent of his acquaintance, but he certainly was on good terms at Gore House, the London residence of Lady Blessington, and there he met many of the celebrities of whom he so freely and gayly discoursed.

Mr. Willis fell upon the palmy days of Lady Blessington. Her name at that time was mentioned rather under the breath, and her carriage was not seen at the Queen's Drawing-rooms. She was unpleasantly talked about. Yes; but so was Lady Flora Hastings a little later. Lady Flora died of the scandal, but Lady Blessington, though scandalized, survived. She was unpleasantly talked about, but all the noted men in London thronged her rooms; and Gore House succeeded Holland House.

The subject of the unpleasant talk, in connection with Lady Blessington, was Count D'Orsay, the husband of Lady Blessington's daughter, the famous dandy, painter, poet, sculptor, horse-jockey, and critic. D'Orsay was probably the best Alcibiades that modern European society has seen. And none of the many good stories told of him surpasses in characteristic interest that related by the painter Haydon in his Autobiography. The artist was starving, and half broken-hearted before his picture—gloom without and despair within—when suddenly D'Orsay enters, like a sunbeam, exquisitely dressed, the glass of fashion and the mould of form, surveys the canvas for a moment, describes the difficulty, and seizing the pallet from the painter, takes the brush in his delicately kidded hand, and gives the necessary stroke; then smiles, bows, and skips into his cab. It is a true bit of Vivian Grey in real life. And Diarrell, too shrewd to lose so fine a subject, made D'Orsay the Count Mirabel of his "Henrietta Temple," and dedicated the book to D'Orsay by name.

That virtuous body, London society, of which the Newcomes is the most subtle and masterly picture and analysis, was never weary of whispering about this Alcibiades and his Aspasia. Lady Blessington went about "under a cloud," as it is poetically rendered. She and the Count crossed to Paris, when the welcome guest of Gore House became President of France; and they both died in Paris during the first years of the new Napoleonic régime.

The gossip about her has been recently revived by the publication of her correspondence, edited by Dr. Madden; and much the most important circumstance of the revival is the letter of Walter Savage Landor, addressed to the London Athenæum. The stalwart veteran; the polished and profound author, who knows that if his readers are not many, they are all enthusiasts and friends; whose sympathies are always upon the right side, and who is sure to say a strong word for those whose liberal thoughts or noble actions have repelled sympathy, has now thrown a flower upon the grave of the wife of an early friend, and a hostess whose house and heart were always open to him.

We allude to this letter because it is so fine a protest against the eager and withering gossip which is so often a hundred-fold worse than what it condemns. If she has any warm friends living, surely they will cherish this letter as her best epitaph.

Christian reader, what do we do, you and this old Easy Chair, when a fellow-sinner sins? Of course we hurry to see who will cast the first stone, and hit hardest. And that is the tone, and the preaching, and the practice of Christian society. Now what said the Master about casting the first stone? what canons did he lay down about that proceeding? We honor this letter of old Walter Savage Landor—a man who has held his heart firm and true for more than seventy years—because it inculcates the simple and reasonable doctrine taught in the case of the Syrian woman. The applicability of the rule is not altered because it is an English woman.

Landor tells the story of his introduction and subsequent acquaintance. "Her parties contained more of remarkable personages than were ever assembled in any other house, excepting, perhaps, Madame de Staël. In the month of the Coronation more men, illustrious in rank, in genius, and in science, met at Gore House, either at dinner or after, than ever were assembled in any palace. Enough has been said vituperatory about the mistress of that mansion. I disbelieve in the tales of her last friendship (D'Orsay); an earlier one affords more cause for admiration than censure."

He then relates her attachment to "a very handsome man," who had ruined himself by gaming, and had fled the country. She resolved to follow; and Lord Blessington, who was then in love with her, did not make a proposal that she should marry him, but that he should pay "a thousand pound or two" to bring back her lover. It was impossible. The lover wrote that he should never return, and begged not to mar her future. Then Lord Blessington came forward. Lady Blessington, until the death of the exile, sent him a hundred pounds quarterly. "Virtuous ladies!" concludes Landor, "instead of censuring her faults, attempt to imitate her virtues. Believe that, if any excess may be run into, the excess of tenderness is quite as pardonable as that of malignity and rancor."

THE Spring opens no pleasanter doors than those of the National Academy of Design, whose exhibition this year was in the rooms lately occupied by the Düsseldorf Gallery. In the midst of American life, which allows so little leisure, and which has no class of cultivated loungers, the jeunesse dorée of foreign capitals, it is interesting to mark what effect and influence these annual collections of paintings have upon the public mind.

The catalogue of this year's exhibition opens with a hilarious account of the condition and prospects of the Academy. It tells us of the extremely favorable state of health in which the institution finds itself, and states that it never held a higher place in the public interest. Copious allusions are also made to the admirable organization of the Academy. We hear of lectures, schools, collections, etc., to a degree that will surely make glad the hearts of lonely young aspirants secluded in remote districts, and hampered by poverty; and which illuminates our minds to a glow, in respect of the love of art, and sympathy with its pursuit, which, it appears, has struck such deep root in our metropolitan, if not our national, character.

For the present, indeed, the lonely young aspirants need not sell their clothes to raise money to enable them to reach the favored region where the Academy proffers lectures, lessons, and apparatus so freely. For the present these things have gone into abeyance. Like shop-windows which, for the last month, have blazed with the notice that "on the first of May, this store will open with an illimitable stock of soap-bubbles and tobacco-smoke," so the Academy catalogue announces that on the first convenient opportunity, lectures, lessons, and appliances will be afforded to an eager public.

However, we do not intend to follow this scent. But why did so grave and discreet a body as the Academy adorn itself for its festival with such grotesque rhetoric as the preface to its annual list of pictures? There was no especial occasion to say any thing; and if such occasion had existed, surely the Academy should have put forth a well-considered and comprehensive statement of its condition and prospects. The effect of such a performance is immediately to challenge attention to its existence, and searching investigation into its operation. The great question of the utility of Academies is at once vexed, and there may be hard knocks given, and hard feelings engendered, before the question is answered.

We presume the facts of the case to be simply these: That the Academy is an amiable institution, which, with very limited means, and no public sympathy, has been endeavoring to teach the rudiments of art, and to cherish an esprit de corps among artists. It has had, we believe, no professors, nor any courses of lectures, and it has certainly been very poor. It was about four years since that a short course of popular miscellaneous lectures upon subjects connected with art, was delivered for the benefit of the Academy, and the attendance upon those lectures showed a not very extensive enthusiasm in the general subject. A year or two later each of the artists of the city contributed a work for sale for the benefit of the Academy; and, as we learn, nearly two thousand dollars were realized from the sale. Meanwhile the Academic performances as such, the teaching by various means, was extremely limited, if not altogether suspended; and now that they have come to a full stop, we have this cheerful preface assuring us that affairs were never more flourishing.

Now we sincerely hope they are, because all Americans who love liberal studies must desire the prosperity of an institution intended to advance them. And we do not find the same objections to this Academy as to those of Europe. The fact is unquestionable, we presume, that in Europe the academies have either occasioned the decline of art, or have been contemporary with it. Probably the latter is the true statement, for no academy would have ruined Raphael, as none, certainly, would have made Michel Angelo. So fatally true is this statement, that every man who concerns himself at all with such interests knows that the word Academy, as applied to works of art, means a conventional and unreal character—means every thing, in fact, but vital excellence. It signifies the perfection of what can be taught, and the sad tendency of the institution is to value talent more than genius.

But an academy with us has not commanded, and never will command, that kind of influence and patronage which in other countries has made it inimical to the best interests of art. Our different social organization would always paralyze that tendency. With us an academy must always be, what the present aims to be, a college of art; and properly managed it would no more prevent a man's becoming a great artist than a well-managed university would prevent his becoming a great poet. Genius needs training even more than talent, because it is more dogmatic and erratic. Feeling is not enough for the artist. As was once well said to this old Easy Chair, the artist must be nine parts mechanic to one part poet. Just as in food, the saccharine element, which is the nourishing quality, must be in greatly less proportion than the un-nourishing fibre.

We glance only at these considerations. They are inevitably suggested by the extraordinary preface of the catalogue. By that preface the Academy has committed itself. It has made implied promises. It proposes to do something on a greater scale than heretofore. Let us hope that over the exhibitions of future years no Nemesis will shake this year's catalogue. With each twelve-month we shall repair to the halls with more exigent eyes. "Show the fruits of that fine promise! Where are the better pictures? Where is the profounder interest in art? Where are the professors and their lectures, the teachers and their lessons, the collections and their capable expounders?" It will not do to assure us every year that things are better. We are too much and sincerely interested in the condition and progress of artistic studies to be stopped with hilarious prefaces and cheerful assurances of plethora. We like the Academy, we think with pleasure of that band of artists in the midst of the universal whirl, who are quietly holding fast to the pursuit of beauty. And so jealous are we of their position and dignity that we shrink from seeing any false or foolish step, any hasty or unnecessary statement, any thing, in short, which will give envy a chance to sneer, or skepticism the excuse of a smile.

And in this connection we must take leave to remind the loungers about our Chair, that in the Crayon, a weekly journal published in New York, they have as sincere, intelligent, and agreeable a record of the contemporary state of art, and criticism upon its performances, as there is in the world. It is a paper pleasant to the eye, and satisfactory to the mind, and when the loungeer considers that there is no more difficult thing to do well than to conduct an æsthetic journal, it is the highest praise to say that this is well done. Let the Academy be managed as well for an academy of art, as the Crayon is managed as a journal of art, and its prosperity will speak for itself, and can dispense with hilarious prefaces.

We have tarried a long time at the door, but we mean to enter and take a glance at the pictures.

And who is Mr. Darby who has two charming pictures, and seemed to be the new excellence of the exhibition? His small cabinet portrait was thoughtful and conscientious, and his "heads" were a pair of faces so full of character, so tenderly treated, and so sweetly conceived, that we are sure many who saw them asked the question we ask, Who is Mr. Darby? Such works are not the result of accident, and we shall undoubtedly hear more of him. "He has a future," as the French delicately express so much more than is said.

Mr. Baker's portraits were delicious, especially that of the lady with the rose-bud and the evanescent loveliness so charmingly caught and fixed forever. The reality of this portrait, its entire want of exaggeration, its pure humanity, detain the memory now, as it did the eye then. This artist has a fresh, sweet sincerity of color, and honest reverence for nature, which have already given him rank with the best of our portrait painters.

Mr. Elliott is our literalist, not that he imitates so faithfully every detail, for he is very slovenly in the details and accessories of his portraits. But he gives the literal, not the poetic man. It is Mr. Richard Roe, the lawyer, or Adolphus Gunnybags, Esq., the merchant, or Mrs. Mère, mother of six children, that he gives us; and no friend of the family, however long he may have been absent in India, could fail to recognize it. But it is only the lawyer and the merchant, and not the man. It is literally correct. It has a daguerreotype exactitude of form and color; but there is something more in every man than appears in Mr. Elliott's portrait of him, however unmistakable a likeness and well-painted a picture it may be.

Mr. Hicks's full-length portrait had beautiful and vigorous parts. The light was admirable. It was real daylight; and the drapery was well-managed and accurately imitated, and the general composition was attractive. But the head lacked the elaborate finish of some of the accessories, and the eye consequently lingered too long upon the brilliant damasks and handsome carpet. For this reason there was a want of unity in the work, and it pleased, altogether, less than the two oil-portraits of Lucretia Mott and Gullian C. Verplanck, and the crayon head of Parke Godwin. In the first there was beautiful modeling and coloring. Perhaps the face of Mrs. Mott was too spotty; but they were as good portraits as we have seen from Mr. Hicks, and that is saying very much.

Mr. Gray had but one head. It was a half-length portrait of a child, and presented a most extraordinary aspect of nature in the landscape background; but the sunny hair of the girl, and the youthful grace of the figure made the picture charming.

Mr. Huntington evidently reposed upon his laurels this year. The Boadicean Magdalen was uninteresting.

Mr. Durand, the President, was as good as usual, and in precisely the same way. His large wood-study was accurate and conscientious; and upon his smaller canvases the same tranquil cows grazed upon the same tranquil pastures, and the same placid stream purled along the same placid landscape, that we remember for many years. It is a calm pastoral that Mr. Durand paints, and it is always very lovely. His qualities are easily perceived, but they are not easily acquired. He is mannered, and from year to year monotonous; but that seems to be the inevitable condition of human performance. There is no perceptible change from year to year; but it would be a hopeless task to quarrel with what is good because it is not always becoming better. It ought to be? True; but good performance is no less good because it is not better, and in art of every kind, unless there be great genius, the limit of individual excellence is soon reached.

Mr. Church exhibited several very elaborate and striking compositions of South American scenery. They were glowing, and careful, and very complete. The light and clouds were often extremely fine, and the sense of lush, tropical luxuriance was very perfectly conveyed. They were universally admired. But is it not rather Church than Nature that we saw in those paintings?

Mr. Kensett had only one considerable work. It was less striking than Mr. Church's, but it was no less truthful and satisfactory. Mr. Kensett's conscience holds his pencil. He seems to have felt every hue in his picture. There is no sacrifice to effect; there is no trick of any kind, but the simple and transparent breadth of Nature is every where visible. His pictures are monotonous and cool in the general impression; but it is because what he can evidently do best, he as evidently does most naturally, and he will not proceed faster upon his canvas than he does in his observation of nature and mastery of the means to express it. Mr. Kensett's pictures have a reality as well as an actuality.

Mr. Cropsey had a "Mount Washington," which it was a pleasure to study. The old faults of cut-up foreground disfigured it, and it was rather too evidently an effect of pigments. But the vigor of the handling, and the close study, the clear and lovely sky, and the bold cloud-forms—his favorite cumuli, but a little too pointed and pinnacled for cumuli—merited the greatest praise. Mr. Cropsey is still constantly increasing his scope, and improves, even to the eye of the uninitiated, yearly.

Mr. Casilear had, as he has had for two or three years, some of the tenderest and truest bits of landscape in the exhibition. They have a modesty, and a fresh, absolute excellence, which are refreshing. There are no sudden dashes to catch applause unawares, but they are carefully considered, and executed with exquisite grace. They are full of the enthusiasm of the true artist. We hope, next year, to meet Mr. Casilear upon a larger canvas.

Mr. Hall had some of his brilliant bits of color; Mr. Cafferty one fine head at least; Mr. Gifford hazy landscapes, not powerful, but full of sweet feeling; Mr. Hubbard his golden gleam of summer; Mr. Colman a study of great promise, as also Mr. Hart. We can not do justice to them here, but we can record our admiration.

Mr. Staigg's miniatures were exquisite. No son or grandson, no daughter or granddaughter need mourn any longer that they are not contemporary with Malbone—Mr. Staigg's miniatures are not less beautiful in their kind. Mr. Samuel Lawrence's heads of Bancroft and Willis were masterly sketches of character. There was a sketch by Mr. Ruskin which was dreadful; and a careful and elaborate crayon drawing by Mr. Darley which was one of the finest things upon the walls, for its variety, character, and superb handling.

The exhibition was smaller, but not otherwise inferior to that of other years. It is not from year to year, but from comparison after certain intervals, that the progress of art in this country can be perceived. Compare the exhibition of '45 with that of '56, and then say if we are not advancing.

And now this prosing old Easy Chair has one suggestion to make. The Academy has sixty thousand dollars, derived from the sale of the old building. That sum ought to be so invested that the interest is about four thousand dollars. Now sixty thousand dollars will not build nor buy proper accommodations for the Academy, not to say any thing of supporting its schools, etc. But four thousand dollars, with the proceeds of the exhibition, will amply cover the expense of hiring an exhibition-room for two or three months—a room for the collection and library, and teachers to direct the studies of beginners. A poor institution, like the Academy, has no right to dine or sup sumptuously, nor to build a great and useless temple. But it has plenty of means and men to accomplish the avowed objects of its organization; and its exceedingly hilarious preface to the last catalogue has opened all our eyes to see that those objects are accomplished.

OUR FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THOUGH our topics range a few days later than the mail, we must take them up where we left them; by so doing we leave no gap in our record of what crowns the newspaper talk of Europe; and beside, we give our kindly readers occasion to trip back a leaf or two in the history of the times, and by a re-look at the great events which checker the years, to fix them more firmly in memory, and to discuss with coolness what they have before dispatched with their morning's coffee.

There was a buzz on the Bourse of Paris when the news first came, in the shape of floating rumor, that the great Nicholas had slipped from the stage, and would make his voice heard over the electric wires no longer. The Bourse proper—the great temple which fronts the theatre of the Vaudeville—had indeed closed; but the speculators had not yet deserted their usual haunts along the Boulevard; and until two of the morning, the cafés where they seal their outside bargains were lighted, and noisy with speculation.

A rise from five to ten dollars, in as many hours, on the value of all the leading stocks, is at any time a startling matter in these dull times of European commerce; but when the rise—as it did then—sprung from a dead man's chamber, there was a wild excitement in it, and a fever of gain, upon which a philosopher might moralize with profit.

The dismal news crushed other hopes besides those which clustered in the hearts of Romanoff kindred; and the French journals tell us the story of many an habitu  of the Paris exchange, whose fortune was swept away by the Emperor's death.

And our readers must know—if they do not already—that the moneyed speculators of Paris are not all of them the keen-visaged men who have sharpened their wits upon the columns of the Bourse; many a quiet grocer of moderate earnings perils his capital upon the risks of three per cents.; and many a demure old lady—with a love of Cashmeres or of Canada Bison in her thought—elips to the bureau of the money-changers for a trial at the game of the stocks.

One of our Paris letter-writers tells us indeed of a poor woman who kept the till of her husband's shop, and who, wearied with the modest accumulations of slow-passing years, had ventured her whole capital in trade upon the prospect (which a week before the Emperor's death seemed imminent) of a fall in the price of the state securities. Upon the very night, however, preceding the day on which her venture was to double her fortune, the tide turned; and the same fate which hurried the Czar to his final account, ruined utterly the adventurous dame of the counter.

But small griefs and small reverses make no show in a time when armies are dying, when cabinets are toppling over, and Emperors sinking to the last lumber.

It is an old story, that the bearer of bad news rides upon a fast horse; yet even with the proverb in mind, it is noticeable that the tidings of the great calamity of Russia came to the western capitals of Europe more quickly and surely than ever any great news before: the wires stood firmly to the weight of the story; no link was broken in the chain; the electric batteries were charged well; and within the same twenty-four hours, the king Frederic mourned his stanchest friend; Napoleon discussed the news with his generals at Boulogne; and the stately Palmerston gave the tidings—without a comment—to his fellow-commoners of England.

It would have been well if comment had been used more sparingly in other quarters; and whatever others may think of the matter, we can not give our echo to the damning terms in which the British papers have recorded the end of the life of Nicholas. The English press-men indeed study very few arts of courtesy; and we admire the honesty with which they blurt out disagreeable truths, however near home these truths may lie; but when the Times talks of the fallen Czar, as of an sject culprit, who had utterly lost friends, character, and power, and died desolated by the ignominy and the fatality of his career, it seems to us that the Times not only forgets good taste, but overlooks the unfortunate comparisons which outsiders may draw between the monarch discomfited by death, and their British Cabinet which dies as easily as it comes to life again.

"In the long array of history, and among those figures dimly seen along the ages of the past, which bear imperishable traces of their guilt and their doom, none stands a more visible mark of retributive justice than he who has thus abruptly passed from the scene of human affairs. . . . This blow has fallen not only on the armies which Russia has equipped for the defense of her territory, not only on her policy and her alliances, but more especially on the one great author of the war, who has expiated with the loss of reputation, the loss of power, and the loss of life itself, the outrage he committed on the rights of other states, and on the peace of Europe."

In this way speaks the Times: and the Chronicle says, "He lived to know that his name was execrated throughout the world. Baffled alike in his diplomacy, and in his military character, he died knowing that he had flung away the hardly-earned fame of a long and too successful career."

Will sober history, or impartial observers (for the world is fully large enough to offer such) confirm this estimate? Is it not something flippant to speak thus slightly of that diplomacy which startled Greece into rebellion, which secured in a perilous season an Austrian guard for the Danubian provinces, and which has so adroitly pushed its negotiations with the courts of Germany, that notwithstanding all of Western strategy, no man can tell where they stand? Or is it altogether fitting in our neighbors of England to point rhetorical sneers at a military power around whose breast-works of the south—kept in marvelous order—a magnificent British army has, through the season past, dashed itself in pieces?

We are no friends to the despotic influences which reside in the court of St. Petersburg, now and always; but we like to see vigor acknowledged, and administrative energy recognized, although it belongs to the head and hands of an ambitious and irresponsible monarch. Nicholas certainly did not cherish "liberal opinions;" perhaps he was not even generous (though there will be, in many minds, doubts of this); but it is certain that he professed boldly his doctrine of a "divine right of kings," and pressed it bravely to its issues. His ambition, too, was not a covert one, but written all over his actions. History may not, indeed, say much of his justice; possibly not of his benevolence—though there were thousands who mourned over him with honest tears—but it will never be denied that Russia, under the lead of his earnestness and devotion, has made, during an equal period, greater strides in the arts, in the sciences, and in all those elements of civilization of which the Continental monarchs of Europe permit the growth, than any sister nation of the Old World.

We have alluded to the Times articles, and if we must except to the good taste of its "execration" of the fallen monarch of Russia, and to its baseless assumption that on such a point England gives an imprimatur to the opinion of the world, at least we can admire cordially the vigor and the fertility with which that great journal has addressed itself to the present disturbed state of British politics.

Can any thing be finer, in the whole range of newspaper accomplishment, than the boldness and the determination with which that journal has sustained the validity of its assertions in regard to the conduct of the war—has given glowing utterance to the hearty indignation of Englishmen every where—has calmly traced the evils to their legitimate sources, and has fearlessly and eloquently laid bare the great plague-spots of British rule?

And is it not all the more extraordinary to us, as republicans, that with a press so free and fearless—awed by no State Council, and by no patents of nobility—England should still yield her army, her church, and, we may add, her representation, to those whose only right lies in habit or in title, but whose fitness for practical duties is never made matter of serious question? A man can hardly have read the leaders of the Times, for the three months last past, without feeling that they are making the "beginning of the end." Mere rhetoric has its day, and its influence dies when the sound of it dies on the ear; but when, as in the matter of these Times articles, rhetoric clothes great truths, which enter into very wakeful ears, and which carry with them such fearful illustrations as have been drawn from the Crimean campaign, the thing will not end in words.

The Times killed the first Cabinet; the Times sifted the second Cabinet; and, if it dies, the Times will have spotted the third.

It is agreeable to an earnest republican eye to see—when popular representation is so vain and false in the parliament—such hearty representation of the instincts, the wants, and the feelings of the great body of the English people, in an arena so large as the columns of the Times.

Nor is it only to the editorials of that journal to which, in these later times, our attention has been drawn. There are letters scattered here and there which show almost the vigor of "Junius," with more than his feeling. Nor shall we be wearying our readers, we are sure, if we interpolate here a fragment of a Times correspondent, who, like many another, is weary of that lordly routine which fills the church, the cabinet, and the army with names rather than with men:

"It is a singular and a melancholy sight," he commences, "to observe, at such a moment as the present, the reckless greed for place and power of the great families who have hitherto monopolized, with a few rare exceptions, the chief offices of State."

After speaking of Lord Goderich, and of Mr. Herbert, "who represents, in his own person, the united interest of several noble families accustomed to generate Cabinet Ministers," he comes to Lord Carlisle, "better known as the Lord Morpeth of the House of Commons. He is one of the most amiable and nicely-educated members of the House of Lords—a pretty scholar, and elegant lecturer, apt at quotation, ready at vers de société, and kindly and good-natured to all men. He has already filled half a dozen posts in the public service, and has proved himself unequal to the duties of every one of them. But then he is a Howard, and that fact alone gives him a title to high office, which the long and proved abilities of our Laings, our Paxtons, and our Petos can never hope to attain. When the late coalition government was formed, Lord Aberdeen hesitated to give this popular and genial mediocrity a seat in his cabinet; whereupon Lord Carlisle, instead of going into opposition, as the Whig custom is, betook himself to foreign travel; and the well-known result has been one of the weakest and most elegant little books that ever graced a drawing-room table. But, as it was deemed an absolute necessity that, according to immemorial custom, the Carlisle-Sutherland interest should be duly represented in the liberal cabinet, Lord Carlisle's nephew, the Duke of Argyll, then a mere boy, was actually lifted into it, as if with a baby-jumper, having previously filled no subordinate office whatever. He had, indeed, occasionally shown himself a promising but pert speaker in the Lords, and evinced talents which might have fairly entitled him to an under-secretaryship; but most certainly had he not been born a Scotch duke—had he not married a Leveson Gower, of the blood of the Howards—he never would have begun his public career in the position in which most successful public men end theirs. And since his appointment to that dignity this young duke has continued to be on the ministerial benches in the Lords precisely what he was when in opposition—eager, boyish, interruptive, and imprudent: no respecter of his superiors in intellect and experience, and so closely mailed in self-conceit as to be scarcely sensible to the well-deserved and withering sarcasms of Lord Derby.

"The late government broke down chiefly in consequence of the utter inaptitude of every body connected with it for the transaction of 'common things.' Our statesmen could exhibit astonishing energy and promptitude in ordering an army to winter in the Crimea, but they could not contrive to supply it with either food, clothing, or medicine, though it never advanced, and never will advance, ten miles from the shore on which it was landed. Tasks which the commercial houses of the city would have accomplished as incidental matters of course in the transaction of their other daily business, have proved impossibilities to our Newcastles and Herberts, solely because they were totally inexperienced in those methods of carrying them out with which all commercial men must be necessarily familiar. Does Lord Palmerston think that the accession of Lords Canning and Carlisle to his councils will mend the matter? Will their elegant scholarship and high-bred manners provide shoes for our perishing infantry, or feed our starving horses? I invite him to read the speech of Mr. Laing, delivered on Friday last, to discuss the state of our commissariat with Sir Joseph Paxton and Sir Samuel Peto, and then consider whether the introduction of such men as those into the Cabinet Councils of the nation would not avail him more than scores of high-born Argylls and accomplished Cannings. But then those gentlemen do not undoubtedly belong to the exclusive clique out of whom Cabinet Ministers have hitherto been selected; they are neither lords themselves nor have they married the daughters of lords; nor are their wives in the same set as the ladies of the Cabinet, therefore their intrusion might cause some social confusion in those family réunions which have hitherto been kept 'so select.' White's bay window, moreover, would probably sneer at 'common fellows' like these, who had actually presumed to raise themselves from nothing, being thrust into the councils of the aristocracy to carry out 'common things,' and the old ladies at Brook's would certainly meet and remonstrate at such an innovation upon the 'rights' of the great Whig families. Afraid, therefore, to face the combined opposition of decayed dandies, fine ladies, and hereditary Whig placemen, Lord Palmerston will, in all probability, continue to recruit his ranks, already quailing before the mass of 'common things' they are called upon to attend to, from young Christ Church tufts and from those mediæval failures of preceding Whig governments who cluster hopefully behind him in the Commons; and when the cup of England's misery and England's disgrace has been filled to overflowing—when the blood of our fathers, our brothers, and our children, sacrificed on the shrine of a greedy and incapable aristocracy, stains every hearth—when gaunt famine occupies every cottage, striking down those dear and tender ones whose very existence depended on the stout hearts and stalwart muscles of the 'common fellows' who are fertilizing in vain the soil of the Crimea—then will the Ministers of England recognize with regret their stubborn blindness, and deplore, when it is too late, that they have refused to be warned by the handwriting on the wall thus interpreted to them by

ONE OF THE PEOPLE."

In the very paper from which we cut this, we find also a fragment from one of Mr. Cobden's speeches, which, with more of temperance in language, yet with kindred tendency, shows us another powerful lever which is heaving at the great bulk of British Privilege.

He is speaking before the National Freehold Land Society: "He believed that ten times more injury had been done to this country by the laws that operate on the transfer and ownership of land than could well be described. The old feudal laws which had been perpetuated in this country in the rural districts had caused a complete divorce between the great mass of the people and the soil. Go into any of the rural counties and you could not find an agricultural laborer who had more interest in the ownership of the land than the horse he drove in the plow. They could not see that in any other country in the world but Russia. The effect of this monopoly in land, and of the laws that prevented the great mass of the rural population from acquiring land, had degraded them to a dead level bordering on barbarism. If they compared the peasantry of this country with those upon the Continent, where the land was more generally divided, how remarkable was the difference; and he would say to the aristocracy of this country at the present moment, do not stand in the way of any measures that may be brought forward, calculated to give facilities for the transfer and ownership of land in small quantities; and he would say to those in the interest of the British aristocracy—and he believed the wisest among them felt it—that one of the great dangers to the landed aristocracy of this country is the want of those buttresses which a larger number of small landowners would be to the institution of property in the hands of a few."

We cite these tokens of feeling and of inquiry in England because they are making up a large share of the talk, not only in the British isles, but upon the Continent. The world seems getting to an age when rulers are judged of by their fitness to rule, and when capacity for duty is judged of by the accomplishment of duty. It is a good catholic standard this, and it is making its way every where.

PUTTING aside the great subject of the war, and the fatal episode of the Russian Emperor's death, nothing has made more talk in the Parisian circles of the two months last past, than the recent trial of a French governess, Mademoiselle Doudet by name, for alleged brutality to three or four little English girls placed under her charge by their father, a certain Dr. Marsden.

In the first instance, the cause excited attention by the exceeding wantonness of cruelty which was charged upon Mademoiselle Doudet—so great even as to have caused the death of two of the children; and again, by the wonderful contrariety of testimony.

It appeared that the governess had been in the service, at one time, of the Queen of England, and was in possession of a strong letter of recommendation from Victoria; numerous other testimonials to her good character were brought forward from persons of eminence in England; and a certain Madame Schwab undertook a long journey for the charitable purpose of testifying to her full knowledge of the defendant's character, and of pronouncing a warm eulogium—in the presence of the court—upon her many virtues. It was further alleged in her defense, that her seeming cruelty was only the judicious exercise of a rigorous system of discipline, recommended by the father himself, warranted by the custom of British schools, and demanded by the vices of the children.

Against Mademoiselle Doudet it was urged that the children were kept in a famished condition, confined for days together without food; that they were beaten, tied foot and hand, and were in fear-the highest standard of morality in a frontier village in a wild country, but these people certainly carried the privilege of geographical position to an unjustifiable extent, and were, moreover, utterly devoid of the quality of personal courage, which is found elsewhere in similar situations.

"During my protracted journey in the wilderness, I had frequently, in the spirit which actuated Alexander Selkirk,* wished myself once more in a position to be cheated, and if I had selected from a minute map of the world, I do not believe that I could have had any wish so thoroughly gratified as at Yavisa.

"Our little canoes were laden to within a couple of inches of the water's edge, and as the tide turned soon after we left, we made slow progress, but after some four hours' hard paddling we arrived at the mouth of the river Tuyra of geographers, whence we ascended it about half a mile to Santa Maria, the residence of Mr. Lucre, where we were most hospitably entertained. As he had some medicines and ointment, our sores and boils were first treated; after which a pretty little woman, the daughter of the Jefe Politico, Mas Carinas, to whom Mr. Lucre was allied, in accordance with the custom of the country, prepared for us an excellent dinner, of which we partook thankfully. After dinner, finding that I could not be prevailed upon to pass the night, Mr. Lucre lent me his own canoe, and assisted by Mas Carinas and the Alcalde, I engaged three bogas on reasonable terms to convey me to Chapigana.

"At 5.30 we embarked, and I found that attention to my comforts had extended beyond the door of my hospitable entertainer, as a platform of boards was extended along the bottom of the canoe, upon which we could repose, as it appeared to us, luxuriously. Santa Maria de Real, as has been already mentioned, is about half a mile from the junction of the rivers Tuyra and Chuquanaqua, and contains, I should suppose, about six hundred inhabitants. The style of building is similar to that of the Indian villages on the Caledonia, which we passed on the second day of our journey, although the houses are inferior in size and stability. Two small rivers enter at this village, and the houses are irregularly scattered along their banks, and that of the Tuyra. Large canoes trade between this place and Panama, where they exchange live stock, timber, and plank, for cottons, Delft-ware, cooking utensils, and cutlery. The village has no priest, and the incumbent of Yavisa performs service there as well as in Chapigana and two other villages, Molincea and Pinogana, which are situated on the Tuyra above Santa Maria. With a strong ebb-tide we paddled rapidly down the Tuyra to its junction with the Chuquanaqua, and thence down the united streams, which at this place becomes very wide, though it retains the tortuous character which distinguishes its whole length above Yavisa. At the junction there is a fine view of the Pine Mountain, which rises abruptly from the flat wooded plain which intervenes, to the height of some 2000 feet. After our long confinement in the forest, where our view was constantly limited by the forest growth, it was an intense pleasure once more to see high land and enjoy a distant view, and I thought I should never tire of gazing on this high and isolated mountain. Beyond it, I was informed, there formerly existed an Inca city, or as the natives term it, a City of the King, while on this side was, during colonial times, a Spanish town of considerable importance, which sprang up rapidly near the mines of Espirito Santo, and as rapidly decayed when the mine was closed by order of the King of Spain, after it was found to have attracted the cupidity of the English Buccaneers.

PINE MOUNTAIN.

"In the beautiful moonlight, and with an occasional glimpse of the Pine Mountain, we drifted and paddled until about 10 P.M., when meeting the flood-tide we tied up to a tree, and each of my bogas addressed themselves to sleep; with me the attempt was nearly a failure, as I suffered such intense pain from my boils and the wood worms (Guzanos de Monte), that until nearly morning I found sleep to be impossible. My two men, too, suffered from the same causes, and about midnight we abandoned the idea, and made a late supper on some boiled salt beef which I had prepared at Yavisa.

"At the same place, in anticipation of this journey, and with direct reference to our ravenous appetites, which it appeared no amount of food could satisfy, I had some salt pork boiled also, and although I paid very liberally for the cooking, the beef only was returned to me, the pork having been confiscated as a perquisite of the cook.

"I had also purchased a turkey at the cost of three dollars and three quarters, and afterward paid one dollar for cooking the same, but was informed on the morning afterward that it had been eaten by the cat. The skeleton was shown to me, which proved conclusively that the meat of the turkey was gone; but as the depredation had been committed in the house of the Padre, who had considerable influence over the natives, whom I might have occasion to employ, expediency alone prevented me from inquiring whether the cats on that portion of the Isthmus used knives and forks.

"At a late hour weariness overcame the sense of pain, and I fell asleep, and awakened early in the morning to find the canoe under way, and near Chapigana, where we arrived about 6 p.m. I soon discovered the house of Mr. Hossack, a Scotchman, who had for a long time resided in that place, and from whom I received a kindly reception. From the river to his house I made my way with great difficulty, as the beach was covered with sharp stones, which cut my bare feet very severely. Golden had to be carried by two men, as he was too much debilitated to walk.

"By Mr. Hossack I was informed that the Virago had sailed for Panama two days before, and that she would return on the next Thursday. He also informed me that the engineers of the Atlantic and Pacific Junction Company, had a dépôt of provisions on the river Savana, at its junction with the Lara, where I could obtain all that was necessary for my party. I requested him to use his influence to obtain a canoe and bogas to convey me at once to this station, but found that none would venture, owing to the strong trade-wind which was blowing across the harbor.

"The day was passed in patching up our dilapidated physique, and in obtaining news; and it was then I learned, for the first time, that our long absence was generally observed, and had caused much uneasiness.

"Unable to write myself, I requested Mr. Hossack to communicate the intelligence of our arrival to his friends in Panama, to prevent unnecessary uneasiness among those who had friends in the party.

"Monday, March 13. A little before daylight we started in a large canoe, belonging to Mr. Hossack, and with three bogas, for the Savana; with a fair tide we passed across the broad estuary, which is by some considered the river Tuyra, and by others called Darien Harbor, and passing the mouth of the Iglesias and Arcti, on the left bank, entered the Savana, which we ascended until about half past 2 p.m., when we arrived at a penal establishment of New Grenada, which had been recently established, in order to assist Mr. Gisborne and party in the prosecution of their survey."

A few hundred yards above the Presidio stood the English dépôt occupied by the naval engineer, Mr. Bennett. He was an Irishman, tall, well-formed, and with a manly, noble presence. Strain, reduced by long starvation from one hundred and forty-five pounds in weight to seventy-five, covered with sores, and clad in such habiliments as the negro Alcalde at Yavisa could furnish him, presented the appearance of a common beggar rather than that of the Commander of the United States Exploring Expedition. As he approached he accosted a negro servant of Mr. Bennett, and inquired where his master was. The negro pointed to where he sat by a table, engaged in making drawings, surveys, etc. As Strain drew near, Mr. Bennett accosted him rather sternly, saying, in somewhat repulsive tones, "Well, Sir, what do you want?" The latter replied, "I am Lieutenant Strain, Commander of the United States Darien Exploring Expedition." "My God!" exclaimed the warm-hearted, noble man, as he caught him in his arms, and pressed him to his bosom, while the tears rolled down his cheeks: "Ah," said he, "we had given you up long ago as lost." He immediately ordered dinner; and, while Strain was eating, told him that he must remain there and recruit, and he himself would go back after his comrades. This was the more generous, as he was very lame from the effect of a large wood worm which had been extracted from his leg. Strain, of course, declined the offer. He then supplied him with provisions, brought out nearly all the clothing he had, saying, "Take these to the poor men;" forced on Strain his poncho, turned his medicine chest, and pockets too, inside out. Not content with this, he ordered a bed placed in Strain's canoe for him, stowed away books, cigars, indeed every thing his noble heart could suggest for his own comfort and that of his men. At five o'clock in the evening Strain, who, while the fate of his comrades remained uncertain, seemed impervious to fatigue, started back for Yavisa, where he arrived on the 15th. Going ashore, he ascertained that two of the men dispatched with Mr. Avery had returned. He immediately sent for them, and inquired the cause of their desertion. They replied they were out of provisions. This he knew to be a falsehood. Disgusted with their cowardice and knavery, he told them that he would not pay them one cent for their services unless compelled in course of law, and would then do it under a solemn protest, and refer the matter to their superior authorities. This threat he fulfilled religiously.

The next day the two bogas, who had returned from Avery's party above, sent him a note from the latter, dated March 13th, stating that he had already passed the place where they had constructed the raft on the 2d of March, but had seen nothing of the main party.

He complained bitterly of the indolence and cowardice of the bogas, whom he found great difficulty in keeping with him by threats and promises, but remarked that he hoped that day to find the party, and that he and Norriga would not return even if all the men left them. At the same time he urged Strain to follow him up without delay. Upon the reception of this intelligence, he was somewhat undecided for a time as to how he ought to act, but finally determined to wait the return of Mr. Avery, or of his party, in the event they should return without him. As his letter stated that they were still advancing, and already near the point where they might reasonably expect to meet the main body in their downward progress, he had little doubt but Avery would be successful, which would make another party entirely unnecessary. Even if he did fit out another party of natives, they would be no more likely to advance than that now with Mr. Avery; and should he accompany them up, and they insist upon returning before reaching the main body, a loss of time would be involved which might prove fatal to them. It was on this day that the Virago was expected at Darien Harbor from Panama, and, as a last resource, he could apply to her commander, and obtain men who would not be arrested by common obstacles. Still, while awaiting momentarily the arrival of Mr. Avery with intelligence, and perhaps with the missing party, he felt averse to leaving Yavisa, and determined to delay at least until next morning, before taking any definitive action. Upon one point he was determined—that if Mr. Avery was forced to return unsuccessful, the safety of his men should not be intrusted to the cowardly natives, but that he would obtain a party of English to accompany him, or, failing in that, would demand an escort of troops from the Granadian Presidio on the Savana, who by their muskets and bayonets might force the bogas to do their duty.

The day passed most anxiously, but as none of Avery's men returned, he augured favorably. The journal says here:

"Friday, March 17. Before daylight I was awakened by the Padre, who announced Avery's return. In answer to my first question, 'Have you brought the party?' he replied, 'One of them. I have brought Parks.'" He had passed the point where, on the 14th of February, the advance party had constructed the first raft, and discovered a cross on the bank, from whence was suspended a letter from Mr. Truxton, to which allusion has already been made in the record of the main party, where a copy is given.

Having read the letter, and discovered that the party were retrograding, he went into camp for the night, intending to follow them up the next day. This was the 14th of March, one month after the advance party had passed this point, and eight days before it was left by the main body under Mr. Truxton. On the morning of the 15th Mr. Avery, accompanied by Mr. Norriga and two bogas, in a small canoe, attempted to ascend the river in pursuit of the party, but meeting a log, about two miles above Holmes's grave, which extended across the river, as they erroneously supposed, they returned to the other men, who refused to go further. Every effort appeared to have been made to induce the natives to proceed, but fear of the Indians had obtained such a firm hold of their minds, that no inducement could be offered sufficiently tempting. Double pay for every day's additional service was offered them, double pay for the whole journey, with a handsome present to each boga upon their return to Yavisa, if they would only proceed up the river one day longer.

Their avarice, though great, appears not to have equalled their cowardice; and with gloomy anticipations, Mr. Avery hastened down the river to report his failure, and to obtain more men and further instructions. They started on their return from No. 2 Hospital Camp, and passing rapidly over the raft journey of the 15th of February, heard at meridian a call on the right bank of the river. Landing, they discovered Parks, who, it will be remembered, strayed from the main body on the 5th of March. He was unable to move, and slightly delirious, but gave what afterward proved to be a tolerably correct account of the condition of the party up to the 5th of March, when he lost himself in the forest. Of his own wanderings he gave no very distinct account, nor could he state how many days he had been absent from the party. From the 5th of March until the evening of the 14th he appeared to have been lost in the forest, and absent from the river; upon his return to which, the evening before he was found, he stated that he had drank six quarts of water, and laid himself down to die. For want of food he said that he did not at first suffer, as he had palmetto when he separated from the other two men, and cut down the palm-nut trees with his knife. His knife he finally broke, after which he obtained no more food, but could not remember how long that was after he was lost. His whole body was covered with wood-ticks, which were removed by Mr. Avery, after which he was oiled, to soften the skin, and relieve the sores.

Food was given him in small quantities, of which he at first wished to eat voraciously, but his hunger being soon appeased, he never asked again for it, although constant in his demands for water. He did not know Strain, but called every body Captain Strain. When brought into the presence of the latter, he got up by the side of the house, and, leaning against the wall, exclaimed, "Oh, Captain, Captain, give me some water!"

"What do you want?" replied Strain. "Oh, it is too late!" he replied, and sunk down and never spoke again, though, at the time, no one thought him dying.

Thoroughly alarmed at hearing that the main body had attempted a return—which Strain feared would terminate in a perfect route, and most disastrously to the lives of all—he only awaited until daylight to demand from the Alcalde a second force, to be placed under his own command, and with positive instructions, under the severest penalties known to the rude law of that region, not to leave him until they had overtaken the party. By dint of threats and exertions, he obtained the necessary orders from the Alcalde upon the local authorities of Yavisa, Pinogani, and Santa, to supply the requisite number with all dispatch, and immediately proceeded to the hire of five canoes. Says the journal :

"While arranging this important business, I was shocked by receiving intelligence of the death of Parks. I had left him but a few minutes before, apparently asleep, and though delirious he appeared strong, and was no more emaciated than the members of my own party. Ordering that a coffin should be made, and a grave dug, I charged Mr. Avery and the Padre with the care of his funeral, and prepared to set out immediately down the river to meet the Virago and ask their assistance, as I feared to intrust the safety of the party above to the cowardly natives, who might again return before reaching it.

"The Virago, I knew, ought to have returned on the day before, and I had determined, if by any chance she should have been delayed, to ascend the Savana to the New Granadian Presidio, and demand from the officer in charge a sufficient guard of soldiers to insure the obedience of the bogas whom I had requested to be drafted for the expedition. I hoped that military discipline might have repaired to some extent inherent cowardice, and that the bayonets of the troops would appear more formidable than the remote danger from the Indians. Unwilling to delay one moment longer than necessary, I left instructions with Mr. Avery to embark the provisions and medicines which I had brought up, and set out as soon as the natives should arrive from the various adjoining villages. Meanwhile the Jefe Politico, Mas Carinas, arrived, and a demand was made upon me by the bogas who had accompanied Mr. Avery, not only for the pay which had been promised them, but for the extra pay which he offered them on condition that they should accompany him until the party was relieved." The additional pay he refused to give them, and reproached them bitterly for their cowardice and roguery in stealing nearly all the provisions which he had with great difficulty obtained and destined for his own men, whom they had so scandalously abandoned to their fate.

The altercation waxed warm, and Strain's life was threatened; but he presented a six-barreled pistol, and kept them back, while a threat from the Jefe Politico that he would consign them to prison finally restored order.

Uneasy, vexed, and indignant, he finally threw himself into his canoe, and taking advantage of the remainder of the ebb-tide, swept rapidly down the river in search of assistance of such a character that he could risk the lives of his party upon it.

Extra pay and constant urging induced the bogas to pull even after the tide had turned, and when they could no longer make any headway against the current, and were forced to anchor, they had already made some sixteen or eighteen miles.

Immediately after anchoring, Strain was informed by a fisherman that an armed English boat was coming up the river; and soon after, to his great joy, she made her appearance, moving rapidly with the tide. He immediately got under way to intercept her, and, upon hailing, found that she contained a party from the Virago, under Lieutenant W. C. Forsyth, which had been sent to his assistance by Captain Edward Marshall, who, in a very polite note, congratulated him upon his arrival, and requested him to bring his whole party on board his ship. Mr. W. C. Bennett also accompanied the detachment, and it was to his promptness and energy that this timely assistance was rendered; for, as soon as he heard the Virago's guns at the mouth of the Savana, he jumped into a canoe, and, paddling himself, hurried down and stated Strain's urgent necessities, which induced Commander Marshall to expedite his expedition so that it left the Virago at midnight on the night previous. It is true that the intention to send a party up the Chuquanaqua already existed; but the promptness of Mr. Bennett, and his earnest representations, advanced its departure several hours, and thus saved Strain the voyage to Darien Harbor. The latter immediately transferred his baggage from the canoe to the paddle-box boat, and arrived at Yavisa a short time after dark. He there learned that answers to the call for men had been received from neighboring villages, but that none had yet arrived, though they were expected in the morning.

The next morning they were stirring early, and every effort was made to obtain canoes for the ascent, as they had determined not to wait the arrival of the natives, but to have them dispatched after by the Jefe Politico and the Alcalde. The constitutional tardiness of the natives, increased by a partially-concealed dissatisfaction at the arrival of the English officers and seamen, delayed them for some hours, and it was not till afternoon that, partly by entreaties, and partly by force, they obtained three canoes and put off.

The tide and some fourteen English oarsmen propelled them rapidly up the stream, and they only halted when it became so dark that they could proceed no farther. While at anchor near the bank, an incident occurred which had nearly proved fatal to the expedition and all engaged, and for a moment seemed to indicate that destiny was against them, and that the unfortunate party had been marked for destruction. At eleven o'clock at night, when all were asleep in the boat except the two sentries and Strain, the latter heard amidst the profound stillness a cracking and rending of timber in the woods, which he knew at once to proceed from a falling tree. He first thought it was some distance from the bank, but on looking up to see whether it was likely to strike and bring down any other timber nearer the shore, he saw against the starlit sky, directly over his head, the dark and swaying form of a tree gradually declining toward the spot where the unsuspecting boats lay moored. His first thought was, "My poor men will now be lost!" He, however, never opened his mouth, but watched the descending mass without moving, as it came directly toward him. Suddenly, as if turned aside by some unseen hand, it inclined to the right, and fell with a fearful crash into the river, a few feet behind, tearing off a piece of the stern of one of the canoes which was moored alongside. Shouts and exclamations followed, and for a moment the greatest consternation prevailed among the seamen, who thought the Indians were upon them; but the voices of the officers, and assurances that the danger had passed, soon restored order. Mr. Avery, who slept in a canoe alongside, had a narrow escape; but fortunately a good wetting was all the inconvenience which any of them experienced.

Next day was Sunday, and all were early at work and advancing up the river. About mid-day they were joined by two canoes containing eleven natives, who had been dispatched after them by the Jefe Politico in Yavisa. At two o'clock they arrived as far as the paddle-box boat could go, and after a hasty dinner, embarked the officers and a portion of the men in the canoes. It was at this point that Strain had discovered tide-water on the 4th of March, during the downward journey.

From this place down to the harbor of Darien, a distance of fifty miles, there is no obstacle to the navigation, and even at the lowest stage of water about two fathoms can be carried. Above this salto the same draft might be carried during the rainy season; but the immense quantities of floating timber at that time, combined with the narrowness of the stream and the frequent rapids, will probably prevent the river being navigated even under the most favorable circumstances. The gunner of the Virago and eight men were left in the paddle-box boat, Avery and Wilson remaining with them, neither of them being in a condition to render much service, and requiring rest and diet. Still Mr. Avery, with an endurance and spirit which honored him, offered to go on, if it was thought he could afford the slightest assistance. Mr. Bennett had brought his own canoe, so that, with the two owned by the natives, they had now six in all. The largest of these was given to William Ross, and was intended as a hospital. He was accompanied by the paymaster, W. H. Hills. Mr. Forsyth took charge of the canoe next in size to that of the surgeon, Mr. Bennett of his own, while Strain selected the canoe of the lightest draft for himself. The remaining two were managed by the natives, who halted to dine, while the main party proceeded over the rapids, which—the tide being out—were passed with great difficulty. At night, when they encamped, the natives rejoined and encamped near them. The 12-pound howitzer in the paddle-box boat was heard distinctly at 8 p.m. This was Sunday, and the next morning, March 20th, after a hearty breakfast, they started in the same order as on the previous day; but before mid-day, Strain found that the exertion of paddling a canoe was too great for him, and that his feet had become fearfully swollen. He accordingly ordered the Padron of the natives to put one man in each canoe, both to paddle and steer it, while two English seamen were retained for the sole purpose of paddling. The officers having managed their own canoes thus far, it had a good moral effect, and convinced the natives that the whites were not so dependent on them as they supposed. The dexterity which the English seamen displayed in the management of the boats surprised every one, but was accounted for by the fact that the Virago had been for some time under repair in Puget Sound, on the north-west coast of America, where the sailors had frequent opportunities of amusing themselves with the canoes of the Indians, which are much less stable even than those of the Isthmus.

At dark they encamped on a shingle beach, and, after a hearty supper, set the watch, which consisted of one officer and two sentries. The remainder were soon asleep around the watch-fires.

As rapids were becoming frequent, one of the native canoes was detailed to assist the English to stem the strong current, which they did by dragging them over by hand. The other was permitted to go ahead for the purpose of hunting, in which the men were very expert. Passing several well-recognized camps of his downward progress, and intervals which it had cost him days of hard labor to accomplish, they encamped after sunset, the 21st, on the rocky beach upon which Strain had slept the 16th of February, after having abandoned his raft in the morning.

The raft and paddles were still there, and one of the latter, which Strain made with a macheta, was secured as a memento by one of the English officers, and afterward proved useful when another was broken. The abundance of food, two fires, the bustle of many men, and the sound of many voices, was a pleasing contrast to the chilly, foodless, fireless nights which he had passed in the desert. Still there was a "plus ultra" which prevented enjoyment, and his silent exclamation was, "Oh that I could bring the remainder of the party to the same degree of comfort, and I should be content!"

At ten o'clock next morning they arrived at No. 2 Hospital Camp of the main body, where, upon the cross over Holmes' grave, Mr. Avery found the letter from Mr. Truxton, informing Strain of his intentions to go back. Landing, Strain examined it critically, but could find no indications of disorganization or route. An old hat and pieces of cloth lay about, but there were two regular camps, with their respective fires, and evidences of an attempt at comfort. The camp of the men was nearest the water, while a path had been cut to the officers' camp, which was about forty feet distant. In the latter he discovered a tree that had served as a target for pistol-shooting, which convinced him that they were neither utterly dispirited or so short of ammunition as he and his party had been. Although the rude attempt to raise the evidence of Christian burial over one of the men who, in high health and spirits, had left the Atlantic coast, could not but produce the saddest reflections, yet he was already prepared for it, and left the camp with brighter anticipations, from the evidences of continued discipline and organization which he had observed. The native canoe-men at this point remonstrated against proceeding further up the river, but as he indignantly refused even to listen to their representations, they postponed the discussion for a future occasion.

Ascending rapidly, they arrived at the fallen tree which had barred Mr. Avery's upward progress; but, upon examination, it was found that, in falling, the roots had opened a narrow channel between it and the bank, through which the small canoes passed easily. The larger ones experienced more difficulty, but with a half hour's cutting of the bank all got safely through, and the ascent was rapidly continued. As the day declined obstacles became more numerous, and much skill and dexterity were displayed by the natives in passing under and over fallen trees which extended across the river, near the level of the water.

As they continued to ascend they saw small crosses along the banks, erected, according to previous arrangement, by the main party as they descended, to point out to Strain their progress when he should return with assistance. But the signs soon ceased, and although they passed numerous return camps, there was no symbol from which it could be inferred that they had the remotest hope of relief from below. Worn-out belts and cartouche boxes, found in camps on the river, showed that the party were dispensing with all unnecessary weight, while pieces of leather cut from the latter gave evidence that their boots and shoes were nearly worn out. Quills and feathers of the loathsome buzzard scattered along, revealed the character of food to which stern necessity had at last driven them. In the afternoon they arrived at the camp from whence Strain had taken leave of the party, and found that it had been revisited by them, the evidence of which was the remains of a fire and some cartouche boxes which had been discarded. About sunset they encamped on a sloping bank, and passed a night of torture, owing to the myriads of mosquitoes which infested the camp.

This was a sad night for Strain. From the examination of to-day's camp it was evident his command had given him up for lost, and commenced the desperate undertaking of finding their way back to the Atlantic shore. The prospect now grew painfully alarming. Strain could not sleep, but agitated, anxious, and feverish, sat up all night fanning himself. The noble-hearted Bennett kept him company nearly the whole night, and cheered him with promise of assistance to the last. He told him that a fearful and trying day was before him on the morrow—alluding to the revelations which the camps of the men would make. He requested him also to get a pair of boots of one of the men, and try by degrees to wear them; for, said he, no one can tell how distant the party may be, and when we ascend as high as the boats can go, the natives, you know, will refuse to advance, and, in all probability, the English seamen also, as they have a mortal dread of the Indians. And as Strain turned inquiringly toward him, he added, "And, you know, when all shall turn back, you and I must shoulder our haversacks and take to the woods alone, till we find your men." This noble self-devotion of a stranger and foreigner—this grand, high purpose to cast his lot in with the distressed commander, and save his party, or perish with them—reveals one of those lofty, elevated characters which shed lustre on the race.*

At early daylight, when the sand-flies relieved the night-guard of mosquitoes, they rose to prepare for a day of labor and excitement, as Strain had every reason to believe he should overtake the main body of his party before night. As they were now nearly in the heart of the Isthmus, and might possibly meet Indians, a regular order of sailing was adopted, and the canoes followed each other in close order.

Strain led the van, accompanied by a canoe containing three natives, who, sailing close along the edge of the shore, examined each camp and searched the river bank step by step. At about nine o'clock, Strain was startled by the cry from the Padron:

"Here is a dead body!"

For a moment he was intimidated, and shrank back as if smitten with a death-chill, and was on the point of asking some one to land and examine it in his place. He did not know which of his friends or comrades he might find stark upon the beach, and for a moment wished to escape the horrible spectacle. Reflection, however, soon convinced him that it was a necessity which must be met, perhaps even till he had counted up, one by one, all of his command, and, nerving himself for the worst, he shoved his canoe ashore. Birds of rapine and beasts of prey had left little more than the skeleton, but a glance at the linen shirt under the blue uniform of the party showed at once that it was an officer. Upon a closer inspection of the bones and skull, he discerned that it was the remains of Mr. Polanco, the junior Granadian commissioner. The outline of a grave was below, which induced the officers and men who accompanied him to believe that the body had been buried and afterward disinterred by wild beasts; but Strain read the history of the recent tragical events more accurately.

The grave was too short for Mr. Polanco; besides, there was not sufficient evidence that the ground had been torn up, while the clothing, flattened over the bones, showed plainly that they had never been covered with earth. He felt, therefore, rather than knew, that Mr. Castilla, his companion, lay beneath, and that he, faithful in death as he had been faithful and docile in life, had laid down and died upon his grave. Where he lay there they interred him, sacredly gathering together even the finger bones; and, placing a cross over the joint remains of these unfortunate, educated, and talented young men, before whom but a few weeks previous a bright future appeared to be opening, they continued their journey saddened and subdued by the melancholy spectacle.

The English officers could not witness it, but turned away sick and sad. It was not till after they had left the spot, that Strain mentioned his convictions concerning the grave, lest some one might propose a delay for the purpose of examining it. The dead were beyond reach of human assistance and human sympathy, but to those who remained of his party delay might be death.

At about 10 A.M., a tree was met extending entirely across the river, which had to be cut in two before a passage could be effected. Cheerfully and heartily the English seamen went to work; but the natives, for a long time, hung back, and, after a consultation, declared that they would go no farther.

Grieved and distressed beyond measure by the fearful sight he had just witnessed, and feeling that the skill and dexterity of the natives were becoming every hour more essential to his success, Strain was thoroughly enraged by this despicable conduct. He entreated, upbraided, and threatened by turns, and gave them to understand that, even should they escape alive from his own party of armed and determined men, whose success depended in a great degree upon their assistance, the grape and canister of the howitzer in the boat below would prevent their reaching Yavisa. He wound up his harangue by swearing, with the most solemn oath known to those barbarians—viz., by the soul of God—that, even if they should escape these dangers, he would devote the remainder of his life to their punishment. Sorrow and anger combined gave an impressiveness to the solemn oath—especially as he presented a six-barreled revolver to their breasts, declaring that at least six of them should never return. After a short and frightened consultation, they agreed to continue on the remainder of that day. Although Strain hoped confidently that the party would be overtaken before night, he did not accept of these conditions, as he was determined that they should never abandon to a fearful death men whose lives were of so much more value than their own, especially as they had embarked in the enterprise, and by their promises induced him to consume time which was beyond price.

For some hours, early in the afternoon, they lost sight of the return camps, and the English party, officers as well as men, became apprehensive that the party had abandoned the river. But on this subject Strain felt no anxiety, as he knew that they would not dare to leave the
